

The Grand Canyon!

*A Worldwide, Year-By-Year
Anthology and Annotated
Bibliography of Personal Encounters with the World's Greatest Draw
1540–2022*

compiled and edited by
Earle E. Spamer

---

COVER ILLUSTRATION: “Grand Canyon of the Colorado[,] Arizona. America the Land of Many Wonders”. Detail of the cover of a Doan’s Kidney Pills advertising brochure, Doan’s Directory of the U.S. With Latest Census of Large Cities 1913 [-] 1914 (Foster-Milburn Co., Buffalo, New York, 1913). The brochure contains no other reference to Grand Canyon. (Artist not credited.)

ABOVE: Fine detail from William H. Holmes, “Panorama from Point Sublime (Part I. Looking East.)”, Sheet 15 in Atlas to Accompany the Monograph on the Tertiary History of the Grand Cañon District (Clarence E. Dutton, U.S. Geological Survey Monograph 2, Atlas, 1882). The artist depicts himself sketching the scene, apparently with Capt. Dutton observing. (Lithography by Julius Bien and Co., New York.)

The Grand Canyon!

THIS IS A HYBRID DIGITAL DOCUMENT IN BOOK LAYOUT

DIGITAL USERS: The entire text of this PDF document is searchable; use your program's "FIND" command. Hyperlinks also appear throughout. To view it in book format with opposing pages, use the appropriate viewing mode with the cover page separate so that odd-numbered text pages appear on the right. A wide screen is essential for convenient two-page viewing. An opposing-page display is, however, not mandatory for the use of this volume.

Hyperlinks are used in the Table of Contents and in other selected places in the volume, as indicated. Position cursor and click to jump to the indicated sections.

NON-INTERACTIVE USERS: The CONTENTS pages (pp. i-ii) list the physical page numbers for the entire volume.

“The First View”

The Grand Canyon!

A Worldwide, Year-By-Year

Anthology and Annotated Bibliography of Personal Encounters with the World's Greatest Draw

1540–2022

compiled and edited by

Earle E. Spamer

THE GRAND CANYON ! A WORLDWIDE, YEAR-BY-YEAR ANTHOLOGY AND ANNOTATED BIBLIOGRAPHY
OF PERSONAL ENCOUNTERS WITH THE WORLD'S GREATEST DRAW, 1540–2022

Compiled and edited by Earle E. Spamer

© 2022 Earle E. Spamer

Spamer, Earle Edward (1952– ) (comp., ed.)

The Grand Canyon! A worldwide, year-by-year anthology and annotated bibliography of personal encounters with the world's greatest draw, 1540-2022

Raven's Perch Media, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, USA

FIRST EDITION

xii, 1343 p. : Portable Document Format (PDF); electronic resource, <https://ravensperch.org>

Registered electronically with the U.S. Copyright Office OCTOBER 2022

All text quotations or illustrations from publications prior to 1927 are in the public domain and may be used freely; no copyright now exists on that material. Annotations and all other textual material herein are those of the compiler and editor. Material reproduced by permission is so indicated. (Consult <https://guides.library.cornell.edu/copyright/publicdomain> regarding public domain conditions; last accessed September 21, 2022.)

The extensively quoted principal material that is presently in the public domain—through 1926—also appears in a more readable, reformatted complementary volume, “My God, there it is!” The World Encounters the Grand Canyon, 1540-1926 (Raven's Perch Media, 2022). The texts from NON-ENGLISH items here in The Grand Canyon! are transcribed in their original languages and are translated into English. In the complementary volume the original-language texts are omitted but are cross-referenced to The Grand Canyon! to aid those users who may need to see the original texts.

This is not a commercial product and is not distributed by sale. The author receives no remuneration or services for the preparation or distribution of this product. Ascertaining the availability or accessibility of cited items is the user's responsibility.

This publication is originally produced in a searchable-text PDF format, which requires the use of the free Adobe™ Acrobat™ Reader or comparable Adobe product. It is designed as a book for screen viewing or printing. To view it in book format with opposing pages, use the appropriate PDF viewing mode so that odd-numbered pages appear on the right. Any page may be reduced or enlarged without degrading text or original image quality.

REPRODUCTION AND FAIR USE • No commercial or for-profit use of this work is allowed without the author's permission. Not-for-profit organizations, educational institutions, government agencies, and Indigenous communities may with credit use this work for purposes of resource management and interpretation, education, and public outreach; they also may download the entire document for cataloging and inclusion in their digital products collections, and they may freely allow users to copy this document for their use if it does not violate either the conditions given here or specific limits of copyright law that may not be waived by this fair-use statement. Reuse of this work, in whole or in part, for any purpose, must cite author, title, publisher, and notice of copyright. Academic or other individual researchers may copy selections for personal reference and may quote from this work following best practices of acknowledgment in scholastic research.

Replication of the entire document is permitted in order to ensure preservation or to migrate to different software, or medium not now in existence, when the technology to use the original digital copy is unsupported, inadequate, or obsolete. A documentary copy of this work in a non-digital medium is permitted for reference use or to preempt the loss of the work due to technological change that may no longer permit this work to be accessed by the means for which it was originally designed.

This statement does not pertain to, nor supersedes, copyrights of items that still may be under copyright protection.

---

FRONTISPIECE. “The First View” in John L. Stoddard's Lectures, Volume Ten (Balch Brothers Co., Boston, and George L. Shuman and Co., Chicago, 1898, p. 174.) — The scene is at Hance's.

The Grand Canyon!

CONTENTS

(All lines are hyperlinks—position cursor and click to jump ahead)

Note to Federal and Native American Administrators	iii
“The Imperial City of Silence”—Early Documentation of the Experience and Perception of Silence in the Grand Canyon, 1869–1926	iv
INTRODUCTION	1
What Is In, and Omitted From, The Grand Canyon! ?	6
Translating and Transliterating	9
Anthologies and Retrospective Collections	12
Publications of Rephotography	14
Marginal Symbols	15
PART I. Primary Expedition Narratives	17
Pedro de Castañeda de Nájera 1540	19
Other Expedition Accounts	35
Reprintings and New Translations of Castañeda	36
Francisco Tomás Hermenegildo Garcés 1776	38
Translations and Excerpts	39
Balduin Möllhausen and Joseph C. Ives 1858	43
Reprinting	58
Accompanying Maps (Grand Canyon)	58
Other Expedition Accounts (Including Translations)	59
James White 1867	75
Contemporary Publications Noting the James White Affair	85
Possible Knock-off	89
Historical Overviews and Discussions	89

The Grand Canyon!

John Wesley Powell 1869–1872	92
Principal Reprintings and Translations (Unabridged or Mostly So)	105
Publications of Expedition Journals and Accounts by Expedition Members	107
Additional Descriptive Accounts By Powell	111
Contemporary Publications Noting the Powell Expeditions	115
Principal Retellings	117
George M. Wheeler 1871	120
Ancillary Expedition Publications That Include Grand Canyon	125
Clarence Edward Dutton 1878–1880	127
Reprintings	139
Robert Brewster Stanton 1889–1890	141
Other Expedition Accounts	150
Contemporary Publications Noting the Stanton Expedition	150
Other Publications	152
PART II. To, Into, and Expressing the Grand Canyon	155
1870–2022	157
Date Undetermined	1145
PART III. Down (and Up) the Colorado	1153
1861–2022	1155
Date Undetermined	1342

The Grand Canyon!

NOTE

To Federal and Native American Administrators

THIS VOLUME documents the “use” of the lands you manage as a resource in and of itself. Much of it probably has never come to your attention and thus it may offer a new perspective of the breadth of interest and participation that people have had with the Grand Canyon. These items are, each in their own way, reports of activities; and however elegantly or not the experiences are described or portrayed, their value is limited if an audience does not know of them.

This bibliography omits publications that pertain to scientific research and to cultural resources of the Grand Canyon. Thousands of these publications are already cited and summarized in other bibliographies and documentary sources.* Instead, here are personal reports and perspectives, first-hand or told on behalf of the participants.

The people who are cited in this bibliography are from around the world. They express their encounters with the Grand Canyon through writing, lecturing, painting, sculpting, photographing, filming, composing music and theatrical performances, and designing architecture. In their activities they share their experiences and impart their impressions of visits to the Grand Canyon, briefly and indulgently alike. These people are your authorities on the ways the Grand Canyon is “used,” by the general public mostly, your expert witnesses to personal Grand Canyon experiences.

The writers and poets have communicated in many languages. The prose accounts not in English are translated herein—often for the first time, so they are bound to be newly recovered information. Writers’ abilities to communicate themselves are subjective, of course, but they all are undeniable. The record assembled here provides far more information than has previously been available. It shows how the world has interacted with the canyon, over centuries. It forms a set of authentic references that document the attention to, activities on, and impressions of the lands that are today secured by governmental agencies of the United States and Native peoples. ●

---

* See particularly THE GRAND CANON: A Worldwide Bibliography of the Grand Canyon and Lower Colorado River Regions in the United States and Mexico, by Earle E. Spamer. Volume I is an exhaustive, topically arranged bibliography of more than 100,000 citations, and Volume II is a comprehensive cartobibliography of more than 3,700 items; together they comprise a bibliographical canon. The various editions of THE GRAND CANON, plus many more related bibliographical resources, can be acquired free of charge through the Raven’s Perch Media website (<https://ravensperch.org>) and in libraries that may have incorporated these digital documents into their digital resources collections.

The Grand Canyon!

“THE IMPERIAL CITY OF SILENCE”

Early Documentation of the Experience and Perception of Silence in the Grand Canyon, 1869–1926*

IN RECENT decades “silence”, “quiet”, and “soundscapes” have been buzz-words in various aspects of administration, resource management, and aesthetic perspectives at Grand Canyon—largely due to negative perceptions of the noise of aircraft overflights and motorized rafts on the Colorado River. Many scientific studies and public-opinion investigations have been made to assess these things at Grand Canyon. Yet these qualities were even a century and more ago an important part of the Grand Canyon experience, which testifies to a fact that “silence” and its effects on human experiences are a natural appreciation, and the perceived negative impacts of technology do not themselves instigate such awareness. The table presented here is titled with appreciation to John J. Bohn, who first wrote of the canyon as the “Imperial City of Silence” after a 1910 visit to Grand Canyon by the Hotel Men’s Mutual Benefit Association. The quotations are arranged according to the year of visit to Grand Canyon; or if not known, inserted according to the year of publication.

Quotation	Source	Year of Visit
THE WRITERS
The river rolls by us in silent majesty; the quiet of the camp is sweet.	Powell 1875	1869
We sat in silent awe, spell-bound, not speaking lest the magic power which held our spirits in mute ecstasy might vanish.	DeMotte 1872	1872
Perhaps the mention of its beauty and sublime depth, its silence, until the dislodgment of a single pebble awoke thundering echoes from its jagged abysses ....	Cushing 1882	1882
... no sounds but those made by ourselves broke the oppressive stillness.	Whitmell 1892	1883
And above all arches the incomparable blue sky of Arizona, flooded with golden sunshine, of mighty beauty that makes one fall silent.	Lindau 1885	1883
... the stillness and desolation which reign here forever.	Allen 1887	1887
With our camp that night beside a quiet, gently-flowing river, with not a sound to disturb, it is no wonder that we went to sleep with thankful hearts, and overslept ourselves in the morning.  The stillness was only broken by the roar of the river as it rushed along beneath me.	Stanton 1890	1890
As the sun rises over the surrounding platform, what a silent, curious change creeps over the whole scene!	Stanton 1893	1890
Not a breath of wind, not a sound disturbs the silence and does not prevent the great voice of nature from being heard.	Stainier 1893	1891

* The cut-off date of 1926 represents the last year (at the time of publication of the present volume) in which most published works are all in the public domain; thus the quotations are free of copyright restrictions.

The Grand Canyon!

Quotation	Source	Year of Visit
It was all so vast and strange and the silence so intense.            . . . we sat in awed silence watching the marvellous transformations in every direction. But it saddens one a little to think of those long echoes being roused by the shriek of a locomotive—that eloquent silence in which we listen with bated breath for the voice of God as it was heard in the beginning when His Spirit “moved upon the face of the waters” and he said, “Let the waters be gathered together and the dry land appear”—broken forever by the footsteps of civilization.	Yucca 1893	1892
. . . one feels the primitive instincts waking up, and, asleep in the grass under the stars, one dreams of a nomadic life in greenery and silence, freed from civilizations . . . .	Dugard 1896	1893
A loud company of Americans who had just arrived in their wagon drove me away from the wonderful spots; they of course immediately had to shout an echo and thereby destroy the main attraction of the wonderful picture, the tremendous silence.	Fromholz 1897	1895
There are some scenes in the presence of which the most sublime emotions are lost in the awful sense of the infinite, where the grandest form of expression is absolute silence. The silence was profound. The return to camp was made in the noontide heat, but our path was shady and we had time to observe the more quiet beauties of nature, that relieved the mental strain to which we had been subjected.	Shoshone 1895
Anything that hints at a “timetable” is entirely out of place in the presence of this solemn, silent and magnificent exhibition of the prodigality of time.	Williamson 1900	1895
A white, silent hour when the air seemed full of whispering voices; not the wild hymn of the beasts, but that greater call of the Unknown that has haunted the hearts of men in City and Wilderness alike . . . .	Hall 1907	1897
And we, unless we are of sterner stuff than the insensate rocks, must tremble too as we stand here listening to the most appalling silence that ever smote the ear of man, an awful silence that seems to tell the endless story of eternity and death.	Holmes 1914	1898
The big river has just room enough to flow and roar obscurely, here and there groping its way as best it can, like a weary, murmuring, overladen traveler trying to escape from the tremendous, bewildering labyrinthic abyss, while its roar serves only to deepen the silence.	Muir 1898
Many grand objects in the world are heralded by sound: the solemn music of Niagara, the roar of active geysers in the Yellowstone, the intermittent thunder of the sea upon a rocky coast, are all distinguishable at some distance; but over the Grand Cañon of the Colorado broods a solemn silence. The God-appointed celebrant, in the cathedrals of this Cañon, must be Nature.            . . . Her prayers are silent, rapturous communings with the Infinite. No voice of man, nor cry of bird, nor roar of beast resounded through those awful corridors of silence.	Stoddard 1898
The majesty of the surroundings is in keeping with the solemnity of the moment, and the profound silence of the chasm seems to invite the thunder tones of the great Judge.	Anonymous 1899

The Grand Canyon!

Quotation	Source	Year of Visit
We wandered along the quietest sylvan path . . .	Monroe 1899
You cannot paint a silence . . . . Come and behold the indescribable scene, where silence seems to have dimension and color.	Fitz-Mac 1899
Hank: "Some of them are silent, and sit and stare like you do."	Jenness 1912	1901
I found the heat and silence fearful. But when the clouds would part and pass for a time and stillness and sunlight come again, all would be as before.	Miller 1901
. . . for a few moments at least, there is silence, and all are in dead earnest, as if awed and hushed by an earthquake . . . . Instead of thus riding in dust with the crowd, more will be gained by going quietly afoot along the rim at different times of day and night . . . Walking quietly about in the alleys and byways of the Grand Cañon City, we learn something of the way it was made . . .	Muir 1902
But only silence came back from the second stone [kicked over the edge]—such a silence as was overpowering . . . .	Rouse 1902
. . . its silent majesty and diverse beauty chiefly speak of the creative genius of the Almighty Builder . . . .	Fox 1903
The first at the goal urged the stragglers to hurry by waving; so before long we had all reached our destination and it was strange; although 80 people were present there was complete silence; no words of admiration escape our lips . . . .	Marek 1906	1904
. . . but the chasm is silent as death, and through its channel there sweeps a clear, untroubled air.	Treves 1905
The two impressions are of numberless infinitely—reaching horizontal lines and of eternal silence. One feels that this illusory apparition is the spirit of silence that dominates the scene. And it is the silence of the place that appalls; for such a turmoil, even of rock, as rages beneath one, would seem in the nature of things to need some wild voice to release its wrath; but here is silence so deep that an engine's scream could not rend one corner of the measureless pall. One is bewildered with the maddening thrall of pulsing air, and throbbing color, and beckoning lines all leading to dreams of infinite life; and against that—the silence of infinite death. . . . the great kaleidoscope of color that is streaked and splashed through this petrified silence . . . . At night the silence of the stars and the silence of this pit—each eternal and maddening to human consciousness—mingle in an awful spell that falls upon the soul like the lonesomeness of the grave. There is something of death in life and of life in death in the grim inevitableness of this silence, so changeless and yet so vital.	White 1905
. . . there would come moments of silence as though each one was vainly struggling to realize that only a few feet away on the right lay that awful brooding chasm, as deep as the ocean and as profoundly silent as the stars.	McCutcheon 1909
We stand with bated breath in the overwhelming silence . . . .	Orr 1910	1909

The Grand Canyon!

Quotation	Source	Year of Visit
The place was silent as a tomb—save at intervals when the faint voices of the descending tourists stole upwards through the morning air.	Rice 1909
The spectators are silent, awe-struck.	Van Loan 1910	1909
[title] The Imperial City of Silence ... the silent, inaudible music that seems to come from the mysterious and unknown depths of this mighty Imperial City of Silence, unfelt to the ears, and seemingly to all the outward senses, has a meaning never felt before.	Bohn 1911	1910
All was still with the silence of infinity.	Stevens 1911	1910
The immensity of the scene . . . tend[s] to beget in the beholder an attitude of silent wonder and solemn admiration.	Burroughs 1911
I watched the sun set at Hopi Point and stood as in a dream while the enchanted colors illumined the domes and temples of nature's silent sanctuary.	Ford 1911
The mysterious awed silence overhanging the whole scene is almost overwhelming.	Lynch 1911
... these silent, somber solitudes . . . .	Harker 1912
Ever the winds sigh and drop into those sun-swept silences.	Du Bois 1913
We stand entranced, appalled and stupefied. All is dead; all is silent; all is ghastly.	Long 1913
It is a quiet, restful place away from the whirl and noise of the city, where the wheels run round and people go distracted.	Munk 1914
Were it not for its variegated tints, its living rejoicing colors[,] it would be a symphony of desolation, despair and silence.	Belcher 1915
The silence thunders about one's ears.	Cooke 1915
It was about six o'clock in the morning, and the jostling, noisy world seemed very far away. On the whole it was rather a breathless day, but we had a half hour's quiet after dinner and before traintime, in which to sit on the comfortable benches overlooking the Canyon as the sun gradually withdrew.	Dunbar 1915
The silence—broken only by the rising and falling moan of the pines!	Griggs 1922	1915
There is nothing to do before this unspeakable glory but to be silent and still . . . .	Graves 1915
... the bigness and the awful stillness beggar description . . .	O'Shaughnessy 1915
He stood in awed wonder gazing silently at the greatest mystery of creation.	Parks 1916
For this Titan of Chasms . . . melts small human pride to modesty and calms the turmoil of life's stress by its size, by its silence, and most of all by its age . . . .	Steele 1917
It is a sight to enjoy in silence . . . .	Shepherd 1922	1919
And the peace and the silence! Lord, Lord, the silence! [A reminiscence of the Grand Canyon overheard on the New York subway.]	Willsie 1919
It is the silence of aeons into which you look—it is Silence's self . . . .	Bridgman 1920 [quoting Flora Field]

The Grand Canyon!

Quotation	Source	Year of Visit
Ever the winds sigh and drop into those sun-swept silences.	Du Bois 1920
... almost always same transparent blue sky with white clouds arches over this place of silence.	T. v. H. 1920
... [its] turmoil inhumanly silent, its soundless battle of colour . . . .	Ayscough 1921
The vastness and the changelessness create a sense of solemn silence. This intense silence is the most awesome thing.	Bryce 1923	1921
And those canyons: the great big canyon and its little canyons, the smaller models being in themselves so great as to bring a great spell of quiet over us as we invaded their depths.	Elder 1922	1921
But there [colors] actually lie smiling in that awful unbroken silence. ... thunder and lightning are swallowed up in the mouth of the eternal silence.	J. T. Ford 1921
As you look upon this marvelous evidence of the forces of nature, the stillness, the quietness seem to grasp you; here you will find noisy outbursts out of tune and almost a sacrilege . . .	Levy 1921
... to what extent do I comprehend the sublime result of this work of some invisible hand . . . —a silent language than which no other could pay so high a tribute to the silent grandeur that had inspired them.	Morse 1921
If one wanders alone amid its vast silences, sleeps by its surging river, or rejoices at sunset and morning hours on its commanding viewpoints, he will be lifted by its very presence out of his narrowness of life . . . . The spirit of the canyon is never revealed to the tourist who jokes upon its brink and who rides a mule to the river, for true impressions come only with sympathy and with silence. It was the sunset hour and the silence of the evening filled me with its peace . . . .	Jeffers 1922
The only way to salute the silence of the Canyon was by—silence.	Johnson 1922
The strange stillness of those profound depths brooded everywhere. . . . No human voice, or song of bird, or tread of beast, resounded through those corridors of silence.	Pearce 1922
... in silence and deep humility he discovered God as never before.	Sitterly 1922
Day and night, a Sunday peace reigns over the Grand Canyon, and the silence is deeper than that which reigns in the desert. The silence is enigmatic, mysterious, almost oppressive. It is like being alone in a church one night, where you see nothing and hear nothing, but still know that you are surrounded by images of saints, pulpits, altarpieces, candelabras and tombs, but everything is silent and the soft organ is silent. ... nothing disturbs me, no sounds are perceived, no voices are heard, the most perfect Sunday peace reigns over everything and I sit alone in the top row and have before and below me the most grandiose spectacle that exists on earth. I was happy when I heard the noise of the motor coaches die away, and the silence return to the forest. An undisturbed, almost eerie silence reigns over the surroundings.	Hedin 1925	1923

The Grand Canyon!

Quotation	Source	Year of Visit
There is a wonderful pull upon the imagination in many ways at the Grand Canyon. We sat quietly and watched the changes as the sun went down.	Schaick 1925
THE POETS [Arranged by year of publication]
Heaven finds on earth some quiet dwelling-place . . .	Brooks 1894
. . . immense and sombre colonnades, In silence wrapped and trancelike quietness . . . A stillness round them, save what odorous winds Sigh fitfully in dreams . . . . . . while nature slept In trancèd stillness strange and ominous. _____ Which now in their unbroken quietness Reflect from ages the tranquillity That still inhabits the vast universe . . . _____ . . . the tense silence of the wilderness . . .	Nesmith 1894
. . . those shudd'ring depths, Which rear their stony, silent heads aloft . . .	Denison 1902
Vague, silent, mystical—its depths unfurled . . . _____ Enchanted castles, silent as the tomb . . .	Wood 1903
O symphony of form and color and silence . . .	Lloyd 1904
Below, the awesome cañon's vast array Swam silent in its sea of azure light . . .	Taylor 1904
Silence! and solitude! . . .	Finley 1906
A thought of God on earth expressed! The silence of His perfect rest!	Raymond 1906
[Title] Silence of the Canyon	Riley 1906
I gaze in awe and silence here . . .	Crawford 1908
A vast and depthless wound in nature's breast, Where silence broods and glooms in sleepless rest . . . _____ The gloom with mystic music, moves and thrills The heart and chastens into silence all The world . . .	G. H. S. 1912
. . . see revealed the carven glory of the inner world, Templed, domed, silent . . .	Daingerfield 1913

The Grand Canyon!

Quotation	Source	Year of Visit
A stillness deeper than the dearth of sound Broods over thee: a living silence breathes Perpetual incense from thy dim abyss. _____ ... Canyon Marvellous The secret of thy stillness lies unveiled In wordless worship! ... Garden of Temples filled with Silent Praise, If God were blind thy Beauty could not be!	Van Dyke 1913
Abysses keep their silver silences ...	Curran 1917
All earth waits silent, wrapt in strange affright— When lo! creeps down the quiet, starlit night.	Rieseberg 1918
O canyon, Earth's dumb symphony, thou expressest the glory of silence; thou hast colored indeed thy notes. Looking on thee, I hear thy fathomless Silence.	Cabot 1919
... The silences that roll.	Belknap 1921
I am the Grand Canyon. ... My Silences are organ-toned,	Bryan 1921
I have seen that which is mysterious, Aloof, divided, silent; Something not of this earth. _____ Silent and windless, The forever completed Is never broken but by clouds. _____ ... the chasm rekindling, Would build up its silent poem of colour to the sun.	Fletcher 1921 [dated 1915]
For thine is the Kingdom of Silence ...	Strauss 1921
Stillness! Immensity that needs no voice! _____ How more than silence in the awful calm! _____ ... the holy hem Of the great Maker's garment that is spun Of stillness and of awe.	McCarthy 1923
The solemn deathlike stillness, Silence that almost speaks, E'en Nature's voice is hushed ...	Peters 1923
... A harmony so consummate that it shared The silence of the sky ...	Noyes 1925

Men do not read descriptions of the Grand Canyon as they stand on its brink . . . .

— Anonymous, 1908

The Grand Canyon!

INTRODUCTION

By Boot, In Saddle
and with Motor, Oar and Paddle

The Grand Canyon! is all about being at and interacting with the Grand Canyon.

So much has been written about the Grand Canyon from personal experience that it may be surprising that a comprehensive record of these impressions has never been put together. Never has every reference been compiled —nor for that matter have so many items been forgotten from the very time they were published. Yes, there are bibliographies, but most of them are specialized or embrace the tremendous hail of everything that goes beyond personal records and impressions. The Grand Canyon! cites, quotes, and annotates the published records of personal encounters with the Grand Canyon, or accounts told on behalf of those who were there, from 1540 to 2022.

True, a number of items have been reprinted in whole or in part in anthologies and similar volumes of prepared reprintings (see pp. 12–13), but they are selective; some repeat the “same old” things. Beyond that, seemingly innumerable writers have quoted the “same old” passages from “A-list” authors like John Wesley Powell and Joseph C. Ives, even though Powell, Ives, and the others had many more interesting things to say beyond those quotations. This volume has to use these standard works, too. But it goes far beyond them, gathering up things that have been forgotten or effectively never known. As for “B-list” writers (and lower), some of them probably should remain forgotten—for their unstimulated perceptions or tortured prose and verse—but this is not a work of critical analysis. Here is everything, as much as could be found, each someone’s personal experience, lavish and cursory alike, each a part of the Grand Canyon story, take it or leave it. Some things were published in languages other than English, which of course hid their discovery at least among readers of English. As many of these as possible have been found, too; and they are reprinted in their original languages and in English translation herein. To have subjectively edited out the “less worthy” or “overly wordy” publications, or those that simply are not in English, would dismiss the very administrative purpose of this volume—to document the world’s infatuation with—its “use” of—the Grand Canyon.

The Grand Canyon!

This volume documents what is otherwise understood only by intuition or supposition—that the Grand Canyon is an intensely attractive draw, and people have “used” its resources intensely. This volume goes beyond prose, gathering up the works of poets and the publications that record the work of artists, photographers, musicians, cinematographers, and architects—all of those people who have used their crafts to express their impressions of the canyon. And it has seemed logical to split the main part of this volume into the two principal Grand Canyon venues—arriving and seeing it from the rim and on its trails, and experiencing it along the Colorado River.

The Grand Canyon! is complemented by another volume, based on this one: “My God, there it is!”: The World Encounters the Grand Canyon, 1540–1926. The complementary volume arranges for that time period, in a more aesthetically pleasing and more easily read layout, all of the transcribed texts that appear in the The Grand Canyon!, prose and poetry alike. But for those items originally in non-English languages, only the English translations are published there. Readers who need to consult the original non-English texts are, through cross-references, directed back to pertinent enumerated citations here in The Grand Canyon! The complementary volume gathers all the publications that are now in the public domain; that is, those that have lapsed from any copyright protection—at present it contains all those things through 1926. The digitally published public-domain texts that appear in both volumes can also be freely reused for users’ own specific needs.<sup>1</sup>

WHEN THE first non-Indigenous people, a small crowd of expeditionary incursionists from Spain, arrived on the canyon rim nearly five centuries ago, in 1540, they eventually realized the intimidating size of the canyon but they were not rapt, excited, or meditative—at least that we know of. They left; and the general public knew nothing about the visit for three centuries.

The next caller was Francisco Garcés, a Spanish Franciscan friar who in 1776 spent five days with the Havasupai Tribe before moving on. He appreciated the overwhelming ruggedness of the canyon barrier, but other than to confer upon it the name Puerto de Bucareli, to honor the Spanish viceroy of New Spain, he said relatively little about it; and again, the visit was for some time unknown.

---

<sup>1</sup> The citations in these two complementary volumes have been culled from the far more comprehensive bibliography by Earle Spamer, THE GRAND CANON: A Worldwide Bibliography of the Grand Canyon and Lower Colorado River Regions in the United States and Mexico, currently in its fourth edition (2022). (The Grand Canon, however, does not extensively quote from many of its citations.) All of the works mentioned here—including “My God, there it is!” and more—are freely available through the Raven’s Perch Media website, <https://ravensperch.org>.

The Grand Canyon!

It was the expedition under the command of Lt. Joseph C. Ives, U.S. Army Corps of Topographical Engineers, that launched the Grand Canyon into the public eye. In 1858 the government-backed expeditionary party traveled up the Colorado River by steamboat from the Gulf of California to Black Canyon. A land party struck out to the east, stopping at the Grand Canyon twice—in Peach Springs Canyon, where they reached the Colorado River at Diamond Creek, and on Cataract Creek (Havasupai Canyon) where a few men descended nearly to the Havasupai village known today as Supai, Arizona. The historic illustrations produced by the expedition's artists, Balduin Möllhausen and Friedrich Wilhelm von Egloffstein, published in 1861, immediately drew the canyon into the imagination of readers, in America and Europe particularly.

John Wesley Powell's first Colorado River expedition, in 1869, was eagerly followed by the public for its adventure, which situated the Grand Canyon among the geographical and geological wonders of the world. Three men were killed in unclear circumstances after they abandoned the trip and climbed out of the canyon, even though the survey was nearly completed. During and after a second river trip in 1871–1872, Powell extended his surveys on land, culminating (at least with regard to the Grand Canyon) with work north of the canyon during 1879–1881. From that work Clarence Dutton's overwhelming Tertiary History of the Grand Cañon District, with its magnificent double-folio Atlas, was published in 1882. The text included his marvelous, chapter-long description of the view from Point Sublime. Artist Thomas Moran had accompanied a Powell party on land a decade earlier, from which visit he produced his epic canvas, Chasm of the Colorado (1873–1874, below), which, with his Grand Cañon of the Yellowstone (1871), was purchased by the federal govern-

Thomas Moran,
Chasm of the Colorado, oil,
7 × 12 feet.

(U.S. Department of the Interior.)

The Grand Canyon!

ment and hung in the U.S. Capitol. These works cemented the American public's fascination with the canyon, and announced to a wider world community the scenic, aesthetic, and scientific values of the grand scenery of the American West.

When in 1883 the Atlantic & Pacific Railroad completed its trackway across northern Arizona, its division point at Peach Springs offered the traveling public access to the Grand Canyon for the first time. Julius Farlee was quick to capitalize (somewhat) on this, advertising a stage conveyance into the canyon, which followed, as had Ives a quarter century earlier, Peach Springs Canyon and Diamond Creek to the Colorado River. He also threw together a shack of a "hotel" at the Diamond Creek confluence for the use of his guests. All of his services were at best rudimentary, as the reader will (re)discover herein.

The fledgling town of Flagstaff also soon capitalized on the presence of the "grander" portion of the canyon nearby, though the sixty-mile venture by wagon from the railroad was more ambitious than was the dusty, rocky descent into the canyon at Peach Springs. John Hance built a cabin and tent accommodations for visitors on the verge of the canyon rim and continued to improve on them. So in short order, Hance's was the favored destination. Peter (Pete) Berry soon thereafter offered a somewhat more sumptuous, though still rustic, hotel at Grand View, several miles west of Hance's. Both Hance and Berry, and their employees, conducted trips into the canyon at their respective places; some visitors experienced both. Hance's offerings, at least at first, could be downright harrowing, sending his guests in several places down (and back up) steeply pitched or dangling ropes. Berry's trail was just plain steep.

And my oh my, did everyone then have something to say about the Grand Canyon. That, in essence, is it—everyone has to say something about it.

So began America's, then Europe's, and then the world's love affair with the Grand Canyon. All things considered, it has not been a tourism lure for really very long, barely a century and a half, with the numbers burgeoning only within the last century.

Yet even at the start, adventurous men took to the river—women did come later. First was the ill-fated expedition led by Robert Brewster Stanton in 1889–1890; a scouting and photographing trip meant to establish the route of the flash-in-the-pan Denver, Colorado Cañon & Pacific Railroad. Three men lost their lives in the river during the first part of the journey, which then was cut short in order to regroup and continue the following year. And when the photographer was seriously wounded, Stanton himself, not a trained photographer, had to take over that duty (with admirable results).

The first party to run the river strictly for adventure followed in Powell's and Stanton's wakes in 1896, when George Flavell and Ramon Montez rowed from Green River, Wyoming, to Yuma, Arizona; though we could not share much of their venture until Flavell's diary was published in 1987. Running the Colorado River through Grand Canyon became by the 1940s a certain thing, even though at that time only fewer than three hundred people had made the trip, most of them with early commercial outfitters who offered a genuine wilderness experience.

The Grand Canyon!

The enlightened years of environmentalism that erupted in the world conscience by the 1960s also opened up the Colorado River in ever broader ways, attracting more of the everyday folk to the outdoors. By the centennial of the first Powell expedition thousands had taken oar- and motor-powered commercial trips through Grand Canyon; some 15,000 by 1969 but ballooning to more than 100,000 by 1976—and by 1995 more than a half million could claim to have gone through Grand Canyon. The total number reached a million soon after 2020. One of the earliest tallies of canyon visitors was noted for 1892, when just 149 people took the ride from Flagstaff to Hance Camp. The rising figures for visitation to the national park after its establishment in 1919 are progressively astonishing. From just 37,745 visitors that year, the numbers reached a half million by 1947. The million mark was passed in 1956; in 1992 more than four million visitors descended on the canyon; five and a half million in 2015; and more than six million in 2017.<sup>2</sup>

These figures represent the millions and millions of people who have felt the need just to go to the Grand Canyon. Thousands have written about their experiences, especially in the past several decades, about which we know thanks to the proliferation of newsletters and organizational magazines that have been made much more freely available in PDF format on the web. Before about 1990 we had to wait usually for inkprint products to appear in mailboxes and on the shelves of libraries and stores; and there were plenty. (We will barely acknowledge the deluge of contributions via modern social media, which range from excellent to mindless.)

Yet the expressive forms by which people have experienced the Grand Canyon are more far-reaching than writing essays and travel notes. Poetry comes to mind, and quite a lot of verse has been written about the canyon. But there are other artistic expressions—paintings, musical pieces, stage performances, and architectural constructions, for example. These forms are well represented, too, as means by which encounters with the canyon have been interpreted and shared.

---

<sup>2</sup> Park visitation figures and river-runner counts from C. V. Abacus [pseudonym of Richard D. Quartaroli], "River Runners of the Grand Canyon: Over 1,000,000 served", Boatman's Quarterly Review, Volume 53, no. 3 (Fall 2022), pp. 20-22. The early visitors' figures are as mentioned by Lilian Whiting, The Land of Enchantment: from Pike's Peak to the Pacific (Little, Brown and Co., Boston, 1906). The figure from 1892 was mentioned by Max Graf von Zeppelin, who visited in 1893 ("Das Grand Canon des Colorado in Arizona", Vom Fels zum Meer (Stuttgart), Volume 14, no. 2 (April/September 1895), p. 263).

The Grand Canyon!

What Is In, and Omitted From, The Grand Canyon! ?

THIS IS a bibliography of as much as which could be found where people have published about their experiences at and in the Grand Canyon, including items that were written about or otherwise feature the experiences of others. These are by, or are about the work of, common travelers, professional and casual lecturers and authors, essayists, poets, chroniclers, artists, photographers, cinematographers, musicians, and architects. If it pertains to personal experiences in the Grand Canyon in any way, and personal expressions based on these encounters, it is cited here.

And if you have ever questioned just how far-ranging is interest and infatuation with the Grand Canyon, this is some proof. We know that people have been coming from far and wide; the “gate” records of the national park particularly document this. We know, too, from the published record that most of them gush about their experience. A few writers grouse about their time at the canyon; a few rather dismissively treat the canyon as a check-box on a form; and fortunately fewer still have been so unenthused that they turn about and leave. This bibliography documents these visitors and their impressions—they all are the “users” of the Grand Canyon. Until now, our information was limited essentially to intuitive or inferential statements, which are not the sort of things that would “stand up in court”.

The Grand Canyon! is more than “just” a bibliography, though. I have taken the opportunity to gather together what the writers and other “users” have done, making this a readable and reusable bibliography. In its digitized form (PDF), users can extract texts for other uses. Works published before 1927 are now all in the public domain; we can freely quote and re-use them. I have quoted extensively those experiences; those that are in non-English languages I provide both the original texts and translations. For publications after 1927, I resort more to annotating the citations that appear herein in order to provide context or specific data that may help the reader decide whether these are items to be pursued, or at the least used in some summary fashion.

It may seem ludicrous to transcribe into this bibliography any part of the widely known primary publications—particularly those of “A-list” writers like Ives, Powell, and Dutton. (I now add Möllhausen to the “A” list because, until now, his complete Grand Canyon experience has been out of reach to readers who understand only English.) While my quotations may parrot the work of anthologists and casual quoters by the hundreds before me, I recognize that adjacent portions of the usual quotations have been unfortunately passed over, even though they do give more perspectives of these writers’ inner feelings and expressive talent. As for the remainder, among whom are some who lack expressive talent, they convey personal impressions to a wide audience, all of whom contribute to the experience of having been to the Grand Canyon, and on the Colorado River. So I offer the time-worn transcriptions, with some additional pieces that hopefully expand upon the “usual” quotations, placing them in a more engaging frame of reference. And in the company of these long and short, reused quotations are hundreds of items that have not seen the light of day since they were first published. This allows the reader to place in perspective—in one place—all of the quotations presented herein. It is, after all, the very purpose of this quoted and annotated work to provide something, rather than to simply direct the reader to “go find” the originals (if they have access to them). Then for the thousands more that are not quoted due to copyright protections in effect, this volume accounts for them with annotations, thus bringing a huge number of items to attention, many of which have been unknown to Grand Canyon readers and viewers.

The Grand Canyon!

The bibliography quotes, in partially edited and annotated form, the experiences people have had with the Grand Canyon, from the time of the first foreigners’ visit in 1540. The editing process has removed portions of these texts that do not relate to or otherwise meander from the Grand Canyon experience, as well as various less-essential passages such as repetitive recitations of the physical dimensions of the canyon, and other repetitions that distract from the overall “feel” for the author’s experiences. In addition to the use of the regular ellipsis (. . .) to indicate that words or phrases are omitted, I have adopted an older format of ellipsis whereby a different symbol represents the omission of more than a sentence, sometimes even more than a paragraph. Older style manuals may show this as a string of asterisks (* * *), a style which incidentally is still employed by the U.S. government’s daily Federal Register. I instead use a bulleted form (• • •) that is aesthetically more pleasing and seemingly less ambiguous.

Throughout this volume, all quotations spell “canyon”, “cañon”, and “canon” (with or without a capital “C”) as they were published.

There are some quotations that have been so often repeated (reflectively, though sometimes giddily) that I thought it best to not only simply transcribe them but to reproduce these shorter passages in facsimile, to allow the reader the enjoyment of seeing them exactly as they were printed. (For example, Joseph Ives’ pronouncement—reprinted to death—that the Grand Canyon is a “profitless locality” that no one will ever be bothered to return to. I also provide in facsimile for the first time, all four pertinent pages of the 1596 manuscript copy of Pedro de Castañeda’s chronicle of the Spanish encounter with Grand Canyon of 1540 [he was not a member of that party] even if it seems like so much scribble to some readers.) These few selections of facsimile reproductions are inserted where appropriate.

First-person accounts are preferred, although selected items recount individual trips by others or offer special perspectives and retrospectives. General productions “about” the canyon, travel guides, the “travel-tips” genre, and items of “interesting facts” are not included; they must include some aspect of personal encounters or expressions. However, brevity does not discount a citation herein, because it may reflect the casualness of the author’s impression; these include items that, for example, are photos that simply show

The Grand Canyon!

“proof” or “pride” of having been at the canyon. These are encounters with the canyon every bit as much as are hiking or river expeditions, publicized in numerous venues.

Artistic expressions—paintings, poetry, musical pieces, theatrical performances, and architecture, for example—are included because these are every bit of personal expression as are written words. Some of the marginal symbols that are seen throughout The Grand Canyon! flag these non-written forms of expression (see a key on p. 15). Notices for, and reviews of, exhibitions and concerts with material specifically about Grand Canyon are included.

Planned trips or itineraries of forthcoming tours are not included, although some announcements for lectures about trips are listed if they are not summarized or otherwise noted later. In some cases, all we now know of some lectures are through announcements or summary records of an institution’s or organization’s lecture series for the previous year; thus these records are an important chronicle of Grand Canyon experiences.

General articles of the “canyon moods” and “world wonders” genres are overlooked if they are not personal reflections or products of a trip to the canyon; nor are general “goings-on” and “Grand Canyon happenings” articles included.

Strictly biographical material about Grand Canyon personages is omitted, but autobiographical productions are listed. Also omitted are “history-of” retrospectives, unless they include significant first-person commentary. Generalist reviews of the geography of the Grand Canyon region are overlooked. Except for selected lectures and presentations, and special commentaries on personal experiences, strictly technical publications and material about scientific or social studies is omitted.

“On-demand” publications such as those that have become prominent in the early 21st century are not included herein if all that has been done is to reprint an older work (often from those that are in the public domain). Newly produced, original “on-demand” publications are included.

If an item’s title effectively summarizes its content or perspective, the title serves as an annotation.

Novels are not cited; they are not, I contest, acceptable to the “encounters” theme of this bibliography. A novel’s author may well have been “inspired” by the Grand Canyon, or has made the canyon the center of attention, but the content is, frankly, made up—the author was neither there nor witness by eye or ear to what transpires in the pages of the novel. It is neither an “encounter” nor an “experience”.

There are occasional references to “THE GRAND CANON” Volume 1 or 2, which pertains Earle Spamer’s far more comprehensive worldwide bibliography of the Grand Canyon and lower Colorado River (Glen Canyon Dam to the Gulf of California). Many citations in this larger work include more bibliographical information for individual works. THE GRAND

The Grand Canyon!

CANON, and all components of it, are found on the Raven's Perch Media website; and some libraries may have incorporated it into their digital-publications collections.

Translating and Transliterating

MANY CITATIONS in this bibliography are for publications and products that are not in English—Arabic, Afrikaans, Basque, Bengali, Catalan, Chinese, Croatian, Czech, Danish, Dutch, Esperanto, Estonian, Faroese, Finnish, French, Galician, German, Greek, Gujarati, Hebrew, Hopi, Hungarian, Icelandic, Ido, Indonesian, Italian, Japanese, Korean, Latvian, Lithuanian, Macedonian, Marathi, Norwegian, O'odham, Polish, Portuguese, Romanian, Russian, Serbian, Slovak, Slovenian, Spanish, and Swedish, Thai, Turkish, Ukrainian, Vietnamese, Welsh, Yiddish.

All non-English items specify the language and provide a translation of the item title—for example, this book by a Frenchman who had visited the Grand Canyon (which unusually for the date was a trip to the North Rim):

Tissandier, Albert

1886      Six mois aux États-Unis : voyage d'un touriste dans l'Amérique du Nord, suivi d'une excursion à Panama. Paris: G. Masson, 298 pp. [In French.]
(transl. 'Six months in the United States: a tourist trip to North America, followed by an excursion to Panama')

In the main entry herein, Tissandier's Grand Canyon experience is then both quoted in French and translated into English.

In this bibliography, for convenience transcriptions are displayed in dark brown and translations in dark blue print; the citation also notes the language in dark red print. There is no other special significance to the use of color, and monochrome displays or printouts of the document will see no appreciable fading as the result of the original colors. And so as to maintain an unambiguous appearance of the quotations in a monochrome display or printout, all transcriptions appear in this volume within nested double quotation marks ( " ") and all translations appear within nested single quotation marks ( ' ') ("nested" meaning that every paragraph unambiguously leads with a quotation mark so as to distinguish the quoted material from editorial remarks and other annotations that appear within [square brackets]).

Most translations have been obtained through the use of Google Translate online. Admittedly, Google Translate is imperfect, insofar that it is a so-called "neural machine translation service" that translates a sentence at a time, which over time has "learned" to construct better and more grammatically correct sentence structures and word selections. But far from the translations herein being a simple transfer of translations from Google Translate, they are the product also of judicious editing, first for sense, then when necessary using retranslations to avoid awkward synonymies introduced by Google Translate. Conventional foreign-language dictionaries have assisted, as also have other translation resources. I make this note here so that users of this volume can take into consideration any perceived negative aspects of Google’s programming interface during the timeframe when the translations were made, chiefly during 2021–2022. Still, the translations are reasonably good, if not accurate, within the subjective nuances of foreign-language translation.

The Grand Canyon!

This note also applies to the corresponding transliterations that appear in this bibliography. In many bibliographies, titles and other information about publications produced in non-Roman orthographies are usually cited in transliteration only because the non-Roman character set is not available to the printer (or to the author of the bibliography) or is deemed unessential. While transliteration is somewhat helpful, in that the information can be “sounded out”, variant transliteration schemes for some languages render the citation less precise, less intelligible, to users who follow other schemes. For the non-Roman orthographies, I have had to rely on Google Translate’s transliterations exactly. Again, note of this is given in the event of future recognition of issues with Google Translate’s methodologies during the period in which I have used it. Particular schemes of transliteration are not indicated in this bibliography because the sources referred to rarely provide such information, even when I have obtained the information from a library’s catalog.

For citations in non-Roman orthographies (Japanese, Chinese, Korean, and others) I do usually provide both a transliteration and a translation in English. Because I do not read the non-Roman orthographies, and inasmuch as they are effectively unintelligible to users like me who are familiar only with Roman orthography, the inclusion of a transliteration facilitates reading by users who could not otherwise even mouth the words; and the inclusion of the original orthographical information (so often omitted from bibliographies) aids those who can read this information and makes it available to users who may seek additional help in locating these works. The information can be copied straight out of this digital document to enable such assistance.

The citations provide non-Roman titles and other information in a format slightly different from that shown above, so as to keep associated data together, in order. Citations that have long, compacted passages of non-Roman orthography, transliteration, and English translation are difficult to visually tease apart, so I have devised a method of colorizing some of this information to make specific portions stand out more clearly. The original title, being the key bibliographical component, is printed in black as usual; it may be followed by a transliteration [in gray font between brackets], then an English translation [in dark blue font between brackets].<sup>3</sup> For example, this citation from a Japanese serial:

---

<sup>3</sup> The gray and dark blue fonts are used for the visual convenience of those working with the original digital version of this bibliography, so that the transliteration and the translation in English are more noticeable amidst the original data and notational texts. Text in supplemental colors may yet be distinguishable even when a monochrome printout from this bibliography is referred to. Colors have no special significance to the textual content presented in this bibliography.

The Grand Canyon!

Shigeji, Īda [飯田茂次]

1956 欧米素描 (一八) [Ōbei sobyō (18)]. [Western drawings (18).] 日本釀造協会誌 [Nihon jōzō kyōkai-shi] [Japan Brewery Association, Journal (Tokyo)], 51(1): 26-31. [In Japanese.]

Travel record. See “二二 グランキャニオン (Grand Canyon)” [22; gurankyanion (Grand Canyon)], pp. 26-29.

In longer citations, the data are easier to tease apart when so organized and colored, such as in this citation in Chinese by a woman who wrote of her Grand Canyon experience while working for the concessioner Xanterra in the food court at Maswik Lodge:

Zhang, Meiyu [張美玉]

2018 希望種子 個人生活心得；淡江大學 財務金融系畢業；美國大峽谷國家公園打工度假分享 [xīwàng zhǒngzǐ gèrén shēnghuó xīndé; dàn jiāng dàxué cáiwù jīnróng xì bìyè; měiguó dà xiágǔ guójiā gōngyuán dǎgōng dùjià fēnxiǎng] [Hope Seeds personal life experience; graduated from Department of Finance, Tamkang University; working in the Grand Canyon National Park, USA]. In: 2018 下半年度：希望種子半年報 [2018 Xià bànniándù : xīwàng zhǒngzǐ bàn nián bào cáituán fārén huá gù jiàoyù jījīn huì] [2018 second half : Hope Seeds semi-annual report]. [Taiwan]: 財團法人華固教育基金會 [Cáituán fārén huá gù jiàoyù jījīn huì] [Huagu Education Foundation], pp. 4-9. [In Chinese.]

In this bibliography, non-Roman information, if not taken digitally from the original publication, has been extracted digitally from web sources, particularly WorldCat and specific library catalogs that have recorded information in non-Roman orthographies. Occasionally I have resorted to printing from a digitized but uncopyable version of the text, then used optical-character recognition (OCR) to render the texts in digital format that could then be copied into the bibliography.

Traditional and simplified character forms of Chinese both appear herein, depending upon whether the original publication or a library catalog record was followed. For transliterations, the pinyin system of romanization is usually followed for Chinese text, again based on the sources. These will be recognized by the inclusion of diacritical marks in the pinyin texts. However, some older citations may be represented in other transliteration systems as used by the sources seen. Further, some Chinese monosyllabic and polysyllabic transliterations are as taken from online catalogues or from automated translations, without regard to linguistic precision in the language itself. These may be displayed either as a “solid” or compound transliteration, which forms a series of long, single “words”, or other times they appear as a string of single-syllable sounds; again, as used by the sources consulted. Similarly, Japanese mono- and polysyllabic transliterations appear in various forms herein. These are only guides, and no attempt has been made at standardization; only to provide usefulness.

In the end, should evidence indicate a substantial flaw with this process, the transcribed texts in their original languages (and orthographies) are still available, herein, to users of this bibliography who either can read these languages or who wish to digitally extract the original data for other uses.

The Grand Canyon!

Anthologies and Retrospective Collections Containing Articles, Essays and Poetry About Grand Canyon or the Colorado River in Grand Canyon

Users may wish to consult any of a number of anthologies and similar works that embrace the Grand Canyon or the Colorado River. Not all of these works will be exclusive to the canyon and river. As noted in the Introduction, many of these works will include the publications that are cited herein, but also take note that many of the works in the present bibliography (being unique) do not appear in the usual anthologies and collections.

- Anderson, Peter, and Kempa, Rick (eds.). Going down Grand : poems from the Canyon. [Fruita, Colorado?]: Lithic Press (2015).
- Babbitt, Bruce (compiler). Grand Canyon: An anthology. Flagstaff, Arizona: Northland Press (1978).
- Berger, Todd R. It happened at Grand Canyon. Guilford, Connecticut, and Helena, Montana: TwoDot (Globe Pequot Press) (2007).
- Engelhard, Michael (ed.). Hell's half mile : river runners' tales of hilarity and misadventure. Halcottsville, New York: Breakaway Books (2004).
- Fleck, Richard F. (ed.). A Colorado River reader. Salt Lake City: University of Utah Press (2000).
- Grand Canyon Private Boaters Association, Special Issue: Reflections—Five Years of Fun—A Waiting List Anthology. The Waiting List, 6(1) (Summer/Fall 2002).
- Gulliford, Andrew (ed.). Outdoors in the Southwest : an adventure anthology. Norman, Oklahoma: University of Oklahoma Press (2014).
- Kempa, Rick (ed.). On foot : Grand Canyon backpacking stories. Flagstaff, Arizona: Vishnu Temple Press (2014).
- Kuhne, Cecil (ed.). The armchair paddler : an anthology of canoeing, kayaking, and rafting adventures. Birmingham, Alabama: Menasha Ridge Press (2000).
- Kurtz, Beverly (ed.). Why we boat : running rivers on our own. Flagstaff, Arizona: Vishnu Temple Press (2018).
- Linford, Dick, and Volpert, Bob (writers, compilers). Halfway to halfway and other river stories. Bend, Oregon: Halfway Publishing (2012).
- Linford, Dick, and Volpert, Bob (writers, compilers). Halfway to halfway and back : more river stories. Bend, Oregon: Halfway Publishing (2018).
- Long, John, and Sponholz, Hai-Van K. (eds.). The liquid locomotive : legendary whitewater river stories. Helena, Montana: Falcon Publishing, Inc. (1999).

The Grand Canyon!

- Newman, Lance (ed.). The Grand Canyon reader. Berkeley, Los Angeles, and London: University of California Press (2011).
- O'Reilly, Sean, O'Reilly, James, and Habegger, Larry (eds.). Grand Canyon : true stories of life below the rim. San Francisco: Travelers' Tales (1999).
- Ryan, Kathleen Jo (photographer, producer). Writing down the river : into the heart of the Grand Canyon. Flagstaff, Arizona: Northland Publishing (1998).
- Sadler, Christa (ed.). There's this river . . . : Grand Canyon boatman stories. Flagstaff, Arizona: Red Lake Books (1994).
- Sadler, Christa (ed.). There's this river . . . : Grand Canyon boatman stories. 2nd ed. Flagstaff, Arizona: This Earth Press (2006).
- Schlesinger, Arthur M., Jr., and Israel, Fred L. (eds.), Grand Canyon experiences : chronicles from National Geographic. Philadelphia: Chelsea House Publishers (2000).
- Schullery, Paul (ed.). The Grand Canyon: early impressions. Boulder, Colorado: Colorado Associated University Press (1981).
- Thorum, Reho R. (ed.). Canyon voices : a selection of poetry about the Grand Canyon. Fredonia, Arizona: Reho R. Thorum (1982).

The Grand Canyon!

Publications of Rephotography

Some specialized publications are useful studies of comparative views of natural and cultural features at and in the Grand Canyon, most notably those that have made modern, comparative views of identical scenes from a century and more ago. These all are means of experiencing the Grand Canyon and the Colorado River, too, though with the added benefit of sharing the modern views with those who first photographed them.

Baars, Donald L.; Buchanan, Rex C.; and Charlton, John R. The Canyon revisited : a rephotography of the Grand Canyon, 1923/1991. (Rephotography by John R. Charlton.) Salt Lake City: University of Utah Press (1994). [Rephotography of the Birdseye expedition.]

Dutton, Allen A. Arizona then and now : text and contemporary rephotography by Allen A. Dutton. Englewood, Colorado: Westcliffe Publishers (2002).

Klett, Mark, and Wolfe, Byron. Reconstructing the view : the Grand Canyon photographs of Mark Klett and Byron Wolfe. [Phoenix]: Phoenix Art Museum and Center for Creative Photography; and Berkeley, Los Angeles, and London: University of California Press (2012). [A unique publication that overlays older views, such as those from postcards, onto modern photographs of the same scene.]

Stephens, Hal G., and Shoemaker, Eugene M. In the footsteps of John Wesley Powell : an album of comparative photographs of the Green and Colorado Rivers, 1871-72 and 1968. Boulder: Johnson Books, and Denver: The Powell Society (1987).

Turner, Raymond M., and Karpiscak, Martin M. Recent vegetation changes along the Colorado River between Glen Canyon Dam and Lake Mead, Arizona. U.S. Geological Survey, Professional Paper 1132 (1980). [Includes rephotography of historic photographs.]

Webb, Robert H. Grand Canyon, a century of change : rephotography of the 1889-1890 Stanton Expedition. Tucson: University of Arizona Press (1996).

The Grand Canyon!

MARGINAL SYMBOLS

An incredible variety of productions are represented in The Grand Canyon! Many users of this bibliography will of course be interested only in essays and other textual accounts of Grand Canyon encounters and experiences. But beyond these there are other forms of expression that other users will in fact be keen on seeing. For this reason I have devised a series of marginal symbols that identify the format of the publication that is cited. Attention to these symbols will allow users to easily bypass these items if they are not of interest, while bringing attention to these items for those users who seek them:

	Verse
	Painting or other artwork or handcraft
	Photography
	Musical work (recordings, scores, etc.)
	Theatrical performance
	Non-performing theatrical production
	Lecture or public address
	Items relating to the activities of filming at Grand Canyon
	Radio broadcasting/reception or script of broadcast
	Architecture (expressly for Grand Canyon)
	Photo documenting presence or other posing at Grand Canyon
	Uprun of the Colorado River or other river ascension
	Young-reader title or young author

... but those who went down swore that when they reached these rocks they were bigger than the great tower of Seville.

— Pedro de Castañeda de Nájera, 1560s manuscript (1596 copy), recounting the 1540 visit to Grand Canyon; as translated in Winship, 1896

... all that we are conscious of ... is a troubled sense of immensity.

— Clarence E. Dutton, 1882

The Grand Canyon!

PART I

PRIMARY EXPEDITION NARRATIVES

Pedro de Castañeda de Nájera 1540

Francisco Tomás Hermenegildo Garcés 1776

Balduin Möllhausen and Joseph C. Ives 1858

James White 1867

John Wesley Powell 1869–1872

George M. Wheeler 1871

Clarence Edward Dutton 1878–1880

Robert Brewster Stanton 1889–1890

The Grand Canyon!

I. Primary Expedition Narratives

1540

The entrada under the command of Francisco Vázquez de Coronado

BETWEEN 1539 AND 1542 an invasion was under way from Nueva España into the lands that today are the North American Southwest. It was a huge expeditionary party organized and led by Francisco Vázquez de Coronado. He (and others to various degrees) had a monetary interest—not only on behalf of the kingdom of Spain but to personally recoup his investment in the expedition through pillaging the riches of Cibola that they had learned about, which in the end were only the stuff of mis- and disinformation.

The story is well known and frequently retold, in summary and at length alike. Historians and other scholars have been delving into its discovered caches of records, and interpreting them, for two centuries, at least. But it wasn't always as such. Not until George P. Winship published in 1896 the only known detailed contemporary account of the entrada did the history of the expedition come into its own. He transcribed and translated a manuscript originally written by Pedro de Castañeda in the 1560s while in Culiacán, Nueva España [Mexico]; the original has been lost, it seems. Winship worked from a copy of that manuscript made in 1596 in Seville, Spain, by Bartolome Niño Velázquez. That copy was found in the Lenox Library, in New York, which now is a part of the New York Public Library; the manuscript had originally been found earlier in the 1800s in the collections of a Frenchman, Henri Ternaux-Compans. And it is to that copy that every historian since then has had to refer.

Casteñeda's account follows the Coronado entrada from today's Mexico up into the Great Plains, and return. En route, in 1540, comes a brief account of a side trip from the Hopi mesas to the Grand Canyon, commanded by Garci-Lopez de Cardenas (Casteñeda was not a member of that party). The purpose of this venture was to ascertain the identity of a great river that they had been told lay to the west. They hoped (correctly) that it was the Río Colorado. They of course knew nothing of the big surprise—the Grand Canyon. This, too, is a story now well known; and it comes to us today with its own modern exercises that seek to discover the route that the Spaniards took to the canyon, the time taken to follow it, and the ultimate place of their arrival, where they spent three days. (These questions still are not satisfactorily resolved due to various ambiguities.) The story is retold most often for its brief telling of the descent by three men into the canyon, in an attempt to reach the river. They failed, and in so doing we have the first record of how distances and scales in the canyon deceive at first sight; a fact that has been repeated by almost every writer since then—or at least, since the canyon became well known in the mid-nineteenth century.

The Grand Canyon!

I. Primary Expedition Narratives

The Grand Canyon did not become widely known until the American exploratory venture led by U.S. Army Lt. Joseph C. Ives, in 1858; or more properly, the dramatic scenes of the canyon and the course of the lower Colorado River did not erupt into a public awareness until Ives published his formal, lavishly illustrated and mapped, report in 1861. It was, however, Balduin Möllhausen, accompanying the expedition as artist and naturalist's assistant, who actually beat Ives into print with his own narrative, but it was in German and never was easily available to the English-reading public, a fact that is remedied in the present volume. Hints of the great Grand Canyon had existed beforehand, but only through the hearsay of guides who led other expeditions that did not go to the canyon. It was known then as Big Canyon and Great Canyon; yet no one really had admitted to having been there, much less having described it.

Casteñeda's account of the Coronado entrada remained unknown until Winship widely advertised it in an annual report of the U.S. Bureau of American Ethnology, despite the fact that it had already been published in 1838, in Ternaux-Compans' somewhat unsatisfactory French translation, published relatively obscurely in Paris. It fell upon Winship to provide not only the first transcription of the original Spanish, but also the first English translation, precisely three hundred years after Velázquez made the copy of Casteñeda's now-lost original.

Most recently, in 2005 Richard Flint and Shirley Cushing Flint compiled and extensively annotated all of the known documents from the Coronado entrada, 1539–1542. They provided meticulous transcriptions of these documents and new, English translations of them. Casteñeda's account of course is just a part of the Flints' lavish publication; and as one might expect of historians, their transcriptions and translations alike differ from those that had been cobbled together by Winship and others. So history marches apace.

The Grand Canyon!

I. Primary Expedition Narratives

Pedro de Castañeda de Nájera 1540

Recounting the entrada under the command of Francisco Vázquez de Coronado, which includes the encounter with Grand Canyon in 1540

Castañeda de Nájera, Pedro de

- 1 1596 Relacion de la Jornada de Cibola compuesta por P<sup>o</sup> de Castañeda Nacera. Donde se trata de de aq-llos poblados, y ritos, y costumbres, la qual fue el año de 1540. Historia del Conde Fernando Gonzales impressa. Sevilla [indicated on leaf 157 recto]. MANUSCRIPT, in the original binding of 19th-century owner Henri Ternaux-Compans. Collation: cover-leaf, signature leaf [transcriber Bartolome Niño Velázquez], ornamental title-leaf, folios 1-157 (recto and verso). [In Spanish.]

[Ornamental title-leaf: Relación de la Jornada de Cibola, compuesta por Pedro de Castañeda de Naçera donde se trata de todos aquellos poblados y ritos, y costumbres, la qual fue el Año De 1540. (transl. 'Account of the journey to Cibola, composed by Pedro de Castañeda de Naçera which deals with all those towns and rites, and customs, which was in the year 1540.')]

While manuscripts are not generally cited in a bibliography of published works, this one is too important to overlook. It is the seminal document of all Grand Canyon encounters by Westerners—Castañeda's account of the long entrada commanded by Francisco Vázquez de Coronado, 1539-1542, which invaded the lands that now comprise a good part of the American Southwest. During this expedition, a separate excursion under the command of Garci-Lopez de Cardenas reached the southeastern corner of the Grand Canyon in 1540. Just a few pages of this manuscript are of interest here, embracing the aborted descent to the Colorado River by Capt. Pablo de Melgosa, Juan Galeras, and a third man whose name is not recorded.

The encounter with Grand Canyon appears in this manuscript on folio 45 recto and verso and folio 46 recto and verso. (This is in fact one of two contemporary accounts of the Coronado entrada that mention having seen the Grand Canyon. For the other account, see the citation for the anonymously written Relación del Suceso, farther below.) Castañeda's account of Coronado's entrada was not published until 1838, and then only in a French translation. The original Spanish, and an English translation, were not published until 1896; and later new translations appeared in 1940 and 2005. Except for a few selected leaves (see list shortly below), the manuscript has never been published in facsimile.

This manuscript is a copy of the original, transcribed by Bartolome Niño Velázquez in Seville, Spain, from the since-missing original that was written in the 1560s by Castañeda while he was in Culiacán, Nueva España [Mexico]. The 1596 copy was "either for or from the library of Hernando González, Conde de Castilla" (Flint and Flint, 2005, p. 382). Velázquez's colophon (folio 157 recto) spells out the date of completion: "acabose de tresladar sabada a veinte y seis de octubre de mill y quintientos y noventa y seis anos en sevilla" (transl. 'finished Saturday, October twenty-six, one thousand and five hundred and ninety-six years in Seville').

All published references to this manuscript are thus to this 1596 copy, which is today no. 63 in the Rich Collection (formerly of the Lenox Library), Rare Books and Manuscripts Division, New York Public Library, New York, New York. The entire volume of the Relación 1596 copy has been digitized and is accessible as 342 individual images online at <http://archives.nypl.org/mss/257063> (last accessed July 27, 2022). (The NYPL catalogue record indicates, in error, that the missing original was written in 1540.)

The copy had been among the papers of Henri Ternaux-Compans of France, who was the first to put this account in print (see Castañeda, 1838, below), though with the liberty of confused translation. Ternaux-Compans had identified this document in the manuscript collection of Antonio de Uguina, in Madrid, who had acquired

The Grand Canyon!

I. Primary Expedition Narratives

the collection of Juan Bautista Muñoz (although scholars recognize that the details of these earlier provenances is unclear). After the 1835 death of Uguina, Ternaux-Compans purchased the collection, from which around 1844 the Spanish manuscripts were purchased by Massachusetts bibliographer-bookseller Obadiah Rich (through Henry Stevens, an agent working on behalf of Rich and others), and in 1848 Rich's collection was acquired by James Lenox (though the relationship between Rich and Lenox is not clear), whose collection in turn became the Lenox Library. The Lenox Library later became an elemental part of the New York Public Library. For a history of the Rich Collection see Edwin Blake Brownrigg, Colonial Latin American Manuscripts and Transcripts in the Obadiah Rich Collection: An Inventory and Index (The New York Public Library, Astor, Lenox and Tilden Foundations; and Readex Books, New York, 1978).

Regarding the repetitive "de de" on line 3 of the cover-leaf (as cited above), likely a lapsus, the first "de" follows the usual letter forms as seen elsewhere, but compare the less usual letter forms of the second "de" with those letters in the word "Conde" in line 6. Previous transcribers of this cover-leaf have not recorded this and have likewise preferred to spell out "aquellos" although it is written and hyphenated as transcribed above.

The ornamental title-page and selected pages have been published in facsimile, as follows:

[1] The ornamental title-page is illustrated as figure 2.1 in Polzer, Charles W., "The Coronado documents: Their limitations", in Flint, Richard, and Flint, Shirley Cushing (eds.), The Coronado expedition to Tierra Nueva : the 1540 route across the Southwest (University Press of Colorado, Niwot, Colorado 1997), pp. 36-43.

[2] The ornamental title-page is illustrated on p. 29 in Ahern, Maureen, "Llevando el norte sobre el ojo izquierdo: Mapping, measuring, and naming in Castañeda's Relación de la jornada de Cibola (1563)", in Arias, Santa, and Meléndez, Mariselle (eds.), Mapping colonial Spanish America : places and commonplaces of identity, culture, and experience, Associated University Presses (Cranbury (New Jersey), London, and Mississauga (Ontario), 2002), pp. 24-50.

[3] Two pages that relate to the description of the Grand Canyon are reproduced in facsimile on pp. 112-113 in John Miller Morris (ed.), Relación de la jornada de Cibola. Narrative of the Coronado expedition (R. R. Donnelley and Sons Co., The Lakeside Press, Chicago, The Lakeside Classics Centennial Edition, 2002). However, take note that while the legend for these illustrated pages reads that they are the "section [that] describes discovery of Grand Canyon" they are mistakenly illustrated in reverse order (folio 45 verso, p. 112; folio 45 recto, p. 113), and further, the Grand Canyon account actually concludes on folio 46 recto and verso (not illustrated). (Compare also the more modern transcriptions of the folios in Flint and Flint (2005, pp. 397-398 [English translation], 451 [transcription of Spanish manuscript].)

The first folio-leaves for parts 1, 2, and 3 of the narrative (as denoted in the manuscript) are reproduced in facsimile in George Parker Winship (1896, "The Coronado Expedition, 1540-1542", U.S. Bureau of Ethnology, 14th Annual Report, Part 1), double-page Plates 33, 34, 35 (plate order within the 14th annual report, but also stamped, respectively, 17, 18, 19 on blank foreleaves to indicate plate order in the Winship paper). The Winship paper comprises the first publication of the Relación in Spanish (Castañeda, 1896), with the first English translation (Castañeda, 1896). Winship omitted the first three leaves of the manuscript, which were first published by Flint and Flint (2005), and which have been read from the original manuscript for this citation in the present bibliography.

In the present volume, for the first time, complete facsimiles are published of the title leaves and the four pages on which the Grand Canyon encounter appear. (See the introductory section that displays facsimile reproductions from selected works.)

The Spanish text as transcribed and published by George P. Winship, as well as his English translation of it, are shown farther below, under 1896.

The Grand Canyon!

I. Primary Expedition Narratives

The following eight pages reproduce several leaves from the 1596 copy of Pedro de Castañeda's 1560s account of the Coronado entrada of 1539–1542. The four pages on which the Grand Canyon encounter of 1540 appears have heretofore not been reproduced in facsimile in their entirety.

1. Cover-leaf
2. Transcriber's leaf (signature of Bartolome Niño Velázquez)
3. Ornamental title-leaf
4. Folio 45 recto (on which the Grand Canyon encounter of 1540 begins)
5. Folio 45 verso
6. Folio 46 recto
7. Folio 46 verso (on which the Grand canyon encounter ends)
8. Folio 157 recto (which ends with the transcriber's colophon that spells out the date of completion, October 26, 1596)

Reproduced by permission of the New York Public Library. Images accessed online July 27, 2022, <http://archives.nypl.org/mss/257063>.

New York Public Library's preferred credit: "Relación de la jornada de Cibola: donde se trata de aquellos poblados y ritos y costumbres, la quel fué el año de 1540, compuesta por Pedro de Castañeda de Nágera. Obadiah Rich collection. Manuscripts and Archives Division. The New York Public Library. Astor, Lenox, and Tilden Foundations."

The Grand Canyon!
I. Primary Expedition Narratives

1. Cover-leaf

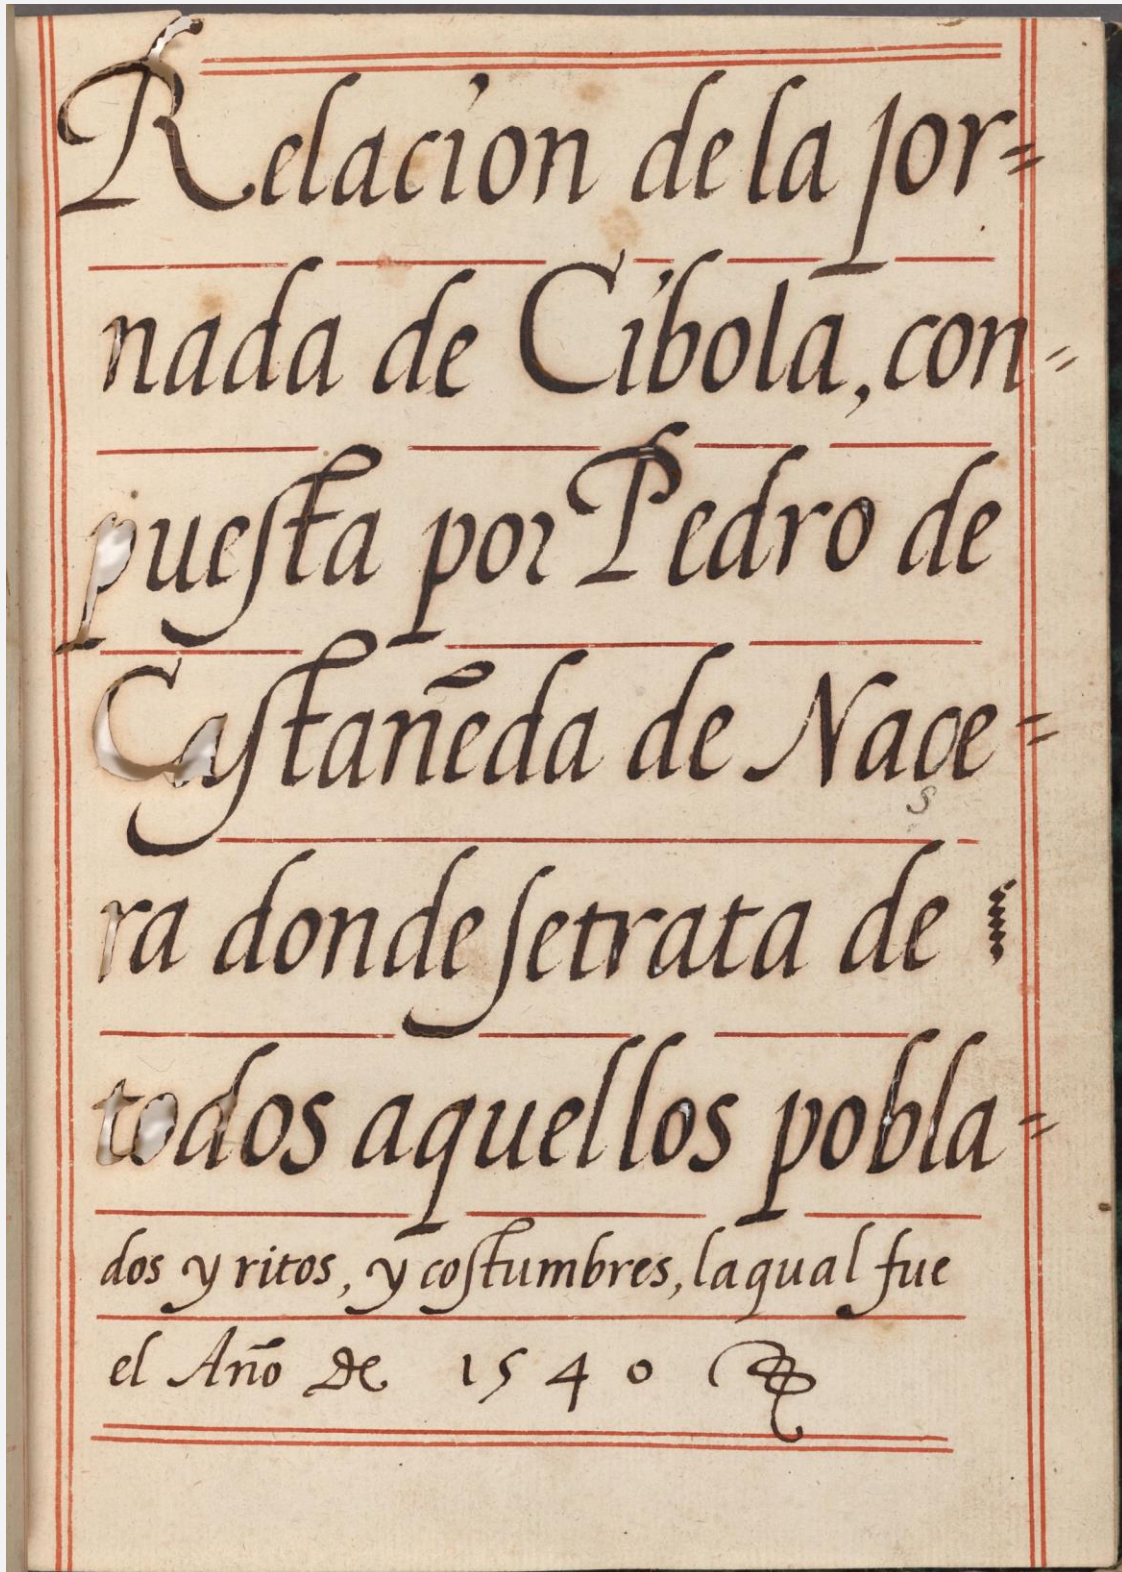

The Grand Canyon!
I. Primary Expedition Narratives

2. Transcriber's leaf (signature of Bartolome Niño Velázquez)

The Grand Canyon!
I. Primary Expedition Narratives

3. Ornamental title-leaf

The Grand Canyon!
I. Primary Expedition Narratives

parte
48

no llevo mas comiçion biblia de alli y dio esta noticia alge neral que luego despa lcho alla adon gno ci to sep de car lenas con hasta duce compa
neros para lo este via que como llevo a tula y en siendo bien recebido y sus pedido de los naturales le dieron guias para que segun sus jornadas ya hevon de alli cargados de bastimentos porque auiande ya por tierra de poble da tras de el poble de que las indias de cion que eran mas de veinte jornadas pues como vbre vonan lado veinte jornadas llegaron alas barrancas del rio que fu es hoy a el ba do de ellas paze

4. Folio 45 recto (on which the Grand Canyon encounter of 1540 begins)

The Grand Canyon!
I. Primary Expedition Narratives

77
primero
En el alto bordo que a una legua de tres o quatro leguas por el ayre esta tierra era alta y lle na de firmes bajos y espar tosos segun distimo de la ju del norte que conserenti empu caliente nose podria bi mir de sus en esta barranca y habien un tres dias sus cascadas baja da para el rio que pa saria delo alto tendria una barranca de haberia el agua y por la notria de los rios ten drun media legua de ancho fue la barranca una impo si ble por que acabo desp los tres dias pareciendo les una parte la menor de si cul tosa se pudiese un bajar por un ligeros el ca pitar un el goso

Yun

The Grand Canyon!
I. Primary Expedition Narratives

parte 46

Don Juan galeas y con
parteros y tardaron haciendo abierta de los de los de la ri va hasta que los per die donde vista los bultos que el bife y los alcanzaba a ver y los vieron ava de las que la de la tarde que no pudieron acabar de hacer por grandes dificultades des que ha llaman porque lo que a vista parecia facil no lo era antes muy apesado ya yo dixeron que aujan la xado la tertia parte y que des de donde llegaron pare cio el rio muy grande y que conforme aunque bien nera beidad tener la anchura que los indios decian de lo

The Grand Canyon!
I. Primary Expedition Narratives

47

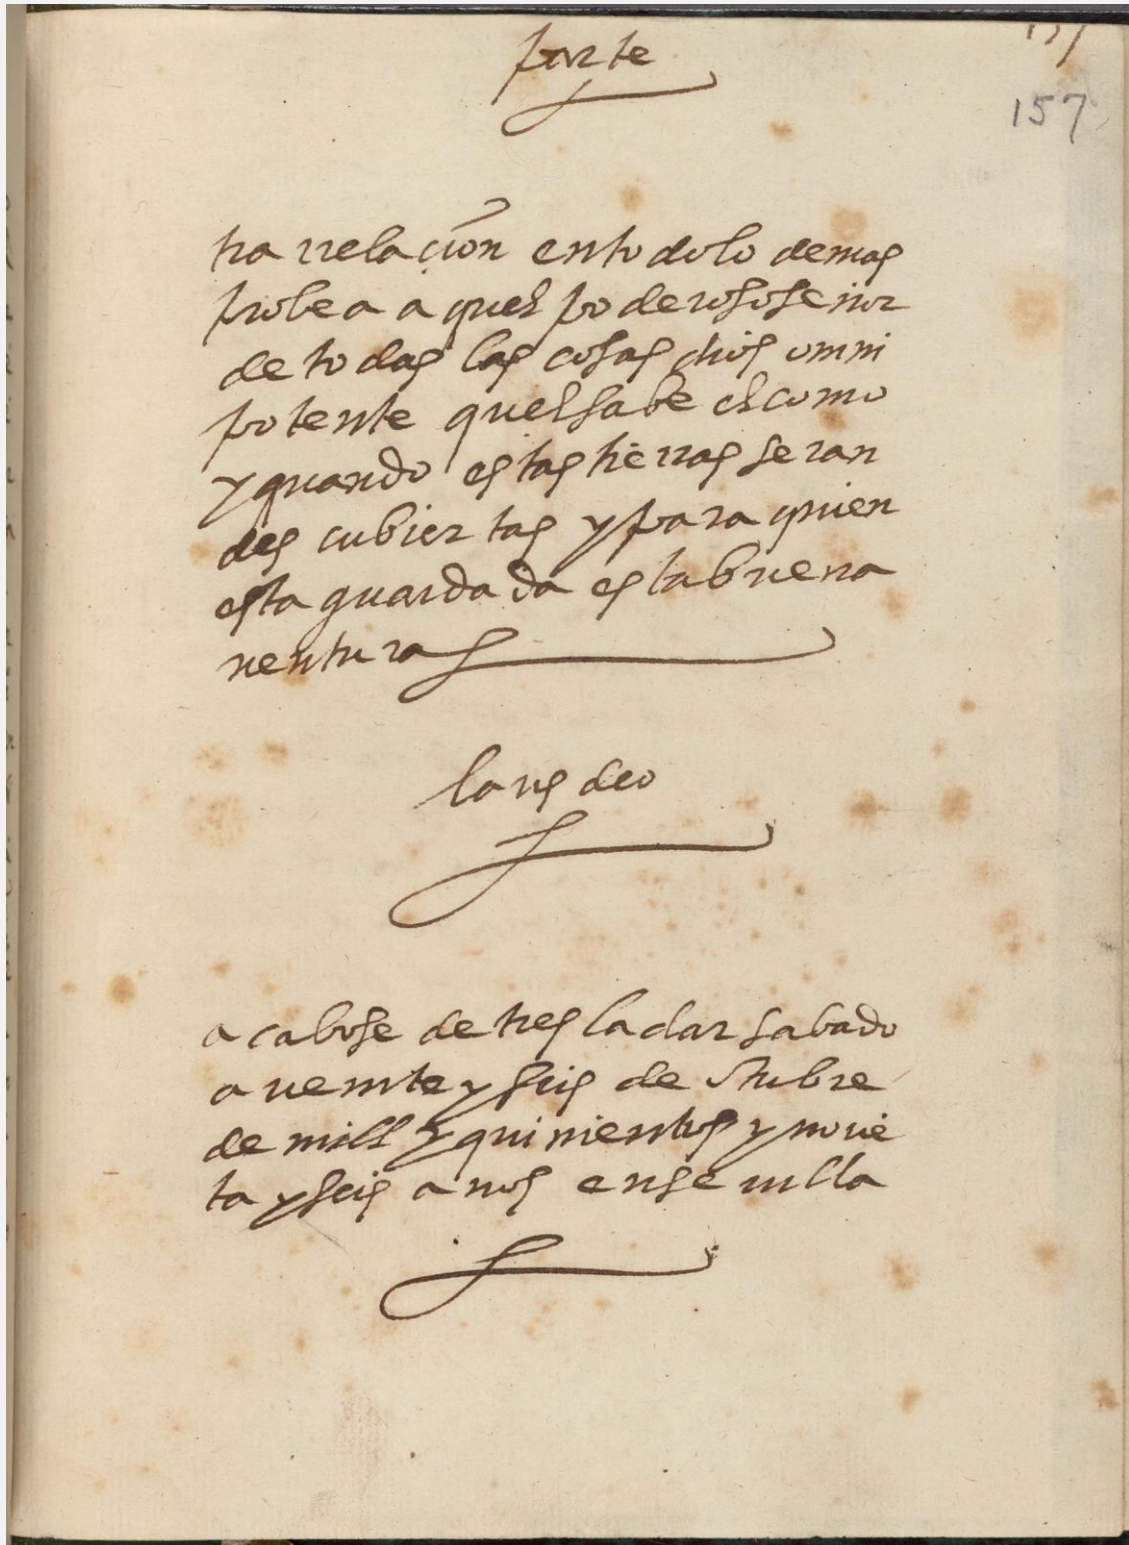

parte

alto de terminaban unos pe sinosillos des ga via des de labarranca Cael pare corde en estado de hombre juran los que buxaron que lle ga ron a ellos que eran muy res que la torre mayor de se nilla no caminaron mas a rizada a la barranca de el rio por que no a ma agua y hasta alli cada dia se des criaban sobre tarde una te gua y des la tierra adentro se busca de las aguas y no no andubiesen. Mas qua tro se nadan las guias dice ran que no era posible pa sar adelante por que no a ma agua entre si quatro
por nada por que ellos quan

90

7. Folio 46 verso (on which the Grand canyon encounter ends)

The Grand Canyon!
I. Primary Expedition Narratives

8. Folio 157 recto (which ends with the transcriber's colophon that spells out the date of completion, October 26, 1596)

The Grand Canyon!

I. Primary Expedition Narratives

- 2 1838 Relation du voyage de Cibola entrepris en 1540; ou l'on traite de toutes les peuplades qui habitent cette contrée, de leurs mœurs et coutumes, par Pédro de Castañeda de Nagera. In: Ternaux-Compans, Henri, Voyages, relations et mémoires originaux pour servir à l'histoire de la découverte de l'Amérique publiés pour la première fois, en français, par H. Ternaux-Compans, [Volume 9]. Relation du voyage de Cibola, entrepris en 1540. Inédit. Paris: Arthus Bertrand, pp. i-xvi, 1-246. [In French.]

(transl. 'Account of the journey to Cibola undertaken in 1540; where we treat of all the peoples who inhabit this region, their manners and customs, by Pedro de Castañeda de Nagera.' in 'Original voyages, relations and memoirs to serve the history of the discovery of America published for the first time, in French, by H. Ternaux-Compans, [Volume 9]. Relation of the voyage to Cibola, undertaken in 1540. Unpublished.')

Ternaux-Compans' translation in French is the first publication anywhere of Castañeda's account of Coronado's entrada. The encounter with Grand Canyon is on pp. 61-64. Pages iii-vi comprise a "Préface de l'éditeur français".

The second title-page indicates binder's number, "9.", with the title, Relation de voyage de Cibola entrepris en 1540 : ou l'on traité de toutes les peuplades qui habitent cette contrée, de leurs mœurs et coutumes, par Pédro de Castañeda de Nagera. (The volume includes items by other writers, such as this one by Castañeda, arranged as an appendix.)

Later scholars have recognized problems with Ternaux-Compans' translations, and for this reason the Grand Canyon encounter, as published by him, has to my knowledge not been reprinted in the Grand Canyon literature. I take the opportunity to do so, in as much as this is the first published record of the Spanish visit of 1540. (An English translation of this—although it is a "translation of a translation"—is appended to the French transcription here—only to facilitate a comparison of the sense of the account in the translations by Winship, 1896 [farther below] and by Flint and Flint, 2005, for example.)

"Ceux-ci donnèrent connaissance aux Espagnols d'une grande rivière, et ajoutèrent qu'en la descendant pendant quelques journées on trouvait des nations d'une taille très-élevée.

"Comme don Pédro de Tobar avait rempli sa mission, il revint sur ses pas et rendit compte au général de ce qu'il avait vu. Celui-ci fit partir sur-le-champ don Garci-Lopez de Cardenas et douze autres personnes pour aller visiter cette rivière; cet officier fut très-bien reçu et parfaitement traité par les Indiens de Tusayan, qui lui donnèrent des guides pour continuer sa route. Nos soldats partirent chargés de vivres, les Indiens les ayant avertis qu'il fallait traverser un désert de vingt journées de long avant d'entrer dans un pays habité.

"Après ces vingt journées de marche ils arrivèrent en effet à cette rivière, dont les bords sont tellement élevés qu'ils croyaient être à trois ou quatre lieues en l'air. Le pays est couvert de pins bas et rabougris; il est exposé au nord, et le froid y est si violent, que, quoique l'on fût en été, on pouvait à peine le supporter. Les Espagnols marchèrent pendant trois jours le long de ces montagnes, espérant toujours trouver une descente pour arriver à la rivière qui, d'en haut, ne paraissait pas avoir plus d'une brasse de large, et qui, selon les Indiens, avait plus d'une demi-lieue; mais il fut impossible de s'y rendre. Étant parvenus deux ou trois jours après dans un endroit où la descente leur parut plus facile, le capitaine Melgosa, Juan Galeras et un soldat qui étaient les plus légers de la bande, résolurent de faire une tentative. Ils descendirent jusqu'à ce que ceux qui étaient restés en haut les eussent perdus de vue. Ils revinrent vers les quatre heures du soir, disant qu'ils avaient trouvé tant de difficultés, qu'ils n'avaient pu arriver jusqu'en bas; car ce qui d'en haut semblait facile, ne l'était pas du tout quand on approchait. Ils ajoutèrent qu'ils étaient parvenus à environ un tiers de la descente; et que de là, la rivière paraissait déjà très-grande, ce qui confirmait ce que les Indiens avaient dit. Ils assurèrent que quelques rochers que l'on voyait d'en haut, et qui paraissaient à peine de la hauteur d'un homme étaient plus hauts que la tour de la cathédrale de Séville.

"Les Espagnols cessèrent de suivre les rochers qui bordent la rivière, parce qu'on y manquait d'eau. Jusque-là ils avaient été obligés chaque soir de s'avancer une lieue ou deux dans l'intérieur pour en trouver. Quand ils eurent marché pendant trois ou quatre jours, les guides leur déclarèrent qu'il était impossible d'aller plus loin, qu'on ne trouverait pas d'eau de quatre jours; que quand les Indiens passaient cette route, ils emmenaient avec

The Grand Canyon!

I. Primary Expedition Narratives

eux des femmes chargées de Calebasses remplies d'eau, et qu'ils en enterraient une partie pour les retrouver au retour; que d'ailleurs ils parcouraient en un jour autant de chemin que les Espagnols en deux.

"Cette rivière était celle del Tizon. On arriva beaucoup plus près de sa source que de l'endroit où Melchior Diaz et ses gens l'avaient traversée, et l'on sut plus tard que les Indiens dont on avait parlé étaient de la même nation que ceux que Diaz avait vus. Les Espagnols revinrent donc sur leurs pas, et cette expédition n'eut pas d'autre résultat."

(translation)

'These [Indians] informed the Spaniards of a great river, and added that by descending it for a few days one would find nations of a very high stature.

'As Don Pedro de Tobar had fulfilled his mission, he retraced his steps and reported to the general what he had seen. He immediately sent Don Garci-Lopez de Cardenas and twelve other people to go and visit this river; this officer was very well received and perfectly treated by the Indians of Tusayan, who gave him guides to continue his journey. Our soldiers left laden with provisions, the Indians having warned them that they had to cross a desert twenty days long before entering an inhabited country.

'After these twenty days of walking they arrived in fact at this river, the banks of which are so high that they thought they were three or four leagues in the air. The country is covered with low and stunted pines; it is exposed to the north, and the cold there is so violent that, although it was summer, it could hardly be endured. The Spaniards marched for three days along these mountains, still hoping to find a descent to the river, which from above appeared to be no more than a fathom wide, and which, according to the Indians, was more half a league; but it was impossible to get there. Having arrived two or three days later in a place where the descent seemed to them easier, Captain Melgosa, Juan Galeras and a soldier who were the lightest of the band, resolved to make an attempt. They descended until those who remained above lost sight of them. They returned around four o'clock in the evening, saying that they had found so many difficulties that they had not been able to get to the bottom; because what from above seemed easy, was not at all so when one approached. They added that they had come about a third of the way down; and that from there the river already seemed very large, which confirmed what the Indians had said. They asserted that some rocks that could be seen from above, and which hardly seemed the height of a man, were higher than the tower of the cathedral of Seville.

'The Spaniards stopped following the rocks that border the river, because there was a lack of water there. Until then they had been obliged each evening to advance a league or two into the interior to find some. When they had walked for three or four days, the guides declared to them that it was impossible to go further, that they would not find water for four days; that when the Indians crossed this trail, they took with them women laden with calabashes filled with water, and that they buried part of them to find them on their return; that, moreover, they traveled as far in one day as the Spaniards in two.

'This river was that of the Tizon. They came much nearer to its source than to where Melchior Diaz and his people had crossed it, and it was later learned that the Indians spoken of were of the same nation as those Diaz had seen. The Spaniards therefore retraced their steps, and this expedition had no other result.'

- 3 1896 Relacion de la Jornada de Cibola conpuesta por Pedro de Castañeda de Naçera. Donde se trata de todos aquellos poblados y ritos, y costumbres, la qual fue el Año de 1540. In: Winship, George P., The Coronado Expedition, 1540-1542. U.S. Bureau of American Ethnology, 14th Annual Report, Part 1, pp. 414-469. [In Spanish.]

Text of the 1596 manuscript copy of the Relación in the New York Public Library (see Castañeda, 1596, above), published for the first time in Spanish by Winship. Winship (p. 414, footnote) indicates, "This text is, as far as possible, a copy of the Relacion in the Lenox Library." (The Lenox library created in 1895 part of the New York Public Library.) Later scholars have noted problems with both the transcription and translation by Winship, but the passages are quoted here exactly as published (see also the facsimile reproductions at the beginning of this part of the bibliography). The Spanish as originally written is, as was customary, without capitalizations or punctuation, and infrequent paragraphing. The encounter with Grand Canyon appears on pp. 429-430. (For the English translation, see Winship's separate translation, which follows after this Spanish transcription.)

The Grand Canyon!

I. Primary Expedition Narratives

“. . . aqui se tubo notiçia de un gran rio y que rio abajo a algunas jornadas auia gêtes muy grandes de cuerpo grande.

“como don pedro de touar no llebo mas comiçion bolbio de alli y dio esta notiçia al general que luego despacho alla a don garçi lopes de cardenas con hasta doçe conpañeros para ber este rio que como llego a tusayan siendo bien regebido y hospedado de los naturales le dieron guias para proseguir sus jornadas y salieron de alli cargados de bastimentos por que auian de yr por tierra despoblada hasta el poblado que los indios deçian que eran mas de ueinte jornadas pues como ubieron andado ueinte jornadas llegaron a las barrancas del rio que puestos a el bado de ellas pareçia al otro bordo que auia mas de tres o quatro leguas por el ayre esta tierra era alta y llena de pinales bajos y encorbados frigidissima debajo del norte que con ser en tiempo caliente no se podia biuir de frio en esta barranca estubieron tres dias buscando la bajada para el rio que pareçia de lo alto tendria una braçada de trabesia el agua y por la notiçia de los indios tendria media legua de ancho fue la baxada cosa imposible porque acabo de estos tres dias pareçiendo les una parte la menos difcultosa se pusieron a abajar por mas ligeros el capitan melgosa y un juan galeras y otro conpañero y tadaron baxando a bista de ellos de los de arriba hasta que los perdieron de uista los bultos quel biso no los alcansaba aber y bolbieron a ora de las quatro de la tarde que no pudieron acabar de bajar por grandes dificultades que hallaron porque lo que arriba parecia façil no lo era antes muy aspero y agro dixeron que auian baxado la terçia parte y que desde donde llegaron parecia el rio muy graude y que conforme a lo que bieron era berdad tener la anchura que los indios deçian de lo alto determinaban unos peñol sillas desgarrados de la baranca a el parecer de uno estado de hombre juran los que baxaron que llegaron a ellos que eran mayores que la torre mayor de seuilla no caminaron mas arrimados a la barranca de el rio porque no auia agua y hasta alli cada dia se desbiaban sobre tarde una legua o dos la tierra adentro en busca de las aguas y como andubiesen otras quatro jornadas la guias dixeron que no era posible pasar adelante porque no auia agua en tres ni quatro jornadas porque ellos quando caminauan por alli sacaban mugeres cargadas de agua en calabaços y que lo aquellas jornadas enterraban los calabaços del agua para la buelta y que lo que caminaban los nuestros en dos dias lo caminaban ellos en uno.

“este rio era el del tison mucho mas hacia los nacimientos del que no por donde lo auian pasado melchior dias y su gente . . .”

- 4 1896 Translation of the narrative of Castañeda. Account of the Expedition to Cibola which took place in the year 1540, in which all those settlements, their ceremonies and customs, are described. Written by Pedro de Castañeda, of Najera. In: Winship, George P., The Coronado Expedition, 1540-1542. U.S. Bureau of Ethnology, 14th Annual Report, Part 1, pp. 470-546.

First English translation of the 1596 copy of the Relación in the New York Public Library (see Castañeda, 1596). Later scholars have noted problems with both the transcription and translation by Winship, but the passages are quoted here exactly as published. The encounter with Grand Canyon appears on pp. 489-490:

“. . . they obtained the information about a large river, and that several days down the river there were some people with very large bodies.

“As Don Pedro de Tovar was not commissioned to go farther, he returned from there and gave this information to the general, who dispatched Don Garcia Lopez de Cardenas with about twelve companions to go to see this river. He was well received when he reached Tusayan and was entertained by the natives, who gave him guides for his journey. They started from here loaded with provisions, for they had to go through a desert country before reaching the inhabited region, which the Indians said was more than twenty days' journey. After they had gone twenty days they came to the banks of the river, which seemed to be more than 3 or 4 leagues above the stream which flowed between them. This country was elevated and full of low twisted pines, very cold, and lying open toward the north, so that, this being the warm season, no one could live there on account of the cold. They spent three days on this bank looking for a passage down to the river, which looked from above as if the water was 6 feet across, although the Indians said it was half a league wide. It was impossible to descend, for after these three days Captain Melgosa and one Juan Galeras and another companion, who were the three lightest and most agile men, made an attempt to go down at the least difficult place, and went down until those who were above were unable to keep sight of them. They returned about 4 o'clock in the afternoon, not having succeeded in reaching the bottom on account of the great difficulties which they found, because what seemed to be easy from above was not so, but instead very hard and difficult. They said that they had been down about a third of the way and that the river seemed very large from the place which they reached, and that from what they saw they thought that Indians had given the width correctly. Those who stayed above had estimated that some huge rocks on the sides of the cliffs seemed to be about as tall as a man, but those who went down swore that when they reached these rocks they were bigger than the great tower of Seville. They did not go farther up the river, because they could not get water. Before this they had had to go a league or two inland every day late in the evening in order to find water, and the guides said that if they should go four days farther it would not be possible to go on, because there was no water within three or four days, for when they travel across this region themselves they take with them women loaded with water in gourds, and bury the gourds of water along the way, to use when they return, and besides this, they travel in one day over what it takes us two days to accomplish.

The Grand Canyon!

I. Primary Expedition Narratives

"This was the Tison (Firebrand) river, much nearer its source than where Melchior Diaz and his company crossed it."

---

Other Expedition Accounts

Anonymous

Another account pertaining to the Coronado entrada comes down to us anonymously, the Relacion del suceso de la jornada que Francisco Vazquez hizo en el descubrimiento de Civola. Flint and Flint (2005, p. 494) remark, "Certainly the captain general's [Vázquez de Coronado] secretary, Hernando Bermejo, or a scribal assistant of his[,] cannot be ruled out as author of the Relación del Suceso." And (p. 495), this document "is assuredly a sixteenth-century copy of the original report, a copy perhaps made for Juan Páez de Castro, royal chronicler to Carlos V." Winship (p. 572, footnote) comments, "The Spanish text of this document is printed in Buckingham Smith's Florida, p. 147 [1857], from a copy made by Muñoz, and also in Pacheco y Cardenas, Documentos de Indias, vol. xiv, p. 318, from a copy found in the Archives of the Indies at Seville."

This text includes mention of the 1540 visit to Grand Canyon, often overlooked in the presence of the far more elaborate account by Pedro de Castañeda (see above).

- 5 1857 Civola y Quivira. 1542. Relacion del suceso de la jornada que Francisco Vazquez hizo en el descubrimiento de Civola. El original en Simancas, Descripciones y poblaciones; legajo 3.º Copia en la Coleccion de Muñoz, tomo LXXXIII. In: Smith, Buckingham (translator), Coleccion de varios documentos para la historia de la Florida y tierras adyacentes. Tomo 1. Londres: En la Casa de Trübner y Compañía, pp. 147-154. ("Se han tirado 500 ejemplares por José Rodriguez, Madrid, año de 1857.") [Winship (1896, p. 612) remarked, "Only one volume was ever published."] [In Spanish.]

(transl. 'Cibola and Quivira. 1542. Account of what happened on the journey that Francisco Vazquez made in the discovery of Civola.)

See pp. 149-150:

"Andadas cinquenta leguas de Tuzan al poniente e ochenta de Civola, halló una barranca de un rio, que fue imposible por una parte ni otra hallarle baxada para cavallo ni aun para pie, sino por una parte mui trabajosa por donde tenia casi dos leguas de baxada: estava la barranca tan acantillada de peñas que apenas podian ver el rio, el qual, aunque es segund dicen tanto e medio mayor quel de Sevilla, de arriba parecia un arroyo, por manera que aunque con harta deligencia se buscó pasada e por muchas partes no se halló, en la qual estuvieron hartos dias e con mucha nescesidad de agua que no la hallavan, e la del rio no se podían aprovechar della, aunque la vian, e a esta causa le fue forzado a D. Garci Lopez bolverse. A donde hallaron este rio, venia del nordeste e bolvia al sur sudueste, por manera que sin falta ninguna es aquel donde llegó Melchor Diaz."

(translation; compare also that of Winship, 1896)

"Traveling fifty leagues from Tuzan to the west and eighty from Civola, he [Cardenas] found a ravine of a river, which was impossible on one side or the other to find a descent for a horse or even on foot, except for a very

The Grand Canyon!

I. Primary Expedition Narratives

laborious part where he had almost two leagues of descent: the ravine was so crammed with rocks that they could hardly see the river, which, although it is two and a half [times] larger than that of Seville, from above it looked like a stream, so that although with great care it was searched and in many places it was not found, in which they spent days with a great need for water that they did not find, and the river could not be taken advantage for it, although they saw it, and for this reason D. Garci Lopez was forced to retreat. Where they found this river, it came from the northeast and thence to the south-southwest, so that without fail it is the one where Melchor [sic] Diaz [had] arrived.'

- 6 1896 Translations of the Relacion del Suceso. Account of what Happened on the Journey which Francisco Vazques made to Discover Cibola. In: Winship, George P., The Coronado expedition, 1540-1542. U.S. Bureau of Ethnology, 14th Annual Report, Part 1, pp. 572-579.

This is Winship's translation of the document first printed in Spanish by Buckingham Smith (above).

"Having gone 50 leagues west of Tuzan, and 80 from Cibola, he [Cardenas] found the edge of a river down which it was impossible to find a path for a horse in any direction, or even for a man on foot, except in one very difficult place, where there was a descent for almost 2 leagues. The sides were such a steep rocky precipice that it was scarcely possible to see the river, which looks like a brook from above, although it is half as large again as that of Seville, according to what they say, so that although they sought for a passage with great diligence, none was found for a long distance, during which they were for several days in great need of water, which could not be found, and they could not approach that of the river, although they could see it, and on this account Don Garcia Lopez was forced to return. This river comes from the northeast and turns toward the south-southwest at the place where they found it, so that it is without any doubt the one that Melchor [sic] Diaz reached."

The Spanish text has also been more recently and more reliably transcribed and translated by Flint and Flint (2005):

- 7 2005 The Relación del Suceso (anonymous narrative), 1540s; AGI, Patronato, 20, N.5, R.8. In: Flint, Richard, and Flint, Shirley Cushing (eds., translators, annotators), Documents of the Coronado expedition, 1539-1542 : "they were not familiar with His Majesty, nor did they wish to be his subjects". Dallas, Texas: Southern Methodist University Press, pp. 494-507.

Editors' introduction, pp. 494-496; translation, pp. 497-502; transcription [in Spanish], pp. 503-507.] [Grand Canyon, pp. 499 (translation), 504-505 (transcripton)].

---

Reprintings and New Translations of Castañeda

(alphabetically by author or editor)

Flint, Richard, AND Flint, Shirley Cushing

- 8 2005 (EDS., TRANSLATORS, ANNOTATORS) Documents of the Coronado expedition, 1539-1542 : "they were not familiar with His Majesty, nor did they wish to be his subjects". Dallas, Texas: Southern Methodist University Press.

Regarding Castañeda's manuscript, see pp. 378-383; with translation, pp. 384-434, and transcription [in Spanish], pp. 435-493. For references to Grand Canyon therein, see pp. 397-398, 451.

Hammond, George P., AND Rey, Agapito

- 9 1940 Coronado Cuarto Centennial publications. Volume 2. Narratives of the Coronado expedition: 1540-1542. Albuquerque: University of New Mexico Press.

The Grand Canyon!

I. Primary Expedition Narratives

A new English translation of Pedro de Castañeda's manuscript: "Relación de la Jornada de Cíbola, conpuesta por Pedro de Castañeda de Naçera donde setrata de todos aquellos poblados y ritos, y costumbres, la qual fue el Año de 1540."

Hodge, Frederick Webb

- 10            1907            (ED.) The narrative of the expedition of Coronado, by Pedro de Castañeda. In: Spanish explorers in the southern United States, 1528-1543. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons. (Original Narrative of Early American History.)
- 11            1946            (ED.) The narrative of the expedition of Coronado, by Pedro de Castañeda. In: Spanish explorers in the southern United States, 1528-1543. New York, Barnes and Noble, Inc., pp. 273-387.

Morris, John Miller

- 12            2002            (ED.) Relación de la jornada de Cíbola. Narrative of the Coronado expedition. Chicago: R. R. Donnelley and Sons Co., The Lakeside Press, cxv, 421 [425] pp. [pagination includes advertisements, pp. 417-421]. (The Lakeside Classics, Centennial Edition.) [All texts are in parallel Spanish and English pages.]

Spanish transcription is from Winship (1896); English translation is from Hammond and Rey (1940). Two pages of the 1596 manuscript that relate to the description of the Grand Canyon (see Castañeda, 1596) are reproduced in facsimile on pp. 112-113. However, take note that while the legend for the illustrated pages reads that they are the "section [that] describes discovery of Grand Canyon" they are mistakenly illustrated in reverse order (folio 45 verso, p. 112; folio 45 recto, p. 113) and that the Grand Canyon account actually concludes on folio 46 recto and verso. (Compare the modern transcriptions of the folios in Flint and Flint (2005), pp. 397-398 [English translation], 451 [transcription of Spanish manuscript].)

---

The Grand Canyon!
I. Primary Expedition Narratives

1776

Ecclesiastical Mission in the Southwest by Francisco Hermenegildo Tomás Garcés, a Franciscan Friar

THE HISTORY of the dutiful, if strained and stained, work of the Spanish Catholic priesthood in the seventeenth- and eighteenth-century American Southwest is legion. Coming out of this long reach of missionary work with often heavy-handed attempts at ecclesiastical if not spiritual conversion, however, are a few, now well studied, ancillary activities that produced maps of the regions of New Spain and the North American Southwest. Perhaps most well known are the cartographical products and geographical discoveries of the Jesuit padre Eusebio Francisco Kino. Although he had nothing to do with the Grand Canyon, probably his greatest discovery—one that was inconveniently ignored for a long time by some cartographers—proved California was not an island and that the Río Colorado arrived directly to the head of the Gulf of California from the continental interior.

It was that waterway that led the way for padre Francisco Garcés, the wandering priest who worked widely to distribute the tidings of his faith and to gather up information about the widespread (not to mention diverse) American Indian tribes. One of his expeditions took him a long way across the plateaus, paralleling the river, to the Hopi mesas in the summer of 1776. There his attempts even to engage with the Hopi fell on deaf ears and produced a decidedly unfriendly, if not hostile, response engendered by the Hopi long memories of Spanish atrocities in the distant past.

Garcés' trip was not wholly unproductive; he spent (so he reported) a productively pleasant five days with the Havasupai people in Havasu Canyon before moving on to the Hopi. En route to the mesas he saw the Grand Canyon in most of its glory. He recognized its geography as a decisive barrier to travel. When he wrote this in his diary (which was not seen in English until Elliott Coues published it in 1900), he offered to name the canyon Puerto de Bucareli—he saw it as a pass through mountains—in honor of his patron, the viceroy of New Spain, Antonio María de Bucareli y Ursúa.

The Grand Canyon!

I. Primary Expedition Narratives

But Puerto de Bucareli did not die at the tip of Garcés' pen. The honorific was soon picked up in Santa Fe by artist and cartographer Bernardo de Miera y Pacheco, whose manuscript maps of the Southwest are legendary. He jotted the puerto's name just where he put the confluence of the Colorado and Little Colorado Rivers—nicely precise between Havasu Canyon and the Hopi mesas—a notation that was seen in 1803 on one of Miera's maps in Mexico by the German geographer–explorer Alexander von Humboldt. He incorporated it onto a map of New Spain that he was working on, which he published in Paris in 1811. He was, however, beaten into print by American and English maps of 1810 that had been compiled from a copy of Humboldt's manuscript map that was made with his permission in 1804 when he passed through Washington, D.C., on the way home to Europe. However, the label by then had lost its association with the Grand Canyon, and it was simply a point-name on a map, one which just so happened to be reprinted on maps of the American Southwest, again and again for decades, on Humboldt's unquestioned authority if not just blindly copied. But the physical Grand Canyon that it was meant for remained in the shadows, known only to Natives and, perhaps, to itinerants of whom we never knew.

Francisco Tomás Hermenegildo Garcés 1776

Garcés, Francisco

- 13 1854 Diario y derrotero que siguió el M. R. P. Fr. Francisco Garces en su viaje hecho desde Octubre de 1775 hasta 17 de Setiembre de 1776, al Rio Colorado para reconocer las naciones que habitan sus márgenes, y á los pueblos del Moqui del Nuevo-México. In: Documentos para la historia de México. Segunda serie, Tomo 1. México: F. Escalante y Comp., pp. 225-374. [In Spanish.]
(transl. 'Diary and course followed by the M. R. P. Fr. Francisco Garces on his trip made from October 1775 to September 17, 1776, to the Colorado River to reconnoiter the nations that inhabit its margins, and the Moqui peoples of New Mexico.')

This item has not been located in order to examine for this bibliography. See also Galvin (1968).

---

Translations and Excerpts

Coues, Elliott

- 14 1900 (ED., TRANSLATOR) On the trail of a Spanish pioneer : the diary and itinerary of Francisco Garcés (missionary priest) in his travels through Sonora, Arizona, and California[,] 1775-1776 : translated from an official contemporaneous copy of the original Spanish manuscript, and edited, with copious

The Grand Canyon!

I. Primary Expedition Narratives

critical notes by Elliott Coues. New York: Francis P. Harper, 2 volumes, pp. 1-312, 313-608.
(American Explorers Series, III.)

For Grand Canyon, see Volume II. Coues' translation is based on two manuscript copies of Garcés' diary and on Garcés (1854). (Compare also the translation by Galvin, 1965, below, made from another manuscript.) For the time when Garcés passed along the southern side of Grand Canyon, see Chapter VIII, "From Mojave to Moqui, June, 1776" (pp. 313-360). Coues' footnotes often far exceed the space given to the translation of Garcés—often just two or three lines of diary and the rest of the page notes—thus the peculiarly long stretch of page numbers cited for the diary quotations made here. Garcés spent five days with the Havasupai; his diary mostly describes the people and their living conditions, but concludes (pp. 345-346),

"Whithersoever I have gone I have seen no situation more strong and secure by nature. These families do not exceed 34 in number; yet it is the largest rancheria that I have seen among the Yabipais. Close by runs the Rio Jabesua, which arises in the labyrinth of caxones there are in every direction; the course it here takes is to the westnorthwest and north, and at a little distance it falls into the Rio Colorado. This is a river of middling size but very rapid, and the Jabesuas utilize it well with many darns and ditches."

Leaving Cataract Canyon (pp. 346-351),

"June 25. I set forth accompanied by five Indians, and traveled two leagues south and east, now on horseback, now on foot, but in both these ways with great exertion, and halted on the slope of the sierra at a scanty aguage. In the afternoon I finished the most difficult part of it (the ascent)—they cause horror, those precipices it presents—and thereafter traveling north over good ground, with much grass, and many junipers, pines, and other trees among which I went about three leagues, I arrived at a rancheria which appertains to the Jabestia, whither had come some of this nation to gather the fruit of the juniper. The principal Indian offered himself to accompany me next day.

"June 26. I traveled four leagues southeast, and south, and turning to the east; and halted at the sight of the most profound caxones which ever onward continue (que aun todavia siguen); and within these flows the Rio Colorado. There is seen (vése) a very great sierra, which in the distance (looks) blue; and there runs from southeast to northwest a pass open to the very base, as if the sierra were cut artificially to give entrance to the Rio Colorado into these lands. I named this singular (pass) Puerto de Bucaréli, and though to all appearances would not seem to be very great the difficulty of reaching thereunto, I considered this to be impossible in consequence of the difficult caxones which intervened. From this position said pass bore east-northeast. Also were there seen on the north some smokes, which my companions said were those of the Indians whom they name Payuches, who live on the other side of the river. I am astonished at the roughness of this country, and at the barrier which nature has fixed therein.

"The Indians took down the beasts to give them water in those caxones, but I did not see any (water) myself."

"Puerto de Bucareli" is, as is widely known now, the Colorado River's passage through Grand Canyon.

[Garcés is often said to have also there compared the canyon to a "prison," but this is a misnomer. As I noted in an earlier article ("Big Canyon, Great Canyon, Grand Canyon: The mysterious evolution of a name", The Ol' Pioneer (Grand Canyon Historical Society), 33(1) (Winter 2022): 17, note 2):

["Things did not go well with his visit to the Hopi; most of them wanted nothing of his ministrations and refused him even lodging and food. He mentioned having been in a melancholy mood; this was on July 14, the day before he left the Hopi. Coues' translation of Garcés (p. 408): 'the melancholy . . . caused me to see myself buried alive in that calaboose (calabozo) of cliffs and cañons, after having encountered such rebels at [sic] the Maquis.' Thus, Garcés saw the region as physically and socially unfriendly, a calabozo that imperiled him—in Spanish, a dungeon or prison cell, not Coues' Anglicized 'calaboose,' or prison. Garcés did not isolate the Grand Canyon as his calabozo, nor did he write this while he was at the canyon during June, as has been misarranged by some writers."

[It is interesting to compare, however, Joseph C. Ives' comment about being in Cataract (Havasupai) Canyon at night, "The cañon was dark as a dungeon." See more fully Ives, farther below.]

The Grand Canyon!

I. Primary Expedition Narratives

Galvin, John

- 15 1965 (ED., TRANSLATOR) A record of travels in Arizona and California, 1775-1776 : Fr. Francisco Garcés. San Francisco: John Howell—Books, [iv], xii, 113 [117] pp., 5 leaves of plates, 2 fold-out maps. ["Diario que hà formado el Padre Fr. Francisco Garcés".] [1,250 copies.] [Also a 2nd printing, 1967, 1,500 copies.]

"This book may be used in whole or in part by anyone who wishes to do so, with the Editor's compliments, for no copyright exists on this work." (title-page verso)

Galvin's "Prefatory Note" indicates (pp. i-ii): "I have used a contemporary manuscript copy in my library. The manuscript is of thirty-two numbered leaves, 8½ by 12 inches in size, all closely written on both sides except the last, which has only four lines written at the top of the recto side. In the last line it has as colophon: 'Tubutama y Enero 3 de 1777. Fr. Fran<sup>co</sup> Garcés', the author's name being copied, not a signature. The handwriting of the copyist throughout is clear and even, and the work has few scribal errors." Galvin points out further that "There is a printed version in Spanish", for which he provides the citation for Garcés (1854, above). "The history and fate of the original holograph, if Father Garcés wrote with his own hand and did not dictate his Diario, seem not to have been reported. The printed version has the most, whether because it was changed by its publishers or transcribes a manuscript now lost. The copy in my library seems to be one of the final group of fair copies prepared, probably with revision by Father Garcés, for submission to the Spanish Crown."

The portions corresponding to the selections from Winship (1896) are as follows (Galvin's translations; the enumerated days are as transcribed by him):

With the Havasupai, p. 66:

"June 20 114th day •••

"In all my travels I have seen no better natural stronghold. It contains about thirty-four families and I believe it to be the largest of all the Yavipai rancherías. The Jabesua River flows through here. It rises in the tangled gorges that are in every direction, and runs northwest and north, flowing near here into the Colorado River. It is a medium-sized river but very rapid. The Jabesuas, by means of good dams, draw much water from it to cultivate crops."

Leaving Cataract Canyon, pp. 66-67:

"June 25 115th day

"Accompanied by five Indians I went two leagues south and east with much difficulty, partly on foot, partly on horseback (they had taken our animals out by another path), and halted on the way up the heights at a watering-place with scant supply. In the afternoon I got to the top of that most painful ascent (its precipices are horrifying), and after a further three leagues southeast and north over land with much herbage, junipers, pines, and so forth, I arrived at a Jabesu a ranchería where they had come to pick juniper berries. The principal man among the Indians said that next day he would go with me.

"June 26 116th day

"Four more leagues southeast and south, and I stopped in sight of the succession of very deep gorges among which flows the Colorado River. From here I saw that in a very large mountain range extending from southeast to northwest and blue with distance a deep passage was cut, steep-sided like a man-made trough, through which the Colorado River enters these lands; I called it the Puerto de Bucareli. Although to my sight it seemed quite near, it was very hard to reach on account of the canyons in between. It lay to the east-northeast from where I looked. I saw toward the north some puffs of smoke which I was told were made by the Payuchas, who dwell on the other side of the river."

The Grand Canyon!

I. Primary Expedition Narratives

- 16 1968 Diario de exploraciones en Arizona y California en los años 1775 y 1776. (Introducción y notas de John Galvin.) Universidad Autónoma de México, Instituto de Investigaciones Históricas, 2nd ed., 103 pp. (Cuadernos Serie Documental, 6.) [In Spanish.]
(transl. 'Diary of explorations in Arizona and California in the years 1775 and 1776')

A republication of Garcés from the 1854 publication cited farther above, which was from a different manuscript than that used by Galvin (1965, above). Not seen.

Garcés, Francisco Tomás Hermenegildo

- 17 1993 [Selection from journal.] In: McNamee, Gregory (ed.), Named in stone and sky : an Arizona anthology. Tucson: University of Arizona Press, pp. 114-115.

Reprinted from Coues (1900).

- 18 2011 Mojave Crossing to Oraibe Pueblo. In: Newman, Lance (ed.), The Grand Canyon reader. Berkeley, Los Angeles, and London: University of California Press, pp. 198-207.

Reprinted from Galvin (1965).

---

The Grand Canyon!

I. Primary Expedition Narratives

1858

Exploration of the Colorado River of the West U.S. Army Corps of Topographical Engineers Commanded by Lt. Joseph Christmas Ives

THE IVES EXPEDITION of 1858 receives due credit for opening the Grand Canyon to the world. Although ostensibly a survey to examine the navigability of the lower Colorado River, as far as possible from the Gulf of California, this was also a modestly clandestine operation to investigate the possibility of using the Colorado as a means to gain logistical access to the continental interior—specifically, Utah, in the face of a possible civil war with Utah’s Mormon government and populace. The survey crew employed a purpose- but quickly-built sternwheel steamboat thrown together in the summer of 1857 in Philadelphia and shipped in pieces via the new railroad across the Isthmus of Panama and on to the Colorado River delta. In hindsight, plans to use the river to reach the interior were impractical, as the “head of navigation” was effectively found when the steamboat, Explorer, collided violently with a submerged rock in Black Canyon, not far downstream from where Hoover Dam would be built some 80 years later. (The expedition dates to 1857, but that time was during the long trip from the East Coast, and the preparations at the mouth of the Colorado, such that the steamboat did not actually get under way until the last few days of the year.)

The second part of the expedition continued with a land excursion to the east, along the 35th parallel. Exploratory surveys were made of the Grand Canyon, first in Peach Springs Canyon, down which the party traveled to Diamond Creek and thence to the Colorado River. A second descent was made at Cataract Creek (Havasupai Canyon), where a small group descended nearly to the Havasupai village of Supai. Leaving the region eastwardly, the main group continued more or less directly to Fort Defiance, New Mexico Territory (the site is in Arizona today), while Lt. Ives and a few others detoured to the Hopi mesas, likely another inquiry into the limits of Mormon incursion into the region.

The Ives expedition also produced the first reasonably detailed maps of the lower Colorado River country and the Grand Canyon. These maps were produced by Friedrich

The Grand Canyon!

I. Primary Expedition Narratives

Wilhelm von Egloffstein, who accompanied the expedition as cartographer and artist. His map of the lower Colorado is very good; but the map of the Grand Canyon, specifically its central and eastern parts, borders on the imaginary. This is not to detract from the effort, however, inasmuch as Egloffstein had no way of surveying those areas he could espy except from a great distance (if at all). This included the critical confluence of the Little Colorado River with the main Colorado, which in fact was mapped in such a way that the Havasu Canyon reached the Little Colorado, and that in turn reached the big Colorado in the central Grand Canyon area.

Detail from F. W. von Egloffstein, Map No. 2. Rio Colorado of the West, Explored by 1st Lieut. Joseph C. Ives, Top! Eng<sup>rs</sup> under the direction of the Office of Explorations and Surveys, A. A. Humphreys, Capt. Top! Eng<sup>rs</sup> in charge, by order of Hon. John B. Floyd, Secretary of War. 1858. In: Ives, Joseph C., Report upon the Colorado River of the West, explored in 1857 and 1858 by Lieutenant Joseph C. Ives, Corps of Topographical Engineers, under the direction of the Office of Explorations and Surveys, A. A. Humphreys, Captain Topographical Engineers, in charge. By order of the Secretary of War. Washington, D.C.: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1861.

Also accompanying the expedition as artist was another German, Balduin Möllhausen, whose other duties included serving as a field assistant to the naturalist John Strong Newberry. And Möllhausen, with Ives too, had in fact been through the same region south of the canyon during the 1854 westbound railroad route survey commanded by Lt. Amiel Weeks Whipple. But Egloffstein and Möllhausen are singled out here for producing a variety of illustrations that accompanied Ives' formal report in 1861; engravings and lithographs that opened the world's eyes to the wonders of the landscapes and Native peoples along the Colorado River. The quality of these ranges from very good and scenically faithful, to the downright mysteriously obscure, even bizarre. Art historians, and others, have had quite a lot to say about these over the years. Even so, the Germans were the first to portray the canyon, and in fact, Möllhausen's original watercolors (made after the expedition from field sketches) include the first ever view of the Colorado River at the bottom of the Grand Canyon, at the mouth of Diamond Creek, a locale that would by the latter part of the century be a frequent destination for the first Grand Canyon tourists and is today an end-point for many boating trips on the Colorado through Grand Canyon. The unwary first common visitors stepped from the cars of the Atlantic & Pacific Railroad to suffer the physical privations of the climate (particularly in summer) and the bodily humiliations of Julius Farlee's springless conveyances down a most unfavorable "road" into the canyon.

The Grand Canyon!

I. Primary Expedition Narratives

It was Ives' bleak evaluations of the uses (uselessness) of the terrain—the Grand Canyon included—that later writers have gleefully lept upon, particularly the one comment that Ives' party would be the last non-Native people ever to go there. But Möllhausen's and Egloffstein's imagery truly caught the public's imagination. The scenes were reproduced—often poorly redrawn—in magazine articles and school geographies on both sides of the Atlantic. The weirder, the better; but they inspired imaginations if not credulity. At that time, too, few really understood the limned grandeur of the canyon scenes that awaited visitors whose experiences had been more used to those of Grand Tours in Europe (think Alps and Rome) and countrysides of unthreatening gentleness like those of the Hudson River Valley. That all was going to change, thanks to Ives and company.

Balduin Möllhausen and Joseph C. Ives 1858

Möllhausen, Balduin

- 19      1858      Der Rio Colorado des Westens. Zeitschrift für Allgemeine Erdkunde, New Series, 5: 438-443. [In German.]
(transl. 'The Rio Colorado of the West')

As an artist and assistant to physician-naturalist John Strong Newberry, Möllhausen had accompanied the Joseph C. Ives expedition up the lower Colorado River and then overland to Fort Defiance, reaching the Grand Canyon at Diamond Creek and Cataract Creek (see Ives, below). He had been through the region before, along with Ives, having passed south of the Grand Canyon in 1854 with the west-bound expedition of Amiel Weeks Whipple, reaching the lower Colorado River.

This report by Möllhausen's contains the first-published description of the Ives expedition's pass by the Grand Canyon in the spring of 1858, when two ventures were made into the canyon itself, at Peach Springs Canyon–Diamond Creek and at Cataract (Havasu) Creek. Published upon his return to Germany, it appeared in print even before Ives' own, obscurely published preliminary report to the Army, dated November 1858 and published at year's end (see farther below), which did not mention the canyon by name. Following as it does the minutes of the "Sitzung der geographischen Gesellschaft zu Berlin vom 2. October 1858" (transl. 'Meeting of the Berlin Geographical Society on October 2, 1858'), and before the meeting of November 6, we can assume that

The Grand Canyon!

I. Primary Expedition Narratives

Möllhausen's report was about coincident with one or the other meeting. The volume is complete as one, not published in separate serially appearing parts (although it is possible that separates could well have been issued in advance of the volume, as was often customary).

Möllhausen later (1861) published a two-volume account of the entire Ives expedition (see farther below), which appeared almost contemporaneously with Ives' monumental, official report. Readers who are familiar with Ives' 1861 text will recognize the general feelings and progression of the expedition in this rendition. (See also Kerp, 1904, in Part II of this bibliography, where part of Möllhausen's text, a little different, is quoted without source other than to credit Möllhausen, which likely was taken from Möllhausen's 1861 fuller account.) Möllhausen's text here in the Zeitschrift does account for the entire expedition, up the Colorado River by steamer from the Gulf of California, to its end in New Mexico Territory, but only that part embracing the land expedition past Grand Canyon is quoted here, as being the first-published impression of the region from the modern era.

"Bei fortgesetzter Reise gegen Nordosten gelangt man endlich in den Winkel, der von dem südwestlich fließenden Colorado und seinem aus Südost kommenden Nebenflusse Colorado Chiquito gebildet wird, und zugleich auf eine Höhe nach barometrischen Messungen von 9000 Fuss über der Meeresfläche und wenigstens 7500 Fuss über dem Spiegel des Colorado. Dort nun beginnt das Hochland, welches sich scheinbar wie eine weite Ebene nach allen Richtungen hin ausdehnt, deren Horizont selten von nebligen Bergkuppen, häufiger aber von spaltenähnlichen Einschnitten in der Ebene selbst unterbrochen wird. Eine unbeschreibliche, beängstigende Einsamkeit herrscht dort oben; verkrüppelte Cedern wechseln durch die Luftspiegelung scheinbar in der Ferne ihre Gestalt, oder ragen, abgestorben und ihres dunkelgrünen Schmuckes beraubt, wie verwitterte riesenhafte Geweihe vorweltlicher Hirsche empor. Sengende Hitze erwärmt dort oben die felsige wasserlose Fläche, dörrt die im verstohlenen Winkel keimenden Gräser und reift die stachelichten Früchte der Cacteen; eisiger Sturm von heftigem Donner begleitet wirbelt zu anderen Zeiten dichte Schneemassen über die Hochebene, Untergang drohend den dorthin verirrt Menschen und Thieren, Ehrfurcht gebietend vor der gewaltigen, Alles umfassenden Naturkraft.

"Lenkt man, in der Absicht, den grossen oder den kleinen Colorado zu erreichen, seine Schritte gegen Norden, dahin, wo Spalten im Boden mächtige, gegen den Horizont scharf abstechende Thürme und Mauern bilden, zugleich aber auch den Lauf grosser Gewässer verrathen, so gelangt man bald in ein Labyrinth von Schluchten, die durch ihre Tiefe um so mehr überraschen, als sie aus der Ferne kaum an der geringen Senkung des Bodens erkennbar sind. Nur theilweise gelingt es, einer solchen Schlucht nachzufolgen, indem sehr bald Abgründe von 50 bis 500 Fuss Tiefe dieselbe unterbrechen. Auf einer vorstehenden horizontalen Felsenlage wie auf dem äussersten Rande eines Daches an grauenvollen Abgründen hinreitend, erreicht man nun auch Stellen, wo selbst der sichere Huf der Maulthiere keinen Halt mehr findet und der Weg zurück nur noch offen bleibt, ein Weg, der über furchtbaren Tiefen frei in der Luft zu schweben scheint, wo man gern die Augen beschattet, um die Felsmassen nicht zu erblicken, die sich scheinbar träge an einander vorbei schieben, wo die sich unter den Füßen lösenden Steine nicht geräuschvoll hinabrollen, sondern unhörbar weite Räume durchfliegen, tief unten schwer auf felsigen Boden fallen, und der auf diese Weise hervorgerufene, durch die Entfernung aber gedämpfte Schlag unheimlich in den Spalten und Klüften verhallt. Was mit Hilfe von Thieren nicht gelingt, das versucht der Mensch noch mit eigenen Kräften. Lange Stricke auf dem gefährlichen Pfade benutzend, gelangten wir allerdings weiter, doch nur so tief, um die Unmöglichkeit einzusehen, den Höhenunterschied zwischen der Hochebene und dem Colorado, der dort über 7000 Fuss beträgt, gänzlich zu überwinden. Es blieb uns also nur noch übrig, an jener Stelle die Höhe wieder zu gewinnen und einen Blick in diese eigenthümliche, gleichsam abgeschlossene Welt zu werfen.

"Was nun von der schwindelnden Höhe gesehen vor dem bewundernden Auge liegt, das vermögen Worte nicht genügend zu schildern; wie ein Chaos verschwimmen in einander tiefe Schluchten und abgesondert stehende, kastenförmige Ueberreste des Hochlandes; über dem trockenen ziegelrothen Sandsteinbett in der Tiefe thürmen sich Tausende von Füssen hoch über einander die Formationen verschiedener Epochen, deutlich erkennbar an den grellen Farbencontrasten; senkrecht stehen die Wände, als ob die geringste Erschütterung sie hinabzustürzen vermöchte; man bebt bei solchem Anblick und tritt unwillkürlich zurück von dem Abgrunde; wohin man auch das Auge wenden mag, überall trifft es auf nacktes todttes Gestein, überall scheinen die Uferränder von entfernteren tieferen Schluchten aufzutauchen, dem forschenden Reisenden ein gebieterisches

The Grand Canyon!

I. Primary Expedition Narratives

Halt zurufend, zugleich aber auch eine schwache Ahnung von der Unendlichkeit erweckend bei dem Gedanken: dass der fallende Tropfen die Schlünde bildete, die ihn von allen Seiten angähnen.

“Wir gelangten bis zu den 3000 Fuss tiefen Cañons; wenige Meilen weiter, aber noch 4000 Fuss tiefer, floss der Colorado, doch mehr als menschliche Kräfte wären erforderlich gewesen, um dahin zu gelangen, von wo aus wir den geheimnissvollen Strom mit unseren Blicken hätten erreichen können; wir schieden, ohne ihn wiedergesehen zu haben. So steht der Mensch oft nahe seinem Ziele, aber gegenüber einer furchtbar erhabenen Natur fühlt er seine eigene Ohnmacht; er beneidet die Weihe, die auf sicheren Schwingen über die Abgründe hinschwebt, er folgt ihr im Geiste und schafft sich mit ahnungsvollem Grauen ein Bild von dem Felsenthal des Colorado des Westens, welches gewiss noch lange für den Menschen in geheimnissvolles Dunkel gehüllt bleiben wird.

“Mehrfach versuchten wir noch weiter nordöstlich hinab an den Colorado zu gelangen, dessen Uferränder wir vom Fusse der San Francisco Mountains glaubten unterscheiden zu können, doch undurchdringlich fanden wir überall die Felsenwüste; selbst die freundlichen Moqui-Indianer schienen durch besonderen Widerwillen abgehalten zu werden, einen Pfad hinunter nach dem Colorado zu suchen oder zu zeigen. Wir sahen Nichts von den hohen Wasserfällen, die ein Fluss aufweisen muss, der auf einer Strecke von ungefähr 80 deutschen Meilen nahe an 3000 Fuss Höhenunterschied zu überwinden hat. Wir gaben unsere Arbeit erst auf, als der gänzliche Mangel an Lebensmitteln und die vollständige Entkräftung der uns gebliebenen Maulthiere uns gewaltsam dazu zwangen. Wir retteten uns nach Neu-Mexico und waren so glücklich, alle unsere Notizen, Zeichnungen und Sammlungen mit durchzubringen.”

(translation)

Continuing the journey northeast one finally comes to the angle formed by the southwest-flowing Colorado and its tributary coming from the southeast, the Colorado Chiquito, and at the same time to a barometric elevation of 9,000 feet above sea level and at least 7,500 feet above level of the Colorado. There now begins the highland, which seems to stretch out in all directions like a wide plain, the horizon of which is seldom interrupted by misty hilltops, but more frequently by crevasse-like indentations in the plain itself. There is an indescribable, frightening loneliness up there; stunted cedars seem to change their shape in the distance through mirage, or, dead and robbed of their dark green adornment, rise up like the weathered, gigantic antlers of prehistoric stags. Scorching heat up there warms the rocky, waterless plain, withers the grasses that sprout in hidden corners, and ripens the thorny fruits of the cacti. At other times, an icy storm accompanied by violent thunder whirls dense masses of snow over the plateau, threatening the demise of the people and animals who have strayed there, commanding awe before the mighty, all-encompassing force of nature.

If, with the intention of reaching [either] the big or the little Colorado, one directs one's steps northwards, to where cracks in the ground form mighty towers and walls that stand out sharply against the horizon, but at the same time also reveal the course of large bodies of water, you soon find yourself in a labyrinth of gorges that are all the more surprising for their depth, as they are hardly recognizable from a distance because of the slight subsidence of the ground. It is only partially possible to follow such a gorge, as very soon chasms of 50 to 500 feet in depth interrupt it. Riding on a protruding horizontal rock formation as if on the outermost edge of a roof along horrible abysses, one now also reaches places where even the sure hooves of mules can no longer find footing and only the way back remains open, a way that leads over terrible depths seeming to float freely in the air, where one likes to shade one's eyes in order not to see the rocky masses that seem to slide lazily past one another, where the stones that come loose under one's feet do not roll down noisily but fly inaudibly through wide spaces, falling heavily on the rocky ground far below, and the shock thus produced, but muffled by the distance, echoes eerily in the cracks and crevices. What cannot be achieved with the help of animals, man still attempts with his own strength. Using long ropes on the perilous path, we went farther, but only so low as to see the impossibility of entirely traversing the difference in elevation between the plateau and the Colorado, which there is over 7,000 feet. It was therefore only left for us to gain the heights again at that point and to cast a glimpse into this peculiar, closed as it were, world.

What lies before the admiring eye seen from the dizzying heights, words cannot adequately describe; like chaos deep ravines and isolated, box-shaped remains of the highlands merge into one another; above the dry,

The Grand Canyon!

I. Primary Expedition Narratives

brick-red sandstone bed below, the formations of different epochs tower thousands of feet high, clearly recognizable by the glaring color contrasts; the walls are vertical, as if the slightest shock could throw them down; one trembles at such a sight and involuntarily steps back from the abyss; wherever one turns one's eye, one encounters bare dead rock everywhere, everywhere the banks of deeper, more distant gorges seem to appear, calling to the inquiring traveler an imperative stop, but at the same time awakening a faint sense of infinity at the thought: that the falling drops [rain] formed the gorges that yawn at him on all sides.

'We got to the canyons 3000 feet deep; a few miles farther, but still 4000 feet below, flowed the Colorado, but it would have taken more than human strength to go where we could have sighted the mysterious stream; we parted without seeing it again. Thus man often stands close to his goal, but in the face of terribly sublime nature he feels his own powerlessness; he envies the consecration that hovers over the abysses on sure wings, he follows her in spirit and with foreboding horror creates for himself an image of the rocky valley of the Colorado of the west, which will certainly remain shrouded in mysterious darkness for a long time to come.

'Several times we tried to get further northeast down to the Colorado, whose banks we thought we could distinguish from the foot of the San Francisco Mountains, but we found the rocky desert impenetrable everywhere; even the friendly Moqui Indians seemed dissuaded by a particular reluctance to seek or point to a trail down to the Colorado. We saw none of the high falls which a river must descend, for a distance of about 80 German miles, nearly 3,000 feet in elevation. We gave up our work only when the complete lack of food and the complete exhaustion of the mules that were left to us compelled us to do so. We escaped to New Mexico and were fortunate enough to bring all our notes, drawings and collections with us.'

Ives, Joseph C.

- 20 1858 Colorado exploring expedition. Preliminary report of 1st Lieutenant J. C. Ives, Topographical Engineers, to Captain A. A. Humphreys, Topographical Engineers, in charge of Office of Explorations and Surveys, War Department, November, 1858. As a part of: Humphreys, A. A., [Annual report to the Secretary of War, December 6, 1858]. From: Floyd, John B., Report of the Secretary of War. In: Message of the President of the United States to the two houses of Congress at the commencement of the Second Session of the Thirty-fifth Congress : December 6, 1858. Washington, D.C.: William A. Harris, Printer, pp. 608-619. (President's message: U.S. 35th Congress, 2nd Session, Senate Executive Document 1, Serial 975.)

Ives' preliminary report to Humphreys is dated "Washington, November 1, 1858." See also Ives (1859). In this preliminary report, under the subject of "Topographical Description of the Region Traversed" (pp. 612-613) he generally describes the region bounding the Grand Canyon as follows. It is quoted here at length for its seminal importance in relaying personal impressions (although in this case also an official accounting) of the region. Note particularly some key words and phrases that are similar to those used by Möllhausen (above), which suggests a sharing of conversations, if not notes.

"This is a vast table land, hundreds of miles in breadth, extending eastward to the mountains of the Sierra Madre and stretching far north into Utah. To the extreme limit of vision immense plateaus rise, one above the other, in successive steps, the floors of the most elevated being from seven to eight thousand feet above the level of the sea. The Colorado and its tributaries, seeking the level of the low region to the southwest, have, by ages of wear and abrasion, cut their way through this huge formation, making cañons that are in some places more than a mile in depth. The mighty avenues of the main water-courses are the thoroughfares into which smaller but still giant chasms debouch, and these in turn have their own subordinate tributaries, forming a maze of yawning abysses, generally inaccessible, and whose intricacies it would be a hopeless task to attempt to unravel. Twice only, after long and difficult clambering down the sides of precipices and through walled approaches that seemed to be leading into the bowels of the earth, were the banks of the streams below finally attained. One place was on the Colorado itself, and the other near the mouth of one of its larger tributaries. Except at the place of decent the cañon of the river, as far as it could be seen, showed no point of practicable ingress or outlet, and the appearance of the torrent, foaming and surging along its confined bed, left little room for doubt as to what would be the result of any attempt, such as has been sometimes suggested, to explore the river in boats from its sources above.

The Grand Canyon!

I. Primary Expedition Narratives

"So numerous and so closely interlaced are the cañons in some portions of this singular region that they have displaced all but scattered remnants of the original plateau, leaving narrow walls, isolated ridges, and spires so slender that they seem to totter upon their bases, shooting up to an enormous height from the vaults below.

"The natural surface of the country opposes insurmountable barriers to travelling in any fixed direction, and the aridity of the accessible portions of the table lands rendered the explorations difficult. Though the season of the year was the most favorable for finding water, much inconvenience was experienced from its scarcity, and it is doubtful whether during the dry months the examinations could have been prosecuted at all.

"West of the Little Colorado belts of cedar and pine forests somewhat relieve the general aspect of barrenness, but travelling eastward, between that river and the towns of the Moquis Indians, the country become almost entirely a desert. The immense stretches of sandy soil are broken only by ridges of brilliant red and yellow marls, that intensify the heat and glare of the sun. The mirage ordinarily existing in such localities assumes generally the appearance of water, and is rendered peculiarly unpleasant from the known absence of that element over the whole region in question."

- 21 1859 Colorado exploring expedition. Preliminary report of First Lieut. J. C. Ives, Topographical Engineers, to Captain A. A. Humphreys, Topographical Engineers, in charge of the Office of Explorations and Surveys, War Department, November 1858. In: Annual report of Captain A. A. Humphreys, Topographical Engineers, in charge of Office of Explorations and Surveys, War Department. December, 1858. "Washington: 1859" [no imprint], pp. 31-42.

This is in a separate of Humphreys' annual report (171 pp.). Also apparently released as a separate [not seen], 12 pp., as cited in Miscellaneous Intelligence [SECTION], American Journal of Science and Arts, Series 2, 27(80) (March 1859): 304: "Lieut. J. C. Ives: Colorado Exploring Expedition, Preliminary Report to Captain A. A. Humphreys, Topograph. Engineers. 12 pp. 8vo." (ENTIRE NOTE). This report was also reprinted in New York Times, December 27, 1858, p. 3.

- 22 1859 The Colorado expedition. The Colorado of the West and the country bordering it—the Grand Canon. American Geographical and Statistical Society, Journal, 1(2) (February): 41-45.

Without by-line. This is a quotation of most of Ives' (1858) report, with an unsigned, one-paragraph editorial introduction. This reprinting omits only some remarks pertaining to Native Americans. Ives' title is emended, and the subtitle is added here; thus "Grand Canon" is attributed to the editor, whose identity has not been determined.

- 23 1861 Report upon the Colorado River of the West, explored in 1857 and 1858 by Lieutenant Joseph C. Ives, Corps of Topographical Engineers, under the direction of the Office of Explorations and Surveys, A. A. Humphreys, Captain Topographical Engineers, in charge. By order of the Secretary of War. Washington, D.C.: U.S. Government Printing Office, 5 parts and four appendices in 1 volume, 2 maps. (Volume: U.S. 30th Congress, 1st Session, House Document 90.) (Serial 1058, Volume 14.) [HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES VARIANT.]

- 24 1861 Report upon the Colorado River of the West, explored in 1857 and 1858 by Lieutenant Joseph C. Ives, Corps of Topographical Engineers, under the direction of the Office of Explorations and Surveys, A. A. Humphreys, Captain Topographical Engineers, in charge. By order of the Secretary of War. Washington, D.C.: U.S. Government Printing Office, 5 parts and four appendices in 1 volume, 4 maps [see note on collation of maps, below]. (Volume: U.S. 30th Congress, 1st Session, Senate Executive Document [no number].) [SENATE VARIANT.]

Sabin (citation follows) cites Ives' publication only with the imprint, "Washington. 1861.", without notice of either the House or Senate variants that exist. Other than the inclusion of two extra maps in the Senate variant, and the banner on the title-page, there is no difference between the printings. In addition, Sabin indicates only "Map." (Joseph Sabin, A Dictionary of Books Relating to America, from Its Discovery to the Present Time. Volume IX. (J. Sabin and Son, New York, 1877), p. 167.) [Poore (citation follows) likewise, but by design (p.

The Grand Canyon!

I. Primary Expedition Narratives

iii), does not differentiate between the two Congressional variants, although it is listed as "Ex. docs., No. 90 36th Cong., 1st sess., Vol. XIV" (p. 780). Poore gives the pagination as 333 pp., with "map", and a publication date of June 5, 1860, which likely is the date ordered to be printed. (Poore, Benjamin Perley, A Descriptive Catalogue of the Government Publications of the United States, September 5, 1774-March 4, 1881 (Washington, D.C.: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1885. U.S. 48th Congress, 2nd Session, Senate Miscellaneous Document 67.) • Parts and appendices paginated as follows: title-page, p. [1]; resolution of the U.S. Senate regarding printing information, attested by Asbury Dickins, Secretary, p. [2]; letter of transmittal from John B. Floyd, Secretary of War, p. [3]; letter of transmittal from Ives, pp. [5]-6; Part I, "General Report", by J. C. Ives, pp. [9]-131; Part II, "Hydrographic Report", pp. 1-14 (NOTE: hydrographical work was conducted by Casimir Bielawski); Part III, "Geological Report", by J. S. Newberry, pp. 1-154; Part IV, "Botany", by "Professors Gray, Torrey, Thurber, and Dr Engelmann", pp. 1-30 (Asa Gray, John Torrey, George Thurber, George Engelmann); Part V, "Zoology", by S. F. Baird, pp. 1-31 (specifically only "List of Birds Collected on the Colorado Expedition"); Appendices cover sheet, p. [1]; Appendix A, "Remarks upon the Astronomical Observations", by G. P. Bond, pp. 3-4 (NOTE: astronomical work was conducted by Paul H. Taylor); "Remarks upon the Barometric Observations", pp. 4-5; Appendix B, "List of Camps, with Distances, Latitudes and Longitudes, Altitudes, etc.", pp. 6-8; Appendix C, "Barometric and Meteorological Observations", pp. 9-31 (NOTE: meteorological work was conducted by C. K. Booker); Appendix D, "Remarks upon the Construction of the Maps", p. 33. With two maps: "Map No. 1. Rio Colorado of the West", drawn by Frhr. F. W. v. Egloffstein, scale 1:380,160, shaded relief (from mouth of Colorado River to head of navigation); "Map No. 2. Rio Colorado of the West", drawn by Frhr. F. W. v. Egloffstein, scale 1:760,320, shaded relief (from head of navigation to Fort Defiance, including Grand Canyon). • Two geologic maps, which are the Egloffstein topographic maps with overprinted geology portrayed by Newberry, accompany only the Senate Executive Document variant (fide WAGNER-CAMP 375, p. 648), for a total of four maps with the Senate variant; further corroborated by Farquhar's citation of the House Executive Document variant (FARQUHAR 21) that notes only two maps. (Farquhar does not cite the Senate variant.) • Note on binding of the Senate variant: The original binding of the Senate variant has a unique spine, embossed and stamped as follows (gilt): [ornamental rule] / SENATE. / [ornamental rule] / COLORADO / EXPLORING / EXPEDITION / [rule] / J. C. IVES, / TOP<sup>L</sup>. ENGINEER. / [rule] / 1857-8. / [ornamental rule] / [ornament, 8-pointed star in symmetrical design] / [ornamental rule] / WAR / DEPARTMENT. / [ornamental rule].

- 25 1861 General report. In: Ives, Joseph C., Report upon the Colorado River of the West, explored in 1857 and 1858 by Lieutenant Joseph C. Ives, Corps of Topographical Engineers, under the direction of the Office of Explorations and Surveys, A. A. Humphreys, Captain Topographical Engineers, in charge. By order of the Secretary of War. Washington, D.C.: U.S. Government Printing Office, pp. [9]-131 [separately paginated]. (Volume: U.S. 30th Congress, 1st Session, House Document 90, Serial 1058.)

Ives' "General Report" is the remarkably detailed, readable record of the entire expedition, from formulation to dispersal. It was of course a river expedition first, then, dividing his command, Ives traipsed overland from the Colorado River to Fort Defiance, in the eastern part of New Mexico Territory (in today's Arizona), stopping en route to descend into the Grand Canyon down what today are known as Peach Springs Wash and Diamond Creek and again in Cataract (Havasu) Canyon. A few of Ives' remarks have been often quoted, sometimes gleefully pointing to his greatest underestimate, that theirs would "doubtless be the last party of whites to visit this profitless locality"—little imagining that in a quarter century tourists would be conducted down this very route to the rude Farlee "hotel" and to the Colorado River itself. But Ives also was impressed with the scenery, and what is transcribed herein, some of which has been oddly overlooked by many writers about the expedition, comprise his own observations and experiences from his encounter with this grand landscape (though with a little suffering in places for his cultural biases); they are interesting to compare to the experiences of the tourists just a few short decades later (as recounted elsewhere herein at some length), in that they tend to fall upon the same sorts of reflection and imagination as the view and the writer's feelings are described. In this sense, Ives was the first to embellish the Grand Canyon's "feel" for readers in English (along with Möllhausen, who wrote independently in German).

The Grand Canyon!

I. Primary Expedition Narratives

Expedition members Balduin Möllhausen and John Strong Newberry also offered up their observations, for which see above and below herein.

The “General Report” is profusely illustrated with lithographs by both Balduin Möllhausen and Friedrich Wilhelm von Egloffstein (including several substantial fold-out panoramic sketches), among which are several that depict scenes at and near the Grand Canyon.

Ives’ “Letter to the Officer in Charge of the Office of Explorations and Surveys” (Capt. A. A. Humphreys, Corps of Topographical Engineers) sums the Colorado River and overland expedition (pp. 5-6):

“The region explored after leaving the navigable portion of the Colorado—though, in a scientific point of view, of the highest interest, and presenting natural features whose strange sublimity is perhaps unparalleled in any part of the world—is not of much value. Most of it is uninhabitable, and a great deal of it is impassable. A brief statement could comprise the whole of what might be called the practical results of the land explorations. The country along the Colorado, however, with the exception of a few places, has been almost a terra incognita. Concerning the character and value of the portions previously explored, great differences of opinion existed. Between the mouth and the highest point attained are many localities unique and surpassingly beautiful. Some of the Indian tribes, of whom little has been known, are subjects for curious speculation; and it being doubtful whether any party will ever again pursue the same line of travel, I have thought it would be better, in place of condensing into a few lines the prominent facts noticed, to transmit the journal kept during the expedition.

“This involves the presentation of what may appear extraneous, and perhaps beyond the limits of a strictly official communication; but a record of the every-day incidents of travel, set down while fresh in the mind, serves to convey a general idea of a country that can scarcely be imparted in any other way, and can hardly fail of reproducing, to some extent, in the mind of the reader the impression made upon that of the traveller.”

Ives’ chapters 7 (“Mojave Valley to Big Canon, at Mouth of Diamond River”) and 8 (“Colorado Plateau, Near Big Canon”) encompass the expedition’s encounter with the Grand Canyon. We begin with the approach to the canyon (p. 98):

“Camp 67, Big cañon of the Colorado, April 3 [1858].—The two Hualpais preserved the credit of the Indian employes by being punctual to their engagement, and led off in company with the Mojaves as we ascended the ravine from Peacock’s spring. It was a cool lovely morning, and a favorable day for travel. After proceeding a mile or two we issued from the hills and entered a region totally different from any that had been seen during the expedition. A broad tableland, unbroken by the volcanic hills that had overspread the country since leaving Fort Yuma, extended before us, rising in a gradual swell towards the north. The road became hard and smooth, and the plain was covered with excellent grass. Herds of antelope and deer were seen bounding over the slopes. Groves of cedar occurred, and with every mile became more frequent and of larger size. At the end of ten miles the ridge of the swell was attained, and a splendid panorama burst suddenly into view. In the foreground were low table-hills, intersected by numberless ravines; beyond these a lofty line of bluffs marked the edge of an immense cañon; a wide gap was directly ahead, and through it were beheld, to the extreme limit of vision, vast plateaus, towering one above the other thousands of feet in the air, the long horizontal bands broken at intervals by wide and profound abysses, and extending a hundred miles to the north, till the deep azure blue faded into a light cerulean tint that blended with the dome of the heavens. The famous ‘Big cañon’ was before us; and for a long time we paused in wondering delight, surveying this stupendous formation through which the Colorado and its tributaries break their way.

“Our guides, becoming impatient of the detention, plunged into a narrow and precipitous ravine that opened at our feet, and we followed as well as we could, stumbling along a rough and rocky pathway. The Hualpais were now of great assistance, for the ravines crossed and forked in intricate confusion; even Ireteba, who had hitherto led the train, became at a loss how to proceed, and had to put the little Hualpais in front. The latter, being perfectly at home, conducted us rapidly down the declivity. The descent was great and the trail blind and circuitous. A few miles of difficult travelling brought us into a narrow valley flanked by steep and high slopes; a sparkling stream crossed its centre, and a gurgling in some tall grass near by announced the presence of a spring. The water was delicious. The grass in the neighborhood was sparse, but of good quality.

The Grand Canyon!

I. Primary Expedition Narratives

"This morning we left the valley and followed the course of a creek down a ravine, in the bed of which the water at intervals sank and rose for two or three miles, when it altogether disappeared. The ravine soon attained the proportions of a cañon. The bottom was rocky and irregular, and there were some jump-offs over which it was hard to make the pack animals pass. The vegetation began to disappear, leaving only a few stunted cedars projecting from the sides of the rugged bluffs. The place grew wilder and grander. The sides of the tortuous cañon became loftier, and before long we were hemmed in by walls two thousand feet high. The scenery much resembled that in the Black cañon [on the lower Colorado River, the site now of Hoover Dam], excepting that the rapid descent, the increasing magnitude of the colossal piles that blocked the end of the vista, and the corresponding depth and gloom of the gaping chasms into which we were plunging, imparted an unearthly character to a way that might have resembled the portals of the infernal regions. Harsh screams issuing from aerial recesses in the cañon sides, and apparitions of goblin-like figures perched in the rifts and hollows of the impending cliffs gave an odd reality to this impression. At short distances other avenues of equally magnificent proportions came in from one side or the other; and no trail being left on the rocky pathway, the idea suggested itself that were the guides to desert us our experience might further resemble that of the dwellers in the unblest abodes—in the difficulty of getting out.

"Huts of the rudest construction, visible here and there in some sheltered niche or beneath a projecting rock, and the sight of a hideous old squaw, staggering under a bundle of fuel, showed that we had penetrated into the domestic retreats of the Hualpais nation. Our party being, in all probability, the first company of whites that had ever been seen by them, we had anticipated producing a great effect, and were a little chagrined when the old woman, and two or three others of both sexes that were met, went by without taking the slightest notice of us. If pack-trains had been in the habit of passing twenty times a day they could not have manifested more complete indifference.

"Seventeen miles of this strange travel had now been accomplished. The road was becoming more difficult, and we looked ahead distrustfully into the dark and apparently interminable windings, and wondered where we were to find a camping place. At last we struck a wide branch cañon [Diamond Creek] coming in from the south, and saw with joyful surprise a beautiful and brilliantly clear stream of water gushing over a pebbly bed in the centre, and shooting from between the rocks and sparkling jets and miniature cascades. On either side was an oasis of verdure—young willows and a thick patch of grass. Camp was speedily formed, and men and mules have had a welcome rest after their fatiguing journey.

"A hundred yards below camp the cañon takes a turn; but as it was becoming very dark, all further examinations were postponed till to-morrow. In the course of the evening Ireteba came into my tent, and I asked him how far we had still to travel before reaching the great river. To my surprise he informed me that the mouth of the creek is only a few yards below the turn, and that we are now camped just on the verge of the Big Cañon of the Colorado.

"Camp 69, Cedar Forest, April 5.—A short walk down the bed of Diamond river, on the morning after we had reached it, verified the statement of Ireteba, and disclosed the famous Colorado cañon. The view from the ridge, beyond the creek to which the Hualpais had first conducted us, had shown that the plateaus further north and east were several thousand feet higher than that through which the Colorado cuts at this point, and the cañons proportionally deeper, but the scene was sufficiently grand to well repay for the labor of the descent. The cañon was similar in character to others that have been mentioned, but on a larger scale, and thus far unrivalled in grandeur. Mr. Mollhausen has taken a sketch, which gives a better idea of it than any description. The course of the river could be traced for only a few hundred yards, above or below, but what had been seen from the table-land showed that we were at the apex of a great southern bend. The walls, on either side, rose directly out of the water. The river was about fifty yards wide. The channel was studded with rocks, and the torrent rushed through like a mill-race.

"The day was spent in an examination of the localities. Dr. Newberry has had opportunities for observation seldom afforded to the geologist. This plateau formation has been undisturbed by volcanic action, and the sides of the cañons exhibit all of the series that compose the table-land in New Mexico [Territory], presenting, perhaps, the most splendid exposure of stratified rocks that there is in the world."

The Grand Canyon!

I. Primary Expedition Narratives

We rejoin Ives in Chapter 8 as the party crosses the plateau, heading eastward. They approach Cataract Canyon (home of the Havasupai, now mapped as Havasu Canyon), where part of the descent ironically foretells the same sorts of hesitant descriptions made by innumerable 20th-century writers who regaled their readers about the ride down Bright Angel Trail (beginning on p. 105):

"The sun was oppressively warm, and every place whose appearance gave promise of water was carefully searched, but without success. Ten miles conducted to the head of a ravine, down which was a well-beaten Indian trail. There was every prospect therefore that we were approaching a settlement similar to that of the Hualpais, on Diamond river. The descent was more rapid than the former had been, and in the course of a few miles we had gone down into the plateau one or two thousand feet, and the bluffs on either side had assumed stupendous proportions. Still no signs of habitations were visible. The worn-out and thirsty beasts had begun to flag, when we were brought to a stand still by a fall a hundred feet deep in the bottom of the cañon. At the brink of the precipice was an overhanging ledge of rock, from which we could look down as into a well upon the continuation of the gorge far below. The break reached completely across the ravine, and the side walls were nearly perpendicular. There was no egress in that direction, and it seemed a marvel that a trail should be found leading to a place where there was nothing to do but to return. A closer inspection showed that the trail still continued along the cañon, traversing horizontally the face of the right hand bluff. A short distance off it seemed as though a mountain goat could scarcely keep its footing upon the slight indentation that appeared like a thread attached to the rocky wall, but a trial proved that the path, though narrow and dizzy, had been cut with some care into the surface of the cliff, and afforded a foothold level and broad enough both for men and animals. I rode upon it first, and the rest of the party and the train followed—one by one—looking very much like a row of insects crawling upon the side of a building. We proceeded for nearly a mile along this singular pathway, which preserved its horizontal direction. The bottom of the cañon meanwhile had been rapidly descending, and there were two or three falls where it dropped a hundred feet at a time, thus greatly increasing the depth of the chasm. The change had taken place so gradually that I was not sensible of it, till glancing down the side of my mule I found that he was walking within three inches of the brink of a sheer gulf a thousand feet deep; on the other side, nearly touching my knee, was an almost vertical wall rising to an enormous altitude. The sight made my head swim, and I dismounted and got ahead of the mule, a difficult and delicate operation, which I was thankful to have safely performed. A part of the men became so giddy that they were obliged to creep upon their hands and knees, being unable to walk or stand. In some places there was barely room to walk, and a slight deviation in a step would have precipitated one into the frightful abyss. I was a good deal alarmed lest some obstacle should be encountered that would make it impossible to go ahead, for it was certainly impracticable to return. After an interval of uncomfortable suspense the face of the rock made an angle, and just beyond the turn was a projection from the main wall with a surface fifteen or twenty yards square that would afford a foothold. The continuation of the wall was perfectly vertical, so that the trail could no longer follow it, and we found that the path descended the steep face of the cliff to the bottom of the cañon. It was a desperate road to traverse, but located with a good deal of skill—zigzagging down the precipice, and taking advantage of every crevice and fissure that could afford a foothold. It did not take long to discover that no mule could accomplish this descent, and nothing remained but to turn back. We were glad to have even this privilege in our power. The jaded brutes were collected upon the little summit where they could be turned around, and then commenced to re-perform the hazardous journey. The sun shone directly into the cañon, and the glare reflected from the walls made the heat intolerable. The disappointed beasts, now two days without water, with glassy eyes and protruding tongues, plodded slowly along, uttering the most melancholy cries. The nearest water, of which we had knowledge, was almost thirty miles distant. There was but one chance of saving the train, and after reaching an open portion of the ravine the packs and the saddles were removed, and two or three Mexicans started for the lagoons mounted upon the least exhausted animals, and driving the others loose before them. It was somewhat dangerous to detach them thus far from the main party, but there was no help for it. Some of the mules will doubtless give out before the night march is over, but the knowledge that they are on their way to water will enable most of them to reach it in spite of their weariness and the length of the way.

"I gave directions to the Mexican not to return for a couple of days. This will give the beasts time to rest, and afford us an opportunity of exploring the trail beyond the precipice, where we had to stop. Several cañons

The Grand Canyon!

I. Primary Expedition Narratives

head near us, all leading into the mighty avenue which forms the main water-way. Each branch has its subordinate tributaries, that interlock with one another, and cut away more than half of the original plateau."

Now some members of the party follow the way into Cataract Canyon, where the expedition's cartographer and artist, the German baron Friedrich Wilhelm von Egloffstein, precipitated unexpectedly to the bottom.

"Camp 73, Colorado plateau, April 14.—Lieutenant Tipton, Mr. Egloffstein, Mr. Peacock, and myself, with a dozen men, formed the party to explore the cañon. It was about five miles to the precipice. The descent of the latter was accomplished without serious trouble. In one or two places the path traversed smooth inclined ledges, where the insecure footing made the crossing dangerous. The bottom of the cañon, which from the summit looked smooth, was covered with hills, thirty or forty feet high. Along the centre we were surprised to find an inner cañon, a kind of under cellar, with low walls at the starting point, which were soon converted into lofty precipices, as the base of the ravine sank deeper and deeper into the earth. Along the bottom of this gorge we followed the trail, distinctly seen when the surface was not covered with rocks. Every few moments, low falls and ledges, which we had to jump or slide down, were met with, till there had accumulated a formidable number of obstacles to be encountered in returning. Like other cañons, it was circuitous, and at each turn we were impatient to find something novel or interesting. We were deeper in the bowels of the earth than we had ever been before, and surrounded by walls and towers of such imposing dimensions that it would be useless to attempt describing them; but the effects of magnitude had begun to pall, and the walk from the foot of the precipice was monotonously dull; no sign of life could be discerned above or below. At the end of thirteen miles from the precipice an obstacle presented itself that there seemed to be no possibility of overcoming. A stone slab, reaching from one side of the cañon to the other, terminated the plane which we were descending. Looking over the edge it appeared that the next level was forty feet below. This time there was no trail along the side bluffs, for these were smooth and perpendicular. A spring of water rose from the bed of the cañon not far above, and trickled over the ledge, forming a pretty cascade. It was supposed that the Indians must have come to this point merely to procure water, but this theory was not altogether satisfactory, and we sat down upon the rocks to discuss the matter.

"Mr. Egloffstein lay down by the side of the creek, and projecting his head over the ledge to watch the cascade, discovered a solution of the mystery. Below the shelving rock, and hidden by it and the fall, stood a crazy looking ladder, made of rough sticks bound together with thongs of bark. It was almost perpendicular, and rested upon a bed of angular stones. The rounds had become rotten from the incessant flow of water. Mr. Egloffstein, anxious to have the first view of what was below, scrambled over the ledge and got his feet upon the upper round. Being a solid weight, he was too much for the insecure fabric, which commenced giving way. One side fortunately stood firm, and holding on to this with a tight grip, he made a precipitate descent. The other side and all the rounds broke loose and accompanied him to the bottom in a general crash, effectually cutting off the communication. Leaving us to devise means of getting him back he ran to the bend to explore. The bottom of the cañon had been reached. He found that he was at the edge of a stream, ten or fifteen yards wide, fringed with cottonwoods and willows. The walls of the cañon spread out for a short distance, leaving room for a narrow belt of bottom land, on which were fields of corn and a few scattered huts.

"A place was found near the ledge where one could clamber a little way up the wall, and we thus got a view of the valley. The river was nearly as large as the Gila at low water, and, with the exception of that stream, the most important tributary of the Colorado between its mouth and our position. The cañon Mr. Egloffstein saw could not be followed far; there were cascades just below. He perceived, however, that he was very near to its mouth, though perhaps at a thousand feet greater altitude, and an Indian pointed out the exact spot where it united with the cañon of the Rio Colorado.

"The Yampais [Havasupai] did not differ much from the Hualapis [Hualapai] in general appearance. They were perhaps a trifle cleaner and more respectable. It is probable that, all told, they do not number more than two hundred persons. One of them accompanied Mr. Egloffstein to the foot of the ledge, and intimated a willingness to go with us to camp, but when he saw the broken ladder gave up his intention. The accident did not appear otherwise to concern him. There must have been some other trail leading to the retreat, for the use of the ladder had evidently been long abandoned.

The Grand Canyon!

I. Primary Expedition Narratives

"Having looked at all that was to be seen, it now remained to get Mr. Egloffstein back. The slings upon the soldiers' muskets were taken off and knotted together, and a line thus made which reached to the bottom. Whether it would support his weight was a matter of experiment. The general impression was that it would not, but of the two evils—breaking his neck or remaining among the Yampais—he preferred the former, and fastened the strap around his shoulders. It was a hard straight lift. The ladder pole was left, and rendered great assistance both to us and the rope, and the ascent was safely accomplished. We invited the Indian to follow Mr. Egloffstein's example, but this he energetically declined. The examination being finished, it was time to return. On leaving camp we had expected to be back before night, and had brought along neither provisions nor overcoats. An hour or two earlier, finding that the day was rapidly slipping by, two of the party were directed to go back and tell those who had remained that we might be detained till the next day, and in that case to forward in the morning something to eat. We walked as fast as possible, in order to get out of the cañon before dark, but the ascent was laborious, and the trail, made in coming down over the rocks, difficult to follow. Numerous branch cañons, all looking alike, would have rendered it easy to become lost had the trail been once departed from. Night came before the foot of the precipice where the train had stopped was reached. It was impossible to distinguish the way in the dark, and we had to halt. A few minutes previously the tracks of the two men that had been sent ahead had been noticed diverging from the proper course, and it was concluded that they were wandering astray somewhere in the labyrinth. After nightfall, as is always the case in these regions, it became bleak and cold. Some of the party, attired for a walk under a hot sun, had not even their coats. The cañon was dark as a dungeon. The surface of the ground being covered with rocks, a recumbent, position was uncomfortable, and the rocks being interspersed with prickly pear and some other varieties of cactaceæ it would have been unwise to walk about. The choice, therefore, lay between sitting down and standing still, which two recreations we essayed alternately for twelve hours that might have been, from the sensations of the party, twelve days. As soon as it was light enough to see the way we put our stiffened limbs in motion. Climbing the precipice was severe work. The summit once attained, it was but five miles to camp, but the violent exercise of the ascent, coming after a twenty-four hours' abstinence from food and rest, and a walk of more than thirty miles over a difficult road, proved so exhausting that, during the last stretch, two or three of the men broke down, and had to have coffee and food sent back to them before they could proceed.

"The messengers, as expected, had not arrived, and our non-return had occasioned some anxiety. The Mexicans were immediately despatched in search of the missing men. Directions had been given that if at any time a person should perceive that he was lost, he should wait quietly in one place for the arrival of the searching party. The two men had had the nerve to follow this plan, and, as soon as they were convinced of the hopelessness of finding the lost path, had selected a comfortable place and patiently waited during the rest of the day, all night, and till noon of the following day, when the Mexicans found them. Their trail could scarcely have been traced for any great distance over the rocks, and had they continued wandering through the mazes of the cañons they would probably have never again been heard from.

"The region east of camp has been examined to-day. The extent and magnitude of the system of cañons in that direction is astounding. The plateau is cut into shreds by these gigantic chasms, and resembles a vast ruin. Belts of country miles in width have been swept away, leaving only isolated mountains standing in the gap. Fissures so profound that the eye cannot penetrate their depths are separated by walls whose thickness one can almost span, and slender spires that seem tottering upon their bases shoot up thousands of feet from the vaults below. • • •

"Camp 74, Forest lagoons, April 18.— • • • Another reconnaissance has since been made on foot from the lagoons westward. A line thirty miles in extent was traversed, with results similar to those previously obtained. An excellent view was had of the Big cañon. The barometric observations upon the surface of the plateau and at the mouths of Diamond and Cataract rivers, showed that the walls of this portion of the cañon were over a mile high. The formation of the ground was such that the eye could not follow them the whole distance to the bottom; but as far down as they could be traced they appeared almost vertical. A sketch taken upon the spot by Mr. Egloffstein does better justice than any description can do to the marvellous scene.

"Our reconnoitering parties have now been out in all directions, and everywhere have been headed off by impassable obstacles. The positions of the main water-courses have been determined with considerable

The Grand Canyon!

I. Primary Expedition Narratives

accuracy. The region last explored is, of course, altogether valueless. It can be approached only from the south, and after entering it there is nothing to do but to leave. Ours has been the first, and will doubtless be the last, party of whites to visit this profitless locality. It seems intended by nature that the Colorado river, along the greater portion of its lonely and majestic way, shall be forever unvisited and undisturbed. The handful of Indians that inhabit the sequestered retreats where we discovered them have probably remained in the same condition, and of the same number, for centuries. The country could not support a large population, and by some provision of nature they have ceased to multiply. The deer, the antelope, the birds, even the smaller reptiles, all of which frequent the adjacent territory, have deserted this uninhabitable district. Excepting when the melting snows send their annual torrents through the avenues of the Colorado, conveying with them sound and motion, these dismal abysses, and the arid table-lands that enclose them, are left, as they have been for ages, in unbroken solitude and silence. The lagoons by the side of which we are encamped furnish, as far as we have been able to discover, the only accessible watering place west [sic] of the mouth of Diamond river. During the summer it is probable they are dry, and that no water exists upon the whole of the Colorado plateau. We start for the south with some anxiety, not knowing how long it may be before water will be again met with."

Newberry, J. S. [Newberry John Strong]

- 26 1861 Geological report. In: Ives, Joseph C., Report upon the Colorado River of the West, explored in 1857 and 1858 by Lieutenant Joseph C. Ives, Corps of Topographical Engineers, under the direction of the Office of Explorations and Surveys, A. A. Humphreys, Captain Topographical Engineers, in charge. By order of the Secretary of War. Washington, D.C.: U.S. Government Printing Office, 154 pp. [separately paginated]. (Volume: U.S. 30th Congress, 1st Session, House Document 90, Serial 1058.)

Newberry's report, as one might surmise, is principally a technical one pertaining to the whole of the lower Colorado River and Colorado Plateau portions of the expedition, to which he appends geological descriptions of the route he took to return to Fort Leavenworth, Kansas. He does from time to time offer some impressions; those from the Grand Canyon area are reproduced here. The chapters that are pertinent are Chapter 5 ("General View of the Structure of the Great Central Plateau") and Chapter 6 ("Geology of the Country Between the Mojave Valley and the Little Colorado"). Note as well that whereas Ives referred to the canyon as "Big Cañon", the name also used on Egloffstein's map (see farther below), Newberry consistently refers to it as "the Great Cañon".

In Chapter 5:

"I shall take the liberty . . . of anticipating in some degree my geological narrative, and give very briefly here, as the most convenient and appropriate place, the results of a line of observation carried quite across this great plateau, of which the geological structure is so clearly revealed in the magnificent sections of the banks of the Colorado, not very far distant from the point we had reached at the close of the last chapter [Black Canyon, on the lower Colorado River]. • • •

"For 300 miles the cut edges of the table-lands rise abruptly, often perpendicularly, from the water's edge, forming walls from 3,000 to 6,000 feet in height. This is the 'Great Cañon of the Colorado,' the most magnificent gorge, as well as the grandest geological section, of which we have any knowledge. • • •

"This plateau is locally much broken and covered by floods of lava, which have flowed from the mountains we had passed; and yet, from commanding points of view, we could see that it had a distinct existence, stretching far away as a margin to the mountains, in a northwesterly direction. It is bounded on the east by a wall several hundred feet in height—in many places perpendicular, and generally abrupt—formed by the cut edge of a portion of the Middle Carboniferous series. Having ascended this wall, we found our view again limited on the east by the bold escarpments of the edge of another and much higher mesa, which, with its salient angles, stretched away in magnificent perspective, both to the north and south. • • • "

Newberry devotes a separate section to the "Erosion of the Table-Lands", which has been recognized as the first conclusive set of observations that point to the power of running water, as opposed to geological cataclysm.

The Grand Canyon!

I. Primary Expedition Narratives

"The sketch which has been given of the table-lands of the upper Colorado, though brief, will perhaps suffice to convey an idea of the generalities of their structure and relations. But before returning to the details of the local geology of our route, I ought perhaps to refer briefly to two questions of general import, which would naturally suggest themselves to any geologist who should traverse the table-lands west of the Rocky mountains, or should receive an accurate description of them from others.

"The first of these questions is: To what cause is due the peculiar topographical features of the surface of the table-lands—where the different formations succeed each other in a series of steps, which generally present abrupt and wall-like edges—the more recent strata occupying the highest portion of the plateau? • • •

"The first of these questions belongs appropriately to the subject of surface geology, and will be referred to again. I may say here, however, that, like the great cañons of the Colorado, the broad valleys bounded by high and perpendicular walls belong to a vast system of erosion, and are wholly due to the action of water. [Italics are Newberry's.] Probably nowhere in the world has the action of this agent produced results so surprising, both as regards their magnitude and their peculiar character. It is not at all strange that a cause, which has given, to what was once an immense plain, underlaid by thousands of feet of sedimentary rocks, conformable throughout, a topographical character more complicated than that of any mountain chain; which has made much of it absolutely impassable to man, or any animal but the winged bird, should be regarded as something out of the common course of nature. Hence the first and most plausible explanation of the striking surface features of this region will be to refer them to that embodiment of resistless power—the sword that cuts so many geological knots—volcanic force. The Great Cañon of the Colorado would be considered a vast fissure or rent in the earth's crust, and the abrupt termination of the steps of the table-lands as marking lines of displacement. This theory though so plausible, and so entirely adequate to explain all the striking phenomena, lacks a single requisite to acceptance, and that is truth.

"Aside from the slight local disturbance of the sedimentary rocks about the San Francisco mountain, from the spurs of the Rocky mountains, near Fort Defiance, to those off [sic] the Cerbat and Aztec mountains on the west, the strata of the table-lands are as entirely unbroken as when first deposited. Having this question constantly in mind, and examining with all possible care the structure of the great cañons which we entered, I everywhere found evidence of the exclusive action of water in their formation. The opposite sides of the deepest chasm showed perfect correspondence of stratification, conforming to the general dip, and nowhere displacement; and the bottom rock, so often dry and bare, was perhaps deeply eroded, but continuous from side to side, a portion of the yet undivided series lying below."

In discussing the erosion and remnants of the table-lands themselves, Newberry sums:

"I use the past participle in speaking of some of the streams whose erosive action has been so marked, from the remarkable fact that many of these eroded valleys are now dry; and in others the present streams are but miniature representatives of those which formerly flowed in their channels.

"Everything indicates that the table-lands were formerly much better watered than they now are."

In Chapter 6, which is more dedicated to specific geological observations, such as stratigraphic measurements and relationships, and notes on paleontology, Newberry devotes two sections to "Cañon of Diamond River" (briefly, p. 54) and "Great Cañon of the Colorado" (at much greater length, pp. 54-58).

"Near Camp 66 we descended to the bottom of one of the arroyos I have mentioned, where it has a depth of more than 500 feet. A mile north of this point its sides converge and become perpendicular, forming a cañon of more magnificent proportions than any we had seen, and in geological interest far surpassing anything I had dared to hope for.

"This seemed to be our only avenue of approach to the Colorado, and we followed it for fifteen miles, to its junction with the still grander cañon of that stream. • • •"

"The cañon of the Colorado at the mouth of Diamond river is but a portion of the stupendous chasm which its waters have cut in the strata of the table-lands, and of which a general description has already been given. At this point its walls have an altitude of over 3,000 feet above the Colorado, and the bed of that stream is about 1,200 feet above the level of the sea, or 500 feet higher than in the Black cañon [of the lower Colorado River].

The Grand Canyon!

I. Primary Expedition Narratives

A few miles further east, where the surface of the table-lands has an altitude of nearly 7,000 feet, the dimensions of the cañon become far more imposing, and its cliffs rise to the height of more than a mile above the river.

"Near the mouth of Diamond river, by the intersections of the numerous cañons which cut the plateau, portions of it have been left in a series of pinnacles and pyramids, frequently standing entirely isolated, forming some of the most striking and remarkable objects seen on our expedition. Many of these buttes exhibit a singular resemblance to the spires and pyramids which form the architectural ornaments of the cities of civilized nations, except that the scale of magnitude of all these imitative forms is such as to render the grandest monuments of human art insignificant in comparison with them. • • •

"Retracing our steps, as the only means of exit from the bottom of the Colorado cañon, and reaching the surface of the mesa, a short distance east of Camp 66, we obtained a fine panoramic view of the geological structure of the country for many miles about us. • • •

"From this point the view towards the north was particularly grand; the course of the Colorado was visible for nearly a hundred miles, and the series of Cyclopean walls into which the mesas of different elevations have been cut by that stream and its tributaries formed a scene of which the sublime features deeply impressed each member of our party. Some conception of the character of this scenery may be gathered from the sketches of the artists of the party, Messrs. Egloffstein and Mollhausen. • • •"

Newberry later provides a separate section on "Cañon of Cascade River" (pp. 62-64), which is Cataract (Havasu) Canyon. The eventful descent into that canyon was well described by Ives (see above), while Newberry offers only a superficial remark to introduce his geological descriptions:

"In attempting to reach the junction of the Great and Little Colorados we descended to the plain to which I have referred; entered and traversed for some miles a cañon leading in the right direction. This proved to be but a tributary to the greater cañon of Cascade river, in which the progress of our party was arrested by cascades."

---

Reprinting

Ives, Joseph C.

- 27 1969 Report upon the Colorado River of the West. New York: Da Capo Press, 5 parts and appendices in 1 volume; pagination as in 1861 volume with [v] pp. preceding. (The American Scene Comment and Commentaries, Wallace D. Farnham, general ed.; A Da Capo Press Reprint Series.)

Facsimile reprint of Ives (1861), Senate Executive Document variant, including colored plates, but the fold-outs and maps are reduced in size.

---

Accompanying Maps (Grand Canyon)

citations, with chorographical notes, are extracted from [THE GRAND CANON Volume 2]

Egloffstein, F. W. von [Egloffstein, Friedrich Wilhelm von]

- 28 1861 Map No. 2. Rio Colorado of the West, Explored by 1st Lieut. Joseph C. Ives, Top<sup>l</sup> Eng<sup>rs</sup> under the direction of the Office of Explorations and Surveys, A. A. Humphreys, Capt. Top<sup>l</sup> Eng<sup>rs</sup> in charge, by order of Hon. John B. Floyd, Secretary of War. 1858. drawn by Fr<sup>h</sup> F. W. v. Egloffstein. Topographer to the Expedition. Scale of 12 miles to one Inch or 1:760320. ("Topography by Frh<sup>l</sup> F. V. v. Egloffstein. Ruling by Samuel Sartain. Lettering by F. Courtenay.") [► From head of navigation of Colorado River to Fort Defiance, including Grand Canyon.] In: Ives, Joseph C., Report upon the Colorado River of the West, explored in 1857 and 1858 by Lieutenant Joseph C. Ives, Corps of Topographical Engineers, under the direction of the Office of Explorations and Surveys, A. A. Humphreys, Captain Topographical Engineers, in charge. By order of the Secretary of War. Washington, D.C.: U.S. Government

The Grand Canyon!

I. Primary Expedition Narratives

Printing Office, 1 sheet. (Volume: U.S. 30th Congress, 1st Session, House Document 90, Serial 1058.) [Shaded relief.]

See Ives (1861) for bibliographical details of the volume. Ives (1861) also was released as Senate Executive Document [no number], which differed only in that the Egloffstein maps were also used as base maps for two geological maps (geology by J. S. Newberry) that accompanied only the Senate version).] [► This map is well known for its highly conjectural depiction of the greater Grand Canyon region. "Big Cañon of the Colorado" is labeled prominently. "Colorado Plateau" is labeled on the south side of the Colorado. Notably, the "Little Colorado or Flax River" is a tributary to Cataract Creek, which in turn reaches the "Colorado River" nearly at longitude 113° W. "Yampais Village" is also labeled here. At that confluence the Colorado is depicted arriving from the northeast, although its course it shown only a short distance before fading into unmapped territory. A short distance northeast of the confluence of "Diamond River" a prominent tributary (not labeled) arrives from the northwest. Between the Colorado and that unlabeled tributary the features of the plateau are labeled "North Side M<sup>ts</sup>".] [NOTE on collation of maps. Although some sources may indicate that the maps are laid in loose, the copy of the Senate variant of Ives held in the American Philosophical Society, presented by J. S. Newberry, is in its original binding, wherein the two Egloffstein topographic maps are fold-outs following the second free leaf of the volume, preceding the plate titled "General Report; Profile" and the frontispiece.]

- 29 1958 Rio Colorado of the West. U.S. Army, Corps of Engineers, 1 sheet. [Facsimile reproduction of "Map No. 2. Rio Colorado of the West", shaded relief (depicting region from head of navigation of Colorado River to Fort Defiance, including Grand Canyon), which was originally published in Joseph C. Ives, Report upon the Colorado River of the West, explored in 1857 and 1858 (U.S. 30th Congress, 1st Session, House Document 90, Serial 1058), 1861.]

See Ives (1861) for bibliographical details of the original volume.

- 30 1975 Rio Colorado of the West. U.S. Army, Corps of Engineers, 1 sheet. [Facsimile reproduction of "Map No. 2. Rio Colorado of the West", shaded relief (depicting region from head of navigation of Colorado River to Fort Defiance, including Grand Canyon), which was originally published in Joseph C. Ives, Report upon the Colorado River of the West, explored in 1857 and 1858 (U.S. 30th Congress, 1st Session, House Document 90, Serial 1058), 1861.]

See Ives (1861) for bibliographical details of the original volume.

Newberry, J. S. [Newberry, John Strong]

- 31 1861 Geological Map No. 2 : prepared by J. S. Newberry M.D. geologist of the expedition.
Accompanying: Newberry, John S., Geological report. In: Ives, Joseph C., Report upon the Colorado River of the West, explored in 1857 and 1858 by Lieutenant Joseph C. Ives, Corps of Topographical Engineers, under the direction of the Office of Explorations and Surveys, A. A. Humphreys, Captain Topographical Engineers, in charge. By order of the Secretary of War. Washington, D.C.: U.S. Government Printing Office, 4 maps on 1 sheet, scale 1:760,320. (Volume: U.S. 36th Congress, 1st Session, Senate Executive Document [no number], Serial 1058.)

The geologic map portrays geology by Newberry, overprinted in color on shaded-relief map by F. W. von Egloffstein, Map No. 2, Rio Colorado of the West, Explored by 1st. Lieut. Joseph C. Ives, Top<sup>l</sup>. Eng<sup>rs</sup>. under the direction of the Office of Explorations and Surveys, A. A. Humphreys, Capt. Top<sup>l</sup>. Eng<sup>rs</sup>. in charge, by order of Hon. John B. Floyd, Secretary of War. 1858. (Egloffstein, 1861) [from head of navigation of Colorado River to Fort Defiance, including Grand Canyon]. The geologic map accompanies only the Senate Executive Document variant of Ives (1861). [NOTE on collation of maps. Although some sources may indicate that the maps are laid in loose, the copy of the Senate variant held in the American Philosophical Society, presented by J. S. Newberry, is in its original binding, wherein the two Egloffstein topographic maps are fold-outs following the second free leaf of the volume, preceding the plate titled "General Report; Profile" and the frontispiece. The two Newberry geologic maps are fold-outs following Part III.]

The Grand Canyon!

I. Primary Expedition Narratives

Other Expedition Accounts (Including Translations and Reprintings)

Möllhausen, Balduin

- 32 NO DATE Reisen in die Felsengebirge Nord-Amerikas bis zum Hoch-Plateau von Neu-Mexico, unternommen als Mitglied der im Auftrage der Regierung der Vereinigten Staaten ausgesandten Colorado-Expedition. Leipzig: Otto Purfürst, 2 volumes, 455, 406 pp. [1860.] [In German.]
- 33 1861 Reisen in die Felsengebirge Nord-Amerikas bis zum Hoch-Plateau von Neu-Mexico, unternommen als Mitglied der im Auftrage der Regierung der Vereinigten Staaten ausgesandten Colorado-Expedition. Leipzig: Hermann Costenoble, 2 volumes, 455, 406 pp. [In German.]

Möllhausen's Reisen has never been published in English in its entirety. Although Ives' 1861 "General Report" is an excellent narrative of the expedition, scholars have noted that Möllhausen's own publication is even more informative, containing the prized perspectives of an explorer who had accompanied earlier expeditions to the west. In fact, his Reisen includes frequent reminiscences of his earlier exploits in the American Midwest and West. The beginning of the land exploration portion of Ives' expedition embraces the first visit to Grand Canyon for the purpose of exploring it—the group descended Peach Springs Canyon to Diamond Creek and the Colorado River, and shortly later a few of them descended into Cataract Creek (Havasupai Canyon), nearly to the Havasupai village known now as Supai, Arizona. The Grand Canyon encounter is now available in English through Raven's Perch Media (<https://ravensperch.org>), Balduin Möllhausen's Grand Canyon (edited by Earle E. Spamer, 2022).

Inasmuch that Möllhausen's account actually predates Ives' report in print, and offers perspectives that Ives did not, some extended selections from the Reisen are as follows:

"Bis zum die Mittagszeit hatte die von uns eingeschlagne Richtung das Hochland zu durchschneiden und des Einförmige der Umgebung auf eine für das Auge gefällige Weise zu unterbrechen. Niedrige Tannen und krause Cedern bezeichneten weithin die Schwellungen und Senkungen des Bodens, und wenn wir uns zufällig in der verlängerten linie einer Haptschlucht befanden, dann war es, als ob uns ein Blick in das Innerste der Erde gestattet gewesen wäre, denn tiefer und tiefer senkten sich die felsigen Uferwände hinab, bis sie in der Ferne chaotisch in violetter Nebelduft in einander verschwammen. • • •

"Wir erreichten gegen Abend eine klare, aber lauwarne Quelle, die, umgeben von Rohr und Schilf, eine ungewöhnlich bequeme Gelegenheit zur Ruhe für die Nacht bot. Das Wasser eilte, als kleiner Bach, einige hundert Schritte in die Schlucht hinein, versank dort im Sande, doch der Richtung desselben nachblickend, gewahrte ich einige Cottonwoodbäume* und verkrüppelte Eichen,* welche von dem erneuerten Hervortreten desselben zeugten. Auf dem von der Quelle befruchteten Boden waren die Spuren einer kleinen Maispflanzung sichtbar, und kaum glaubte ich meinen Augen trauen zu dürfen, als ich einen Pfirsichbaum entdeckte, der einsam am Fuße eines nahen Hügels dem seuchten Boden seine Nahrung entnahm. Vielfach ergingen wir uns in Vermuthungen über die Art und Weise, auf welche der Pfirsichstein, dem das Bäumchen entkeimte, seinen Weg in diese abgeschlossenen Regionen gefunden hatte, und nahmen wir an, daß derselbe durch die Apache-Indianer vom Rio Grande dorthin gebracht und absichtslos, vom Zufall geführt, geflanzt worden sei.

"Vor uns, in der Entfernung von etwa einer Meile, wurde die Schlucht von hohen, senkrechten Felswänden eingeengt, welche dieselben regelmäßigen horizontalen Schichten und Lagen zeigten, deren ich bei der Beschreibung der Music mountains schon erwähnte. Die eigentliche Oeffnung des geheimnißvollen Cañons, in welches unser Weg am folgenden Tage hineinführen sollte, wurde noch durch einige vorspringende Hügel verdeckt, und so erstieg ich denn die nächste Höhe, um mir von dort aus eine Zeichnung von diesem so interessanten Punkte zu sichern. -- Ein Gewirre von regelmäßigen und unregelmäßigen Linien, erstere aber in überwiegender Zahl, drängte sich dort in ein merkwürdiges und zugleich schönes Bild zusammen. Wie mächtige Wälle mit senkrechten Maurern schoben sich die zerklüfteten Plateaus an einander vorbei, in bunten Farben schimmerten ihre fast wagerecht liniirten Abhänge, und dunklere Schatten verriethen die Stellen, an welchen es tief in den Schoos der Erde hinabging. Cedernbüsche schmückten ringsum die wellenförmig an einander hängenden Hügel, aber hinter diesen erhob sich das nackte Gestein in den prachtvollsten Formationen und,

The Grand Canyon!

I. Primary Expedition Narratives

verursacht durch die verschiedenen Entfernungen, in den zartesten und immer mehr verschwimmenden Schattirungen. Lautlose Stille herrschte in dieser öden, abere schönen Wildniß, doch zu dem Aufmerksamen sprach es aus todtem Gestein wie aus grünenden Cedern und keimenden Halmen in leichtverständlicher Weise: 'Erhaben ist die Natur in allen ihren Formen!' • • •

"Lieblich wölbte sich der klare Himmel über uns, als wir in der Frühe das 2. April unsere Thiere sattelten; an den Abhängen der Berge spielten die Strahlen der Sonne, und langsam schlichen die Schatten niederwärts. Wir verfolgten unsern Weg in der Schlucht und wurden auf einer kurzen Strecke von dem Bache begleitet, der auf's Neue dem sandigen Boden entrieselte und zu beiden Seiten dürstige Vegetation nährte. Kohlenhaltiger Kalkstein bildete die Haptformation unserer Umgebung, doch erblickte ich auch Sandstein und Granit, und als wir nach Zurücklegung von zwei Meilen in südlicher Richtung, gegen Westen in die Haptschlucht einbogen, hatten wir zu beiden Seiten hohe, fenkrechte Felswände, auf welchen die regelmäßig übereinander geschichteten Gesteinsarten sich deutlich auszeichneten. Wir besanden uns dort noch immer in einer Höhe von ungefähr dreitausend Fuß über dem Meerespiegel, und etwa achthundert Fuß hoch waren die steilen Ufer, welche die breite Schlucht einfaßten. Der sandige, trockene Weg führte stark abwärts, und in geringerem Grade senkten sich mit demselben die kolossalen Schichten und Lagen gegen Nordwesten.

"Als wir so dahinritten, und der Höhenunterschied zwischen unserer Straße und dem Plateau sich mit jeder Meile bedeutend vergrößerte, die gigantischen und zugleich erhabenen Felsmassen immer dichter um uns zusammenrückten, neue Formationen und neue Farben dem Boden gleichsam entstieg und sich zu prachtvollen und wie drohen überhängenden Gebilden vereinigten, da fühlte ich nicht die sengende Gluth der Sonne, deren Kraft sich in dem engen Felsenkessel verdoppelte; ich hatte nur Gedanken und Blicke für die erhabene Scenerie, die scheinbar im wildesten Durcheinander, von Meisterhand zu einem so schönen Ganzen geordnet war. Tiefer hinab führte unsere Straße, höher empor ragten die Felsen, schmaler wurde der Streifen des blauen, sonnigen Himmels, der so freundlich auf uns niederblickte, und mit jedem Schritte veränderten sich die Bilder, die ich nur der Erinnerung einzuprägen vermochte. Da standen Tempel mit wunderbaren Architekturen, lange Säulenhallen und mächtige, aber zierlich geformte Pyramiden; da öffneten sich weite Gewölbe, Bogenfenster und Thore, aber unten in der Schlucht, dem trockenen Bette eines zeitweise niederschäumenden Gießbaches, befand sich dürrer Sand und glattgewaschenes Gerölle, und zwischen diesem, so wie in den Felsritzen ragten stachlichte Cacteen hervor, fast die einzige Vegetation in dieser unwirthlichen, ich möchte sagen unterirdischen Wildniß. Und doch lebten menschen hier, menschen, die in der tiefen Einsamkeit alle menschlichen Neigungen verloren zu haben scheinen, Menschen, die sich nicht sehnen nach geselligem Verkehr mit andern Nationen und nur von der Noth nach dem Hochland hinaufgetrieben werden, um dort zu jagen. Im sonnigen Felsenwinkel spärlich gewonnener Mais, Fische des Colorado und etwas Wild bilden den Unterhalt dieser elenden Geschöpfe, und träge und theilnahmlos, wie das sie umgebende Gestein, bringen sie ihr Leben, ähnlich den Thieren, dahin.

"Wir ritten in geringer Entfernung an einem Lager von etwa dreißig dieser bedauernswürdigen Wallpay-Indianer vorbei, die sich in einer Nebenschlucht ihre Heimath gegründet hatten, doch obgleich wohl nur einzelne derselben von der Existenz von weißen Menchen wußten, rührte sich doch keiner, um unsern Zug genauer zu betrachten, ja, man hätte glauben mögen, daß dergleichen Expeditionen dort täglich vorbeigezogen wären, so wenig Aufmerksamkeit schenkten sie uns. Dieselbe Beobachtung machte ich, als wir an mehreren Hütten dicht vorbeikamen, in welchen die Bewohner so regungslos liegen blieben, als ob sie unsere Gegenwart gar nicht geahnt hätten. Die Hütten bestanden aus Lauben von Reisig und Baumrinde, welche sich an die überhängenden Uferwände anlehnten, und kaum dicht genug waren, um einigen Schutz gegen die Sonnenstrahlen zu gewähren. Wir begegneten einer alten Frau, welche langsam und mühselig unter einer Bürde von Wurzeln und Kräutern dahinkroch; es war eine Mitleid erregende Erscheinung, dieses alte, runzlichte, krankhaft keuchende Geschöpf; ich reichte ihr ein Stück Brod hin, doch ohne dasselbe anzunehmen oder meine Absicht zu verstehen, schaute sie mich mit ausdruckslofen Augen von der Seite an und zog dann murrend und scheltend ihres Weges.

"Nachdem Iretéba uns angewiesen hatte, der Schlucht immer weiter nachzufolgen, kehrte er in einer der elenden Hütten ein, um, wie er zu verstehen gab, Erkundigungen über die dortige Gegend einzuziehen. Von der bezeichneten Richtung abzuweichen, war allerdings nicht möglich, doch stießen wir bei unserm weitem Vordringen auf so eruste Hindernisse, namentlich auf herabgerollte Felsblöcke und Abstufungen im Wege selbst, daß wir

The Grand Canyon!

I. Primary Expedition Narratives

schon daran zu zweifeln begannen, ob wir je in dieser Richtung den Colorado erreichen würden. Bei der Vorsicht, mit welcher wir uns nur auf dem gefährlichen Boden vorwärts bewegen konnten, bei der Unruhe, die wir hinsichtlich unserer Thiere empfanden, welche, ohne vorher gerastet zu haben, gewiß nicht mit ihren Lasten die Wallpay-Schlucht hätten wider verlassen können, ging viel von den Eindrücken verloren, welche die imposanten Felsmassen nothwendiger Weise auf Jeden ausüben mußten. Ermüdet hingen die Meisten in den Sätteln und schauten vor sich nieder; funfzehn Meilen hatten wir aber auch schon seit dem frühen Morgen zurückgelegt und waren auf dieser Strecke gegen zweitausend Fuß abwärts gezogen. nach unsereer Berechnung konnten wir uns also nicht mehr hoch über dem Spiegel des Colorado befinden, und bei jeder Biegung hofften wir endlich den ersehnten Strom zu erblicken. Plötzlich schien die Schlucht durch einen mächtigen Felsenwall abgesperrt zu sein, doch lieblich schimmerte uns aus einem dunkeln Winkel grünendes Weidengebüsch entgegen, und wie aufmunternd drang das laute Rauschen eines Gießbaches zu uns herüber! Wir eilten, so gut es nur gehen wollte, darauf zu, und einige Minuten später tranken im Schatten von Weiden und Cottonwoodbäumen, Menschen und Thiere in langer Reihe aus den diamantklaren Fluthen eines Gebirgsflüßchens.

„Rein und klar, wie ein Diamant, sprudelte der Bach aus einer nordöstlichen Schlucht an uns vorüber, wie ein kostbarer Stein lag, in entgegengesetzter Richtung vor uns, ein ganz kleines, mit dem anmuthigsten Grün geschücktes Thälchen, und Diamant-Bach (Diamond creek) taufte wir das Wasser, das luftig dahintanzte und auf dem beschränkten Raume bis an den Fuß der starren Felsen hin, nach besten Kräften seine Segnungen spendete, welche sich in einer verhältnißmäßig üppigen Vegetation vertheilten.

„Eindrücke, und die aus denselben entsprungenen Gefühle des Kindes wiederholen sich oft in späterem Alter. So erinnere ich mich von unterirdischen Zaubergärten, inmitten furchtbarer Wildnisse, gelesen zu haben, und wie ich damals von größter Bewunderung für die Bilder einer reichen Phantasie hingerissen wurde, so freute ich mich hier beim Aublick der kleinen Bodenfläche, die mich so lebhaft an jene Zaubergärten mahnte. Zwar sehlten die schillernden Blumen und Vögel, und abgestorbene Bäume und Sträucher erzählten von der Vergänglichkeit dessen, was ich vor mir sah; doch an den schroffen Felswänden, die hoch emporragten, vermochte ich es zu berechnen, wie tief ich mich unterhalb der Oberfläche des Bodens befand; ich hatte kennen gelernt, daß schreckliche Wüsten in weitem Umkreise mich umgaben; ich hatte Befürchtungen um unser Geschick gehegt, und plötzlich lag vor mir im erquickendsten, mir fast fremd gewordenen Frühlingsgrün, ein von der Natur gepflegtes, wildes Gebirgsgärtchen, und durch dasselbe murmelte das krystallklare Wasser über farbige Kiesel und an hindernden Felsblöcken vorbei. • • •

„Gleich nach unserer Ankunft kletterte ich nach einer vorspringenden Felswand hinauf, und von dort aus, wo ich eine Aussicht auf das Thälchen, und die dasselbe einschließenden Gebirgsmassen gewann, zeichnete ich eine Skizze von der ganzen prachtvollwn Scenerie. Nicht wenig Mühe verursachten mir die zahlreichen Linien des über zweitausend Fuß hohen Berges, der gegen Südwesten den Lauf des Diamant-Baches zu hemmen schien, und dessen Fuß durch einen Vorsprung meinen Blicken entzogen wurde. Derselbe glich einem mächtigen, unbeendigten Bau, welchen entsprechende Strebepfeiler und Thürme umgaben. Bis zum Gipfel hinauf erkannte ich die regelmäßig übereinander liegenden Schichten, die wie künstliches Manerwerk über die ganze Breite des kolossalen Felsens reichten, und durch den Einfluß der Atmosphäre und der zeitweise niederschlagenden Feuchtigkeit in so wunderliche Gebilde umgeschaffen waren. Aehnliche Berge tauchten nach allen Seiten hin im Hintergrunde auf, und die Linien der verschiedenen Straten mit den Augen verfolgend, überzeugte man sich leicht, daß die jetzt durch weite Zwischeuräume getrennten Berge, einst ein festes Hochland bildeten und im innigsten Zusammenhang mit einander gestanden hatten.

„Ein eigenthümliches Farbenspiel zeigte sich an den schroffen Wänden, denn während auf den ersten achthundert Fuß dunkles Braun und Blauschwarz vorherrschend war, spielten die Höhen im schönsten Rosa, Gelb, Blau und Grün, je nachdem die Formationen verschiedener Epochen sich übereinander reihten und von der Abendsonne malerisch beleuchtet wurden. Die außerordentliche Klarheit der Atmosphäre ließ übrigens die entfernteren Gegenstände viel näher erscheinen, als sie in Wirklichkeit waren, und so lebten wir Alle der meinung, daß der schöne Berg, den ich eben beschrieb, nur durch einen Felsvorsprung von uns getrennt sie; als ich aber in's Lager zurückkehrte, traf ich daselbst mit Iretéba zusammen, der mir versicherte, daß der Colorado noch zwischen uns und jenem Berge fließe.

The Grand Canyon!

I. Primary Expedition Narratives

“Der Abend war nicht mehr fern, und den Strom ganz in der Nähe wähhend, begaben sich mehrere von uns auf den Weg, um noch an demselben Tage einen Blick auf ihn zu werfen. Wir gelangten schnell an's Ende des Thälchens, dessen ganze Länge kaum fünfhundert Schritte betrug, und bogen dann in die enge Schlucht ein, in welcher der Bach, immer mit gleichem Ungestüm, sich von einer nach der andern Seite hinüberwand und dem Colorado zueilte. Es war ein sehr mühevoller Weg, denn bald hinderten uns Ranken, bald Gestein, oder auch der Bach selbst im Fortschreiten, doch in der Hoffnung, bei jeder nächsten Biegung auf dem User des stolzen Stromes zu stehen, arbeiteten wir unverdrossen weiter. Zwei Meilen hatten wir auf diese Weise zurückgelegt, als die Schlucht sich allmählich in ein breites, sandiges Thal öffnete, und der Fuß des bekannten Berges nur noch durch kleine Weiden und Mezquitgebüsche verdeckt blieb. Das Ende des Thales, welches eine halbe Meile lang war, vermochten wir fast mit den Augen zu erreichen; der Berg schien daselbst dem sandigen Boden zu entsteigen, und für kaum glaublich hielten wir es, daß sich dort noch der breite Spiegel des Colorado befinden könne. Als wir aber stille standen und lauschten, da schlug an unser Ohr, wie das Gestampfe unzähliger schwerfälliger Hufe, dumpfes, unheimliches Rauschen und Toben, wozu sich das friedliche Plätschern und Murmeln des Baches zu unserer Seite gesellte. Wir eilten mitten durch das Gestrüpp hindurch nach der nächsten Erhebung der sandigen Fläche, und begrüßten, in geringer Entfernung vor uns, den schäumenden Spiegel des Stromes, der mit unwiderstehlicher Gewalt über die von ihm selbst losgerissenen Trümmer der nahen Felsenfesten dahinstürzte.

“Der Anblick machte uns verstummen, und mit einem Gefühl der bewundernden Verehrung schritten wir weiter, bis unsere Füße auf dem von den Wellen des Stromes befeuchteten Sande ruhten.

“Den Charakter unerschütterlicher, ernster Ruhe trugen ringsum die majestätischen Naturbauwerke; ebenso ernst folgten die unbändigen Wassermassen der von ihnen erikämpften Straße; gleichsam voll grimmiger Wuth über den Widerstand, auf den sie fortwährend stießen, prallten sie von Fels zu Fels, von Stufe zu Stufe, und Wirbel und Schaum erzeugend drängten sie sich in das südliche Felsenthor. Ich schaute stromauswärts, so der Fluß den finstern Schluchten enteilte; ich beobachtete vor mir die breite, mit zahlreichen Wirbelkreisen bedeckte Wasserfläche und die beweglichen Spiegelbilder auf derselben, doch unwillkürlich wendeten sich die Augen immer wieder gegen Süden, wo die Wasser, wie im ewigen Kampfe mit dem leblosen Gestein, sich brausend und tobend überstürzten.

“Nur kurze Zeit schwelgten wir in dem Anblick der großartigen Scene, denn die hochrothen Kuppen der Berge hatten sich schon in einen violetten, dustigen Schleier gehüllt, und diese Schatten begannen sich um uns her in die abgeschlossene Welt zu senken; wir schlugen den Rückweg ein, und als wir die enge Schlucht erreichten, umgab uns undurchdringliche Finsterniß. Halb kriechend, stolpernd und oftmals stürzend suchten wir unsern Weg auf dem ungünstigen Boden; nur langsam gelangten wir von der Stelle, und die Nacht war schon weit vorgeschritten, als wir der ersten großen Feuer der mexikanischen Hüter ansichtig wurden, welche Thal, Baum und Fels magisch beleuchteten. • • • ”

After leaving the Diamond Creek area, when they have in sight the San Francisco Peaks and the plateau ahead, en route to Cataract Creek:

“Gegen Norden lag ein durchaus anderes Bild vor uns. Dort wurde nämlich der Horizont von einem Plateau begrenzt, welches der scheinbar ununterbrochenen Ebene fenkrecht entstieg. Dasselbe erstreckte sich weithin von Westen nach Nordosten, und war an mehreren Stellen gespalten und durchbrochen, so daß die losgetrennten Theile als regelmäßige Thürme und Wälle gegen den blauen Himmel contrastirten. Je mehr wir uns dieser eigenthümlichen Formation näherten und je deutlicher das Farbenspiel der schroffen Wände sich von dem duftigen Blau der ganzen Masse löste, um so mehr befestigte sich bei uns die Ansicht, daß wir uns den Betten größerer Gwässer näherten, und daß dort am Fuße der eben bezeichneten Uferwand, tief unten im Schooß der Erde, der kleine oder der große Colorado fließe, oder auch diese beiden Flüsse sich gerade an jenem Punkte vereinigten. • • •

“. . . vor uns lag, in stets zunehmenden Dimensionen, das vielfach zerklüftete Plateau mit seinen grellfarbig, aber regelmäßig gezeichneten Uferwänden.

“Beim Hinblick auf die kolossalen Wälle und auf die weite graue Fläche, wo überall eine ermüdende Einförmigkeit und Oede zu Tage trat, und bei dem Gedanken, daß dennoch die großartigsten und gewaltigsten aller Naturszenen vor uns liegen mußten, beschlich mich ein eigenthümliches Gefühl der Ungeduld, aber auch

The Grand Canyon!

I. Primary Expedition Narratives

der Besorgniß, indem ich bei jeder neuen Senkung erwarten konnte, den Boden tief gespalten zu sehen und von der Natur ein gebieterisches Halt! zu vernehmen. Doch bergauf und bergab zogen wir, über Hügelreihen und durch Thalgründe; der Boden senkte sich mehr und mehr, und endlich beschränkte sich unsere ganze Aussicht auf die nahen runden Hügel. Gegen Mittag erst, nachdem wir unsern Thieren einen dürstigen Trunk aus einer mit Regenwasser gefüllten Felsenvertiefung verabreicht hatten, bog der Pfad in eine Schlucht ein, und derselben abwärts folgend, gelangten wir bald an sechshundert Fuß tief hinab. Wir befanden uns dort auf einer Kalksteinstrate, während Schichten fossiler Muscheln und Kalkstein sich zu beiden Seiten von uns hoch über einander thürmten, und die schrägen, zugänglichen Abhänge nach dem Plateau hinauf bildeten.

„Nur auf eine kurze Strecke vermochten wir die enge Mitte der Schlucht als unsern Weg zu benutzen, dann aber hemmte ein vierzig Fuß tiefer Abgrund unsere Schritte, und an denselben hintretend, erkannten wir, daß die stürzenden Wasser hier die Lage des massiven Gesteins durchbrochen und sich dann mit wilder Zerstörungswuth ihren Weg erweitert und abwärts gebahnt hatten. Wir begaben uns auf den kaum erkennbaren Pfad, der am äußersten Rande der Kalksteinschicht stets in derselben Höhe hinführte. Nach kaum hundert Schritten schon hatte die Tiefe der Schlucht, welche sich unmittelbar neben dem Pfade öffnete, bis auf dreihundert Fuß zugenommen; weithin vermochten wir die horizontale Strate zu erkennen, doch nirgend erblickten wir eine Stelle, wo der Pfad hätte möglicher Weise hinabführen könne, und wohl schwindelte uns schon bei dem bloßen Gedanken, unsere Reise auf einem Wege fortsetzen zu müssen, der nur für Bergziegen und Antilopen geschaffen zu sein schien. Wir stiegen ab, um die Thiere am Zügel zu führen, schnallten die Sporen von den Füßen, und in die lange Reihe eintretend, begannen wir die gefährliche Wanderung. Wie an Tiefe, hatte die Schlucht auch in der Breite zugenommen, und bot uns die gegenüberliegende Uferwand zugleich ein Bild derjenigen, auf welcher wir uns befanden. Demnach bestanden beide aus gewaltigen, regelmäßig an einander gereihten Felsenthürmen mit hoher Bedachung, die schräg zur Deckschicht des Plateaus hinaufführte, während von der Gesteinslage, die unsern Weg bildete, und deren Fortsetzung auf der andern Seite deutlich hervortrat, eine einzige senkrechte Wand bis in die schauerliche Tiese hinabreichte. • • •

„Die lebhaft Unterhaltung in unserm Zuge war plötzlich verstummt, lautlos schritt Jeder in der bunten Reihe von Menschen und Thieren dahin, krampfhaft hielt die rechte Hand die schwere Büchse umklammert, während die linke, die Augen beschattend, den Rand des Hutes niederwärts zog, und der Fuß vorsichtig den Boden prüfte, ehe er das Gewicht des Körpers auf sich nahm. Man vernahm nur das Klappern der Hufe auf dem festen Gestein und einzelne Stimmen, welche die Maulthiere je nach Umständen aufmunterten oder beruhigten; und wenn ein verwitterter Felsblock unter der ungewohnten Last aus seinen Fugen wich, gerüschlos weite Räume durchmaß und zerschellend mit dumpfem Klang tief unten aufschlug, dann durchzuckte ein leises Beben die Brust, und man erblickte kräftige Männer, die zagend wie Kinder sich niederkauerten, um einen Anfall von Schwindel zu besiegen. Doch die Thiere drängten immer wieder von Neuem an, und aufgestört wurde Jeder, der sich einer kurzen Rast hinzugeben gedachte.

„Nur zeitweise wagte ich es zur Seite zu blicken, wo sich neben dem Pfade, dessen Breite zwischen drei und zwölf Zoll wechselte, der über tausend Fuß tiefe Abgrund öffnete; und schaute ich dann hinab, wo ziegelfarbiges Gestein durch die Entfernung wie mit einbem violetten Hauche überzogen war, dann schienen die gegenüberliegenden Thürme und Mauern sich zu beleben; mit träger Bewegung schoben sie sich aneinander vorbei, die Felsmassen aber, die zu meiner rechten Seite hoch übereinander gethürmt lagen, neigten sich drohend über mich hin, und es war dann die höchste Zeit, auf einige Secunden die Augen zu schließen, um die gleichsam wankende Umgebung wieder zum Stehen zu bringen. Es war ein langer und ermüdender Weg, den wir auf diese Weise zurücklegten, doppelt ermüdend, weil die Sonne mit sengender Gluth das Gestein erwärmte, und die grell beleuchteten Farben desselben zugleich das Auge blendeten. Mit einem gewissen Neid beobachtete ich die schwerbepackten Maulthiere, die mit unerschütterlicher Ruhe an den Abgründen hinkletterten und nur gelegentlich stille standen, um mit langgestrecktem Halbe und gespitzten Ohren in die Tiefe hinabzuschauen, wie um dieselbe mit den Augen zu messen. Obgleich wir von der Sicherheit der Maulthiere mehr überzeugt sein mußten, als von der eigenen, so wagte doch Niemand, außer einigen Mexikanern, welche in den Gebirgen von Sonora groß geworden, sich dem Sattel anzuvertrauen, und auf die Gefahr, hinuntergedrängt zu werden, suchte Jeder nach besten Kräften seinen Platz in dem langen Zuge zu behaupten. Zwei Meilen hatten wir überwunden, als wir eine Art Plattform erreichten, an deren westlichen Ende, zwischen zwei der erwähnten Thürme, der Pfad

The Grand Canyon!

I. Primary Expedition Narratives

in die Schlucht hinabbog. Ich befand mich zufällig unter den Vordersten, und im Zickzack an dem steilen Abhänge hinkletternd, gelangten wir gewogen achtzig Fuß tief hinab, wo wir uns aber von der Unmöglichkeit überzeugten, anders, als mittelst Stricken unsere Reise fortzusetzen. Der Befehl zur Umkehr wurde ertheilt, und nicht ohne Mühe die Reihe der Packthiere auf dem gewundenen Pfade wieder nach der Plattform hinaufgetrieben, wo glücklicher Weise der größte Theil der Expedition noch versammelt war. Loses Gestein und Felsblöcke rollten uns zwar vielfach entgegen, doch ohne Unfall faßten wir endlich wieder festen Fuß, und ordneten uns zur Wanderung zurück an den Abgründen hin.

„Hat sich das Auge schon etwas an den grausigen Anblick gewöhnt, und wurden die Anfälle von Schwindel und Uebelkeiten etwas feltener, so hatte dafür die Ungeduld der durstenden Heerde zugenommen, die, in der Meinung, zum Wasser zurückgetrieben zu werden, auf wahrhaft drohende Weise drängte und nachschob. Auch die Sehnen an den Knien begannen zu schmerzen und zu erschlaffen, und krampfhaftes Zittern zuckte in den Waden. So war denn der Rückweg nicht weniger gefährlich als die Hinreise, und muß ich gestehen, daß letzte Thier, welches von unsern Sammlungen trug, in Sicherheit sah. • • •

„Da wir uns überzeugt hatten, daß bei einem erneuerten Versuch, mehr von diesem wunderbaren Terrain kennen zu lernen, die Thiere uns nur von wenig oder gar keinem Nutzen sein konnten, so wurde auf Peacock's Rath die ganze Heerde, mit Ausnahme der getränkten Thiere, noch an demselben Abend an den See zurückgesendet. Wir waren schon über dreißig Meilen von jenem Punkte entfernt, weshalb die zum Schutz der Heerde bestimmten Mexikaner den Auftrag erhielten, erst nach zwei Tagen wieder zu uns zu stoßen. Wir selbst beabsichtigten während dieser Zeit unsere Forschungen nach besten Kräften zu Fuß auszudehnen, um entweder an den Colorado selbst hinabzugelangen, oder wenigstens von der Höhe aus einen Blick auf denselben zu gewinnen.

„Ich unternahm noch vor Einbruch der Nacht einen kleinen Ausflug in nördlicher Richtung, doch gerieth ich bald in ein solches Labyrinth von Schluchten, daß ich mich kaum wieder hinauszufinden vermochte. Mehrfach entdeckte ich feuchte Stellen, wo in neuerer Zeit Wasser gestanden hatte, doch deutete nicht die geringste Spur auf die Nähe einer Quelle, und nur einzelne, ganz alte, kaum erkennbare Abdrücke von den Hufen flüchtiger Antilopen und Hirsche erblickte ich auf den Höhen. Selbst das Heulen der Coyote's vermißte ich zur nächtlichen Stunde, der sicherste Beweis, daß sich weder Eingeborene noch Wild auf viele Meilen im Umkreise befanden.

„Am 13. April in aller Frühe verließ eine Recognoscirungsabtheilung das Lager, um noch einmal die Wanderung in die wilde Schlucht zu unternehmen. Die Gesellschaft bestand aus Lieutenant Ives, Dr. Newberry, Egloffstein, Peacock, Lieutenant Tipton und mir, nebst sechs Soldaten. Wir waren alle wohlbewaffnet, mit Mundvorrath und Wasser auf vierundzwanzig Stunden versehen, und führten mit Rücksicht auf die Bodengestaltung auch noch lange Stricke und Leinen mit uns. Wir erreichten bald die bekannte Cisterne, und da eben einige Arbeiter und Soldaten damit beschäftigt waren, Wasser zum Bedarf der im Lager Zurückbleibenden heraufzuziehen, so benutzten wir diese Gelegenheit, unsere Feldflaschen frisch zu füllen, und uns noch durch einen Trunk von dem schönen, klaren Wasser zu laben. Hier war es, wo Dr. Newberry und ich uns von der übrigen Gesellschaft trennten, um den Versuch zu wagen, der Schlucht gleich von Anfang an nachzufolgen. Leicht gelangten wir an Stricken zu dem Wasservorrath hinab, und während unsere Gefährten hoch über uns auf dem Felsenpfade dahinzuschweben schienen, drangen wir immer tiefer abwärts.

„Fortwährend umgab uns auf unserm gleichsam unterirdischen Wege die interessanteste und großartigste Formation, denn überhängende Felswände, ausgewaschene Höhlen, herabgestürzte kolossale Blöcke und glattes Gerölle reichten sich in einem so furchtbar wilden Chaos aneinander, daß wir vor Erstaunen oftmals kaum Worte zu finden vermochten. Bald an Abgründen hinkreichend, bald an Stricken uns niederlassend, rückten wir indessen allmählich weiter; wohlthuende Kühle begünstigte uns bei der schweren Arbeit, und immer mehr gaben wir uns der Hoffnung hin, die geheimnißvolle Schlucht, in welche nie ein menschlicher Fuß, auch nicht der eines Indianers gedrungen war, bis zu ihrer Erweiterung erforschen zu können. Plötzlich aber hemmte ein Abgrund unsere Schritte, ein Abgrund, der über hundert Fuß tief hinabreichte, und dem andere, kleinere und größere Abstufungen fast unmittelbar folgten. Wir schauten hinab, wir prüften die Seitenwände, die aus der schauerlichen Tiefe weit über unsern Standpunkt senkrecht hinausragten, wir maßen unsere Leinen, aber Alles blieb vergebens, unsere Kräfte und unsere Mittel reichten nicht aus, derartige Hindernisse zu besiegen, und mit einem gewissen Wilderstreben entschlossen wir uns endlich zur Rückkehr. Wir befanden uns bald wieder bei dem

The Grand Canyon!

I. Primary Expedition Narratives

Wasservorrath, die Strickleiter hing noch da, und kurze Zeit darauf standen wir auf derselben Stelle, wo wir uns in der Frühe von unsern Gefährten getrennt hatten.

“Da es uns nicht gelungen war, den Weg abwärts zu verfolgen, so faßten wir den Entschluß, uns nach der Höhe hinauf zu arbeiten, um möglicher Weise von dort aus einen Ueberblick über die nächste Umgebung zu gewinnen, die in geologischer wie in topographischer Beziehung so viel Werkwürdiges und Ungewöhnliches barg. Als wir mühsam an den steilen Abhängen hinaufkletterten, erschien uns die Atmosphäre doppelt glühend und drückend, weil wir eben erst die gewölbeähnliche kühle Schlucht verlassen hatten, und vielfach waren wir genöthigt zu rasten, ehe wir die Höhe des Plateaus erreichten, wo uns auf wellenförmig gestörter Kalksteinstrategie ein verhältnißmäßig ebener Weg offen stand. Wir wählten die westliche Richtung, und am Rande derselben Schlucht hinschreitend, in welcher unsere Gefährten verschwunden waren, und wo sich tief unter uns der luftige Pfad hinzog, erblickten wir bald Formationen und Scenerien, wie sie die kühnste Phantasie nicht zu ahnen und zu schaffen vermag. Bis zu zweitausend Fuß tief schauten wir hinab, und traf dort das Auge auf dunkelrothen Sandstein, welcher den Boden der trockenen, nackten Felsenschlucht bildete, die sich in westlicher Richtung immer mehr senkte und erweiterte. Wie feines Geäder erschienen die zahllosen Wasserriunen, die vom Fuße der senkrechten Mauern sich der Mitte zuschlingelten und dort zu einem tiefen Flußbett vereinigten, welches, so weit das Auge reichte, die Farbe von rothglühendem Eisen trug. Aus der Schlucht stiegen die mächtigen Thürme mit ihren regelmäßigen Architekturen und Bedachungen empor, gebildet durch die horizontalen Schichten verschiedener Epochen, und je nach ihrer Nachgiebigkeit mehr oder minder ausgemeißelt durch die Einwirkung der Atmosphäre seit tausend und aber Tausenden von Jahren. Grellfarbige Streifen zogen sich in ungestörter Ordnung an den gekerbten Wänden dahin, und während Dr. Newberry sorgsam an diesen Striefen die Geschichte der geologischen Formation des mächtigen Hochlandes zu entziffern suchte, nahm ich mein Skizzenbush zur Hand und schaffte mir ein Andenken an jenen merkwürdigen Punkt.

“Es war um die Mittagszeit, mit sengender Gluth fielen die Strahlen der Sonne auf das nackte Gestein, welches ebenfalls erhitzt, Wärme auströmte und die nächsten Luftschichten in zitternder Bewegung erhielt. Die Winde schwiegen, das Athmen wurde schwer, aber mit ungeschwächtem Interesse studierten wir die Linien und Farben des wunderbaren Bildes, welches in unbeschreiblicher Mannichfaltigkeit, aber auch in schrecklicher Oede vor uns lag. Leises, einschläferndes Gesumme von Insekten erfüllte den weiten Raum, regungslos lagen auf dem erwärmten Felsen zahlreiche Eidechsen umher, wollüstig sogen sie mit weitgeöffnetem Rachen die heiße Luft ein, aber im Schatten eines Felsblockes lugte hinter halgehobener Fallthür die giftige Tarantel hervor. • • •

“Mitten in dem Bassin erhob sich noch ein letzter Ueberrest des Plateaus, der durch die Regelmäßigkeit seiner Formen auf das Merkwürdigste gegen seine ausgezackte und zerrissene Umgebung contrastirte. Es ragte nämlich auf der rothen Unterlage ein mächtiger Kegel empor, dessen höchsten Gipfel ein Felsenthurm zierte. Das abgerundete Dach desselben stand einst in Verbindung mit der Gesteinslage, auf welcher wir uns befanden, und an dem Thurm und den Abhängen des Kegels niederwärts schauend, erkannten wir überall die horizontalen Schichten, deren Fortsetzung an jedem senkrechten Durchschnitt des Hochlandes leicht zu entdecken war. Hier nun, wo auf ausgedehntem Raume sich kolossale Massen in ein einziges Bild, und doch nur zu einem kleinen Theilchen eines gewaltigen Ganzen zusammendrängten, schienen die mächtigen Dimensionen der einzelnen Wälle und Thürme, im Vergleich mit denen in engeren Schluchten zu schwinden, doch bebte man fast bei dem Eindruck, den die farben- und formenreichen, starren, regungslosen Massen ausübten, und kaum wagte man es, seine Stimme zu erheben gegenüber einer so suchtbaren schönen Natur.

“Nicht ohne Mühe verfolgte ich die Linien, welche vor meinen Blicken chaotisch in einander verschwammen, und lange hätte ich noch weilen mögen in der tödtlichen Einsamkeit, doch schmerzhaft wirkte das blendend beleuchtete, farbige Gestein auf meine Augen, und der Körper erschlaffte unter den brennenden Strahlen der Sonne. • • •

“Nach einem Marsch von drei Meilen standen wir endlich am Rande der Schlucht, und vor mir lag ein Bild, im Charakter ähnlich dem, welches ich schon beschrieb, und doch auch wieder so verschieden in seinen einzelnen Theilen und Formen. Der Eindruck, welchen der gewaltige Felsenkessel auf uns machte, wurde dadurch gehoben, daß wir hart am Rande des Plateaus standen und die grausige Tiefe sich unmittelbar vor unsern Füßen öffnete. Schüchtern schauten wir hinab auf das nahe an zweitausend Fuß tief gelegene dunkelrothe Bett des trockenen Bassins; in unzähligen Windungen, ähnlich phantastischen Arabesken, zogen sich die verschiedenen

The Grand Canyon!

I. Primary Expedition Narratives

Wasserrinnen dahin, und mit ihnen vereinigten sich die Schluchten, die aus den tiefen Spalten des Hochlandes weit in das Becken hineinreichten. Die durchschnittliche Breite dieses Felstessels betrug nicht unter sechs Meilen, doch war er gleichsam in zwei Hälften getheilt durch eine mauerähnliche Verlängerung des Plateaus, welche so merkwürdige Gebilde schmückten, daß man in der That die wohlhaltenen Ruinen einer indianischen Stadt vor sich zu sehen glaubte. Auffallender noch war ein mächtiges Amphitheater, welches sich in schöner, regelmäßiger Rundung zwischen unserm Standpunkte und der ruinengekrönten Felswand ausdehnte. Durch eine weite Oeffnung stand dasselbe mit dem Hauptkessel in Verbindung, doch bildete es ein abgeschlossenes Bauwerk, welches den Beobachter mehr als alles Andere zu Betrachtungen hinreißen mußte. • • •

„Dort also auf schwindelnder Höhe, am Rande des Abrundes, saß ich wiederum und zeichnete. Vor mir aus schauerlicher Tiefe thürmten sich die formationen verschiedener Epochen 12 über einander, dentlich extenbar an den grellen Farbencontrasten, jede einzelne Schicht ein Weltalter bezeichnend. Senkrecht standen die Wände, als ob die geringste Erschütterung sie hinabzustürzen vermöchte, und wie eine Mahnung an die Unendlichkeit erschienen mir die Merkmale, die klar beewiesen, daß der fallende Wassertropfen die Schlünde bildete, welche mir von allen Seiten entgegenstarrten. Ich faß und zeichnete, und blickte zugleich sehnsüchtig hinübere nach der hohen Felswand, die sich in der Entfernung von ungefähr zwanzig Meilen aus der Ebene erhob, und an deren Fuß der kleine oder der große Colorado vorüberschäumen mußte. • • •

„Mit einer gewissen Wehmuth blickte ich nach der mächtigen Uferwand hinüber, die den Lauf großer Gewässer bezeichnete, und von der mich Hindernisse trennten, die zu überwinden mehr als menschliche Kräfte erfordert hätte; mit Wehmuth beobachtete ich auch eine Weihe, die auf sichern Schwingen in gleicher Höhe mit meinem luftigen Standpunkte über der Tiefe dahinschwebte. Ich beneidete den Vogel um seine Kraft, folgte ihm im Geiste und schaffte mir in Gedanken, mit ahnungsvollem Grauen, ein Bild vondem Felsenthale des Colorado "des Westens", welches vielleicht noch für kommende Jahrhunderte dem Menschen ein Geheimniß bleiben wird. Als ich mich wendete, um in's Lager zurückzukehren, hatte ich wieder die scheinbar ununterbrochene Ebene vor mir, der Himmel hatte sich bewölkt, im Westen schimmerten einige rosenfarbige Streifen, den baldigen Untergang der Sonne verkündend, und ich eilte, um nicht zwischen den Schluchten von der Dunkelheit überrascht zu werden.“

(translation)

‘By noon the direction we had taken cut through the highlands, breaking the monotony of the surroundings in a way pleasing to the eye. Low firs and curled cedars broadly marked the swells and depressions of the ground, and if we happened to be in the extended line of a main ravine it was as if we had been permitted a glimpse into the bowels of the earth, for the rocky side walls descended lower and lower until in the distance they blurred chaotically into one another in a violet swirl of mist. • • •

‘Toward evening we reached a clear but lukewarm spring, which, surrounded by canes and reeds, afforded an unusually comfortable place to rest for the night. The water rushed like a small brook a few hundred paces into the ravine, where it sank into the sand, but looking in the direction of it I saw some cottonwood trees and stunted oaks, which testified to its renewed emergence. The traces of a small corn plantation were visible on the soil fertilized by the spring, and I could scarcely believe my eyes when I discovered a peach tree, lonely at the foot of a nearby hill, watered by the irrigated soil. We have often speculated as to the manner in which the peach stone from which the sapling had germinated had found its way into these secluded regions, and assumed that it was brought there by the Apache Indians from the Rio Grande, and unintentionally, by chance, had been planted.

‘Ahead of us, at a distance of about a mile, the ravine was narrowed by high vertical cliffs, showing the same regular horizontal strata and relationships which I have mentioned in describing the Music Mountains. The actual opening of the mysterious canyon, into which our way was to lead on the following day, was still hidden by a few projecting hills, and so I climbed the next height, in order to secure a sketch of this very interesting point from there. — A tangle of regular and irregular lines, but the former in the majority, crowded together in a strange and at the same time beautiful picture. The shattered plateaus pushed past one another like mighty ramparts with vertical walls, their almost horizontally lined slopes shimmered in bright colors, and darker shadows betrayed the places where it went deep into the bosom of the earth. Cedar bushes adorned the undulating hills all around, but behind these the bare rock rose in the most magnificent formations and, caused by the different distances, in the most delicate and ever more blurred shades. Hushed silence reigned in this desolate but beautiful wilderness, but to the attentive one it spoke out of dead rock like green cedars and germinating stalks in an easily understandable way: "Sublime is nature in all its forms!" • • •

The Grand Canyon!

I. Primary Expedition Narratives

‘The clear sky arched beautifully above us as we saddled our animals early in the morning on April 2nd; the sun’s rays played on the slopes of the mountains, and slowly the shadows crept down. We pursued our way in the ravine, and were accompanied for a short distance by the brook, which again indented the sandy soil, and nourished thirsty vegetation on either side. Carboniferous limestone formed the main formation of our surroundings, but I also saw sandstone and granite, and when, after traveling south for two miles, we turned west into the main gorge, we had on either side high vertical walls of rock, on which the rocks, regularly superimposed layered types, were clearly distinguished. We were still at an altitude of about three thousand feet above sea level, and the steep banks that bound the wide gorge were about eight hundred feet high. The sandy, dry trail descended sharply, and to a lesser extent the colossal strata and their relationships descended with it to the northwest.

‘As we rode along, and the difference in height between our road and the plateau increased markedly with every mile, the gigantic and at the same time majestic masses of rock drew closer and closer around us, new formations and new colors rising from the ground, as it were, and becoming magnificent and threateningly overhanging united forms, I did not feel the scorching glow of the sun, whose power was doubled in the narrow rocky basin; I had only thoughts and eyes for the sublime scenery, which, apparently in the wildest confusion, had been arranged into such a beautiful whole by a master’s hand. Our road went lower, the rocks rose higher, the streak of blue, sunny sky that looked down on us so kindly grew narrower, and with every step the images that I could only impress on memory changed. There stood temples of marvelous architecture, long porticoes, and mighty but delicately formed pyramids; wide vaults, arched windows and gates opened up, but down in the gorge, the dry bed of an occasionally foaming torrent, there was dry sand and smooth-washed rubble, and between this and in the cracks in the rocks prickly cacti protruded, almost the only vegetation in this inhospitable, I might say subterranean wilderness. And yet people lived here, people who in their deep solitude seem to have lost all human inclinations, people who have no longing for social intercourse with other nations and are only driven up to the highlands by necessity to hunt there. Corn sparsely harvested in the sunny rocky nook, Colorado fish, and some game, are the sustenance of these wretched creatures, and indolent and indifferent, like the surrounding rocks, they carry on their lives like beasts.

‘We rode a short distance past a camp of about thirty of these unfortunate Wallpay Indians, who had made their home in a side ravine, but although only a few of them knew of the existence of white people, none of them moved to take a closer look at our train, yes, one would have thought that such expeditions would pass there daily, so little attention they paid to us. I made the same observation when we came close to several huts, in which the occupants remained lying motionless, as if they had not even suspected our presence. The huts consisted of arbors of sticks and bark, leaning against the overhanging walls, and scarcely thick enough to afford any protection from the sun’s rays. We met an old woman crawling slowly and laboriously under a burden of roots and herbs; it was a pathetic sight, this old, wrinkled, sickly panting creature; I handed her a piece of bread, but without accepting it or understanding my intention, she looked sideways at me with expressionless eyes, and then went on her way, grumbling and scolding.

‘After Ireteba had instructed us to follow the ravine further and further, he stayed in one of the miserable huts to, he indicated, make inquiries about the area. It was not possible to deviate from the indicated direction, but in our further advance we encountered such serious obstacles, namely boulders that had rolled down and steps in the path itself, that we began to doubt whether we would ever reach the Colorado in this direction. With the caution with which we could only move forward on dangerous ground, with the uneasiness we felt towards our animals, which, without having first rested, certainly could not have left the Wallpay Gorge again with their burdens, much of the impression that the imposing masses of rock necessarily had to exert on everyone was lost. Tired, most of them [the men] hung in their saddles and looked down in front of them; but we had already covered fifteen miles since early morning, and had descended about two thousand feet that way. According to our calculations we could no longer be high above the level of the Colorado, and at every turn we hoped at last to see the longed-for stream. Suddenly the gorge seemed to be closed off by a mighty rock wall, but green

The Grand Canyon!

I. Primary Expedition Narratives

willow bushes shimmered lovely from a dark corner, and how encouraging was the loud rushing of a torrent that reached us! We hurried towards it as best we could, and a few minutes later, in the shade of willows and cottonwood trees, men and beasts were drinking in a long line from the diamond-clear waters of a mountain stream.

‘Pure and clear, like a diamond, the creek gushed past us from a northeastern gorge that, like a precious stone, lay in the opposite direction before us, a very small valley decorated with the most graceful green, and we baptized the water that danced along in the air Diamant-Bach (Diamond creek [in English]) and, in the limited space up to the foot of the rigid rocks, it bestowed its blessings to the best of its ability on relatively lush vegetation.

‘Impressions, and the child’s feelings arising from them, are often repeated at a later age. I remember reading about subterranean enchanted gardens in the midst of terrible wilderness, and just as I was then carried away by the greatest admiration for the pictures of a rich imagination, so I rejoiced here at the sight of the small area of land that reminded me so vividly of those enchanted gardens. The shimmering flowers and birds were missing, and dead trees and bushes told of the transience of what I saw before me; but by the sheer cliffs that towered high I could calculate how far below the surface of the ground I was; I had known that terrible deserts surrounded me in a wide radius; I had feared for our fate, and suddenly there lay in front of me in the most refreshing green spring, which had become almost alien to me, a wild mountain garden tended by nature, and through it the crystal-clear water murmured over colored pebbles and past hindering boulders. • • •

‘As soon as we arrived I climbed up a projecting cliff, and from there, where I had a view of the valley and the masses of mountains enclosing it, I drew a sketch of the whole splendid scene. I was not a little troubled by the numerous lines of the mountain, more than two thousand feet high, which towards the southwest seemed to check the course of Diamond Creek, and the base of which was hidden from my view by a ledge. It resembled a mighty unfinished structure, surrounded by corresponding buttresses and towers. Up to the summit I could see the regularly superimposed strata, which, like man-made mantles, stretched across the entire breadth of the colossal rock, and which had been transformed into such strange formations by the influence of the atmosphere and occasionally falling moisture. Similar mountains appeared on all sides in the background, and by tracing the lines of the various strata with one’s eyes it was easy to convince oneself that the mountains, now widely separated, had once formed a solid highland, and had stood in the most intimate connection with one another.

‘A peculiar play of colors appeared on the craggy walls, for while dark brown and blue-black predominated on the first eight hundred feet, the heights played in the most beautiful pink, yellow, blue and green, depending on the formations of different epochs lined up one above the other and by the evening sun were picturesquely illuminated. The extreme clarity of the atmosphere, moreover, made the more distant objects appear much nearer than they really were, and so we all believed that the beautiful mountain which I have just described is only separated from us by a spur of rock; but when I returned to the camp, I met Ireteba there, who assured me that the Colorado still flowed between us and that mountain.

‘Evening was not far off, and assuming the river was quite close at hand, several of us set out to have a look at it that same day. We quickly came to the end of the valley, the whole length of which was scarcely five hundred paces, and then turned into the narrow gorge, in which the brook, always with the same impetus, meandered from one side to the other and hastened towards the Colorado. It was a very arduous path, because sometimes tendrils, sometimes rocks, or even the stream itself prevented us from progressing, but in the hope of standing on the bank of the proud stream at every next bend, we continued to work undeterred. We had gone two miles in this way, when the ravine gradually opened into a broad sandy valley, and the foot of the well-known mountain remained hidden only by small willows and mezquite bushes. We could almost reach the head of the valley, which was half a mile long; the mountain seemed to rise out of the sandy ground there, and we found it almost unbelievable that the broad mirror of the Colorado could still be found there. But as we stood still and listened, our ears pounded like the pounding of innumerable ponderous hooves, a dull, eerie roaring and raging, to which was added the peaceful splashing and murmuring of the brook at our side. We hastened through the middle of the undergrowth to the next elevation of the sandy plain, and a short distance in front of us greeted the frothy speculum of the river, which tumbled with irresistible force over the ruins of the nearby rocky fortresses that it had itself torn loose.

The Grand Canyon!

I. Primary Expedition Narratives

`The sight silenced us, and with a feeling of admiring reverence we went on until our feet rested on the sands wetted by the waves of the stream.

`The majestic natural structures all around bore the character of unshakable, solemn calm; the unruly masses of water followed the path they had fought just as seriously; as it were, full of fierce fury at the resistance they constantly encountered, they stumbled from rock to rock, from step to step, and creating eddies and foam they pushed their way into the southern gate of the rock. I looked upstream, so the river parted from the dark gorges; I watched the wide expanse of water in front of me, covered with numerous whirlpools and the moving reflections on it, but involuntarily my eyes kept turning to the south, where the waters rushed and rushed, roaring and raging, as if in an eternal struggle with lifeless rock.

`We only reveled in the sight of the magnificent scene for a short time, for the crimson peaks of the mountains had already wrapped themselves in a violet, dusty veil, and deep shadows began to descend around us in the closed world; we turned back, and when we reached the narrow ravine, impenetrable darkness surrounded us. Half crawling, stumbling, and often falling, we sought our way on unfavorable ground; we only got slowly from the spot, and the night was far advanced when we saw the first big fires of the Mexican guards, which magically illuminated valley, tree and rock. • • •`

After leaving the Diamond Creek area, when they have in sight the San Francisco Peaks and the plateau ahead, en route to Cararact Creek:

`A completely different picture lay before us towards the north. There the horizon was limited by a plateau, which rose perpendicularly from the apparently uninterrupted plain. It extended widely from west to northeast, and was fissured and broken in several places, so that the severed parts contrasted as regular towers and ramparts against the blue sky. The more we approached this peculiar formation and the more clearly the play of colors of the rugged walls detached itself from the fragrant blue of the whole mass, the more firmly we believed that we were approaching the beds of larger waters, and that there at the foot of the embankment just described, deep down in the bosom of the earth, the small or the great Colorado flow, or that these two rivers also unite at that very point. Shortly before, before we saw the San Francisco mountains, we passed a small lake, which seemed to hold water most of the year, but was by no means fed by springs. We were already about nine thousand feet above sea level, too high to be able to assume such a thing without hesitation, especially given the knowledge of the geological formation of the ground, which we had gradually gained. A massive layer of limestone in that elevation covered the whole extent of the highlands; this was only a few feet below the surface of the ground, and at that point formed a basin-like depression, which received the rain and snow water of a considerable area. We watered the animals there, and with a faint hope of finding water again in the near future, we followed the old route. • • •`

` . . . before us lay, in ever-increasing dimensions, the multifaceted plateau with its garishly colored but regularly marked bluffs.

`Looking at the colossal ramparts and the vast gray expanse, where everywhere a wearisome monotony and desolation appeared, and at the thought that yet the grandest and most powerful of all natural scenes must lie before us, a peculiar feeling of impatience crept over me, but also the concern that with every new drop down I could expect to see the ground deeply split and to hear nature command, Halt! But we went uphill and downhill, over rows of hills and through valley bottoms; the ground lowered more and more, and finally our entire view was limited to the nearby round hills. Not until about noon, after we had given our thirsty animals a drink from a rocky depression filled with rainwater, did the path turn into a gorge, and following it down we soon came down six hundred feet. We were there on a stratum of limestone, while strata of fossil shells and limestone piled high on either side of us, making up the accessible slopes to the plateau.

`We were only able to use the narrow center of the gorge as our way for a short distance, but then a chasm forty feet in depth checked our steps, and by it we found that the tumbling waters had here broken the layer of solid rock and then with wild destructiveness widened the way and cleared it out. We set off on the barely recognizable path that led to the very edge of the limestone layer, always at the same height. In scarcely a

The Grand Canyon!

I. Primary Expedition Narratives

hundred paces the depth of the ravine which opened immediately beside the path had increased to three hundred feet; we could see the horizontal strata for a long way off, but nowhere did we see a place where the path might possibly lead down, and the mere thought of having to continue our journey on a path seemed to be created for mountain goats and antelopes made us dizzy. We dismounted to lead the animals by the bridle, unbuckled the spurs from our feet, and entering the long line we began the perilous journey. The gorge had increased in width as well as in depth, and the wall of the opposite bank offered us at the same time a picture of the one on which we were. Accordingly, both consisted of mighty towers of rock, arranged regularly in a row, with a high top, which led up obliquely to the top layer of the plateau, while from the rock layer that formed our path and its continuation on the other side, a single vertical wall stood out clearly to ghastly depth. • • •

‘The lively conversation in our train had suddenly stopped, everyone in the motley line of people and animals walked silently along, the right hand clutched convulsively the heavy rifle, while the left, shading the eyes, pulled down the brim of the hat, and the foot gently patting the ground before taking the weight of the body. All that was heard was the clatter of hooves on the solid rock, and a few voices, which cheered or calmed the mules according to circumstances; and when a weather-beaten boulder gave way from its joints under the unusual load, spanning wide spaces without a sound and shattering with a dull sound far below, then a gentle tremor quivered through the chest, and one saw strong men who crouched down hesitantly like children to conquer an attack of dizziness. But the animals pressed on again and again, and everyone who thought of taking a short break was disrupted [moved along].

‘Only at times did I venture to look aside, where beside the path, which varied in breadth from three to twelve inches, opened the abyss more than a thousand feet deep; and then looking down, where brick-colored rocks were tinged with distance as if with a violet tinge, the towers and walls opposite seemed to come alive; with sluggish movement they pushed past each other, but the masses of rock that lay piled high one above the other on my right leaned threateningly over me, and it was high time to close my eyes for a few seconds to bring the swaying surroundings to a standstill again. It was a long and tiring journey that we covered in this way, doubly tiring because the sun was heating up the rock with a scorching glow, and the glaring colors of it blinded the eye at the same time. With a certain envy I watched the heavily laden mules, which climbed the precipices with imperturbable calm, only occasionally standing still and looking down with their long and half-pricked ears as if to measure it with their eyes. Though we had to be more sure of the safety of the mules than of our own, no one dared try to trust the saddle, save a few Mexicans who had grown up in the Sonoran mountains and tried at the risk of being thrown down, everyone doing their best to maintain their place in the long procession. We had covered two miles when we reached a kind of platform at the western end of which, between two of the towers mentioned, the path turned down into the ravine. I happened to be among the foremost, and zigzagging down the steep declivity, we descended about eighty feet, when we convinced ourselves of the impossibility of continuing our journey other than by rope. The order to return was given, and, not without difficulty, the line of pack animals was driven back up the winding path to the platform, where fortunately the greater part of the expedition was still assembled. Loose stones and boulders often rolled towards us, but without an accident we finally got our footing again and assembled ourselves for a hike back to the abyss.

‘When the eye had already become somewhat accustomed to the horrible sight, and the attacks of dizziness and nausea had become less frequent, the impatience of the thirsty herd had increased, which, thinking they were being driven back to the water, pressed and pushed in a truly menacing manner. The tendons on your knees also began to ache and go slack, and spasmodic tremors twitched in your calves. So the way back was no less dangerous than the outward journey, and I must confess that the safety of the last animal carrying one of our collections was illusory. • • •

‘As we were satisfied that in a renewed attempt to learn more of this marvelous terrain the animals could be of little or no use to us, on Peacock’s advice the whole herd, except the watered animals, was sent back to the lake the same evening. We were already more than thirty miles from that point, so the Mexicans assigned to protect the herd received orders not to come back to us for two days. We intended during this period to do our best to extend our explorations on foot, either to get down the Colorado itself, or at least to get a view of it from above.

The Grand Canyon!

I. Primary Expedition Narratives

`I made a little trip north before nightfall, but soon found myself in such a labyrinth of ravines that I could scarcely find my way out. Several times I discovered damp spots where water had recently stood, but there was not the slightest trace of the vicinity of a spring, and I only saw isolated, very old, barely recognizable imprints of the hooves of fleeing antelopes and deer on the heights. I even missed the howling of the coyotes at night, the surest proof that there were neither natives nor game for many miles around.

`Early on April 13, a reconnaissance detachment left the camp to undertake the journey once more into the wild ravine. The company consisted of Lieutenant Ives, Dr. Newberry, Egloffstein, Peacock, Lieutenant Tipton and myself, with six soldiers. We were all well-armed, provided with provisions and water for twenty-four hours, and we also had long ropes and lines with us in consideration of the formation of the ground. We soon reached the well-known cistern, and as some workmen and soldiers were just busy hauling up water for the needs of those who remained in the camp, we took advantage of this opportunity to refill our canteens and have a drink of the nice, clear water to refresh. Here Dr. Newberry and I parted from the rest of the company to try and follow the gorge from the start. We descended easily by ropes to the store of water, and while our companions seemed to be floating along the rocky path high above us, we descended lower and lower.

`On our subterranean path, as it were, we were constantly surrounded by the most interesting and magnificent formations, for overhanging rock walls, washed-out caves, fallen colossal boulders and smooth rubble lined up in such a terribly wild chaos that we were often astonished and hardly able to find words. Now reaching over precipices, now settling down on ropes, we meanwhile gradually advanced. The pleasant coolness favored us in the hard work, and more and more we gave ourselves up to the hope of being able to explore the mysterious gorge, into which no human foot, not even that of an Indian, had ever penetrated to its full extent. Suddenly, however, a chasm checked our steps, a chasm that went down over a hundred feet, and which was almost immediately followed by other gradations, smaller and larger. We looked down, we checked the side walls, which protruded perpendicularly from the horrid depths far beyond our point of view, we measured our lines, but all was in vain, our strength and our means were not sufficient to conquer such obstacles, and with a certain yearning for the wild we finally decided to return. We were soon back at the water supply, the rope ladder was still hanging there, and a short time later we were standing on the same spot where we had parted from our companions that morning.

`Since we had not been able to follow the path downwards, we decided to work our way up, in order if possible to get an overview of the immediate surroundings from there, which in geological as well as topographical respects contains much of the same that was worthy of work and that was unusual. As we laboriously climbed the steep slopes, the atmosphere seemed doubly hot and oppressive for having just left the vaulted cool ravine, and we were often forced to rest ere we reached the top of the plateau, and where we encountered undulating waves limestone strata a relatively level path was open. We chose the western direction, and striding along the edge of the same ravine into which our companions had vanished, and where the breezy path lay far below us, we soon beheld formations and sceneries such as the boldest imagination could not foresee or create. We looked down to a depth of two thousand feet, and there met our eye a dark red sandstone that formed the bottom of the dry, bare rocky ravine, which in a westerly direction steadily lowered and widened. The innumerable streams of water [channels] appeared like fine veins, winding their way from the foot of the vertical walls to the center and uniting there to form a deep riverbed, which as far as the eye could see was the color of red-hot iron. From the gorge rose the mighty towers with their regular architecture and roofing, formed by the horizontal strata of different epochs and more or less chiseled according to their response to the action of the atmosphere for thousands upon thousands of years. Brightly colored streaks ran in disorder along the scored walls, and while Dr. Newberry carefully tried to decipher from these streaks the history of the geological formation of the mighty highlands, I took up my sketch-bush and made a souvenir of that curious point.

`It was about midday, the sun's rays fell on the bare rock with a scorching glow, which also heated up, radiated warmth and received the next layers of air in trembling movements. The winds were still, breathing grew heavy, but with undiminished interest we studied the lines and colors of the wondrous picture which lay before us in indescribable variety, but also in terrible solitude. A quiet, soporific humming of insects filled the wide expanse, numerous lizards lay motionless on the warm rocks, voluptuously soaking in the hot air with wide

The Grand Canyon!

I. Primary Expedition Narratives

open mouths, but in the shade of a boulder the poisonous tarantula peered out from behind the half-raised trapdoor. • • •

`In the middle of the basin rose a last remnant of the plateau, which by the regularity of its forms contrasted in the most remarkable way with its jagged and torn surroundings. A mighty cone towered up on the red base, the highest peak of which was adorned with a rock tower. The rounded roof of it once stood in connection with the bed of rock on which we stood, and looking down at the tower and slopes of the cone we saw everywhere the horizontal strata, the continuation of which was easy to discover at every vertical section in the high country. Here, then, where over a vast space colossal masses crowded into a single picture, and yet [were] only a small part of a mighty whole, the mighty dimensions of the individual ramparts and towers seemed to dwindle in comparison with those in narrower canyons, but one trembled almost at the impression made by the rigid, motionless masses, rich in color and form, and one scarcely dared to raise one's voice in the face of such terribly beautiful nature.

`It was not without effort that I followed the lines that blurred chaotically before my eyes, and I could have lingered in the deadly loneliness for a long time, but the dazzlingly lit, colored rock had a painful effect on my eyes, and my body went limp under the burning rays of the Sun. • • •

`At last, after a march of three miles, we stood at the edge of the ravine, and before me lay a picture similar in character to that which I have already described, and yet so different in its parts and forms. The impression made on us by the mighty rock basin was heightened by the fact that we stood hard on the edge of the plateau and the horrible depths opened up directly at our feet. Shyly we shuffled down to the dark red bed of the dry basin, about two thousand feet deep; in innumerable meanders, like fantastic arabesques, the various water channels ran along, and with them the ravines were joined by the gorges that reached far into the basin from the deep crevasses of the highlands. The average breadth of this crag was not less than six miles, but it was as if it were divided in two by a wall-like extension of the plateau, which was adorned with such strange formations that one really thought one saw before one the well-preserved ruins of an Indian city. Even more striking was a mighty amphitheater, which stretched out in a beautiful, regular curve between our point of view and the rock face crowned with ruins. Through a wide opening it was connected with the main basin, but it formed a closed structure, which, more than anything else, had to excite the observer to contemplation. • • •

`So there, at a dizzying height, on the edge of the curve, I sat again and drew. The formations of different epochs piled up in front of me from a horrible depth, one above the other, which can be clearly distinguished by the glaring color contrasts, each individual layer designating a world age. The walls stood upright, as if the slightest tremor might throw them down, and the features, which clearly proved that the falling drop of water formed the gorges that stared at me from all sides, seemed to me like a reminder to infinity. I grasped and drew, and at the same time looked longingly at the high cliff that rose out of the plain about twenty miles away, and at the foot of which the little or the big Colorado must froth past. • • •

`With a certain melancholy I looked across at the mighty embankment, which marked the course of great waters, and from which I was separated by obstacles that would have required more than human strength to overcome; with melancholy I also observed a harrier that soared on sure wings at the same height as my lofty standpoint over the depths. I envied the bird's strength, followed it in spirit and created in my mind, with foreboding horror, a picture of the rocky valley of the Colorado "of the West", which will perhaps remain a secret to people for centuries to come. When I turned to return to camp I found the seemingly uninterrupted plain before me again, the sky had clouded over, some rose-colored streaks shimmered in the west, heralding the imminent setting of the sun, and I sped to avoid being surprised by darkness between the ravines.'

34

1867 Resor i Norra Amerikas klippberg till Ny-Mexicos högslätt, företagna af Colorado-Expeditionen, enligt uppdrag af Förenta Staternas regering, och beskrifna af Balduin Möllhausen, Medlem af expeditionen. (C. E. Möller, translator.) Stockholm: Tryckt hos R. G. Berg, 2 volumes (Förre Delen, 355 [359] pp.; Sednare Delen, 313 [314] pp.). [Translation of Reisen in die Felsengebirge Nord Amerikas . . .] [In Swedish.]

The Grand Canyon!

I. Primary Expedition Narratives

- 35 1975 Reisen in die Felsengebirge Nord-Amerikas bis zum Hoch-Plateau von Neu-Mexico. Hildesheim: H. A. Gerstenberg, 2 volumes. ("Reprographischer Nachdruck der Ausgabe Leipzig 1861.") [In German.]
- 36 1975 Reisen in die Felsengebirge Nord-Amerikas bis zum Hoch-Plateau von Neu-Mexico. (Introduction by Erich Heinemann.) München: Borowsky, 2 volumes. [Author's name given as Balduin von Möllhausen.] [In German.]
- 37 NO DATE Reisen in die Felsengebirge Nordamerikas bis zum Hoch-Plateau von Neu-Mexico, unternommen als Mitglied der im Auftrage der Regierung der Vereinigten Staaten ausgesandten Colorado-Expedition. München: Verlag Lothar Borowsky, 2 volumes. [Ca. 1975.] [In German.]
-

The Grand Canyon!

I. Primary Expedition Narratives

1867

The James White Affair

JAMES WHITE'S story is perhaps the one bit of Colorado River–Grand Canyon history that is not really understood. What is known—certainly—is that Mr. White was rescued off a crude raft in the Colorado River at Callville, below the mouth of the Grand Canyon, suffering severely from exposure and starvation. He said he had been all the way through “the Big Canyon”, the sole survivor of three who had been prospecting above the San Juan River. The inclusion of James White's story in this volume neither supports nor dismisses the veracity of his account.

Over the years, belief in the White story changed back and forth. At first, the story—often dramatically touted by title-writers as “a drift for life”—was an authentic one, based on C. C. Parry's revelation of the events and his adoption of them as true. (Not long after his rescue, White wrote a brief letter to his brother recounting his misadventure, a letter that survived, with its mailing envelope no less, to appear in publications that favored the truthfulness of his account.) In 1917, a Colorado historian managed to get his U.S. Senator to publish a detailed congressional memorandum giving some semblance of government authentication to the White story—and of course in the process waylaying John Wesley Powell and party as the first to “explore” the Grand Canyon. It includes White's own further elaboration of things—unsettlingly, 50 years after the fact. A few years later, detractors and debunkers began their work. Great problems seem to lay in White's physical descriptions of things as well as the timing of events (despite allowances for his desperate condition when found). So things stood, one way or the other, until the twenty-first century when the facts and times were revisited by a number of people, who have brought favor to the White camp again. A granddaughter produced a book through a university press, Hell or High Water: James White's Disputed Passage Through Grand Canyon, 1867, and a great-grandson displayed for a professional river runners' meeting a recreation of White's raft to suggest its riverworthiness (though it was not taken through the canyon).

Still, there are the problems of geographical facts and timings. For one thing, White's description of the confluence of the Little Colorado River is so awry as to dismiss it all. Perhaps the greatest point of contention has been the point where he entered the river. Some have effectually corroborated White's version of things, others say that he could not have gone in above the San Juan as he stated, while still others say his journey could not have gone through the Grand Canyon at all, that perhaps the “drift” was not anywhere near as long as he said it was. So, how much are we to allow him? We must give in to the privations he described of his journey, that he was in fact rescued from the river in bad shape, and the fact that his was not an expedition of exploration but just to get the hell out of there. The Grand Canyon just happened to be there. At any rate, here is the story.

The Grand Canyon!

I. Primary Expedition Narratives

James White 1867

Parry, C. C. [Parry, Charles Christopher]

- 38      1868      Account of the passage through the Great Cañon of the Colorado of the West, from above the mouth of Green River to the head of steamboat navigation at Callville, in the months of August and September, 1867, by James White, now living at Callville. Reported January 6, 1868, to J. D. Perry, Esq., Pres't of the Union Pacific Railway, Eastern Division, by C. C. Parry, Ass't Geologist, U. P. R. Surv. Academy of Science of St. Louis, Transactions, 2: 499-503. [Published April, 1868 (see date at beginning of signature 32, p. 491 of volume).]

Delivered to a meeting of the Academy of Science of St. Louis by George Engelmann, February 17, 1868 (see notation p. 584 of volume): “Dr. Engelmann read a paper, communicated from Arizona, by Dr. C. D. Parry, being ‘An Account of the Passage through the Great Cañon of the Colorado River, by Mr. James White, with Geological Remarks,’ which was referred to the Committee on Publication.”

This is the first published record of the James White affair, taken from Parry’s own interview of White in Hardyville, Arizona Territory, as reported in correspondence to John D. Perry, President of the Eastern Division of the Union Pacific Railway. Following the Ives expedition up the lower Colorado River, this sets the stage for a history and accounts of downriver explorations through the Grand Canyon. White’s (and Parry’s) geographical descriptions and timings seem somewhat awry—this much is well understood from today’s understandings of the contemporary perspectives of the mid-19th century—and later historians have conjectured that other landmarks and rivers may have been meant, if indeed the story is a true one. Parry, it should be kept in mind, also was wholly convinced of the veracity of White’s account, and it is obvious that he polished the account into the form that he published, coming across as being very likely far more precise than White’s recollections were given to him. White of course had no real way of determining his geographical positions, and one must recall that neither was he in a favorable state of mind and body when he was rescued at Callville, thus as his journey progressed his abilities and attentions flagged. And as always in oral histories, the speaker’s and audience’s perspectives may not be in tune. White did indeed come down the Colorado River, and was saved at Callville; but where he entered the river has been a point of contention ever since 1867. Nonetheless, this is now a part of the historical record, open to corroboration and dispute alike.

“Sir—The Railroad survey now in progress under your direction has afforded many opportunities for acquiring valuable additions to our geographical knowledge of the unexplored regions of the far West from original sources not accessible to ordinary map compilers. Mining prospecters within the last twenty years, more adventurous even than the noted trappers of the Rocky Mountains, have scarcely left a mountain slope unvisited, or a water-course unexamined, over the wide expanse extending from the Mississippi River to the Pacific Ocean. Could the varied and adventurous experience of these mountain men be brought into an accessible form, we should know nearly as much of these western wilds, as we now do of the settled portions of our country.

The Grand Canyon!

I. Primary Expedition Narratives

"Among the geographical problems remaining for the longest time unsolved, was the actual character of the stupendous chasms, or cañons, through which the Colorado of the west cleaves its way from its snowy source to its exit into the California Gulf. Within the last ten years public attention has been frequently directed to this subject, and various Government expeditions have imparted reliable information in reference to the upper and lower course of this remarkable river. Lieut. Ives, in 1857-8, made a satisfactory exploration of the navigable portion of the Colorado, extending from its mouth to the Great Cañon, and since then a regular line of light draft boats have been successfully traversing these inland waters. Still the Great Cañon remained a myth; its actual length, the character of the stream, the nature of its banks, and the depth of its vertical walls, were subjects for speculation, and afforded a fine field for exaggerated description, in which natural bridges, cavernous tunnels, and fearful cataracts formed a prominent feature. Now, at last, we have a perfectly authentic account from an individual who actually traversed its formidable depths, and who, fortunately for science, still lives to detail his trustworthy observations of this most remarkable voyage. Happening to fall in with this man during my recent stay of a few days at Hardyville, on the Colorado, I drew from him the following connected statement in answer to direct questions noted down at the time.

"NARRATIVE

"James White, now living at Callville, on the Colorado River, formerly a resident of Kenosha, Wisconsin, was induced to join a small party for the San Juan region, west of the Rocky Mountains, in search of placer gold diggings. The original party was composed of four men, under the command of a Capt. Baker.

"The party left Fort Dodge on the 13th of last April, and after crossing the plains, completed their outfit for the San Juan country in Colorado City, leaving that place on the 20th of May. Proceeding by way of South Park and the Upper Arkansas, they crossed the Rocky Mountains, passing round the head waters of the Rio Grande, till they reached the Animas branch of the San Juan River. Here their prospecting for gold commenced, and being only partially successful, they continued still farther to the west, passing the Dolores and reaching the Mancas which latter stream was followed down to the main valley of the San Juan. Crossing the San Juan at this point, they continued down the valley in a westerly direction for about 200 miles, when the river entered a cañon. Here they again crossed to the north bank, and leaving the river passed across a mountain ridge aiming to reach the Colorado River. In a distance of 60 miles over a very rugged country, they reached this latter stream, or rather its main eastern tributary, Grand River. At the point where they first struck the river it was inaccessible on account of its steep rocky banks; they accordingly followed up the stream in search of a place where water could be procured. At an estimated distance of 12 miles they came upon a side cañon down which they succeeded in descending with their animals, and procuring a supply of water. They camped at the bottom of this ravine on the night of the 23d of August, and on the morning of the 24th, started to ascend the right bank to the table land. In making this ascent they were attacked by Indians, and Capt. Baker, being in advance, was killed at the first fire. The two remaining men, James White and Henry Strole, after ascertaining the fate of their comrade, fought their way back into the cañon, and getting beyond the reach of the Indians, hastily unpacked their animals, securing their arms and a small supply of provisions, and proceeded on foot down to the banks of Grand River. Here they constructed a raft of dry cottonwood, composed of three sticks, 10 feet in length and 8 inches in diameter, securely tied together by lariat ropes, and having stored away their arms and provisions, they embarked at midnight on their adventurous voyage.

"The following morning, being on the 25th of August, they made a landing, repaired their raft by some additional pieces of dry cedar, and continued on their course. The river here was about two hundred yards wide, flowing regularly at a rate of 2½ to 3 miles per hour. According to their estimate they reached the mouth of Green River, and entered the main Colorado 30 miles from the point of starting. Below the junction the stream narrows, and is confined between perpendicular rocky walls, gradually increasing in elevation. At an estimated distance of 40 miles from Green River they passed the mouth of the San Juan, both streams being here hemmed in by perpendicular walls. From this point the cañon was continued, with only occasional breaks formed by small side cañons equally inaccessible with the main chasm. Still they experienced no difficulty in continuing their voyage, and were elated with the prospect of soon reaching the settlements on the Colorado, below the Great Cañon.

The Grand Canyon!

I. Primary Expedition Narratives

"On the 28th, being the fourth day of their journey, they encountered the first severe rapids, in passing one of which, Henry Strole was washed off, and sank in a whirlpool below. The small stock of provision was also lost, and when White emerged from the foaming rapids, he found himself alone, without food, and with gloomy prospects before him for completing his adventurous journey. His course now led through the sullen depths of the Great Cañon, which was a succession of fearful rapids, blocked up with masses of rock, over which his frail raft thumped and whirled, so that he had to adopt the precaution of tying himself fast to the rocking timbers. In passing one of these rapids, his raft parted, and he was forced to hold on to the fragments by main strength, until he effected a landing below in a shallow eddy, where he succeeded, standing waist deep in water, in making necessary repairs, and started again. One can hardly imagine the gloomy feelings of this lone traveller, with no human voice to cheer his solitude, hungry, yet hopeful and resolute, closed in on every side by the beetling cliffs that shut out sunlight for the greater part of the long summer day, drenched to the skin, sweeping down the resistless current, shooting over foaming rapids, and whirling below in tumultuous whirlpools, ignorant of what fearful cataracts might yet be on his unswerving track, down which he must plunge to almost certain destruction; still, day after day, buoyed up with the hope of finally emerging from his prison walls, and feasting his eyes on an open country, with shaded groves, green fields, and human habitations.

"The mouth of the Colorado Chiquito was passed on the fourth day, in the evening, the general appearance of which was particularly noted, as he was here entangled in an eddy for two hours, until rescued, as he says, 'by the direct interposition of Providence.' The general course of the river was noted as very crooked, with numerous sharp turns, the river on every side being shut in by precipitous walls of 'white sand rock.' These walls present a smooth, perpendicular and, occasionally, over-hanging surface, extending upward to a variable height, and showing a distinct line of highwater mark thirty to forty feet above the then water-level.

"His estimate of the average height of the Cañon was 3,000 feet, the upper edge of which flared out about half way from the bottom, thus presenting a rugged crest. The last two days in the Cañon, dark-colored igneous rocks took the place of the 'white sandstone,' which finally showed distinct breaks on either side, till he reached a more open country, containing small patches of bottom land, and inhabited by bands of Indians. Here he succeeded in procuring a scanty supply of Mezquite bread, barely sufficient to sustain life till he reached Callville, on the 8th of September, just fourteen days from the time of starting, during seven of which he had no food of any description.

"When finally rescued, this man presented a pitiable object, emaciated and haggard from abstinence, his bare feet literally flayed from constant exposure to drenching water, aggravated by occasional scorplings of a vertical sun; his mental faculties, though still sound, liable to wander, and verging close on the brink of insanity. Being, however, of a naturally strong constitution, he soon recovered his usual health, and is now a stout, hearty, thick-set man. His narrative throughout bears all the evidences of entire reliability, and is sustained by collateral evidence, so that there is not the least reason to doubt that he actually accomplished the journey in the manner and in the time mentioned by him.

"CONCLUSIONS

The following may be summed up as some of the new facts to be derived from this remarkable voyage, as additions to our present geographical knowledge of the Hydrography of the Colorado River:

"1st. The actual location of the mouth of the San Juan, 40 miles below Green River junction, and its entrance by a cañon continuous with that of the Colorado.

"2d. From the mouth of the San Juan to the Colorado Chiquito, three days' travel in the swiftest portion of the current, allowing a rate of four miles per hour, for fifteen hours, or sixty miles per day, would give an estimated distance of 180 miles, including the most inaccessible portion of the Great Cañon.

"3d. From Colorado Chiquito to Callville, ten days' travel was expended. As this portion of the route was more open, and probably comprised long stretches of still water, it would not be safe to allow a distance of more than thirty miles per day, or three hundred miles for this interval. Thus, the whole distance travelled would amount to five hundred and fifty miles, or something over five hundred miles from Grand River junction to head of steamboat navigation at Callville.

The Grand Canyon!

I. Primary Expedition Narratives

"4th. The absence of any distinct cataract, or perpendicular falls, would seem to warrant the conclusion that in time of high water, by proper appliances in the way of boats, good, resolute oarsmen, and provisions secured in water-proof bags, the same passage might be safely made, and the actual course of the river with its peculiar geological features properly determined.

"5th. The construction of bridges by a single span would be rendered difficult of execution on account of the usual flaring shape of the upper summits; possibly, however, points might be found where the high mesas come near together.

"6th. The estimated average elevation of the Cañon at 3,000 feet, is less than that given on the authority of Ives and Newberry, but may be nearer the actual truth, as the result of more continuous observation.

"7th. The width of the river at its narrowest points was estimated at 100 feet, and the line of high-water-mark thirty to forty feet above the average stage in August.

"8th. The long continued uniformity of the geological formation, termed 'white sandstone' (probably Cretaceous), is remarkable, but under this term may have been comprised some of the lower stratified formations. The contrast, on reaching the dark igneous rocks, was so marked that it could not fail to be noticed.

"9th. Any prospect for useful navigation up or down this cañon during the season of high water, or transportation of lumber from the upper pine regions of Green or Grand Rivers, could not be regarded as feasible, considering the long distance and the inaccessible character of the river margin for the greater part of its course.

"10th. No other satisfactory method of exploration, except along the course of the river, could be adopted to determine its actual course, and peculiar natural features, and James White, as the pioneer of this enterprise, will probably retain the honor of being the only man who has traversed, through its whole course, the Great Cañon of the Colorado, and lived to recount his observations on this perilous voyage."

- 39 1869 Grand Canon of the Colorado. Account of the passage of the Great Canon of the Colorado, from above the mouth of Green River to the head of steamboat navigation at Callville, in the months of August and September, 1867, by James White, now living at Callville. In: Palmer, William J., Report of surveys across the continent, in 1867-'68, on the thirty-fifth and thirty-second parallels, for a route extending the Kansas Pacific Railway to the Pacific Ocean at San Francisco and San Diego. By Gen. Wm. J. Palmer. December 1st, 1868. Philadelphia: [privately printed] (W. B. Selheimer, Printer), pp. 232-236.

This reprints Parry's correspondence to J. D. Perry (see Parry, 1868, above), with the exception that a note is added, dating it "Hardyville, Arizona, January 6, 1868." Also note that the title adds the name "Grand Canon" in addition to "Great Canon".

- 40 1869 [Correspondence, January 6, 1868.] In: Schofield, J. M., Report of the [U.S. Army] Chief of Engineers to the Secretary of War, for the year 1868. Washington, D.C.: U.S. Government Printing Office, Appendix X1, pp. 1191-1195. (Volume U.S. 40th Congress, 3rd Session, House Executive Document 1, Part 2, Volume 5, Serial 1368.)

This reprints Parry's correspondence to J. D. Perry (see Parry, 1868, above), with the exception that a note is added, dating it "Hardyville, Arizona, January 6, 1868."

The Grand Canyon!

I. Primary Expedition Narratives

White, James

- 41 1870 Passage of the Great Canyon of the Colorado. In: Bell, W. A., New tracks in North America : a journal of travel and adventure whilst engaged in the survey for a southern railroad to the Pacific Ocean during 1867-68. New York: Scribner, Welford and Co., pp. 435-453.

Stoddard, S. R. [Stoddard, Seneca Ray]

- 42 1906 The Grand Canyon of Arizona. Anybody's Magazine (Sacramento, California), 1(3) (July): 17-28.

The Contents page for this issue lists the author as E. R. Stoddard, an error. Includes (p. 28) a transcription of the letter from James White to his brother, regarding James's putative trip down the Colorado River through Grand Canyon in 1867. He begins by quoting the account as summarized by C. C. Parry in 1868 and 1869 and concludes with a transcription of White's letter to his brother about his misfortunate adventure:

"Here is the story from the original letter literally as written. Its unconventional directness lifts it above mere polished English; its unconscious strength carries conviction of its truth. Its authenticity is vouched for by John E. Parry, Esq., of Glens Falls, N. Y.: nephew of Dr Parry, quoted above. The letter is shown in its original envelope bearing the old three-cent Government stamp, duly cancelled, with post-mark and date, 'St. Thomas, A. T., Oct. 1-67,' written on as was common at small post offices at that time. It is addressed in the same hand as written within, to 'Jashay H. White, Kenosha, Wis.'

Navigation of the Big Canon
A Terrible Voyage
Calluille September 26, 1867.

Dear Brother it has ben some time sence i have heard frome you i got no ancer from the last letter that i roat to you for i left soon after i rote i Went prospected With Captin Baker and Gorge Strole in the San Won montin Wee found very god prospeck but noth that Wold pay then Wee stare Down the San Won river Wee travel down a bout 200 miles then Wee cross over on Coloreado and Camp Wee lad over one day Wee found out that Wee Cold not travel down the river and our horse Wass Sore fite and Wee had may up our mines to turene back When Wee Was attacked by 15 or 20 utes indns thay kill Baker and Gorge Strole and my self took fore ropes off our hourse and a ax ten pounds of flour and our gunns We had 15 millse to Woak to Colarado We got to the river Jest at night Wee bilt a raft that night Wee got it bilt abot teen o clock tha night Wee saill all that night Wee had god sailing fro three days and the Fore day Gorge Strole Was Wash of from the raft and down that left me alone i thought that it Wold be my time next i then pool off my boos and pands i then tide a rope to my Wase i Wend over falls From 10 to 15 feet hie my raft Wold tip over three and fore time a day the thard dav Wee loss our flour and fore seven days i had noth to eat to ralhide nife Caber the 8 days i got some muskit beens the 13 days a party of indis frendey thay Wold not give me noth eat so i give my pistols for hine pards of a dog i eat one of for super and the other breakfast the 14 days i rive at Calluille Whare i Was tak Caere of by James ferry i Was ten days With out pants or boots or hat i Was soon bornt so i Cold hadly Walk the ingis tok 7 head horse from us I wish I Can rite you halfe i under Went i see the hardes time that eny man ever did in the World but thank god that i got throught saft i am Well a gin and i hope the few lines Will fine it you all Well i send my felt respeck to all

Josh ansee this When you get it

Dreck you letter to Calluille

Arizona

Josh ast Ton to ancy

that letter that i

rote him sevel yeas

a goe.

James White"

The Grand Canyon!

I. Primary Expedition Narratives

Dawson, Thomas Fulton

- 43 1917 The Grand Canyon; an article giving the credit of first traversing the Grand Canyon of the Colorado to James White, a Colorado gold prospector, who it is claimed made the voyage two years previous to the expedition under the direction of Maj. J. W. Powell in 1869. Washington: U.S. Government Printing Office, U.S. 65th Congress, 1st Session, Senate Document 42, 67 pp. [including wraps].

This controversial congressional memorandum was a purposeful and detailed attempt to give credit for the first descent of the Colorado River through the Grand Canyon to James White. The document was put together by Dawson, of the Colorado Historical Society, and presented for publication by the U.S. Senate by Senator John Franklin Shafroth, of Colorado. It includes White's long explanation of events, fifty years after the fact:

"WHITE'S OWN STORY.

"After remaining for a few months on the lower Colorado and after revisiting his old home in Wisconsin, Mr. White returned to Colorado and ultimately located in that State. There he has lived ever since 1878, and there in 1916 he prepared this account of his voyage. He has become an old man, and necessarily the passage of time has had the effect of clouding his memory as to details; but the account is still valuable, because, so far as known, it is the only printed statement signed by him, with the exception of a brief account which appeared in a Wisconsin paper soon after the conclusion of the voyage.

"Mr. White writes:

"I was born in Rome, N. Y., November 19, 1837, but was reared in Kenosha, Wis. At the age of 23 I left for Denver, Colo., later drifting to California, and there enlisted in the Army at Camp Union, Sacramento, in Company H, California Infantry, Gen. Carleton (some doubt as to the correct spelling of his name) being general of the regiment, and the company being under Capt. Stratton. I served in the Army three and one-half years, being honorably discharged at Franklin, Tex., on May 31, 1865. From there I went to Santa Fe, N. Mex., and then to Denver. In the fall of that year I went from Denver to Atchison, Kans., with Capt. Turnley (some doubt as to the correct spelling of this name) and his family, and from Atchison I went to Fort Dodge, Kans., where I drove stage for Barlow & Sanderson, and there I got acquainted with Capt. Baker, also George Stroll and Goodfellow. This was in the spring of 1867, and the circumstances under which I met them were as follows: Capt. Baker was a trapper at the time I met him there, and the Indians had stolen his horses, and he asked me to go with him to get his horses, and I went with him, George Stroll, and Goodfellow. We could not get his horses, so we took 14 head of horses from the Indians. The Indians followed us all night and all day, and we crossed the river at a place called Cimarron in Kansas, and we traveled across the prairies to Colorado City, Colo.

"Before going further with my story I would like to relate here what I know of Capt. Baker's history. He had been in the San Juan country in 1860 and was driven out by the Indians. He showed me lumber that he had sawed by hand to make sluice boxes. I was only with him about three months, and he spoke very little of his personal affairs. When we were together in Colorado City he met several of his former friends that he had been prospecting with in the early sixties. I can not remember their names. The only thing I know is that he mentioned coming from St. Louis, but never spoke of himself as being a soldier, and I thought "Captain" was just a nickname for him. He was a man that spoke little of his past or personal affairs, but I remember of him keeping a memorandum book of his travels from the time we left Colorado City.

"After reaching Colorado City, Colo., Baker proposed a prospecting trip to the San Juan. There we got our outfit, and that spring the four of us started on the trip and went over to the Rio Grande. At the Rio Grande, Goodfellow was shot in the foot, and we left him at a farmhouse, and the three of us proceeded on our trip. From the Rio Grande we went over to the head of it, down on the Animas, up the Eureka Gulch. There we prospected one month. We dug a ditch 150 feet long and 15 feet deep. We did not find anything, so we went down the Animas about 5 miles, crossed over into the Mancos. At the head of the Mancos we saw a large lookout house about 100 feet high, which was built out of cobblesotnes. Farther down the canyon we saw houses built of cobblestones, and also noticed small houses about 2 feet square that were built up about 50 feet on the side of the canyon and seemed to be houses of some kind of a bird that was worshiped. We followed the Mancos down until we struck the San Juan. Then we followed the San Juan down as far as we could and then swam our horses across and started over to the Grand River, but before we got to the Grand River we struck a canyon; so we went down that canyon and camped there three days. We could not get out of the canyon on the opposite side; so we had to go out of the canyon the same way we went down. There we were attacked by Indians and Baker was killed. We did not know

The Grand Canyon!

I. Primary Expedition Narratives

there were any Indians about until Baker was shot. Baker, falling to the ground, said, "I am killed." The Indians were hiding behind the rocks overlooking the canyon. Baker expired shortly after the fatal shot, and, much to our grief, we had to leave his remains, as the Indians were close upon us; and George Stroll and I had to make our escape as soon as possible, going back down in the canyon. We left our horses in the brush and we took our overcoats, lariats, guns, ammunition, and 1 quart of flour, and I also had a knife scabbard made out of rawhide, and I also had a knife, and we started afoot down the canyon.

"We traveled all day until about 5 o'clock, when we struck the head of the Grand Canyon of the Colorado River. There we picked up some logs and built us a raft. We had 200 feet of rope when we first built the raft, which was about 6 feet wide and 8 feet long, just big enough to hold us up. The logs were securely tied together with the ropes. We got on our raft at night, working it with a pole. We traveled all night, and the next day, at 10 o'clock, we passed the mouth of the San Juan River. We had smooth floating for three days. The third day, about 5 o'clock, we went over a rapid, and George was washed off, but I caught hold of him and got him on the raft again.

"From the time we started the walls of the Canyon were from two to three thousand feet high, as far as I could estimate at the time, and some days we could not see the sun for an hour, possibly two hours. Each day we would mix a little of the flour in a cup and drink it. The third day the flour got wet, so we scraped it off of the sack and ate it. That was the last of the flour and all we had to eat.

"On the fourth day we rebuilt our raft, finding cedar logs along the bank from 12 to 14 feet long and about 8 or 10 inches through. We made it larger than the first one. The second raft was about 8 feet wide and 12 feet long. We started down the river again, and about 8 o'clock in the morning (as to our time, we were going by the sun) we got into a whirlpool and George was washed off. I hollered to him to swim ashore, but he went down and I never saw him again.

"After George was drowned I removed my trousers, tying them to the raft, so I would be able to swim in case I was washed off. I then tied a long rope to my waist, which was fastened to the raft, and I kept the rope around my waist until the twelfth day.

"About noon I passed the mouth of the Little Colorado River, where the water came into the canyon as red as could be, and just below that I struck a large whirlpool, and I was in the whirlpool about two hours or more before I got out.

"I floated on all that day, going over several rapids, and when night came I tied my raft to the rocks and climbed upon the rocks of the walls of the canyon to rest. I had nothing to eat on the fourth day.

"On the fifth day I started down the river again, going over four or five rapids, and when night came I rested on the walls again and still nothing to eat.

"On the sixth day I started down the river again, and I came to a little island in the middle of the river. There was a bush of mesquite beans on this island, and I got a handful of these beans and ate them. When night came I rested on the walls again.

"The seventh, eighth, ninth, and tenth days were uneventful, but still going continuously over rapids, and still nothing to eat. So I cut my knife scabbard into small pieces and swallowed them. During the entire trip I saw no fish or game of any kind.

"On the eleventh day I went over the big rapid. I saw it before I came to it, and laid down on my stomach and hung to the raft and let the raft go over the rapid, and after getting about 200 yards below the rapid I stopped and looked at a stream of water about as large as my body that was running through the solid rocks of the canyon about 75 feet above my head, and the clinging moss to the rocks made a beautiful sight. The beauty of it can not be described.

"On the twelfth day my raft got on some rocks and I could not get it off; so I waded onto a small island in the middle of the river. On this island there was an immense tree that had been lodged there. The sun was so hot I could not work, so I dug the earth out from under this tree and laid under it until the sun disappeared behind the cliffs. This was about noon. After resting there I got up and found five sticks about as big as my leg and took them down to the edge of the island below my raft. I then untied the rope from my raft and took the loose rope I had around my waist and tied these sticks together. I slept on this island all night.

"On the thirteenth day I started out again on my newly made raft (leaving the old raft on the rocks), thinking it was daylight; but it was moonlight, and I continued down the river until daylight. While floating in the moonlight I saw a pole sticking up between two large rocks, which I afterwards learned the Government had placed there some years before as the end of its journey.

The Grand Canyon!

I. Primary Expedition Narratives

"When daylight came I heard some one talking, and I hollered "hello," and they hollered "hello" back. I discovered then that they were Indians. Some of them came out to the raft and pulled me ashore. There were a lot on the bank, and I asked them if they were friendly, and they said they were, and I then asked them to give me something to eat, when they gave me a piece of mesquite bread. While I was talking to some of the Indians the others stole my half-ax and one of my revolvers, which were roped to the raft. They also tore my coat trying to take it from me.

"After eating the bread I got on my raft and floated until about 3 o'clock in the afternoon, when I came upon another band of Indians, and I went ashore and went into their camp. They did not have anything for me to eat, so I traded my other revolver and vest for a dog. They skinned the dog and gave me the two hind quarters and I ate one for supper, roasting it on the coals. The Indians being afraid of me, drove me out of their camp, and I rested on the bank of the river that night, and the next morning, the fourteenth day after I got on my raft, I started to eat the other quarter, but I dropped it in the water. I floated that day until 3 o'clock and landed at Callville, and a man came out and pulled me ashore.

"Jim Ferry or Perry (not sure as to the first letter of this name) was a mail agent at that place. He was also a correspondent for some newspaper in San Francisco. He took me in and fed me. When I landed all the clothing I had on my body was a coat and a shirt, and my flesh was all lacerated on my legs from my terrible experience and of getting on and off the raft and climbing on the rocks. My beard and hair were long and faded from the sun. I was so pale that even the Indians were afraid of me. I was nothing but skin and bones and so weak that I could hardly walk. Jim Ferry or Perry cared for me for three days, and the soldiers around there gave me clothing enough to cover my body.

"I was at Callville about four weeks, and a boat was there getting a load of salt, and I got on that boat and went to Fort Mojave. There I met Gen. Palmer and told him my story.

"From Fort Mojave I went to Callville again and there worked for Jim Ferry (or Perry), carrying the mail for three months between Callville and Fort Mojave. Then he sold out to Jim Hinton, and I carried mail for him for a month. He sold out, and we each bought a horse and pack animal and we started from Callville, going to Salt Lake in the spring of 1868. From Salt Lake City we went to Bear River. There we took a contract of getting out ties. Then I hired out as wagon boss. Then I quit and run a saloon. I sold out and then went to Omaha, Nebr. From there I went to Chicago, and from there to Kenosha, Wis., to visit my old home. That was in 1869. From Kenosha I went to Chicago, and from there to Leavenworth, Kans., and later to Kansas City, Kans. From there I went to Junction City, Kans., and then to Goose Creek. I drove stage in and out of Goose Creek for Barlow and Sanderson, for whom I had worked in Fort Dodge. I was transferred from Goose Creek to Fort Lyon or Five Mile Point. From there I went to Bent Canyon, Colo., and kept home station. From there I went to Bent Canyon, Colo., and kept home station. From there I went to Las Animas, Colo., and minor places, later drifting to Trinidad, where I have lived since 1878.

"These are the plain facts. There are many minor points that could be mentioned, but did not think it would be necessary to mention here. I have never been through that country since my experience, but have had a great desire to go over the same country again, but have never been financially able to take the trip.

"(Signed) JAMES WHITE"

Bass, William Wallace

- 44 1920 Adventures in the canyons of the Colorado by two of its earliest explorers, James White and W. W. Hawkins, with introduction and notes by William Wallace Bass, the Grand Canyon guide. (Foreword by George Wharton James.) Grand Canyon, Arizona: The authors, 38 pp. [Cover title: Adventures in the Canyons of the Colorado. William Wallace Bass.]

Regarding James White's putative journey in 1867 through Grand Canyon on the Colorado River, see pp. 32-34. White original letter and its envelope are illustrated.

"Personally, I have come to believe White's statements, and here wish to reproduce in facsimile a letter he wrote to his brother, dated Callville, September 26, 1867. Owing to the imperfections in spelling, punctuation, etc., I give a rendition (made by Mr. Dawson ) into correct English. [The corrected version does not appear in Dawson's memorandum (below).]

The Grand Canyon!

I. Primary Expedition Narratives

"NAVIGATION OF THE BIG CANON A TERRIBLE VOYAGE

Callville, September 26, 1867.

Dear brother :

It has been some time since I have heard from you. I got no answer from the last letter I wrote you, for I left soon after I wrote. I went prospecting with Captain Baker and George Stroll in the San Juan mountains. We found very good prospects, but nothing that would pay. Then we started down the San Juan River. We traveled down about 200 miles; then we crossed over on the Colorado and camped. We laid over one day. We found that we could not travel down the river, and our horses had sore feet. We had made up our minds to turn back when we were attacked by fifteen or twenty Ute Indians. They killed Baker, and George Stroll and myself took four ropes off our horses, an axe, ten pounds of flour and our guns. We had fifteen miles to walk to the Colorado. We got to the river just at night. We built a raft that night. We sailed all that night. We had good sailing for three days ; the fourth day George Stroll was washed off the raft and drowned, and that left me alone. I thought that it would be my time next. I then pulled off my pants and boots. I then tied a rope to my waist. I went over falls from ten to fifteen feet high. My raft would tip over three or four times a day. The third day we lost our flour, and for seven days I had nothing to eat except a raw-hide knife cover. The eighth day I got some mesquite beans. The thirteenth day I met a party of friendly Indians. They would not give me anything to eat, so I gave them my pistol for the hind parts of a dog. I had one of them for supper and the other for breakfast. The sixteenth day I arrived at Callville, where I was taken care of by James Ferry. I was ten days without pants or boots or hat. I was sun-burnt so I could hardly walk. The Indians took seven head of horses from us. I wish I could write you half I underwent. I saw the hardest time that any man ever did in the world, but thank God that I got through it safe. I am well again, and I hope these few lines will find you all well. I send my best respects to all. Josh, answer this when you get it. Direct your letter to Callville, Arizona. Ask Tom to answer that letter I wrote him several years ago.

JAMES WHITE."

Dawson, Thomas Fulton

- 45        2001        The Grand Canyon : an article giving the credit of first traversing the Grand Canyon of the Colorado to James White, a Colorado gold prospector, who it is claimed made the voyage two years previous to the expedition under the direction of Maj. J. W. Powell in 1869. Phoenix: Five Quail Books, 67 [76] pp. [including wraps]. [First printing.]

Facsimile reprint of Dawson (1917), "with the addition of a bibliography of books, periodicals, newspapers, and unpublished works." Page [76] (rear wrap) notes: "Reprint by [colophon] Five Quail Books[,] Phoenix, Arizona[,] with the addition of a bibliography of books, periodicals, newspapers, and unpublished works. September 2001[.] 150 copies in wraps[,] 50 copies in boards[.] A special thank you to our friends for their assistance." [Note: All but one of the stock in boards, plus five additional in slipcases, was lost to theft before distribution (see the publisher's "Addendum" laid in with the 2nd printing [Dawson, 2002]). With the exception of a single copy in boards held by the publisher, surviving copies of this first printing will only be with self-wraps, side-stapled.]

Dawson, Thomas Fulton

- 46        2002        The Grand Canyon : an article giving the credit of first traversing the Grand Canyon of the Colorado to James White, a Colorado gold prospector, who it is claimed made the voyage two years previous to the expedition under the direction of Maj. J. W. Powell in 1869. Prescott, Arizona: Five Quail Books, 2nd printing, 67 [81] pp. [2nd printing varies from the 1st.]

Facsimile reprint of Dawson (1917), "with the addition of a bibliography of books, periodicals, newspapers, and unpublished works." Dated November 2002. "25 copies in boards, 5 copies in slipcase" [dark green buckram boards and slipcases green]. Includes facsimile reprinting, on one folded leaf tipped in at rear, of the article by C. C. Parry (1868): "Account of the passage through the Great Cañon of the Colorado of the West, from above

The Grand Canyon!

I. Primary Expedition Narratives

the mouth of Green River to the head of steamboat navigation at Callville, in the months of August and September, 1867, by James White, now living at Callville. Reported January 6, 1868, to J. D. Perry, Esq., Pres't of the Union Pacific Railway, Eastern Division, by C. C. Parry, Ass't Geologist, U. P. R. Surv.", published in Academy of Science of St. Louis, Transactions, 2 (April): 499-503 (Parry, 1868). Note: This 2nd printing was issued with publisher's "Addendum" (1 leaf, verso blank, laid loose), which states: "This is the second printing of Dawson's 1917 Senate Document No. 42 in hardback by Five Quail Books. The first printing, fifty copies in black buckram plus five in slipcases, were stolen; only one copy survived. The others have not been found as of this date and are presumed to have been destroyed. The first printing lacked the tipped in The Transactions of the St. Louis Academy of Science item and had not been numbered or signed. This new printing has additions to the bibliography plus this addendum." The Addendum leaf also includes additional bibliographical citations. The 2nd printing in boards is bound in dark green buckram, with matching slipcase for those so distributed. All copies are signed "Dan Cassidy" (of Five Quail Books). (1st printing, Phoenix [see Dawson, 2001]; 2nd printing [this citation], Prescott.)

---

Contemporary Publications Noting the James White Affair

Anonymous

- 47 1868 The Colorado River. The Circular (Oneida, New York), 5(11) (June 1): 87-88. [Credited to American Examiner and Review.]
- 48 1869 Voyage through the Grand Canon of Colorado [sic]. In: Reviews [SECTION]. American Naturalist, 2(12) (February): 655-656.
- An abstract of a portion of the item by C. C. Parry (1868).
- 49 1869 A romantic voyage. The Round Table (New York), 9(217) (March 20): 180-181.
- Refers to "narrow canyons" of western rivers and concludes with remarks on the James White affair.
- "These fissures have not been scooped out by the watercourses, but are apparently the result of some titanic convulsion of nature which has rent the mountains asunder, and made a highway for the rivers to pass through. Of all these remarkable natural curiosities none exceeds in grandeur or extent the great Canyon of the Colorado, a region as little known to science as the interior of Africa, or the neighborhood of the North Pole. * * *
- "On our best maps much of its [the Colorado River's] route is still a blank space; but a scientific party, mostly young men from Illinois, headed by professor Powell, is now on an exploring expedition, partly to enlarge their knowledge and recruit their health, but mainly to solve the mystery of the Upper Colorado and its wonderful canyon, by attempting to pass through it in boats or rafts—a passage which has as yet only been successfully accomplished by one man, whose adventures in the gorge form one of the most fascinating stories of peril and hair-breadth escapes we ever remember reading."
- 50 1869 Passage of the great canon of the Colorado. Brooklyn Monthly, 1(2) (April): 157-163.
- 51 1869 Eine Fahrt durch die Grosse Felsenschlucht des westlichen Colorado. Mittheilungen aus Justus Perthes' Geographischer Anstalt über Wichtige Neue Erforschungen auf dem Gesamtgebiete der Geographie von Dr. A. Petermann [Petermanns Geographische Mittheilungen], 15: 19-21. [In German.]
- (transl. 'A ride through the Great Canyon of the western Colorado'; i.e., Colorado River of the West.)
- An abstract of the item by C. C. Parry (1868).

The Grand Canyon!

I. Primary Expedition Narratives

- 52 1869 Ueber eine Flossfahrt durch den grossen Cañon des Colorado. Gaea—Natur und Leben (Köln), 5: 317. [In German.]
(transl. 'About a raft trip through the great canyon of the Colorado.')
- 53 1869 Floßfahrt auf dem Großen Colorado des Westens. From: Revue der Erd- und Völkerkunde. In: Chronik der Gegenwart [SECTION]. Unsere Zeit (Deutsche Revue der Gegenwart), New Series, 5(1): 633-639. [Item title from contents page, p. 955.] [In German.]
(transl. 'Raft down the Great Colorado of the West.')
- A significant portion relates to the James White affair. Information is credited to "Major Calhoun" [Alfred R. Calhoun] of the Corps of Engineers. The Powell expedition is not mentioned. Also notes that the Colorado River rises in Idaho.
- 54 1869 Half a mile below ground. Thrilling adventure of a party in the great canon of the Colorado. The Christian Pioneer (London), 23: 101-103.
- 55 1870 A drift for life. All the Year Round, New Series, (58) (January 8): 132-135.
- 56 1870 A drift for life. Littell's Living Age, Series 4, 16 (February 12) (1341): 424-427.
Credited to "From 'All the Year Round.'" (see above).
- 57 1870 Eine Floßfahrt auf dem großen Colorado. In: Feuilleton [SECTION]. Troppauer Zeitung (Troppau, Austrian Silesia), 1870(52) (March 4): [2]-[3], (53) (March 4): [3], (54) (March 7): [3]-[4], (55) (March 8): [3]. [In German.]
(transl. 'A raft trip on the great Colorado.')
- Note on the imprint:* Troppau is the German name for Opava, which in 1870 was a part of Austrian Silesia; today it is Opava, Czech Republic.
- 58 1870 A drift for life. Friends' Intelligencer (Philadelphia), 27(11) (May 14): 170-172, (12) (May 21): 189-190.
Credited to "From 'All the Year Round.'" (i.e., Anonymous, 1870).
- 59 1870 Adrift for life [sic]. The Gentleman's Journal (London), 1(34) (June 1): 539-540. [Note that issue numbers 1(31)-1(34) all are dated June 1.]
- 60 1871 Ein Passionsfahrt durch die Unterwelt. Klagenfurter Tagespost (Klagenfurt, Austria), 1871(36) (May 1): [1]-[2]. [In German.]
(transl. 'A romantic ride through the underworld.')
- 61 1871 Eine entsetzliche Fahrt. Roman-Magazin des Auslandes (Berlin), 5 (2nd Quarter): 236-239. [In German.]
(transl. 'A horrible ride.')
- 62 NO DATE A drift for life. [London and Brighton]: Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge, 15 pp. (Penny Series of Popular Tales.) [1890.]
- 63 1892 A drift for life. Ballou's Monthly Magazine, 77(2) (August) (452): 143-145.
- 64 1907 The story of James White; first explorer of the Grand Cañon. In: Outdoor Men and Women [SECTION]. Outing Magazine, 50(1) (April): 46-49.

Includes transcription and facsimile reproduction of James White's letter, pp. 48-49.

The Grand Canyon!

I. Primary Expedition Narratives

- 65 1916 First explorer of Grand Canon living. In: Cabinet of Miscellaneous Information [SECTION]. The Mining American (Denver), 72(1772) (January 29): 4.
- "James White, the Colorado pioneer, who in 1867 made a voyage on a raft through the Grand Canon of the Colorado, about two years before its exploration by Maj. J. W. Powell, is still living and now resides at Trinidad, Colorado."
- 66 1918 Through Grand Canyon on a raft. In: Field Sports, Motors, and Travel [SECTION; Elon H. Jessup, ed.]. Outing, 72(2) (May): 128, 130.
- Includes excerpts from U.S. Senate Document 42 (see Dawson, 1917).
- 67 1920 Grand Canyon National Park. The Golden West (Los Angeles), 1(24) (May 15): 7.
- Dedication of the national park. Item includes a transcription of the James White letter regarding his putative 1867 trip down Colorado River through Grand Canyon.
- Bates, H. W.
- 68 1870 (ED.) Illustrated travels : a record of discovery, geography, and adventure. London: Cassell, Petter, and Galpin, 378 pp.
- Includes notice of the James White affair.
- Bell, William A.
- 69 1869 New tracks in North America. A journal of travel and adventure whilst engaged in a survey for a southern railroad to the Pacific Ocean during 1867-8. London: Chapman and Hall, 2 volumes, lxi, 236 pp., 322 pp., map.
- True 1st ed. See Volume I, "Passage of the Great Cañon of the Colorado by James White, the Prospector", pp. 199-217.
- 70 1869 New tracks in North America. A journal of travel and adventure whilst engaged in a survey for a southern railroad to the Pacific Ocean during 1867-8. London: Chapman and Hall, and New York: Scribner, Welford and Co., 2 volumes, lxi, 236 pp., 322 pp., map.
- See in Volume I, "Passage of the Great Cañon of the Colorado by James White, the Prospector", pp. 199-217.
- Calhoun, Alfred R.
- 71 NO DATE Passage of the great cañon of the Colorado. In: Wonderful adventures : a series of narratives of personal experiences among the native tribes of America. London, Paris, and New York: Cassell, Petter, Galpin and Co., pp. 3-24. [Bottom of p. 313: "Cassell, Petter, Galpin & Co., Belle Sauvage Works, London, E.C."] [Also noted with printer's notations, "20,191" and "30,388".]
- 72 NO DATE Passage of the great cañon of the Colorado. In: Wonderful adventures : a series of narratives of personal experiences among the native tribes of America. Philadelphia: William B. Evans and Co., pp. 3-24.
- 73 NO DATE Passage of the great cañon of the Colorado. In: Wonderful adventures : a series of narratives of personal experiences among the native tribes of America. Philadelphia: William B. Evans and Co., 2nd ed., pp. 3-24.
- 74 1874 Passage of the great cañon of the Colorado. In: Wonderful adventures : a series of narratives of personal experiences among the native tribes of America. Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott and Co.,

The Grand Canyon!

I. Primary Expedition Narratives

2nd ed., pp. 3-24. [Bottom of p. 313: "Cassell, Petter & Galpin, Belle Sauvage Works, London, E.C. 373".]

Campbell, J. F. [Campbell, John Francis]

- 75 1876 My circular notes. Extracts from journals, letters sent home, geological and other notes, written while travelling westwards round the world, from July 6, 1874, to July 6, 1875. Vol. II. London: Macmillan and Co., 331 pp.

See pp. 255-257. Refers, p. 256, to the James White affair (but not by name) and without note of Powell: "After flowing more than 600 miles through a very dry country, the waters escape from the mountains into Californian plains through a winding cañon, which is said to be 6,000 feet deep, and little wider than the water way. I have not seen this Grand Cañon, but I have spoken with many who have explored it as far as they could get. They say that it would be as possible to shoot Niagara and live, as to descend the Colorado." [with associated footnote:] "A book has been published in which a circumstantial account of the descent of the Colorado by a miner on a raft. Certain recorded events appeared inconsistent with each other, and I suppose that the story is mythical."

Clerke, John [pseudonym] [Beggs, William J.]

- 76 1868 A terrible voyage. Lippincott's Magazine, 2 (December): 588-594.
Author is indicated in volume contents, p. 4.

Findlay, Alexander George

- 77 1870 A directory for the navigation of the North Pacific Ocean : with descriptions of its coasts, islands, etc., from Panama to Behring Strait and Japan, its winds, currents, and passages. Second edition. London: for Richard Holmes Laurie, 1,007 [1,008] pp. [Cover title: North Pacific Directory.]

See "The Rio Colorado", pp. 131-133. Includes note of "that most wonderful natural phenomenon—the Grand Cañon", which is "quite useless to man"; with a footnote mentioning the James White affair.

Hood, J. E.

- 78 1869 Lost and found in the Rocky Mountains. The Western Monthly (Chicago), 2(7) (July): 11-20. [Also reprinted Garland Publishing (New York, 1976), Garland Library of Narratives of North American Indian Captivities, Volume 81].]

Recounting of a raft trip by "Karl" (pseudonym) on the Colorado River through Grand Canyon, prior to the supposed trip by James White. In all probability fictional, if not also an attempt to usurp the White story.

Hyatt, Alpheus

- 79 1868 The chasms of the Colorado. St. Louis Medical Reporter, 3(16) (November 1): 526-533.

From The American Naturalist, "with some additions" that include notice of the James White affair as reported in the Transactions of the St. Louis Academy of Sciences, vol. 2 (April 1868). The original American Naturalist article, also by Hyatt, features the canyons of the lower Colorado, not the Grand Canyon.

The Grand Canyon!

I. Primary Expedition Narratives

Possible Knock-off

Moss, John

- 80 1877 Through the Grand Canyon on a raft. Weekly Arizona Miner (Prescott, Arizona), (Supplement), 14(18) (April 20): [1], (May 4):.

With editor's introductory paragraph, followed by a first-person retelling of a solo raft trip in Summer 1861 through Grand Canyon, in four days to Fort Mohave on the lower Colorado River. Although written in the first person, it begins with a parenthetical "(said Captain Moss to his listener)". Fiction, of course, but listed here inasmuch as are also all accounts of James White's descent of the river in 1867.

---

Historical Overviews and Discussions

Anonymous

- 81 2017 [Photo.] Greg Adams, the great-grandson of James White, celebrating the 150th anniversary of James White being plucked from the river near Callville, Utah, having presumably floated through the Canyon two years before John Wesley Powell. Greg is on his replica of White's boat, which he built at the GTS. Boatman's Quarterly Review, 30(2) (Summer): 48

Actually a four-log raft. GTS: Guides Training Seminar.

Adams, Eilean

- 82 2001 Hell or high water : James White's disputed passage through Grand Canyon, 1867. Logan, Utah: Utah State University Press, 220 pp.

The author is a granddaughter of James White.

Bulger, Harold A.

- 83 1961 First man through the Grand Canyon. Missouri Historical Society, Bulletin, 17(4) (Part 1) (July): 321-331.

James White affair.

Davis, William Morris

- 84 1919 The alleged journey of James White through the Grand Canyon in 1867. Geographical Review, 8: 355-356.

Dawson, Thomas Fulton

- 85 1919 More light on James White's trip through the Grand Canyon. The Trail (Society of Sons of Colorado), 11(9) (February): 5-14.

Dimock, Brad

- 86 2008 The James White debate. In: Berger, Todd R. (ed.), Reflections of Grand Canyon historians; ideas, arguments, and first-person accounts. Grand Canyon Association, Monograph 14, pp. 123-124. (2nd Grand Canyon History Symposium, January 25-28, 2007, Grand Canyon National Park.)

The Grand Canyon!

I. Primary Expedition Narratives

- 87 2008 The case for James White's raft trip through Grand Canyon: The story of White's story. In: Berger, Todd R. (ed.), Reflections of Grand Canyon historians; ideas, arguments, and first-person accounts. Grand Canyon Association, Monograph 14, pp. 131-136. (2nd Grand Canyon History Symposium, January 25-28, 2007, Grand Canyon National Park.)

See Myers (2008) for a complementary overview disfavoring the White account.

Farquhar, Francis P.

- 88 1950 Did James White precede Major Powell through the Grand Canyon? In: Kipp, J. B., The Colorado River. Los Angeles: private press of Muir Dawson, pp. i-vi.

Hale, Nathan

- 89 2019 Major Impossible. New York: Amulet (Harry N. Abrams, Inc.), 127 [128] pp. (Nathan Hale's Hazardous Tales.) [Cover includes sticker: "NHHT A Grand Canyon Tale".] [Hardbound. Comic book format.]

Regarding the Powell Expedition of 1869, with historical flashbacks in Powell's life. Adds (pp. 124-125) "Navigation of the Big Canon: A Terrible Voyage. The perilous journey of James White—in his own words and spelling" (also in comic book format); and (pp. 126-127) black-and-white reproductions of watercolor art made by the author during Colorado River trips in Grand Canyon.

Jones, Calico

- 90 1967 First through the Grand Canyon. Real West, 10 (May): 27-29, 72-74.
James White affair.

Kipp, J. B.

- 91 1950 The Colorado River. Los Angeles: private press of Muir Dawson, [iii], vi, 7, [i] pp. ("180 copies printed at the private Press of Muir Dawson. 45 in wrappers for presentation and 135 in boards for sale. June, 1950[.]")

Regarding the James White affair, a communication by Kipp from Hardyville, September 10, 1867, contributed by "Mr. Wolff, of Wolff & Folks" of San Bernardino, California. Text originally printed in The San Bernardino Guardian, September 21, 1867. Introduction for the Muir Dawson printing by Francis P. Farquhar. Guidon (1969, p. 43), and Five Quail Books—West, Catalogue 13, indicate pagination vi, 7, [3]. Rose's (1984) unpublished listing of Colorado Plateau holdings in Grand Canyon National Park Research Library indicates that this volume was published in Los Angeles, by the author, containing 16 pp. Full collation from a hardbound copy as follows by Spamer: [flyleaf]; [blank leaf]; [iii], [iv] blank; Farquhar introduction, i-vi; Kipp text title, [verso blank]; Kipp text 1-7, [8 blank]; Bibliography title, [verso blank]; Bibliography [iii] pp., [iv] blank; [production information, [i], verso blank], [blank leaf], [flyleaf].

Lingenfelter, Richard E.

- 92 1958 First through the Grand Canyon. (Foreword by Otis Marston.) Los Angeles: Glen Dawson, 119 pp. (Early California Travels Series, 45.) ("300 copies composed and printed by Paul Bailey at his Westernlore Press Bound at the Silverlake Bindery".)

Supports the claim that the James White affair is truthful.

Myers, Tom [Myers, Thomas M.]

- 93 2008 Why James White's 1867 raft trip doesn't float—at least through Grand Canyon. In: Berger, Todd R. (ed.), Reflections of Grand Canyon historians; ideas, arguments, and first-person accounts.

The Grand Canyon!

I. Primary Expedition Narratives

Grand Canyon Association, Monograph 14, pp. 125-129. (2nd Grand Canyon History Symposium, January 25-28, 2007, Grand Canyon National Park.)

See Dimock (2008) for a complementary overview favoring the White account.

Simmons, Virginia McConnell

- 94            2007        Drifting West : the calamities of James White and Charles Baker. Boulder, Colorado: University Press of Colorado, 210 pp.

Smith, Brad

- 95            2001        First to journey through the Grand Canyon: the life story of James White. Cochise, Arizona: Brad Smith, 28 pp. ["First edition. First printing. Limited to 100 signed and numbered copies."]

Stanton, Robert Brewster

- 96            1919        The alleged journey, and the real journey of James White, on the Colorado River, in 1861 [sic]. The Trail (Society of Sons of Colorado), 12(4) (September): 5-26.

The text does refer to the correct year, 1867.

- 97            1932        Colorado River controversies. By Robert Brewster Stanton (1846-1922). Edited by James M. Chalfant. Foreword by Julius F. Stone, author of "Canyon Country". New York: Dodd, Mead and Co., 232 pp.

- 98            1982        Colorado River controversies. (James M. Chalfant, ed.; foreword by Julius F. Stone.) Boulder City, Nevada: Westwater Books, 261 pp.

Volume is facsimile reprint of Stanton (1932), with added commentaries by Otis R. Marston and Martin J. Anderson.

---

The Grand Canyon!
I. Primary Expedition Narratives

1869–1872

Colorado River Exploring Expeditions
Conducted by John Wesley Powell
Under the Direction of the Smithsonian Institution

JOHN WESLEY POWELL is undisputably the lead pioneer of organized Colorado River expeditions through the Grand Canyon; and despite some back-and-forth commentary over the years, he did not “name” the canyon but he surely made it “stick”. He did better even than J. C. Ives and his artists to make this happen. And the newspapers and other periodicals across the land and in Europe reported on Powell’s anticipated exploration as well as occasional updates once it was under way—even if a few reports of disaster were sensationally faked. The reading public ate it up. Despite the eagerness of reporters and editors, Powell was a master of self-promotion. His account of the 1869 expedition from Green River, Wyoming, to the mouth of the Virgin River has been so worn out by contemporary writers, by historians to this day, and by anthologists and quoters galore, that one may wonder what is the purpose in going through it again.

What appears here from Powell is in context with the hundreds of other writers who had to tell about their encounters with the Grand Canyon. Although he had to be prodded at first to produce a formal report of his exploits, he did not fall in among the numerous others who wrote of their experiences but, if they had been read at all, were forgotten. Writers of museum signage and historical markers cull from Powell the same lines for public edification, and pull the same illustrations from his publications, to tell again and again the same story, updated in some showy or meaningful way to make it seem like it’s not the same old story again. Just how many times can we be bidden to enter the “Great Unknown”? Well, in fact, Richard D. Quartaroli has pointed out that Powell did not even come up with the term:

This is one part of many classic quotes from Major John Wesley Powell, often recited on Grand Canyon river trips as boaters pass the junction of the Little Colorado River tributary with the main Colorado River. Powell wrote this about his 1869 river expedition in an 1875 official report to the U.S. Congress, via Professor Joseph Henry of the Smithsonian Institution, June 16, 1874.

The Grand Canyon!

I. Primary Expedition Narratives

This is not a Powell journal entry, and neither he nor his crew mention the term “Great Unknown.” In fact, Powell did not coin the term. It is unknown who did, but it appeared in an unattributed front-page newspaper article in The Cheyenne Leader the day after Powell and his nine men launched four boats on the Green River, from Green River City, on May 24, 1869. Powell “has started out with the view to exploring, if possible, the great Colorado river. The undertaking is a risky and dangerous one, in view of the fact that each attempt to penetrate the great unknown has proved a failure.”<sup>4</sup>

And so long as we’re at it, since Powell did not name the Grand Canyon (despite insistent repetitions to this wayward attribution, even today), who did name it? Just as with the too-famous “Great Unknown” quote, we, frustratingly, don’t know. Powell is peculiarly cursed, giving him credits where none are due, yet the beliefs continue. The “Grand Canyon” name, as applied to Arizona’s great chasm, first appeared in print in the summer of 1857, in a book published in Philadelphia, ironically just two miles from the place where at that very time J. C. Ives’ steamboat Explorer was being built. But the author, statistician and physical scientist Lorin Blodget, seems to have used the name in passing; he did not say it was his own, nor gave credit for it. Yet there it is, “Grand Canyon” a dozen years before Powell’s first expedition on the Colorado, and even before Ives set out for that river.<sup>5</sup>

Powell in every way—in the Grand Canyon–Colorado River literature at least—has always been bigger than life. He was a courageous explorer in his day—they all said so—and he was a military hero, working now with but one hand, which only on occasion was a hindrance. (There are the innumerable quotations from his book about him dangling by one

---

<sup>4</sup> Richard D. Quartaroli, “John Wesley Powell and crew’s 1869 Grand Canyon river mapping: What did they know and when did they know it?” [abstract]. Mapping Grand Canyon Conference : February 28-March 1, 2019 : Arizona State University, Tempe [Arizona State University, Tempe], p. 16. [Note: At the time of presentation the title had been changed to “The Great Unknown” of river mapping: What did Powell and the 1869 crew know and when did they know it?” Video recordings of each presentation at this conference were posted online at this website: <https://lib.asu.edu/mapping-grandcanyon-conference/program> (March 2019). The quotation here is taken from Quartaroli’s written draft for another presentation. Quartaroli credits a personal communication from Don Lago for the original information.

The Cheyenne Leader, Tuesday, May 25, 1869 (Vol. 11, no. 213), p. 1, column 1; accessed by Quartaroli online at Wyoming Digital Newspaper Collection, March 18, 2021.

<sup>5</sup> Lorin Blodget, Climatology of the United States, and of the Temperate Latitudes of the North American Continent (J. B. Lippincott and Co., Philadelphia, and Trübner and Co., London, 1857). [Regarding “Grand Canyon” see pp. 92, 97 footnote.]

Earle Spamer, “Once again, ‘Who named the Grand Canyon?’—and other obscure Grand Canyon ‘firsts’”, The Ol’ Pioneer (Journal of the Grand Canyon Historical Society), 24(2)(Spring 2013): 4-16.

Spamer, “Connections: It’s always who you know and what you hear” (American Philosophical Society, Philadelphia, online blog, April 20, 2018; <https://www.amphilsoc.org/blog/connections-its-always-who-you-know-and-what-you-hear>).

Spamer, “Big Canyon, Great Canyon, Grand Canyon: The mysterious evolution of a name”, The Ol’ Pioneer (Journal of the Grand Canyon Historical Society), 33(1)(Winter 2022): 8-18.

The Grand Canyon!

I. Primary Expedition Narratives

arm and being hoisted up by the drawers removed from a companion—which is not quoted herein because the event took place in Desolation Canyon on the Green River in Utah; but there is still yet another story of dangling, “suspended 400 feet above the river” he said, that is quoted because this time it happened as a Grand Canyon experience.)

Hopefully, by placing Powell’s “famous” words in the context of their full surroundings, both within Powell’s work and among others, one may gain a greater appreciation for the reasons he stands out, without so much genuflection.

John Wesley Powell 1869–1872

It should come as no surprise that by far the greatest number of Grand Canyon expedition accounts are those from, or about, the expeditions conducted by John Wesley Powell in 1869 and in 1871–1872. Whereas earlier accounts of the Grand Canyon are “historic”, it is Powell who first brought the canyon into the public domain. He did not “name it”, of course, but if there is any one person who made it famous, it is he. With healthy doses of embellished adventure, his narrative (as if it were a single expedition, that one of 1869) encouraged a broad appreciation for the daring river trip(s), which only later encouraged others to follow suit. Little could Powell have imagined what “river running” would become—with hundreds, no less, who would realize livelihoods running the Colorado River—or what personal adventures would be experienced and retold by the now more than a million everyday people who have run through Grand Canyon, to each of whom the Colorado would be “theirs”.

Many parts of Powell’s (1875) published government report of his expeditions (written as if it were the journal of his 1869 trip down the Green and Colorado Rivers, although it was written years after the expeditions, with great embellishment), but moreso his more elaborately produced commercial version of 1895, have been reprinted and widely extracted from for use in many venues, especially for the popular-reading market. A few passages have been reprinted to death, and longer passages shoved into anthologies; but even so, much will be transcribed herein so as to highlight the great adventures and anxieties of the river trip, and to maintain the volume’s comprehensive provision for providing everything in one place.

Powell, John Wesley

- 99      1875      Exploration of the Colorado River of the West and its tributaries. Explored in 1869, 1870, 1871, and 1872, under the direction of the Secretary of the Smithsonian Institution. Washington, D.C.: U.S. Government Printing Office, 291 pp., map and river profile on two sheets laid in. [U.S. 43rd Congress, 1st Session, House Miscellaneous Document 300, Serial 1622.]

This volume is traditionally cited as by Powell. Powell’s name is not on the title-page, but it appears on the next leaf, p. [III], “Report of J. W. Powell”, with the report following on pp. [i]-xi, 1-214 (p. [i] is a letter of transmittal from Joseph Henry to J. G. Blaine, Speaker of the House of Representatives). Chapter 10 (pp. 133-145) is “Report on a trip to the mouth of the Dirty Devil River”, by A[Imon]. H[arris]. Thompson, which is extralimital to the region covered by this bibliography. “Part Third, Zoology” (pp. 215-285), by Elliott Coues, contains two papers related only partly to the Colorado River region, and a third paper communicated to Coues by G. Brown Goode, “Notes on the ‘Salamander’ of Florida (Geomys tuza)”, which is not pertinent to this bibliography or to Powell’s expedition.

The Grand Canyon!

I. Primary Expedition Narratives

Two sheets are laid in: 1) map, "Green River from the Union Pacific Rail Road to the Mouth of White River. 1873" (scale 1 inch = 4 miles) (extralimital to the region covered by this bibliography); 2) "Profile of the Green River and Colorado River of the West From the crossing of the U.P.R.R. to the mouth of the Colorado, compared with the Profile of the Ohio and Mississippi Rivers From Pittsburg to Vicksburg" (horizontal scale 1 inch = 40 miles, vertical scale 1 inch = 2000 feet).

Poore, p. 1021, gives a publication date of June 16, 1874, which is two days earlier than Henry's letter of transmitted and which may be the date ordered to be printed. [Poore, Benjamin Perley, A Descriptive Catalogue of the Government Publications of the United States, September 5, 1774-March 4, 1881 (Washington, D.C.: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1885; U.S. 48th Congress, 2nd Session, Senate Miscellaneous Document 67.)]

Powell's prefatory remarks offer some set-up for his expedition (pp. 6-7):

"These cañon gorges, obstructing cliffs and desert wastes, have prevented the traveler from penetrating the country, so that, until the Colorado River Exploring Expedition was organized, it was almost unknown. Yet enough had been seen to foment rumor, and many wonderful stories have been told in the hunter's cabin and prospector's camp. Stories were related of parties entering the gorge in boats, and being carried down with fearful velocity into whirlpools, where all were overwhelmed in the abyss of waters; others, of underground passages for the great river, into which boats had passed never to be seen again. It was currently believed that the river was lost under the rocks for several hundred miles. There were other accounts of great falls, whose roaring music could be heard on the distant mountain-summits. There were many stories current of parties wandering on the brink of the cañon, vainly endeavoring to reach the waters below, and perishing with thirst at last in sight of the river which was roaring its mockery into dying ears. • • •

"More than once have I been warned by the Indians not to enter this cañon. They considered it disobedience to the gods and contempt for their authority, and believed that it would surely bring upon me their wrath."

We pick up Powell's story as the expedition arrives in the Grand Canyon, at the confluence of the Little Colorado River (pp. 78-79). This was always considered a key point for establishing the geography of the Southwest, which required a precise understanding of its latitude and longitude (though longitude was not too accurately determined with the instrumentation available). This point had not been attained by any of the earlier exploring expeditions in the region (that did not reach the canyon), including J. C. Ives' expedition in 1858 (that did reach the canyon near Diamond Creek, far to the west). No record exists of Western people having ever been to the confluence, even on the rim overlooking it. If James White's saga really had him passing by here on his makeshift raft in 1867—his drift for life—he was in no sense able to provide a reliable description.

"August 10.—Walls still higher; water, swift again. We pass several broad, ragged cañons on our right, and up through these we catch glimpses of a forest clad plateau, miles away to the west.

"At two o'clock, we reach the mouth of the Colorado Chiquito. This stream enters through a cañon, on a scale quite as grand as that of the Colorado itself. It is a very small river, and exceedingly muddy and salt. I walk up the stream three or four miles, this afternoon, crossing and recrossing where I can easily wade it. Then I climb several hundred feet at one place, and can see up the chasm, through which the river runs, for several miles. On my way back, I kill two rattlesnakes, and find, on my arrival, that another one has been killed just at camp.

"August 11.—We remain at this point to day for the purpose of determining the latitude and longitude, measuring the height of the walls, drying our rations, and repairing our boats.

"Captain [Walter] Powell, early in the morning, takes a barometer, and goes out to climb a point between the two rivers.

"I walk down the gorge to the left at the foot of the cliff, climb to a bench, and discover a trail, deeply worn in the rock. Where it crosses the side gulches, in some places, steps have been cut. I can see no evidence of its having been traveled for a long time. It was doubtless a path used by the people who inhabited this country anterior to the present Indian races—the people who built the communal houses, of which mention has been made.

The Grand Canyon!

I. Primary Expedition Narratives

"I return to camp about three o'clock, and find that some of the men have discovered ruins, and many fragments of pottery; also etchings and hieroglyphics on the rocks.

"We find, to night, on comparing the readings of the barometers, that the walls are about three thousand feet high—more than half a mile—an altitude difficult to appreciate from a mere statement of feet. The ascent is made, not by a slope such as is usually found in climbing a mountain, but is much more abrupt—often vertical for many hundreds of feet—so that the impression is that we are at great depths; and we look up to see but a little patch of sky.

"Between the two streams, above the Colorado Chiquito, in some places the rocks are broken and shelving for six or seven hundred feet; then there is a sloping terrace, which can only be climbed by finding some way up a gulch; then, another terrace, and back, still another cliff. The summit of the cliff is three thousand feet above the river, as our barometers attest.

"August 12.—The rocks above camp are rust colored sandstones and conglomerates. Some are very hard; others quite soft. These all lie nearly horizontal, and the beds of softer material have been washed out, and left the harder, thus forming a series of shelves. Long lines of these are seen, of varying thickness, from one or two to twenty or thirty feet, and the spaces between have the same variability. This morning, I spend two or three hours in climbing among these shelves, and then I pass above them, and go up a long slope, to the foot of the cliff, and try to discover some way by which I can reach the top of the wall; but I find my progress cut off by an amphitheater. Then, I wander away around to the left, up a little gulch, and along benches, and climb, from time to time, until I reach an altitude of nearly two thousand feet, and can get no higher. From this point, I can look off to the west, up side cañons of the Colorado, and see the edge of a great plateau, from which streams run down into the Colorado, and deep gulches, in the escarpment which faces us, continued by cañons, ragged and flaring, and set with cliffs and towering crags, down to the river. I can see far up Marble Cañon, to long lines of chocolate colored cliffs, and above these, the Vermilion Cliffs. I can see, also, up the Colorado Chiquito, through a very ragged and broken cañon, with sharp salients set out from the walls on either side, their points overlapping, so that a huge tooth of marble, on one side, seems to be set between two teeth on the opposite; and I can also get glimpses of walls, standing away back from the river, while over my head are mural escarpments, not possible to be scaled."

Powell's next chapter, "The Grand Cañon of the Colorado" (pp. 80-105), is the source for much of the material that is quoted to this day.

"August 13.—We are now ready to start on our way down the Great Unknown. Our boats, tied to a common stake, are chafing each other, as they are tossed by the fretful river. They ride high and buoyant, for their loads are lighter than we could desire. We have but a month's rations remaining. The flour has been resifted through the mosquito net sieve; the spoiled bacon has been dried, and the worst of it boiled; the few pounds of dried apples have been spread in the sun, and reshrunken to their normal bulk; the sugar has all melted, and gone on its way down the river; but we have a large sack of coffee. The lighting of the boats has this advantage: they will ride the waves better, and we shall have but little to carry when we make a portage.

"We are three quarters of a mile in the depths of the earth, and the great river shrinks into insignificance, as it dashes its angry waves against the walls and cliffs, that rise to the world above; they are but puny ripples, and we but pigmies, running up and down the sands, or lost among the boulders.

"We have an unknown distance yet to run; an unknown river yet to explore. What falls there are, we know not; what rocks beset the channel, we know not; what walls rise over the river, we know not. Ah, well! we may conjecture many things. The men talk as cheerfully as ever; jests are bandied about freely this morning; but to me the cheer is somber and the jests are ghastly.

"With some eagerness, and some anxiety, and some misgiving, we enter the cañon below, and are carried along by the swift water through walls which rise from its very edge. They have the same structure as we noticed yesterday—tiers of irregular shelves below, and, above these, steep slopes to the foot of marble cliffs. We run six miles in a little more than half an hour, and emerge into a more open portion of the cañon, where high hills and ledges of rock intervene between the river and the distant walls. [They arrive at Hance Rapid.] Just at the head of this open place the river runs across a dike: that is, a fissure in the rocks, open to depths below, has been filled with eruptive matter, and this, on cooling, was harder than the rocks through which the crevice was made, and, when these were washed away, the harder volcanic matter remained as a wall, and the river has cut a gate-way through it several hundred feet high, and as many wide. As it crosses the wall, there is a fall below, and a bad rapid, filled with boulders of trap; so we stop to make a portage. Then on we go, gliding by hills and ledges, with distant walls in view; sweeping past sharp angles of rock; stopping at a few points to examine rapids, which we find can be run, until we have made another five miles, when we land for dinner.

The Grand Canyon!

I. Primary Expedition Narratives

"Then we let down with lines, over a long rapid, and start again. Once more the walls close in, and we find ourselves in a narrow gorge, the water again filling the channel, and very swift. With great care, and constant watchfulness, we proceed, making about four miles this afternoon, and camp in a cave.

"August 14.—At daybreak we walk down the bank of the river, on a little sandy beach, to take a view of a new feature in the cañon. Heretofore, hard rocks have given us bad river; soft rocks, smooth water; and a series of rocks harder than any we have experienced sets in. The river enters the granite!*

*Geologists would call these rocks metamorphic crystalline schists, with dikes and beds of granite, but we will use the popular name for the whole series—granite.

"We can see but a little way into the granite gorge, but it looks threatening.

"After breakfast we enter on the waves. At the very introduction, it inspires awe. The cañon is narrower than we have ever before seen it; the water is swifter; there are but few broken rocks in the channel; but the walls are set, on either side, with pinnacles and crags; and sharp, angular buttresses, bristling with wind and wave polished spires, extend far out into the river.

"Ledges of rocks jut into the stream, their tops sometimes just below the surface, sometimes rising few or many feet above; and island ledges, and island pinnacles, and island towers break the swift course of the stream into chutes, and eddies, and whirlpools. We soon reach a place where a creek comes in from the left, and just below, the channel is choked with boulders, which have washed down this lateral cañon and formed a dam, over which there is a fall of thirty or forty feet; but on the boulders we can get foothold, and we make a portage.

"Three more such dams are found. Over one we make a portage; at the other two we find chutes, through which we can run.

"As we proceed, the granite rises higher, until nearly a thousand feet of the lower part of the walls are composed of this rock.

"About eleven o'clock we hear a great roar ahead, and approach it very cautiously. The sound grows louder and louder as we run, and at last we find ourselves above a long, broken fall, with ledges and pinnacles of rock obstructing the river. There is a descent of, perhaps, seventy five or eighty feet in a third of a mile, and the rushing waters break into great waves on the rocks, and lash themselves into a mad, white foam. We can land just above, but there is no foot-hold on either side by which we can make a portage. It is nearly a thousand feet to the top of the granite, so it will be impossible to carry our boats around, though we can climb to the summit up a side gulch, and, passing along a mile or two, can descend to the river. This we find on examination; but such a portage would be impracticable for us, and we must run the rapid, or abandon the river. There is no hesitation. We step into our boats, push off and away we go, first on smooth but swift water, then we strike a glassy wave, and ride to its top, down again into the trough, up again on a higher wave, and down and up on waves higher and still higher, until we strike one just as it curls back, and a breaker rolls over our little boat. Still, on we speed, shooting past projecting rocks, till the little boat is caught in a whirlpool, and spun around several times. At last we pull out again into the stream, and now the other boats have passed us. The open compartment of the 'Emma Dean' is filled with water, and every breaker rolls over us. Hurling back from a rock, now on this side, now on that, we are carried into an eddy, in which we struggle for a few minutes, and are then out again, the breakers still rolling over us. Our boat is unmanageable, but she cannot sink, and we drift down another hundred yards, through breakers; how, we scarcely know. We find the other boats have turned into an eddy at the foot of the fall, and are waiting to catch us as we come, for the men have seen that our boat is swamped. They push out as we come near, and pull us in against the wall. We bail our boat, and on we go again.

"The walls, now, are more than a mile in height—a vertical distance difficult to appreciate. Stand on the south steps of the Treasury building, in Washington, and look down Pennsylvania Avenue to the Capitol Park,

The Grand Canyon!

I. Primary Expedition Narratives

and measure this distance overhead, and imagine cliffs to extend to that altitude, and you will understand what I mean; or, stand at Canal street, in New York, and look up Broadway to Grace Church, and you have about the distance; or, stand at Lake street bridge, in Chicago, and look down to the Central Depot, and you have it again.

"A thousand feet of this is up through granite crags, then steep slopes and perpendicular cliffs rise, one above another, to the summit. The gorge is black and narrow below, red and gray and flaring above, with crags and angular projections on the walls, which, cut in many places by side cañons, seem to be a vast wilderness of rocks. Down in these grand, gloomy depths we glide, ever listening, for the mad waters keep up their roar; ever watching, ever peering ahead, for the narrow cañon is winding, and the river is closed in so that we can see but a few hundred yards, and what there may be below we know not; but we listen for falls, and watch for rocks, or stop now and then, in the bay of a recess, to admire the gigantic scenery. And ever, as we go, there is some new pinnacle or tower, some crag or peak, some distant view of the upper plateau, some strange shaped rock, or some deep, narrow side cañon. • • •

"August 15.— • • • And now we go on through this solemn, mysterious way. The river is very deep, the cañon very narrow, and still obstructed, so that there is no steady flow of the stream; but the waters wheel, and roll, and boil, and we are scarcely able to determine where we can go. Now, the boat is carried to the right, perhaps close to the wall; again, she is shot into the stream, and perhaps is dragged over to the other side, where, caught in a whirlpool, she spins about. We can neither land nor run as we please. The boats are entirely unmanageable; no order in their running can be preserved; now one, now another, is ahead, each crew laboring for its own preservation. In such a place we come to another rapid. Two of the boats run it perforce. One succeeds in landing, but there is no foot-hold by which to make a portage, and she is pushed out again into the stream. The next minute a great reflex wave fills the open compartment; she is water-logged, and drifts unmanageable. Breaker after breaker rolls over her, and one capsizes her. The men are thrown out; but they cling to the boat, and she drifts down some distance, alongside of us, and we are able to catch her. She is soon bailed out, and the men are aboard once more; but the oars are lost, so a pair from the 'Emma Dean' is spared. Then for two miles we find smooth water.

"Clouds are playing in the cañon to day. Sometimes they roll down in great masses, filling the gorge with gloom; sometimes they hang above, from wall to wall, and cover the cañon with a roof of impending storm; and we can peer long distances up and down this cañon corridor, with its cloud roof overhead, its walls of black granite, and its river bright with the sheen of broken waters. Then, a gust of wind sweeps down a side gulch, and, making a rift in the clouds, reveals the blue heavens, and a stream of sunlight pours in. Then, the clouds drift away into the distance, and hang around crags, and peaks, and pinnacles, and towers, and walls, and cover them with a mantle, that lifts from time to time, and sets them all in sharp relief. Then, baby clouds creep out of side cañons, glide around points, and creep back again, into more distant gorges. Then, clouds, set in strata, across the cañon, with intervening vista views, to cliffs and rocks beyond. The clouds are children of the heavens, and when they play among the rocks, they lift them to the region above.

"It rains! Rapidly little rills are formed above, and these soon grow into brooks, and the brooks grow into creeks, and tumble over the walls in innumerable cascades, adding their wild music to the roar of the river. When the rain ceases, the rills, brooks, and creeks run dry. The waters that fall, during a rain, on these steep rocks, are gathered at once into the river; they could scarcely be poured in more suddenly, if some vast spout ran from the clouds to the stream itself. When a storm bursts over the cañon, a side gulch is dangerous, for a sudden flood may come, and the inpouring waters will raise the river, so as to hide the rocks before your eyes.

"Early in the afternoon, we discover a stream, entering from the north, a clear, beautiful creek, coming down through a gorgeous red cañon. We land, and camp on a sand beach, above its mouth, under a great, overspreading tree, with willow shaped leaves.

"August 16.—We must dry our rations again to day, and make oars. The Colorado is never a clear stream, but for the past three or four days it has been raining much of the time, and the floods, which are poured over the walls, have brought down great quantities of mud, making it exceedingly turbid now. The little affluent, which we have discovered here, is a clear, beautiful creek, or river, as it would be termed in this western country, where streams are not abundant. We have named one stream, away above, in honor of the great chief of the 'Bad Angels,' and, as this is in beautiful contrast to that, we conclude to name it 'Bright Angel.'

The Grand Canyon!

I. Primary Expedition Narratives

"Early in the morning, the whole party starts up to explore the Bright Angel River, with the special purpose of seeking timber, from which to make oars. A couple of miles above, we find a large pine log, which has been floated down from the plateau, probably from an altitude of more than six thousand feet, but not many miles back. On its way, it must have passed over many cataracts and falls, for it bears scars in evidence of the rough usage which it has received. The men roll it on skids, and the work of sawing oars is commenced.

"This stream heads away back, under a line of abrupt cliffs, that terminates the plateau, and tumbles down more than four thousand feet in the first mile or two of its course; then runs through a deep, narrow cañon, until it reaches the river.

"Late in the afternoon I return, and go up a little gulch, just above this creek, about two hundred yards from camp, and discover the ruins of two or three old houses, which were originally of stone, laid in mortar. Only the foundations are left, but irregular blocks, of which the houses were constructed, lie scattered about. In one room I find an old mealing stone, deeply worn, as if it had been much used. A great deal of pottery is strewn around, and old trails, which in some places are deeply worn into the rocks, are seen. • • •

"August 17.—Our rations are still spoiling; the bacon is so badly injured that we are compelled to throw it away. By an accident, this morning, the saleratus is lost overboard. We have now only musty flour sufficient for ten days, a few dried apples, but plenty of coffee. • • • We make ten miles and a half, and camp among the rocks, on the right. We have had rain, from time to time, all day, and have been thoroughly drenched and chilled; but between showers the sun shines with great power, and the mercury in our thermometers stands at 110°, so that we have rapid changes from great extremes, which are very disagreeable. It is especially cold in the rain to-night. The little canvas we have is rotten and useless; the rubber ponchos, with which we started from Green River City, have all been lost; more than half the party is without hats, and not one of us has an entire suit of clothes, and we have not a blanket apiece. So we gather drift wood, and build a fire; but after supper the rain, coming down in torrents, extinguishes it, and we sit up all night, on the rocks, shivering, and are more exhausted by the night's discomfort than by the day's toil.

"August 18.—The day is employed in making portages, and we advance but two miles on our journey. Still it rains.

"While the men are at work making portages, I climb up the granite to its summit, and go away back over the rust colored sandstones and greenish yellow shales, to the foot of the marble wall. I climb so high that the men and boats are lost in the black depths below, and the dashing river is a rippling brook; and still there is more cañon above than below. All about me are interesting geological records. The book is open, and I can read as I run. All about me are grand views, for the clouds are playing again in the gorges. But somehow I think of the nine days' rations, and the bad river, and the lesson of the rocks, and the glory of the scene is but half seen.

"August 19.—Rain again this morning. Still we are in our granite prison, and the time is occupied until noon in making a long, bad portage.

"After dinner, in running a rapid, the pioneer boat is upset by a wave[.] We are some distance in advance of the larger boats, the river is rough and swift, and we are unable to land, but cling to the boat, and are carried down stream, over another rapid. The men in the boats above see our trouble, but they are caught in whirlpools, and are spinning about in eddies, and it seems a long time before they come to our relief. At last they do come; our boat is turned right side up, bailed out; the oars, which fortunately have floated along in company with us, are gathered up, and on we go, without even landing.

"Soon after the accident the clouds break away, and we have sunshine again. • • •

"August 23.— • • • [The party pauses, briefly, at one of the most popular stops of modern river travelers—Deer Creek Falls.] Just after dinner we pass a stream on the right, which leaps into the Colorado by a direct fall of more than a hundred feet, forming a beautiful cascade. There is a bed of very hard rock above, thirty or forty feet in thickness, and much softer beds below. The hard beds above project many yards beyond the softer, which are washed out, forming a deep cave behind the fall, and the stream pours through a narrow crevice above into a deep pool below. Around on the rocks, in the cave like chamber, are set beautiful ferns, with delicate fronds and enameled stalks. The little frondlets have their points turned down, to form spore cases. It has very much the appearance of the Maiden's Hair fern, but is much larger. This delicate foliage covers the rocks all about the fountain, and gives the chamber great beauty. But we have little time to spend in admiration, so on we go. • • •

The Grand Canyon!

I. Primary Expedition Narratives

"August 25.—We make twelve miles this morning, when we come to monuments of lava, standing in the river; low rocks, mostly, but some of them shafts more than a hundred feet high. Going on down, three or four miles, we find them increasing in number. Great quantities of cooled lava and many cinder cones are seen on either side; and then we come to an abrupt cataract [Lava Falls]. Just over the fall, on the right wall, a cinder cone, or extinct volcano, with a well defined crater, stands on the very brink of the cañon. This, doubtless, is the one we saw two or three days ago. From this volcano vast floods of lava have been poured down into the river, and a stream of the molten rock has run up the cañon, three or four miles, and down, we know not how far. Just where it poured over the cañon wall is the fall. The whole north side, as far as we can see, is lined with the black basalt, and high up on the opposite wall are patches of the same material, resting on the benches, and filling old alcoves and caves, giving to the wall a spotted appearance.

"The rocks are broken in two, along a line which here crosses the river, and the beds, which we have seen coming down the cañon for the last thirty miles, have dropped 800 feet, on the lower side of the line, forming what geologists call a fault. The volcanic cone stands directly over the fissure thus formed. On the side of the river opposite, mammoth springs burst out of this crevice, one or two hundred feet above the river, pouring in a stream quite equal in volume to the Colorado Chiquito.

"This stream seems to be loaded with carbonate of lime, and the water, evaporating, leaves an incrustation on the rocks; and this process has been continued for a long time, for extensive deposits are noticed, in which are basins, with bubbling springs. The water is salty.

"We have to make a portage here, which is completed in about three hours, and on we go.

"We have no difficulty as we float along, and I am able to observe the wonderful phenomena connected with this flood of lava. The cañon was doubtless filled to a height of twelve or fifteen hundred feet, perhaps by more than one flood. This would dam the water back; and in cutting through this great lava bed, a new channel has been formed, sometimes on one side, sometimes on the other. The cooled lava, being of firmer texture than the rocks of which the walls are composed, remains in some places; in others a narrow channel has been cut, leaving a line of basalt on either side. It is possible that the lava cooled faster on the sides against the walls, and that the centre ran out; but of this we can only conjecture. There are other places, where almost the whole of the lava is gone, patches of it only being seen where it has caught on the walls. As we float down, we can see that it ran out into side cañons. In some places this basalt has a fine, columnar structure, often in concentric prisms, and masses of these concentric columns have coalesced. In some places, when the flow occurred, the cañon was probably at about the same depth as it is now, for we can see where the basalt has rolled out on the sands, and, what seems curious to me, the sands are not melted or metamorphosed to any appreciable extent. In places the bed of the river is of sandstone or limestone, in other places of lava, showing that it has all been cut out again where the sandstones and limestones appear; but there is a little yet left where the bed is of lava.

"What a conflict of water and fire there must have been here! Just imagine a river of molten rock, nunning down into a river of melted snow. What a seething and boiling of the waters; what clouds of steam rolled into the heavens! • • •

"August 27.—This morning the river takes a more southerly direction. The dip of the rocks is to the north, and we are rapidly running into lower formations. Unless our course changes, we shall very soon run again into the granite. This gives us some anxiety. Now and then the river turns to the west, and excites hopes that are soon destroyed by another turn to the south. About nine o'clock we come to the dreaded rock. It is with no little misgiving that we see the river enter these black, hard walls. At its very entrance we have to make a portage; then we have to let down with lines past some ugly rocks. Then we run a mile or two farther, and then the rapids below can be seen. [Separation Rapid.]

"About eleven o'clock we come to a place in the river where it seems much worse than any we have yet met in all its course. A little creek comes down from the left. We land first on the right, and clamber up over the granite pinnacles for a mile or two, but can see no way by which we can let down, and to run it would be sure destruction. After dinner we cross to examine it on the left. High above the river we can walk along on the top of the granite, which is broken off at the edge, and set with crags and pinnacles, so that it is very difficult to get a view of the river at all. In my eagerness to reach a point where I can see the roaring fall below, I go too far on the wall, and can neither advance nor retreat. I stand with one foot on a little projecting rock, and cling with my hand fixed in a little crevice. Finding I am caught here, suspended 400 feet above the river, into which I should fall if my footing fails, I call for help. The men come, and pass me a line, but I cannot let go of the rock long enough to take hold of it. Then they bring two or three of the largest oars. All this takes time which seems very precious to me; but at last they arrive. The blade of one of the oars is pushed into a little crevice in the rock beyond me, in such a manner that they can hold me pressed against the wall. Then another is fixed in such a way that I can step on it, and thus I am extricated.

The Grand Canyon!

I. Primary Expedition Narratives

“Still another hour is spent in examining the river from this side, but no good view of it is obtained, so now we return to the side that was first examined, and the afternoon is spent in clambering among the crags and pinnacles, and carefully scanning the river again. We find that the lateral streams have washed boulders into the river, so as to form a dam, over which the water makes a broken fall of eighteen or twenty feet; then there is a rapid, beset with rocks, for two or three hundred yards, while, on the other side, points of the wall project into the river. Then there is a second fall below; how great, we cannot tell. Then there is a rapid, filled with huge rocks, for one or two hundred yards. At the bottom of it, from the right wall, a great rock projects quite half way across the river. It has a sloping surface extending up stream, and the water, coming down with all the momentum gained in the falls and rapids above, rolls up this inclined plane many feet, and tumbles over to the left. I decide that it is possible to let down over the first fall, then run near the right cliff to a point just above the second, where we can pull out into a little chute, and, having run over that in safety, we must pull with all our power across the stream, to avoid the great rock below. On my return to the boat, I announce to the men that we are to run it in the morning. Then we cross the river, and go into camp for the night on some rocks, in the mouth of the little side cañon.

“After supper Captain Howland asks to have a talk with me. We walk up the little creek a short distance, and I soon find that his object is to remonstrate against my determination to proceed. He thinks that we had better abandon the river here. Talking with him, I learn that his brother, William Dunn, and himself have determined to go no farther in the boats. So we return to camp. Nothing is said to the other men.

“For the last two days, our course has not been plotted. I sit down and do this now, for the purpose of finding where we are by dead reckoning. It is a clear night, and I take out the sextant to make observation for latitude, and find that the astronomic determination agrees very nearly with that of the plot—quite as closely as might be expected, from a meridian observation on a planet. In a direct line, we must be about forty five miles from the mouth of the Rio Virgen. If we can reach that point, we know that there are settlements up that river about twenty miles. This forty five miles, in a direct line, will probably be eighty or ninety in the meandering line of the river. But then we know that there is comparatively open country for many miles above the mouth of the Virgen, which is our point of destination.

“As soon as I determine all this, I spread my plot on the sand, and wake Howland, who is sleeping down by the river, and show him where I suppose we are, and where several Mormon settlements are situated.

“We have another short talk about the morrow, and he lies down again; but for me there is no sleep. All night long, I pace up and down a little path, on a few yards of sand beach, along by the river. Is it wise to go on? I go to the boats again, to look at our rations. I feel satisfied that we can get over the danger immediately before us; what there may be below I know not. From our outlook yesterday, on the cliffs, the cañon seemed to make another great bend to the south, and this, from our experience heretofore, means more and higher granite walls. I am not sure thnt we can climb out of the cañon here, and, when at the top of the wall, I know enough of the country to be certain that it is a desert of rock and sand, between this and the nearest Mormon town, which, on the most direct line, must be seventy five miles away. True, the late rains have been favorable to us, should we go out, for the probabilities are that we shall find water still standing in holes, and, at one time, I almost conclude to leave the river. But for years I have been contemplating this trip. To leave the exploration unfinished, to say that there is a part of the cañon which I cannot explore, having already almost accomplished it, is more than I am willing to acknowledge, and I determine to go on.

The Grand Canyon!

I. Primary Expedition Narratives

"I wake my brother, and tell him of Howland's determination, and he promises to stay with me; then I call up Hawkins, the cook, and he makes a like promise; then Sumner, and Bradley, and Hall, and they all agree to go on.

"August 28.—At last daylight comes, and we have breakfast, without a word being said about the future. The meal is as solemn as a funeral. After breakfast, I ask the three men if they still think it best to leave us. The elder Howland thinks it is, and Dunn agrees with him. The younger Howland tries to persuade them to go on with the party, failing in which, he decides to go with his brother.

"Then we cross the river. The small boat is very much disabled, and unseaworthy. With the loss of hands, consequent on the departure of the three men, we shall not be able to run all of the boats, so I decide to leave my 'Emma Dean.'

"Two rifles and a shot gun are given to the men who are going out. I ask them to help themselves to the rations, and take what they think to be a fair share. This they refuse to do, saying they have no fear but that they can get something to eat; but Billy, the cook, has a pan of biscuits prepared for dinner, and these he leaves on a rock.

"Before starting, we take our barometers, fossils, the minerals, and some ammunition from the boat, and leave them on the rocks. We are going over this place as light as possible. The three men help us lift our boats over a rock twenty five or thirty feet high, and let them down again over the first fall, and now we are all ready to start. The last thing before leaving, I write a letter to my wife, and give it to Howland. Sumner gives him his watch, directing that it be sent to his sister, should he not be heard from again. The records of the expedition have been kept in duplicate. One set of these is given to Howland, and now we are ready. For the last time, they entreat us not to go on, and tell us that it is madness to set out in this place; that we can never get safely through it; and, further, that the river turns again to the south into the granite, and a few miles of such rapids and falls will exhaust our entire stock of rations, and then it will be too late to climb out. Some tears are shed; it is rather a solemn parting; each party thinks the other is taking the dangerous course.

"My old boat left, I go on board of the 'Maid of the Cañon.' The three men climb a crag, that overhangs the river, to watch us off. The 'Maid of the Cañon' pushes out. We glide rapidly along the foot of the wall, just grazing one great rock, then pull out a little into the chute of the second fall, and plunge over it. The open compartment is filled when we strike the first wave below, but we cut through it, and then the men pull with all their power toward the left wall, and swing clear of the dangerous rock below all right. We are scarcely a minute in running it and find that, although it looked bad from above, we have passed many places that were worse.

"The other boat follows without more difficulty. We land at the first practicable point below and fire our guns, as a signal to the men above that we have come over in safety. Here we remain a couple of hours, hoping that they will take the smaller boat and follow us. We are behind a curve in the cañon, and cannot see up to where we left them, and so we wait until their coming seems hopeless, and push on. • • •

"August 29.—We start very early this morning. The river still continues swift, but we have no serious difficulty, and at twelve o'clock emerge from the Grand Cañon of the Colorado.

"We are in a valley now, and low mountains are seen in the distance, coming to the river below. We recognize this as the Grand Wash.

"A few years ago, a party of Mormons set out from St. George, Utah, taking with them a boat, and came down to the mouth of the Grand Wash, where they divided, a portion of the party crossing the river to explore the San Francisco Mountains. Three men—Hamblin, Miller, and Crosby—taking the boat, went on down the river to Callville, landing a few miles below the mouth of the Rio Virgen. We have their manuscript journal with us, and so the stream is comparatively well known.

"To night we camp on the left bank, in a mesquite thicket.

"The relief from danger, and the joy of success, are great. When he who has been chained by wounds to a hospital cot, until his canvas tent seems like a dungeon cell, until the groans of those who lie about, tortured with probe and knife, are piled up, a weight of horror on his ears that he cannot throw off, cannot forget, and until the stench of festering wounds and anæsthetic drugs has filled the air with its loathsome burthen, at last

The Grand Canyon!

I. Primary Expedition Narratives

goes out into the open field, what a world he sees! How beautiful the sky; how bright the sunshine; what 'floods of delirious music' [Henry Wadsworth Longfellow, "Evangeline"] pour from the throats of birds; how sweet the fragrance of earth, and tree, and blossom! The first hour of convalescent freedom seems rich recompense for all—pain, gloom, terror.

"Something like this are the feelings we experience to night. Ever before us has been an unknown danger, heavier than immediate peril. Every waking hour passed in the Grand Cañon has been one of toil. We have watched with deep solicitude the steady disappearance of our scant supply of rations, and from time to time have seen the river snatch a portion of the little left, while we were ahungered. And danger and toil were endured in those gloomy depths, where oftentimes the clouds hid the sky by day, and but a narrow zone of stars could be seen at night. Only during the few hours of deep sleep, consequent on hard labor, has the roar of the waters been hushed. Now the danger is over; now the toil has ceased; now the gloom has disappeared; now the firmament is bounded only by the horizon; and what a vast expanse of constellations can be seen!

"The river rolls by us in silent majesty; the quiet of the camp is sweet; our joy is almost ecstasy. We sit till long after midnight, talking of the Grand Cañon, talking of home, but chiefly talking of the three men who left us. Are they wandering in those depths, unable to find a way out? are they searching over the desert lands above for water? or are they nearing the settlements?"

100 1895 Canyons of the Colorado. Meadville, Pennsylvania: Flood and Vincent, The Chatauqua-Century Press, 400 pp. [100 copies only?]

This volume, although it largely reprints the narrative by Powell (1875), he identifies (p. iv) as a "popular account of the exploration", in which he has "revised and enlarged the original journal of exploration". It adds numerous illustrations from other surveys and includes some from Clarence E. Dutton's work on the Grand Canyon region. He notes in his preface (pp. iv-v), "I have sought refuge in graphic illustration, and for this purpose have gathered from the magazines and from various scientific reports an abundance of material." The "magazines" refers principally to Scribner's Monthly (see "Additional Descriptive Accounts By Powell" farther below). He elaborates the text with newly added chapters on the Colorado River basin's physiographical features and on the ethnology of its Native American tribes, the latter subject is also well illustrated. And he muses (p. v), "Many years have passed since the exploration, and those who were boys with me in the enterprise are—ah, most of them are dead, and the living are gray with age."

Although this volume has been reprinted many times in the 20th century, it was unfortunately not a good seller when it was produced, which was, as biographers have noted, an attempt to gain some additional income in his later life of retirement (though of course he does not acknowledge that need in the preface that summarizes a history of his writings about the expedition).

A full-page display advertisement by the publisher, Flood and Vincent, seen in The Chautauquan, 24(6) (March 1897): 772, specifies two binding states: "Notwithstanding the enormous cost entailed in producing this volume, it is offered at the following low prices : 1—In Extra Fine Cloth Binding, with ornamental cover design stamped in gold and color, printed on fine plate paper, gilt top, per copy—$10.00; 2—In Half Morocco Binding, stamped in gold, printed on fine plate paper, gilt top, per copy—$12.00". Inasmuch as this edition did not sell well, the full-page advertisement two years after publication was obviously an attempt to move limited stock.

Chapter 15, the final chapter (pp. 379-397) titled "The Grand Canyon", is newly added to this version of his narrative. It is largely a descriptive review of the canyon's physiography and the means by which it was created, and its relationship with the broader landscape. Here Powell also contemplates on the monumental scale of things in ways that, by 1895, were already becoming widely familiar to the reading public—comparisons to humans' architectural creations, for starters.

One may wish to compare these observations to those of tourists who even then were visiting and entering the canyon. Note as well that Powell now borrows upon some of the very observations that more common writers were putting to pen—the canyon's inexpressibleness in writing and artistry alike, and the infinite variations of color, light, and form. (It is interesting, too, that inexpressibleness seems not to have impacted the works of poets and musicians.)

The Grand Canyon!

I. Primary Expedition Narratives

"On these highly colored beds the tower limestone [Redwall] is found, 1,000 feet in height. Everywhere there is carved into towers, minarets, and domes, gray and cold, golden and warm, alabaster and pure, in wonderful variety. • • •

"Stand at some point on the brink of the Grand Canyon where you can overlook the river, and the details of the structure, the vast labyrinth of gorges of which it is composed, are scarcely noticed; the elements are lost in the grand effect, and a broad, deep, flaring gorge of many colors is seen. But stand down among these gorges and the landscape seems to be composed of huge vertical elements of wonderful form. Above, it is an open, sunny gorge; below, it is deep and gloomy. Above, it is a chasm; below, it is a stairway from gloom to heaven. • • •

". . . the elements of the façade of the Grand Canyon change vertically and horizontally. The details of structure can be seen only at close view, but grand effects of structure can be witnessed in great panoramic scenes. Seen in detail, gorges and precipices appear; seen at a distance, in comprehensive views, vast massive structures are presented. The traveler on the brink looks from afar and is overwhelmed with the sublimity of massive forms; the traveler among the gorges stands in the presence of awful mysteries, profound, solemn, and gloomy. • • • "

Powell ends this chapter in meditation, some of the visions of which are already familiar to the growing masses of Grand Canyon readers. The "conqueror of the canyon" again appeals to the fame that had begun to be forgotten in the halls walked by everyday people, where, as he had when he had left the river in 1869, he hawks the Grand Canyon at market price, in terms that are familiar to everyman, now also echoing Dutton and newcomers alike. The writers of the Santa Fe Railway could not have advertised it better, though they already were trying valiantly.

"The wonders of the Grand Canyon cannot be adequately represented in symbols of speech, nor by speech itself. The resources of the graphic art are taxed beyond their powers in attempting to portray its features. Language and illustration combined must fail. The elements that unite to make the Grand Canyon the most sublime spectacle in nature are multifarious and exceedingly diverse. The Cyclopean forms which result from the sculpture of tempests through ages too long for man to compute, are wrought into endless details, to describe which would be a task equal in magnitude to that of describing the stars of the heavens or the multitudinous beauties of the forest with its traceries of foliage presented by oak and pine and poplar, by beech and linden and hawthorn, by tulip and lily and rose, by fern and moss and lichen. Besides the elements of form, there are elements of color, for here the colors of the heavens are rivaled by the colors of the rocks. The rainbow is not more replete with hues. But form and color do not exhaust all the divine qualities of the Grand Canyon. It is the land of music. The river thunders in perpetual roar, swelling in floods of music when the storm gods play upon the rocks and fading away in soft and low murmurs when the infinite blue of heaven is unveiled. With the melody of the great tide rising and falling, swelling and vanishing forever, other melodies are heard in the gorges of the lateral canyons, while the waters plunge in the rapids among the rocks or leap in great cataracts. Thus the Grand Canyon is a land of song. Mountains of music swell in the rivers, hills of music billow in the creeks, and meadows of music murmur in the rills that ripple over the rocks. Altogether it is a symphony of multitudinous melodies. All this is the music of waters. The adamant foundations of the earth have been wrought into a sublime harp, upon which the clouds of the heavens play with mighty tempests or with gentle showers.

"The glories and the beauties of form, color, and sound unite in the Grand Canyon—forms unrivaled even by the mountains, colors that vie with sunsets, and sounds that span the diapason from tempest to tinkling raindrop, from cataract to bubbling fountain. But more: it is a vast district of country. Were it a valley plain it would make a state. It can be seen only in parts from hour to hour and from day to day and from week to week and from month to month. A year scarcely suffices to see it all. It has infinite variety, and no part is ever duplicated. Its colors, though many and complex at any instant, change with the ascending and declining sun; lights and shadows appear and vanish with the passing clouds, and the changing seasons mark their passage in changing colors. You cannot see the Grand Canyon in one view, as if it were a changeless spectacle from which a curtain might be lifted, but to see it you have to toil from month to month through its labyrinths. It is a region more difficult to traverse than the Alps or the Himalayas, but if strength and courage are sufficient for the task, by a year's toil a concept of sublimity can be obtained never again to be equaled on the hither side of Paradise."

The Grand Canyon!

I. Primary Expedition Narratives

---

Principal Reprintings and Translations (Unabridged or Mostly So)

- 101 1915 First through the Grand Canyon : being the record of the pioneer exploration of the Colorado River in 1869-70. (Horace Kephart, ed.) New York: Macmillan Co., 320 pp
- Five Quail Books Catalogue Three (no. 112a) lists a 1915 ed. as published in Oyster Bay, New York, by Nelson Doubleday, and notes, "To confuse matters even further, Macmillan is listed as publisher in Farquhar 42b. Macmillan may have sold reprint rights to Outing and/or Doubleday, both of which published the Kephart under an 'Outing Adventure Library' logo. Same general description, except no ads at rear." Five Quail Books—West Catalogue Ten (no. 321) notes, "This title exists in various editions variously dated."
- 102 1915 First through the Grand Canyon : being the record of the pioneer exploration of the Colorado River in 1869-70. (Horace Kephart, ed.) Oyster Bay, New York: Nelson Doubleday, 320 pp.
- 103 1915 First through the Grand Canyon : being the record of the pioneer exploration of the Colorado River in 1869-70. (Horace Kephart, ed.) (Outing Adventure Library.) New York: Outing Publishing Co., 320 pp.
- 104 1957 The exploration of the Colorado River. (Introduction by Wallace Stegner.) Chicago and London: University of Chicago Press, 138 pp.
- Abridged from Powell (1875), Exploration of the Colorado River of the West. Variant dust jackets noted. Hardbound and paperbound states. Various printings.
- 105 1961 The exploration of the Colorado River. Garden City, New York: Natural History Library, Anchor Books, Doubleday and Co., Inc., in cooperation with American Museum of Natural History, 176 pp. (Natural History Library, no. N11.)
- Reprint of 1957 title.
- 106 1961 Exploration of the Colorado River of the West and its tributaries. Explored in 1869, 1870, 1871, and 1872, under the direction of the Secretary of the Smithsonian Institution. Garden City, New York: Doubleday/Natural History Library.
- 107 1961 The exploration of the Colorado River and its canyons. (Formerly titled: Canyons of the Colorado.) New York: Dover Publications, Inc., 400 pp.
- Facsimile reprint of Powell (1895, Canyons of the Colorado). Cover variants represent various reprintings, but Dover does not specially distinguish later printings of its books by date.
- 108 1964 Canyons of the Colorado : with many illustrations. New York: Argosy-Antiquarian, Ltd., 400 pp. [750 copies.]
- Facsimile reprint of Powell (1895).
- 109 1983 La exploracion del Gran Cañon del Colorado. (Marta Perez, translator.) Barcelona: Laertes S. A. de Ediciones, 254 [256] pp. (Nan Shan, 8.) [Spine title: "La Exploración del Gran Cañón".] [In Spanish.]
(transl. 'The exploration of the Grand Canyon of the Colorado.')
- Translation of Powell (1895, Canyons of the Colorado).

The Grand Canyon!

I. Primary Expedition Narratives

- 110 1987 The exploration of the Colorado River and its canyons. (Introduction by Wallace Stegner.) New York: Penguin Books, 394 pp.
Facsimile reprint of Powell (1895, Canyons of the Colorado).
- 111 1995 Les canyons du Colorado. (Récit adapté de l'Anglais par Gail Wagman et Marc de Gouvenain.) Arles, France: Actes Sud, 223 [227] pp. (Terres d'Aventure; série dirigée par Marc de Gouvenain.) (transl. 'The canyons of the Colorado.') [In French.]
Translation of Powell (1895, Canyons of the Colorado).
- 112 2001 Höllenfahrt durch den Grand Canyon : Expeditionsbericht über die erste Befahrung und Erforschung des Green River und des Colorado River. (Übersetzung und bearbeitung von Elmar Engel.) Oberschleissheim: Pollner Verlag, 136 pp. + advertisements [139-151] (but in which [140-143] are illustrations for the book). [In German.]
(transl. 'Descent into Hell through the Grand Canyon : Expedition report on the first descent and exploration of the Green River and the Colorado River.')
- Translation of Powell (1895, Canyons of the Colorado).
- 113 2002 The exploration of the Colorado River and its canyons. (Introduction by Anthony Brandt.) Washington, D.C.: National Geographic, 269 pp. (National Geographic Adventure Classics.)
Reset reprinting of Powell (1895, Canyons of the Colorado).
- 114 2006 Průzkum řeky Colorado a jejích kaňonů : zpráva majora J. W. Powella, Washington 1895. (Afterword by Václav Cílek. Otto Hauck, translator.) Praha: Dokořán, 272 pp. [In Czech.]
(transl. 'Exploring the Colorado River and its canyons: a report by Major J. W. Powell')
- Translation of Powell (1895, Canyons of the Colorado).
- 115 2007 科罗拉多河探险记 [Ke luo la duo he tan xian ji] [The Exploration of the Colorado River and its Canyons]. (雷立美 [Lei Limei], translator.) 广州 [Guangzhou]: 花城出版社 [Hua cheng chu ban she] [Guangzhou, China: Huacheng Publishing House], 380 pp. + [2] pp. advertisements. (三尺书架·第一辑 [San chi shu jia di yi ji] [Three-Foot Bookshelf, Series 1].) [In Chinese.]
Translation after Powell (1895, Canyons of the Colorado). Although the title's translation suggests it is the same as that of Powell's original report (1875, Exploration of the Colorado River . . .), this is an abridgment from the 1895 ed., including illustrations. The cover illustration imaginatively portrays the expedition in birch bark canoes! Author's name in Chinese orthography: 约翰 韦斯利 鲍威尔 (Yuèhàn Wéi sī lì Bào wěi'ěr).
- 116 2015 Die Erforschung des Colorado Rivers und des Grand Canyons, 1869-1870. Aus dem Amerikanischen übersetzt und kommentiert von Niels-Arne Münch. Herausgegeben und mit einer Einführung versehen von Dietrich Denecke. Wiesbaden: Edition Erdmann (Verlagshaus Römerweg GmbH), 320 pp. [In German.]
(transl. 'The Exploration of the Colorado River and the Grand Canyon, 1869-1870. Translated from the American and annotated by Niels-Arne Münch. Edited and provided with an introduction by Dietrich Denecke.')
- Translation of Powell (1895, Canyons of the Colorado); title with dates thus. Includes translation of Powell's preface to his 1895 edition, pp. 70-74. Volume includes attached cloth strip bookmark.
- 117 2019 The Grand Canyon expedition : the exploration of the Colorado River and its canyons. Layton, Utah: Gibbs Smith, 281 [282] pp. [Hardbound, 8¼ × 5¼-inch format, illustrated boards, no dust jacket.]
Text reset from Powell (1895, Canyons of the Colorado, with selected illustrations reproduced.

The Grand Canyon!

I. Primary Expedition Narratives

---

Publications of Expedition Journals and Accounts by Expedition Members

Beaman, E. O.

- 118 1872 The Colorado exploring expedition. Anthony's Photographic Bulletin, 3(2) (February): 463-465.
- 119 1872 A tour through the Grand Canon of the Colorado. Anthony's Photographic Bulletin, 3(10) (October): 703-705.
Credited to New York Sun but no author credit line.
- 120 1874 The cañon of the Colorado, and the Moquis pueblos: A wild boat-ride through the cañons and rapids, a visit to the Seven Cities of the Desert, glimpses of Mormon life. Appleton's Journal, 11(265) (April 18): 480-484, (266) (April 25): 513-516, (267) (May 2): 545-548, (268) (May 9): 590-593, (269) (May 16): 623-626, (270) (May 23): 641-644, (271) (May 30): 686-689.

Cooley, John

- 121 1988 The great unknown : the journals of the historic first expedition down the Colorado River. Flagstaff, Arizona: Northland Publishing, 207 pp.

Dellenbaugh, Frederick S.

- 122 NO DATE Running the gauntlet of the Grand Canyon of the Colorado. In: Adventures afloat and ashore : tales by James Fenimore Cooper, Theodore Roosevelt, Washington Irving, Herman Melville, E. S. Ellis, Frederick S. Dellenbaugh, Mayne Reid, R. M. Ballantyne, and others. New York and London: G. P. Putnam's Sons, Knickerbocker Press, pp. 1-29. (Reading Circle Classics for Young People.) [Another citation notes year 1930, and Katherine Newbold Birdsall, ed.]
- 123 1902 The romance of the Colorado River : the story of its discovery in 1540, with an account of the later explorations, and with special reference to the voyages of Powell through the line of the great canyons. New York and London: G. P. Putnam's Sons (The Knickerbocker Press), 399 pp. [Reprinted 1903, 1904, 1906. See 1909 for a revised ed.]
- Fully the first half of the book relates to history on the Colorado River earlier than the Powell expeditions.
- 124 1905 Breaking the wilderness : the story of the conquest of the Far West, from the wanderings of Cabeza de Vaca, to the first descent of the Colorado by Powell, and the completion of the Union Pacific Railway, with particular account of the exploits of trappers and traders. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons (The Knickerbocker Press), 360 pp.
- 125 1908 A canyon voyage : the narrative of the second Powell expedition down the Green-Colorado River from Wyoming, and the explorations on land, in the years 1871 and 1872. New York and London: G. P. Putnam's Sons (The Knickerbocker Press), 277 pp.

This 1st ed. also known to have at least once been distributed as a presentation copy with variant cover, designed, hand colored, and initialed by Dellenbaugh, with hand-colored chapter heading and a hand-colored photo of undetermined source. See cover illustration and description of this in Back of Beyond Books : Rare Book Catalogue No. 18—December 2016 (Moab, Utah), item 6.

The Grand Canyon!

I. Primary Expedition Narratives

- 126 1909 The romance of the Colorado River : the story of its discovery in 1540, with an account of the later explorations, and with special reference to the voyages of Powell through the line of the great canyons. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons (The Knickerbocker Press), 401 pp

Five Quail Books Catalogue 16 (2000), no. 58B, indicates for one copy: "This copy dated 1909 has a photo of the Powell Memorial by the Kolb Brothers. The Memorial was built in 1915 [sic, 1918]. Another distinct difference is the lack of a pictorial cover." Five Quail Books Catalogue 20 (2004), no. 104B, indicates, "This edition has three foldout maps that earlier editions do not have."

- 127 1921 Travellers and explorers, 1846-1900. In: Trent, William Peterfield, Erskine, John, Sherman, Stuart P., and Van Doren, Carl (eds.), The Cambridge history of American literature. [Volume 3.] Later national literature: Part II. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons, and Cambridge, England: University Press, pp. 131-170; and bibliography, pp. [681]-728.

- 128 1921 Books by American travellers and explorers from 1846 to 1900. Being Chapter XIV of the third volume of the Cambridge History of American Literature : with a bibliography. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons, paginated 131-170, and bibliography, [681]-728.

Title-page dated 1920. Preprint or offprint. Wrapper text: "Travellers and Explorers, 1846-1900. Reprinted from The Cambridge History of American Literature, Volume III. New York. 1921." Bibliography bound with blank leaves interleaving the print leaves, presumably for autograph emendations.

- 129 1926 A canyon voyage : the narrative of the second Powell expedition down the Green-Colorado River from Wyoming, and the explorations on land, in the years 1871 and 1872. New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, and London: Humphrey Milford, Oxford University Press, 277 pp.

Includes new introduction.

- 130 1962 The romance of the Colorado River : the story of its discovery in 1540, with an account of the later explorations, and with special reference to the voyages of Powell through the line of the great canyons. Chicago: Rio Grande Press, Inc., 399 pp.

Facsimile reprint of Dellenbaugh (1902). 1st and 2nd (1965) printings indicate on title-page verso, "First published in 1904". 2nd printing is a state variant: title-page and verso differ from 1962 printing; facsimile of Putnam 1902 title-page present (absent in 1962 printing); map before Putnam title-page present (absent in 1962 printing); and Dellenbaugh's dedication absent (present in 1962 printing). Cover gives subtitle as: An account of the second Powell expedition down the Grand Canyon in 1871.

- 131 1962 A canyon voyage : the narrative of the second Powell expedition down the Green-Colorado River from Wyoming, and the explorations on land, in the years 1871 and 1872. (Foreword by William H. Goetzmann.) New Haven, Connecticut, and London: Yale University Press, xxvi, 277 pp.

Hardbound and paperbound states. Paperbound state released as part of Yale Western Americana Paperbound series, YW-4.

- 132 1982 The romance of the Colorado River : the story of its discovery in 1540, with an account of the later explorations, and with special reference to the voyages of Powell through the line of the great canyons. New York: Time-Life Books, Inc., 399 pp. (Classics of the Old West.)

Facsimile reprint of 1902 ed.

The Grand Canyon!

I. Primary Expedition Narratives

- 133 1984 A canyon voyage : the narrative of the second Powell expedition down the Green-Colorado River from Wyoming, and the explorations on land, in the years 1871 and 1872. Tucson: University of Arizona Press, 277 pp.
- Facsimile reprint of Yale University Press ed. with its foreword by William H. Goetzmann. Cover title: A Canyon Voyage : the narrative of the second Powell expedition.
- 134 1998 The romance of the Colorado River : the story of its discovery in 1540, with an account of the later explorations, and with special reference to the voyages of Powell through the line of the great canyons. Mineola, New York: Dover Publications, Inc., 399 pp.
- Facsimile reprint of the 1902 ed.
- 135 2017 A canyon voyage : the story of John Wesley Powell and the charting of the Grand Canyon. New York: Skyhorse Publishing, 276 pp., plates.
- Although indicated as the 1908 1st ed., with different subtitle, this is actually a facsimile reprint of Dellenbaugh (1926).

Ghiglieri, Michael P.

- 136 2003 First through Grand Canyon : the secret journals and letters of the 1869 crew who explored the Green and Colorado Rivers. Flagstaff, Arizona: Puma Press, [xviii], 342 pp. ("With writings by George Young Bradley, Andrew Hall, William Robert Wesley Hawkins, Oramel G. Howland, John Wesley Powell, Walter H. Powell, John Colton Sumner. With Foreword by Richard D. Quartaroli".) [Hardbound and paperbound states.]
- 137 2005 George Young Bradley: Chronicler of the 1869 John Wesley Powell expedition down the Green and Colorado Rivers. In: Anderson, Michael F. (compiler, ed.), A gathering of Grand Canyon historians; ideas, arguments, and first-person accounts; proceedings of the inaugural Grand Canyon History Symposium, January 2002. Grand Canyon Association, Monograph 13, pp. 137-144.
- 138 2010 First through Grand Canyon : the secret journals and letters of the 1869 crew who explored the Green and Colorado Rivers. Flagstaff, Arizona: Puma Press, 2nd ed., revised, [xviii], 342 pp. ("With writings by George Young Bradley, Andrew Hall, William Robert Wesley Hawkins, Oramel G. Howland, John Wesley Powell, Walter H. Powell, John Colton Sumner. With Foreword by Richard D. Quartaroli".)
- Cover indicates "Revised Edition". Most added pages are in a revised appendix and index.
- 139 2015 First through Grand Canyon : the secret journals and letters of the 1869 crew who explored the Green and Colorado Rivers. Flagstaff, Arizona: Puma Press, 3rd ed., revised, [xviii], 342 pp. ("With writings by George Young Bradley, Andrew Hall, William Robert Wesley Hawkins, Oramel G. Howland, John Wesley Powell, Walter H. Powell, John Colton Sumner. With Foreword by Richard D. Quartaroli".)
- Cover indicates "Third Edition, Revised and Expanded". Most added pages are in a revised appendix and index.

Hawkins, W. W.

- 140 1920 [Account of first Powell expedition.] In: Bass, William Wallace, Adventures in the canyons of the Colorado, by two of its earliest explorers, James White and W. W. Hawkins, with introduction and notes by William Wallace Bass, the Grand Canyon guide. Grand Canyon, Arizona: The authors, pp. 15-29.
- Regarding James White, see Bass (1920) under James White in Part I of this bibliography.

The Grand Canyon!

I. Primary Expedition Narratives

Hillers, John K.

- 141 1874 The "Venus" Box. The Photographic Times (New York), 4(47) (November): 170.

Promotional letter to the Scovill Manufacturing Company, New York, October 20, 1874. Begins, "Having just returned from Major Powell's Colorado River Exploring Expedition, to which I was photographer, I desire to express my unqualified satisfaction with the 'Venus Box,' which you supplied. [See clarification below.] It is superior to any camera box I have ever used. Many of the negatives made on the expedition of last year were worthless, in consequence of the leakage of light through the box and holders, which were of —'s make, and it became necessary to cover them entirely with black cloth before a good negative could be obtained."

Of further note is another promotional item, by the manufacturer, in the previous August issue (44): 122 (ellipses are part of the quotation): "Major J. W. Powell, in charge of Colorado River Exploring Expedition, writes us under date of June 16th, 1874: 'I would like to try one of your No. 53, 8 x 10 "Venus" view boxes . . . I am very desirous it should be perfect. Have been using —'s boxes for some time, and hnd [sic] trouble in excluding the light from box and holder.' . . . He writes again, June 24th, 'Goods, letter, and bill received to-day. The camera appears to be perfect, and suits my photographer to a "T." . . .'" On the same page is the manufacturer's brief explanation of the "Venus Box": "For the benefit of such as may not know the plan of the box, we will describe it. It is an 8 x 10 reversible, double swing-back, with a 5 x 8 stereo attachment. It has a leather cone-bellows, and is storngly bound with brass. The swings both work inside of the body of the box, and are easily adjusted with the thumb and finger of one hand by a rack and pinion movement, which is self-setting, and is fastened to the back of the box. There are thin wood obscurers extending across the platform, which prevent the light coming up from under the tripod. Price of the box and glass corner-holders complete, $60."

Lago, Don

- 142 2018 The Powell Expedition : new discoveries about John Wesley Powell's 1869 river journey. Reno and Las Vegas: University of Nevada Press, 396 pp. [Available in November 2017.] [Paperback 2nd printing, 2018, distributed with new covers; redesigned front cover, with photo of boat at shore of river, and blurbs on back cover. 1st printing cover photo shows Powell and an American Indian.]

Utah State Historical Society

- 143 1939 Diary of Almon Harris Thompson, geographer; Explorations of the Colorado River of the West and its tributaries, 1871-1875. (H. E. Gregory, ed.) Utah Historical Quarterly, 7(1/3) (January/April/July): 3-138.
- 144 1947 The exploration of the Colorado River in 1869. Utah Historical Quarterly, 15(1/4) (January/April/July/October): XIII, 270 pp. [Hardbound and paperbound states.]
- Various separately authored chapters.
- 145 1949 The exploration of the Colorado River and the High Plateaus of Utah in 1871-72. Utah Historical Quarterly, 16/17 [16(1/4) (January/April/July/October 1948) – 17(1/4) (January/April/July/October 1949)], 540 pp. (Copyright 1949.) [Hardbound and stiffbound states.] [Also a facsimile reprinting, University of Utah Press and Utah State Historical Society, 2009.]
- Various separately authored chapters.
- 146 1960 The Colorado . . . River of the West. Utah Historical Quarterly, 28(3) (July): 195-324 [entire number]. [Ellipsis is part of title.]
- Various separately authored chapters.

The Grand Canyon!

I. Primary Expedition Narratives

- 147 1969 John Wesley Powell and the Colorado River; Centennial Edition. Utah Historical Quarterly, 37: 146-283 [entire number].
Various separately authored chapters.
- 148 2009 Diary of Almon Harris Thompson : explorations of the Colorado River of the West and its tributaries, 1871-1875. (Herbert E. Gregory, ed.) Salt Lake City: University of Utah Press, and Utah State Historical Society, 143 pp.
Facsimile reprint of Utah Historical Quarterly, Vol. 7, nos. 1-3 (1939, see above).
- 149 2009 The exploration of the Colorado River in 1869 and 1871-1872 : biographical sketches and original documents of the First Powell Expedition of 1869 and the Second Powell Expedition of 1871-1872. Salt Lake City: University of Utah Press, and Utah State Historical Society, 271 pp.
Facsimile reprint of Utah Historical Quarterly, Vol. 15 (1947, see above), with a new index, pp. 141-142.
- 150 2009 The exploration of the Colorado River and the High Plateaus of Utah by the Second Powell Expedition of 1871-1872. Salt Lake City: University of Utah Press, and Utah State Historical Society, 540 pp.
Facsimile reprint of Utah Historical Quarterly, Vols. 16-17 (1949, see above), with a new index, pp. 141-142.

---

Additional Descriptive Accounts by Powell

Powell, John Wesley

- 151 1869 Scenery of the Colorado. Interesting report from Col. [sic] Powell. The most wonderful scenery in the world—925 miles of canon and 300 waterfalls—rock walls 4,000 feet high—shooting rapids and cascades—hair-breadth ‘scapes—loss of three men—ancient Indian towns—a fascinating story. New-York Tribune, 29(8886) (September 30): 1-2.
A communication from Powell (with introduced errors). [Daily newspapers are not normally cited in this bibliography but this item is of critical interest to Powell’s explorations, and which was reproduced in abridgment shortly later in a biweekly serial (see next citation).
- 152 1869 Scenery of the Colorado. Interesting report from Colonel [sic] Powell. (Correspondence of the New York Tribune.) Supplement to the Courant (Connecticut Courant, Hartford), 34(24) (October 9): 186-187. (“Published every other week as a part of the Connecticut Courant.”) Abridged from Powell (1869, New-York Tribune) (see citation immediately preceding).
- 153 1870 Exploration of Colorado River. Letter from the Secretary of the Interior transmitting An estimate of appropriations to prosecute to completion the geological and topographical exploration of the Colorado River and its tributaries. U.S. 41st Congress, 2nd Session, House of Representatives Executive Document 280, 2 pp.
- 154 1870 Appendix D. Major J. W. Powell’s report on his explorations of the Rio Colorado in 1869. In: Bell, William A., New tracks in North America. A journal of travel and adventure whilst engaged in a survey for a southern railroad to the Pacific Ocean during 1867-8. London: Chapman and Hall, and New York: Scribner, Welford and Co., pp. 559-563.

Not signed but written in the first person. This actually is a reprinting, with minor editing, of Powell’s correspondence to the New-York Tribune (1869).] [NOTE: Appendix D is added to the 1870 ed. of Bell; not present in 1869 ed. See also a note by Bell appended to p. 453. Also take note that by the inclusion of Powell’s

The Grand Canyon!

I. Primary Expedition Narratives

use of "Grand Cañon", this ed. of Bell is the only contemporary publication to use all three early names for Grand Canyon, also using "Great Cañon" and "Big Cañon".]

- 155 1871 The Grand Cañon of the Colorado. In: Lanoye, Ferdinand de [Tugnot de Lanoye, Ferdinand], The sublime in nature : compiled from the descriptions of travellers and celebrated writers. New York: Charles Scribner and Co., pp. 133-143. [Also reprinted 1872.]
- Attribution as "Col. J. W. Powell. Letter to the New York Tribune."
- 156 1872 Survey of the Colorado River of the West. Letter from the Secretary of the Smithsonian Institution, transmitting Report preliminary for continuing the survey of the Colorado of the West and its tributaries, by Professor Powell. U.S. 42nd Congress, 2nd Session, House Miscellaneous Document 173, Serial 1562, 12 pp.
- 157 1873 Report of progress made in the survey of the Colorado River of the West, and its tributaries. U.S. 42nd Congress, 3rd Session, House Miscellaneous Document 76, pp. 2-16.
- 158 1874 Professor Powell's report on the survey of the Colorado of the West. Letter from the Secretary of the Smithsonian Institution, transmitting a report of Professor Powell on the survey of the Colorado River of the West and its tributaries, &c., &c. U.S. 43rd Congress, 1st Session, House Miscellaneous Document 265, Serial 1621, 29 pp. [Also as a separate, U.S. Government Printing Office, 36 pp.]
- 159 1874 The Colorado cañons. In: New-York Tribune, Extra, No. 19, Lectures and Letters, (May): 9-10. [Additional title-page indicates The Tribune. Lecture and Letter Extras. No. 19. Pamphlet Edition.]
- 160 1874 The Colorado cañons. In: Tribune popular science. Boston: Henry L. Shepard and Co., Part 3, pp. 9-10.
- 161 1875 The cañons of the Colorado. Scribner's Monthly, 9(3) (January): 293-310, (4) (February): 394-409, (5) (March): 523-537.
- 162 1875 An overland trip to the Grand Cañon. Scribner's Monthly, 10 (October): 659-678.
- 163 1875 The cañons of the Colorado. In: Beach, Alfred E. (ed.), The science record for 1875. A compendium of scientific progress and discovery during the past year. New-York: Munn and Company, Office of the "Scientific American.", pp. 508-523.
- Credited to "Scribner's Monthly" (p. 597); i.e. Powell (1875, above).
- 164 1877 Valley of the Colorado; Major Powell's explorations of the most wonderful river on the continent. (From the New York Engineering and Mining Journal.) Salt Lake City Tribune [newspaper], 8(44) (November 3), 8(46) (November 17).
- Without by-line. Cited here are parts 2 and 4, of 5 or more?
- 165 1877 The Colorado Plateau. National Repository, 1 (December): 481-499.
- Excerpt from Powell (1875), without credit to author.
- 166 1878 The cañons of the Colorado. Scientific American Supplement, 5(118): 1869-1871, (121): 1917-1919, (124): 1965-1967, (131): 2075-2077, (135): 2139-2141.

The Grand Canyon!

I. Primary Expedition Narratives

- 167 1895 Scenery on the Colorado. American Antiquarian, 17 (July): 240-247. ("Reprinted from the Canyons of the Colorado; published by Ford & Vincent, Meadville, Pa.")
- 168 1896 The cañons of the Colorado. In: Todd, Emma J., and Powell, W. B., The normal course in reading. Fifth reader : advanced readings in literature: scientific, geographical, historical, patriotic and miscellaneous, with analyses of authors. Boston, New York, and Chicago: Silver, Burdett and Co., pp. 33-41.
- 169 1899 The Grand Cañon of the Colorado. Birds and All Nature, 6(3) (October): 106-109. ("From Major J. W. Powell's Report of the Exploration of the Cañons of the Colorado—1869.")
With colored illustration (p. [106]), "Grand Cañon", credited to Santa Fe Railway. Text is interjected with editorial notes that allow for the omission of portions of Powell's text.
- 170 1909 The Grand Cañon of the Colorado. In: Clifford, John H. (ed.), Famous travels and adventures. Volume VI. Philadelphia: The After School Club, pp. 122-136. (The After School Library; Hamilton Wright Mabie, ed.-in-chief.)
- 171 1964 Down the Colorado! (George A. Diehl, ed.). Princeton, New Jersey: Secondary School Science Project, Princeton University, 98 pp.
Condensed from Powell (1895, Canyons of the Colorado).
- 172 1965 The Canyon. In: Borland, Hal (compiler, ed.), Our natural world : the land and wildlife of America as seen by writers since the country's discovery. Garden City, New York: Doubleday and Co., Inc., pp. 196-212. [Also reprinted by J. B. Lippincott and Co. (Philadelphia and New York, 1969).]
- 173 1966 First through the Canyon. St. Louis, Missouri: McGraw-Hill Book Co., Webster Division, 26 pp.
From Chapter 8 of Powell (1875), Exploration of the Colorado River of the West and its tributaries.
- 174 1969 Down the Colorado. American Heritage, 20(6) (October): front cover, 3, 52-61, 83, back cover.
Journal excerpt from August 1869, with introduction signed "The Editors", and with comments on Lake Powell by Eliot Porter (p. 61).
- 175 1974 An overland trip to the Grand Canyon: northern Arizona as Powell saw it in 1870. Palmer Lake, Colorado: Filter Press, 40 pp. (Wild and Wooly West Series, 28.)
Facsimile reprint of title by Powell (1875).
- 176 1980 The cañons of the Colorado : the 1869 discovery voyage down the Colorado River from Wyoming, into Colorado, through Utah, to Arizona and Nevada (William R. Jones, ed.). Golden, Colorado: Outbooks, 64 pp. [Also a 1981 printing.]
Facsimile reprint of Powell (1875, Scribner's Monthly), with editor's preface and map.
- 177 1980 In search of a river's end. Cobblestone, 1(6): 11-19.
Excerpts credited to the 1961 Dover Publications printing of Powell (1895), The exploration of the Colorado River and its canyons.
- 178 1980 Exploration of the Colorado River. In: Bergon, Frank (ed.), The wilderness reader. NAL Penguin, Inc., and New American Library of Canada, Ltd.

The Grand Canyon!

I. Primary Expedition Narratives

- 179 1981 1869: First through the Grand Canyon. In: Schullery, Paul (ed.), The Grand Canyon: early impressions. Boulder, Colorado: Colorado Associated University Press, pp. 5-32.
From Powell (1915).
- 180 1990 From Exploration of the Colorado River. In: Finch, Robert, and Elder, John (eds.), The Norton book of nature writing. New York and London: W. W. Norton and Co., pp. 258-263 [introduction, pp. 257-258].
- 181 1990 John Wesley Powell, 1834-1902. In: Work, James C. (ed.), Prose and poetry of the American West. Lincoln and London: University of Nebraska Press, pp. 119-142. [See "From the Little Colorado to the Foot of the Grand Canyon", pp. 121-142. From Powell (1895).]
- 182 NO DATE The cañons of the Colorado. Scientific American Supplement, 5(118): 1869-1871, (121): 1917-1919, (124): 1965-1967, (131): 2075-2077, (135): 2139-2141. New Orleans, Louisiana: Historical Publications, Inc., pp. [1]-[15] of [16]. [1993.]
Facsimile reprint of Powell's (1878) serial article in single newspaper format. Adds item on back page (p. [16]), "What Became of Powell's Vision", by L. Greer Price, signed August 30, 1993. (Copy purchased as new, June 1994; published 1993, teste L. Greer Price, 1999.)
- 183 1993 From The Exploration of the Colorado River and its Canyons. In: The Ragged Mountain portable wilderness anthology. (Illustrations by Jan Adkins, design by Brian Jones.) Camden, Maine: Ragged Mountain Press, pp. 32-33, 65, 83-84 [three separate excerpts, each with the same title].
- 184 1993 A nursery of great silence. In: McNamee, Gregory (ed.), Named in stone and sky : an Arizona anthology. Tucson: University of Arizona Press, pp. 103-104.
Selection from Powell (1895, Canyons of the Colorado).
- 185 1994 Exploration of the Colorado River. In: Bergon, Frank (ed.), The wilderness reader. Reno, Nevada: University of Nevada Press, pp. 151-170.
- 186 1996 Excerpt from The Exploration of the Colorado River. In: Mancall, Peter C. (ed.), Land of rivers : America in word and image. Ithaca (New York), and London: Cornell University Press, pp. 109-111.
Excerpt from Powell (1875), accompanied by a John K. Hillers photo (p. 108), "John Wesley Powell and his party on the Colorado River, 1871" (which shows the party at Green River).
- 187 1996 [Text.] In: Holmes, Joseph, and Powell, John Wesley, Canyons of the Colorado. (Photographs and essays by Joseph Holmes; text excerpted from "The Exploration of the Colorado River and Its Canyons", by John Wesley Powell; foreword by David R. Brower.) San Francisco: Chronicle Books, 136 pp. [Hardbound and paperbound states.]
- 188 1997 The Canyon. In: Caras, Roger, Roger Caras' treasury of classic nature tales. New York: Galahad Books, pp. 73-92.
- 189 1998 From Exploration of the Colorado River and its Canyons. In: Murray, John A. (ed.), The river reader. New York: Lyons Press, pp. 119-140. (A Nature Conservancy Book.)
- 190 1999 Through the Grand. In: Long, John, and Sponholz, Hai-Van K. (eds.), The liquid locomotive : legendary whitewater river stories. Helena, Montana: Falcon Publishing, Inc., pp. 143-156.

The Grand Canyon!

I. Primary Expedition Narratives

- 191 2001 The diary of John Wesley Powell, conquering the Grand Canyon. (Connie Roop and Peter Roop, eds.; illustrations and map by Laszlo Kubinyi.) New York: Benchmark Books, Marshall Cavendish, 96 pp. (In My Own Words.)
- 192 2002 Exploring the Grand Canyon. Luray, Virginia: Treasures Beyond Measure, 20 pp.
Reprint of Chapter 25 from Powell's (1895) Canyons of the Colorado.
- 193 2002 From the Little Colorado River to the foot of the Grand Canyon. In: Underwood, Lamar (ed.), The greatest adventure stories ever told. Guilford, Connecticut: Lyons Press.
- 194 2006 From the Little Colorado to the foot of the Grand Canyon. In: Savoy, Lauret E., Moores, Eldridge M., and Moores, Judith E. (eds.), Bedrock : writers on the wonders of geology. San Antonio, Texas: Trinity University Press, pp. 212-218.
Extract from Powell (1895, Canyons of the Colorado).
- 195 2010 Im Boot durch den Grand Canyon. In: Langer, Freddy (ed.), Grand Canyon und Las Vegas : ein Reiselesebuch. Hamburg: Ellert und Richter Verlag, pp. 65-88. [In German.]
(transl. 'In a boat through the Grand Canyon' in 'Grand Canyon and Las Vegas: a travel book')
- From Höllenfahrt durch den Grand Canyon : Expeditionsbericht über die erste Befahrung und Erforschung des Green River und des Colorado River (übersetzung und bearbeitung von Elmar Engel), Pollner Verlag (Oberschleissheim, 2001; see Powell, 2001).
- 196 2011 The Grand Cañon of the Colorado. In: Newman, Lance (ed.), The Grand Canyon reader. Berkeley, Los Angeles, and London: University of California Press, pp. 153-171.
Reprinted from Exploration of the Colorado River of the West and its Tributaries (Powell, 1875).

Powell, John Wesley; Porter, Eliot; AND Fowler, Don D.

- 197 1969 Down the Colorado. John Wesley Powell, Diary of the first trip through the Grand Canyon, 1869 : Eliot Porter, photographs and epilogue, 1969 : foreword and notes by Don D. Fowler. New York: E. P. Dutton and Co., 168 pp. [Also reprinted by Promontory Press (New York, 1969), and by Promontory Press in collaboration with Chanticleer Press (New York, 1969, printed in Italy).]

---

Contemporary Publications Noting the Powell Expeditions

Anonymous

- 198 1869 The Pacific Railroad—open. How to go: What to see. [continued] The Atlantic Monthly, 23 (June (140): 753-762.
See p. 761, passing notice of John Wesley Powell's proposal to "test the safety of the passage of the great canyon of the Colorado of the West."
- 199 1869 The Powell expedition. Deseret News, (September 15): 6 [issue pagination].
Notice of safe arrival at Virgin River.
- 200 1869 Major Powell's lecture. Deseret News, (September 22): 8 [issue pagination].
Regarding John Wesley Powell lecture in Salt Lake City, about his exploration of the Colorado River.

The Grand Canyon!

I. Primary Expedition Narratives

- 201 1869 [John Wesley Powell.] The Cultivator and Country Gentleman (Albany, New York), 34 (September 30): 262.
- "Col. [sic] Powell, the Colorado explorer, has returned from a journey through the entire Grand Canon, from Green River to the point where the Colorado debouches into the open plain in Arizona. The country is barren beyond description, unsusceptible of cultivation even by irrigation, and no discoveries of precious metals were made." (ENTIRE NOTE)
- 202 1869 J. W. Powell's Erforschung des westlichen Colorado. Globus (Illustrierte Zeitschrift für Länder- und Völkerkunde) (Braunschweig), 16(11) (October): 171-173. [In German.]
(transl. 'J. W. Powell's exploration of the western Colorado'; i.e., Colorado River of the West)
- 203 1869 The Colorado expedition. Scientific American, New Series, 21(15) (October 9): 229-230.
- 204 1869 The Grand Canon of the Colorado. The Cultivator and Country Gentleman (Albany, New York), 34 (October 14): 302.
- Overview and quotations from an item by "Col. [sic] J. W. Powell" in the New York Tribune (see under "Additional Descriptive Accounts By Powell", above).
- 205 1869 Powell's Erforschung des westlichen Coloradostromes. Globus (Illustrierte Zeitschrift für Länder- und Völkerkunde) (Braunschweig), 16(14) (November): 223-224. [In German.]
(transl. 'J. W. Powell's exploration of the western Colorado river'; i.e., Colorado River of the West)
- 206 1869 Voyage du colonel J. M. Powell [sic], dans le bassin du Colorado en 1869. Annales des Voyages, de la Géographie, de l'Histoire et de l'Archéologie (Paris), 4: 115-116. [In French.]
(transl. 'Voyage of Colonel J. M. Powell, in the Colorado basin in 1869.')
- Credited to New-York Herald.
- 207 1869 Voyage du colonel J. M. Powell [sic], dans le bassin du Colorado en 1869. Annales des Voyages, de la Géographie, de l'Histoire et de l'Archéologie (Paris), 4: 115-116. [In French.]
(transl. 'Voyage of Colonel J. M. Powell, in the Colorado basin in 1869.')
- Credited to New-York Herald.
- Daly, Charles Patrick
- 208 1874 Annual address; the geographical work of the world in 1872. Geographical Society of New York, Journal, 4: 63-118.
- See p. 66, and "Professor Powell's exploration of the Colorado River", p. 79.
- Daly, Charles Patrick
- 209 1875 Annual address; the geographical work of the world for 1875. Geographical Society of New York, Journal, 7: 31-92.
- See "Prof. J. W. Powell's Exploration of the Colorado", pp. 46-48.
- 210 1876 Professor Powell's explorations. American Geographical Society, Journal, 8: 58-59.
- 211 1876 Annual address; the geographical work of the world in 1874. Geographical Society of New York, Journal, 7: 53-92.
- See "Professor Powell's explorations", p. 65.

The Grand Canyon!

I. Primary Expedition Narratives

212 1878 Annual address; the geographical work of the world for 1875. Geographical Society of New York, Journal, 8: 31-92.

See "Prof. J. W. Powell's Exploration of the Colorado", pp. 46-48.

213 1878 Professor Powell's expedition. Geographical Society of New York, Journal, 8: 58-59.

Loew, Oscar

214 1879 Major Powell's Fahrt durch die Klammern des Großen Colorado. Deutsche Rundschau für Geographie und Statistik, 1(11) (August): 541-546, (12) (September): 602-608. [In German.]
(transl. 'Major Powell's journey through the gorges of the Great Colorado')

---

Principal Retellings

By and large, the principal retellings are rewritten for younger audiences, because most of the adult-genre tellings are those by Powell and expedition members, and by other authors and editors who have provided significant overviews and new information pertaining to the expeditions (see above).

Anderson, Peter

215 1992 Into the unknown: Major Powell's river journey. (Illustrations by Tom McFarland.) Helena, Montana: Falcon Press, 31 pp.

Bruns, Roger A.

216 1997 John Wesley Powell : explorer of the Grand Canyon. Springfield, New Jersey, and Aldershot, Hants., United Kingdom: Enslow Publishers, Inc., 128 pp.

Cahill, Tim

217 2013 Life preserver; 1869, American History Museum, explorer John Wesley Powell filled in "great blank spaces" on the map. Smithsonian, (November): 22.

Article written in the first-person, uniquely from the viewpoint of John Wesley Powell's life preserver. With William Hawkins' inscription on one side, quoted and illustrated.

Carlson, Vada F.

218 1974 John Wesley Powell : conquest of the canyon. (Drawings by Richard Cuffari.) Irvington-on-Hudson, New York: Harvey House, Inc., 158 [160] pp.

Frazer, Steve

219 1960 First through the Grand Canyon : the expedition of Major John Wesley Powell. Philadelphia: John C. Winston Co., 180 pp. [1st ed.] [Also printed by Holt, Rinehart and Winston (New York, 1960).]

The Grand Canyon!

I. Primary Expedition Narratives

Hale, Nathan

- 220 2019 Major Impossible. New York: Amulet (Harry N. Abrams, Inc.), 127 [128] pp. (Nathan Hale's Hazardous Tales.) [Cover includes sticker: "NHHT A Grand Canyon Tale".] [Hardbound. Comic book format.]

Regarding the Powell Expedition of 1869, with historical flashbacks in Powell's life. Adds (pp. 124-125) "Navigation of the Big Canon: A Terrible Voyage. The perilous journey of James White—in his own words and spelling" (also in comic book format); and (pp. 126-127) black-and-white reproductions of watercolor art made by the author during Colorado River trips in Grand Canyon.

Hicks, Mark A., AND Hicks, Donna E.

- 221 2010 The grand adventure : a true story of survival and determination on an amazing river journey into the Grand Canyon and other canyons of the West. [No place]: Book Landing, [32] pp. (Copyright 2000, 2010.) [Cover gives sub-title as: a true story of survival and determination on an amazing river journey through the Grand Canyon and other canyons of the West.] [An on-demand publication.]

About the Powell expedition.

Maurer, Richard

- 222 1999 The wild Colorado : the true adventures of Fred Dellenbaugh, age 17, on the second Powell expedition into the Grand Canyon. New York: Crown Publishers, Inc., 120 pp.

Place, Marian T.

- 223 1963 John Wesley Powell: Canyon's conqueror. (Illustrated by Harve Stein.) Boston: Houghton Mifflin Co., 191 pp. (Piper Books.)

See also White (1958).

Ray, Deborah Kogan

- 224 2007 Down the Colorado : John Wesley Powell, the one-armed explorer. New York: Frances Foster Books/Farrar, Straus and Giroux, [48] pp.

Reuben, Angela

- 225 2014 Conquering the great unknown. (Illustrations by J. Rae Chipera.) [No place]: Two Owls Press, LLC., 227 pp.

A narrative of the Powell expedition of 1869.

Ross, Michael Elsohn, AND Smith, Wendy

- 226 2000 Exploring the earth with John Wesley Powell. Minneapolis, Minnesota: Carolrhoda Books, Inc., 48 pp.

Rusho, W. L.

- 227 1969 Powell's canyon voyage. Palmer Lake, Colorado: Filter Press, 44 pp. (Wild and Woolly West Series, 11.)

A condensation prepared for the centennial of Powell's first expedition.

The Grand Canyon!

I. Primary Expedition Narratives

Souza, D. M. [Souza, Dorothy M.]

228 2004 John Wesley Powell. New York: Watts Library/Franklin Watts, 64 pp.

Summers, Richard Aldrich

229 1939 Conquerors of the river. (Illustrations by Donald McKay.) London, New York, and Toronto: Oxford University Press, 195 pp.

Ullman, James Ramsey

230 1960 Down the Colorado with Major Powell. (Illustrations by Nicholas Eggenhofer.) Boston: Houghton Mifflin Co. (The Riverside Press, Cambridge), 184 pp. (North Star Books, 17.)

Waldman, Stuart

231 2005 The last river : John Wesley Powell and the Colorado River exploring expedition. New York: Mikaya Press, 48 pp.

Walt Disney Productions

232 1960 Walt Disney's Ten Who Dared. New York: Dell Publishing Co., [32] pp. (Dell Movie Classic series, 1178.)

Comic book format. Inside covers, and back cover have promotional information for the Disney motion picture, "Ten Who Dared".]

White, Dale [pseudonym] [Place, Marian T.]

233 1958 John Wesley Powell : geologist-explorer. New York: Julian Messner, Inc., 192 pp. ("Published simultaneously in Canada by The Copp Clark Publishing Co., Limited".)

Fictionalized biographical account of Powell and the Colorado River expedition. See also Place (1963).

Wibberley, Leonard

234 1958 Wes Powell, conqueror of the Grand Canyon. New York: Ariel Books, 209 pp.

The Grand Canyon!

I. Primary Expedition Narratives

1871

U.S. Army Corps of Topographical Engineers Survey Commanded by Lt. (later Capt.) George Montague Wheeler

U.S. Geographical and Geological Explorations and Surveys
West of the 100th Meridian

GEORGE MONTAGUE WHEELER was a tough guy. Not so much in personal character as in pure gumption. When he had a mind—a military mind—to do something, he dragged his men along with him. One time, he crossed Death Valley in the dead of summer. But for pure unmitigated gall, he directed an *UP*stream expedition on the Colorado River into the Grand Canyon, in order to (he supposed) “complete” the Powell expedition down to the lower Colorado River of J. C. Ives—never mind the fact that Powell had himself already threaded through the great canyon exit of the Colorado River at the Grand Wash Cliffs in 1869. Wheeler—who directed one of the four geological and geographical surveys of the West prior to their melding into one U.S. Geological Survey (and thus was in direct administrative, fiscal, and employment competition with Powell’s own survey)—decided to drag his boats up through that opening, to the mouth of Diamond Creek, the exploratory benchmark of the Ives expedition of 1858. He thought it would be a simple matter. Of course, it wasn’t. Nor was it a simple matter to get his needless results into print. The upriver expedition took place in 1871; the results, with others of his similarly duplicative land survey that overlapped on Powell’s, were not published for another 18 years.

To be clear, Wheeler’s party barely made it to Diamond Creek, after numerous tedious delays in passing around the great rapids that then still existed in the lower part of Grand Canyon (that were drowned by Lake Mead behind Hoover Dam in the 1930s, though one by one the silted-in rapids may yet be refounded as the lake level drops dramatically due to drastically diminishing water supplies in the (re)aridification of the West). Still, his tardily published journal accounts for one of the most unusual, if not outrightly peculiar, of Colorado River expeditions.

The Grand Canyon!

I. Primary Expedition Narratives

George M. Wheeler 1871

Wheeler, George M.

- 235 1889 Report upon United States Geographical Surveys West of the One Hundredth Meridian, in charge of Capt. Geo. M. Wheeler . . . Volume 1.—Geographical report. Washington, D.C.: U.S. Government Printing Office, 780 pp. [Errata sheet tipped in on title-page.]

Publication of Volume 1 was greatly delayed. This volume contains the general narrative of the upstream expedition on the lower Colorado River, which ascended into Grand Canyon as far as Diamond Creek; see “Ascent of the Colorado River and Exploration of the Grand Cañon to the Mouth of Diamond Creek in 1871”, pp. 156-171, of which pp. 163-169 pertain to the ascent of the river in Grand Canyon. Several accompanying lithographic illustrations, drawn from photographs from various sources, depict parts of Grand Canyon that were not part of Wheeler’s survey. (See also Ranney and Dimock, 2015 [in Part III of this bibliography], which includes notes on this expedition and a transcription, with a few annotations, of the entire itinerary that includes the lower Colorado River to the Grand Canyon [that portion omitted here].)

“The report of the results from this special party of the expedition of 1871 is made in itinerary form, as the examinations presented special features, making this boat trip an expedition in itself and the route prominent above all others.

“The river party left camp at Cottonwood Springs, on the east base of the Spring Mountain Range, Nevada, and, traveling by the most direct line of march, reached Camp Mohave on the evening of the 12th of September. Here were stored the boats, three in number, that had been constructed in San Francisco and shipped via the mouth of the Colorado to this point. In addition thereto, one barge, the property of the Quartermaster’s Department, through the courtesy of the commanding officer, Bvt. Maj. R. H. Pond, at Camp Mohave, was added to the little fleet. • • •

“The river party consisted, in addition to myself, of P. W. Hamel, topographer; G. K. Gilbert, geologist; Dr. W. J. Hoffman, naturalist; T. H. O’Sullivan, photographer; E. M. Richardson, assistant topographer and artist; Frank Hecox, barometric assistant; F. W. Loring, general assistant; six boatmen, six enlisted men (one sergeant and five privates from Company G, Twelfth Infantry) from Camp Mohave, and Captain Asquit and thirteen other Indians of the Mohave tribe. • • • ”

Inasmuch as this was a unique expedition—one which later historians have asserted was quite unnecessary for the stated purpose of supposedly making “complete and final” the exploration of the Colorado River, an example of Wheeler’s overbearing personality and command leadership—the entire itinerary through Grand Canyon is transcribed here; the omissions are those where illustrations are described. On the other hand, this priceless record of a monumentally difficult (if purposeless) expedition is one that is not generally accessible to casual readers in its largely unabridged form.

“October 7.—Camp No. 19, near foot of the Grand Cañon. The land parties are left this morning to take one more day for recuperation, and the three boat parties merrily start out to search for further wonders in the Grand Cañon, imagining but few of the many difficulties that were soon to be met.

“Gilbert Camp is reached at 1 p. m., but he had not then returned from the summit of the plateau. A little farther on a full view, magnificent beyond description, of the walls of the Grand Cañon is had [Grand Wash Cliffs]. Camp is made after nightfall on the southern shore, near a little stream trickling from the sides of the cañon. Sheltered by the foliage that clusters around this little ravine one manages to protect himself from the wind-drifting sand. In the vicinity of the old Ute crossing, near the foot of the Grand Cañon, the river widens and

The Grand Canyon!

I. Primary Expedition Narratives

the rapids are more shallow. This is the best point yet noted for fording, still in the lowest of waters swimming would be necessary, and at high water doubtless the swift current would prohibit this method even. • • •

"October 8.—Camp No. 20, head of Winding Rapids. In following up the little ravine near the camp the source of its pure stream of water is discovered, and near it most beautiful beds of ferns. The photographer remains in this locality taking views. The springs near the Tufa Bluffs, on the north side, not far from our former camp, were examined and four were named—Tufa, Grotto, Baptismal Font, and Holy Water Cup. The temperature of these springs is 70 degrees Fahrenheit. The water is most clear and sparkling. A small stream of water, entering the river from a side cañon to the south, was passed where elm trees were seen. Five rapids are passed within two miles. A section of the river is here made by Mr. Hamel, and observations for time and latitude are taken by myself.

"October 9.—River Camp No. 21, near Cascade Rapids. Camp is broken early and the start made in fine style. It is hoped this day to make considerable distance, but soon many rapids are stumbled across, and at noon 9 had been passed, and prior to sunset, 15, some of which had as many as three falls. Observed three tufa mineral springs about noon, temperature 70 degrees. During the day a monument on the north shore was passed in which was found a memorandum signed by '4' men, one of whom was O. D. Gass, of Las Vegas Ranch, Nevada, who had ascended to this point in 1864(?) (The '4' was partly obliterated.)

"The rapids are more formidable than any yet seen. I am satisfied that no one has ever ascended the river above this point, and Mr. Gass, one of the 4 persons mentioned above, told me in 1869 at Las Vegas ranch that he considered it impossible to penetrate further. It is for this party to try it, however, and if successful to-morrow there will seem to be little doubt of reaching Diamond Creek. Traveled 7½ miles to-day. The narrowest point in the river yet reached is immediately above Tufa Springs—75 feet. Its bed here is one of erosion through the underlying granite walls rising on either side. The coarse carving, noted in detail on the limestone and boulders of débris beaches, is here shown on a grander and more picturesque scale than elsewhere seen. The geological horizon of granite is just reached, and it is not improbable that it extends as far as Diamond Creek, where it was noted by Dr. Newberry, in 1858. A wash with high banks comes in at the camp from the north and is covered with driftwood, evidencing the rise at stages of high water. • • •

"October 10.—River Camp No. 22, opposite Vernal Falls. We traveled this day not far from five miles. Two boats are lost over the rapid immediately in front of our camp, but secured again without damage. Early to-day a rapid is passed with a direct fall of at least 8 feet. The entire fall of the rapid before mentioned is 35 feet, above which comes smooth water for approximately 1½ miles, flowing along solid granite walls of the cañons on either side. Another rapid met during the day calls for all the strength of the different crews. Much water has been taken by the boats. At last a long rapid of two falls appears, with smooth water at its head, extending for quite a distance. The boats succeed in passing the first one a little after dark. It is not considered safe to try the other, as everything has to be unloaded and the first boat has been very nearly swamped. Therefore a dark and dreary camp is made among the débris of the slopes, where, cuddled up Indian fashion, the weary hours of the night are passed. The labor of the past few days has been very wearing upon the men, and one of the strongest Indians was thrown upon the rocks and badly bruised, making two invalids in the party. I have several times during the day despaired of reaching Diamond Creek in time to join the relief party there, as each rapid in turn seems to be more powerful than the last, and the number per mile is evidently on the increase; and, furthermore, it appears unlikely that any party has ascended the river farther than this locality, or that one ever will. Still, the objective point can be reached, it is believed, if the men and boats hold together. Traveled approximately 5 miles and camped on north shore.

"October 11.—Camp No. 23, below Disaster Rapid. This morning Mr. Gilbert makes certain special geological examinations, among others examining an injected dike-like mass of basalt in the granite. Portage is made, and the rapid near camp passed. Another appears within one-fourth of a mile, then smooth water for a little distance, after which a powerful rapid that takes the strength of all of the three crews. Then appears another stretch of fair water that brings one to the worst rapid of the trip. All the boats are brought up and lines thrown ahead. This rapid seemed long but not dangerous, however, but the first boat going into it proved differently. The first dash filled the boat with water, the second swamped it, and in this way the lives of two boatmen were endangered. The boat ran back against the rocks almost a perfect wreck, and its contents were washed down

The Grand Canyon!

I. Primary Expedition Narratives

below the overhanging rocks. A stout case containing my most valuable private and public papers and data for a great share of the season's report, which for the first time had not been taken out of the boat at a portage, was lost, as well as valuable instruments, the astronomical and meteorological observations, and worse than all the entire rations of that boat. These losses could not be made good, and this disaster threatened to drive the cañon parties back to the barge station at the crossing, thus pronouncing the trip a partial failure. Night came, and the boats dropped back about half a mile to camp. Weary myself and much dispirited, it is still necessary to maintain cheerfulness toward the little party, who see great trouble ahead. A compact vein of basaltic lava of 6 feet thickness obtruding through the granite was noticed, as also like intrusions at a number of points elsewhere on either side of the cañon. The granite grows higher and is beautifully sculptured in pot-holes and other forms.

"October 12.—Reached Camp No. 24, head of Disaster Rapid. The morning is occupied in searching up and down the river for any trace of articles lost from boat No. 1, but without success. Our party are all despondent, and as the boat swamped yesterday was badly damaged, and rations are very short, a portion of the party is here detached to make the descent in this boat, with the expectation of reaching the land party and following their trail to the southward from the point on the river where the barge lies anchored. No one except Mr. Gilbert and myself think that the boats can pass the rapids in front of us. It requires no little courage to continue farther on, since one day later would prevent a return in time to meet the relief party at the river-crossing, and the barge has rations only up to a certain date. Mr. Gilbert and myself propose to reassure the men by taking the first boat across the rapid. Portage of the stores is made to the wash at the head of the rapids, which consumes the greater share of the day, and half an hour before twilight a rope is stretched and the emergency prepared for. The entire force is stationed along the line, and the cast-off is made. In the minutes the worst part of the rapid is over, and just as the sun sinks gloomily behind the cañon horizon the worst rapid is triumphantly passed, amid the cheers and exultations of every member of the party. Astronomical observations were made here.

"October 13.—River Camp No. 25. This morning the second boat passes Disaster Rapid successfully, and a fresh start for the further ascent is made. Three other severe rapids are passed during the day, still the distance traveled has been nearly six miles. About 3 p. m. a beautiful vista is passed, formed by the granite boulders that approach quite to the bed of the river, contracting the channel so as to produce an enormous current. The shifting current for quite a distance has sculptured strange contours among the granite walls that at this low stage protrude above the water. Many are carved like full columns, others honeycombed in extravagance of form, making the view in all its phases the grandest and most sublime of any noticed along the route. The channel here is the narrowest yet met—being less than 50 feet wide. The thickness of the granite beds becomes greater and greater, and now reaches from 700 to 800 feet. The more solid the granite the less dangerous and difficult the rapids and falls. This is easily explained, since the rapids have formed by accumulated debris breaking in from the side cañons, and from the boulders detaching from the sides of the main wall and falling into the stream. The latter more frequently make the dam, and the irregular flow of the water causes these most terrible rapids. It becomes necessary to make a very difficult portage just at dusk. It is very severe, since the men are greatly worn. The hope of ultimate success sustains the sinking courage as also the belief that no one will follow speedily in our tracks, thus making the ascending exploration of the river complete and final.

"October 14.—At River Camp No. 26, above Portage Rapids. The temperature at night in the cañon has been of late decreasing, and the morning fire that can be made by a little drift-wood picked up is very agreeable. An old Indian trail is found in the creek that comes into the cañon from the south. There are a few hills of scanty corn of this season's growth, while a little avenue among the willows seems to have been planted with beans in hills, but no appearance of fruit. The Indians have evidently been here in the early spring, but not since. One of the worst rapids of the trip was met to-day, which obliged the portage of the boats with all the stores for fully one-fourth of a mile. Mr. Hamel and myself penetrated a second creek coming in from the south, following a gentler slope than any yet seen, which leads to the belief that possibly one could emerge by it from the cañon bed, if necessary. The distance to-day is  $2\frac{3}{4}$  miles. It took six hours to pass the rapid above mentioned. This morning the rear boat picked up a duck floating down the stream that had been killed by a shot, and it is hoped this may indicate that the land party has reached the mouth of Diamond Creek, and that it is not far distant.

"Camp is made at a southern bend of the river, and for the first time out of sight of a rapid. Now and then a stray duck is seen, but hardly any other winged animals. The flora of the side cañons is extremely meager.

The Grand Canyon!

I. Primary Expedition Narratives

Their streams have no fish. A peculiar salmon and hunchback are found in the river at places, but being without hooks it has been impossible to increase the scanty stock of provisions. No new plants or other forms appear, and the entire cañon is but one grand rock laboratory. Noted to-day a small snake with black and white rings, different from any yet seen. Traveled  $2\frac{3}{4}$  miles, approximately.

"October 15.—River Camp No. 27, Castaway Rapids. After an inspection of provisions held this morning, it becomes necessary to further curtail the amounts allowed to each individual. A rapid is passed early in the day with a fall of 8.8 feet, at which point the river is  $48\frac{5}{8}$  feet in width. Eleven rapids are met and passed during the day, the entire distance gained being about  $3\frac{1}{4}$  miles. The semi-granite walls appear on either hand with a superior cap of sandstone more prominent, giving at this special locality great perpendicularity to the walls. Towing is hence a thing very much to be dreaded. The short lengths of apparently smooth water are becoming less frequent, and swift currents are noted at each turn in the river. This indicates—and our aneroids verify the fact—that the fall per mile increases at every step.

"Mr. Gilbert's boat is cast away in pulling through the last rapid, and he and Hecox go so far down the stream that the crew could not reach them, hence they go supperless to bed among the rocks in this wild cañon. Our camp is a little shelving place in the rocks, with scarcely room enough for the little party to sleep among the boulders. Everyone is gloomy at the prospect, starvation staring one in the face without the certainty of relief either in advance or retreat.

"October 16.—Camp No. 28, Starvation Camp. To-day it has often been necessary to climb as high as 100 feet to pass the tow-rope ahead. Two portages of stores were necessary, and one portage of the boats. In passing the third nest of rapids the rope parted and one of the boats was cast away upon one of the roughest rapids in the river. The sight, although exciting, was an extremely sickening one. The boat was caught, however, on the other side, and extricated after much difficulty. Such accidents are disheartening in the face of the presumable dangers yet in advance, the number and extent of which are yet unknown. The boat upon the second trial, however, passed safely. Washes reach the river from either side at the head of this rapid, and hence the magnitude of the dam accounts for its length. The one from the north is a stream with about 200 inches flow; the one from the other direction has a very gentle slope.

"Mr. Hamel climbed the granite wall, and reports it smooth and level on the top of the mesa. It may yet be necessary to take this route to the mouth of Diamond Creek. Astronomical observations were made for time and latitude. The entire rations of the party scarcely make a re-enforce to my blanket pillow, where they are at night placed as a precaution.

"October 17.—Camp No. 29, below Concealed Rapids. Made a portage of boats to-day among the narrowest and heaviest rapids of the trip. Width 35 feet, fall  $10\frac{1}{10}$  feet. Speculations are rife to-day as to the prospect of either want and starvation and inability to get out of the cañon, and yet I believe there will be some loophole in event of the utmost emergency. Fortunately the weather during the day continues fine. The warm genial sun now and then reaches the river and improves the temperature of the water, with which all persons have constantly to deal, and the hands are not so cold that any of the party suffer in consequence. The river trip would still continue practicable were the unforeseen trials and privations known so as to be mastered. As it is, each day seems like an age, and the danger of complete disaster stares one so plainly in the face that a state of uneasiness naturally prevails. To day I have been thinking over a plan of sending forward upon the mesas to reach Diamond Creek. My mind is still bent upon taking the boats to their original destination if they will hold together. It has been necessary to guard the entire stock of rations in person for the last few days. It is decided this evening in the event of emergency that the boats shall be abandoned, the mesa reached on foot, and the mouth of Diamond Creek thus reached. Gained  $3\frac{1}{2}$  miles to-day. Saw the new moon by daylight, 2 p. m.

"October 18.—River Camp No. 30, Look-ahead Camp. It is now hardly daylight until 7 o'clock, at which time the weary labors of the day are begun. A portage about 9 o'clock is effected at a rapid where some ugly boulders of enormous proportions are the only beach. To-day the fifth castaway is noted, and Gilbert and Salmon try their luck at swimming. It is estimated that the distance to the mouth of Diamond Creek cannot exceed 17 miles. The track of a man's foot with boots or shoes on is noted on the southern bank. It is hoped that it may be some one from the relief party. A longer portage of boats has to be made, but it proves successful, and the camp at night is so selected that it is believed the mesa in close proximity may be climbed in the morning. Notwithstanding

The Grand Canyon!

I. Primary Expedition Narratives

the great obstacles of the day, a distance of 3½ miles has been gained. The boats are leaking badly. Complete instructions are made for the two messengers, Hecox and Roberts, who volunteered to start out in the morning to reach Diamond Creek. This seems a necessary measure, as the lives of twenty persons are now dependent upon the success of the messengers sent ahead for food. A fair-sized loaf is cooked for each, and they will depart at daylight. Between 10 and 11 a. m. Mr. Gilbert saw plainly the planet Venus. Astronomical observations were here taken.

"October 19.—Camp No. 31, mouth of Diamond Creek. The climb to the top of the first mesa is very steep, but it was pleasant to find that there was sufficient space to the rear to admit of a pretty level trail along the next series of bluffs. The messengers feel hopeful, and fully appreciate the necessity for vigorous efforts on their part. It is fully understood by them that the parties intend to abandon the boats and follow on their trail on the morning of the 22d, if no assistance is sent before then. There is a slight chance of their reaching Diamond Creek and bringing provisions back by the second night. If not there must be considerable suffering on the part of those left with the boats. At a mile a little creek is crossed, on which old fire beds show the presence of Indians in their hunting season. I attempted to explore the bed of the stream crossing into the river, and was obliged to climb to the lower mesas, narrowly escaping a fall of 150 feet. The cañon cut out by this stream is the most romantic I have ever examined among the varied scenes of years of mountain life. Shortly after, one of the members finds a fish-pole and line with a large salmon attached, which probably came from the party at the mouth of Diamond Creek, and a little later a float and message from Hecox, who had reached the mouth of Diamond Creek. About 2 p. m. a signal is seen, which proves to be a handkerchief left by [Charles] Spencer, about 6 miles ahead, toward which all possible exertion is made, hoping to reach that point before sundown. Camp is reached before dark, not knowing until then how tired and weary all had become. Mr. Hamel reports having seen during the day a star at a point in the cañon where the upper walls were in close proximity. Sextant observations for time and latitude were here made, and also a cross-section of the river by Mr. Hamel. • • •

"Observations for time and latitude were made by Lieutenant Lockwood and myself at the mouth of Diamond Creek. This same point had been reached by Ives during his land trip eastward to Fort Defiance. The relief party is overhauled at Peach Tree Spring by the advance runners, and they and a fresh relief party from the rendezvous at Truxton Springs reach the river on the 20th, bringing mental comfort and rations. A number of the boat party proceed the 21st to join the rendezvous, while the balance begin their perilous journey down-stream, joining the barge and continuing the descent to Mohave, which point was reached in safety on the evening of the fifth day, thus evidencing the difference in rate of travel whether with or against the current."

---

Ancillary Expedition Publications That Include Grand Canyon

Wheeler, George M.

236 NO DATE Photographs showing landscapes, geological and other features, of portions of the western territory of the United States, obtained in connection with Geographical and Geological Explorations and Surveys West of the 100th Meridian : season of 1871. [No imprint], [Caption and seal] U.S. War Department, U.S. Army, Corps of Engineers, [Washington, D.C.: U.S. Geographical and Geological Survey West of the 100th Meridian], [albumen prints, hand-assembled on heavy stock, in folio].

Summarized list of photographs included in the volume that relate to Grand Canyon:

12. Camp at the Crossing of the Colorado, just below the Mouth of the Grand Cañon.
13. Triangulation Station, near the Mouth of the Grand Cañon, Colorado River.
14. Grotto Spring, Grand Cañon, Colorado River.
15. View in the Grand Cañon of the Colorado. Walls 5,000 feet in height.
16. Maiman, a Mohave Indian; guide and interpreter.
17. Baptismal Font, about 6 miles above Mouth of the Grand Cañon.
18. View across the Grand Cañon from Grotto Spring.
19. Grand Cañon, junction of Diamond and Colorado Rivers.

The Grand Canyon!

I. Primary Expedition Narratives

20. View of the Grand Cañon. Walls near Mouth of Diamond River.
21. Types of Mohave Indians.
22. Fred. W. Loring, in his campaign costume, with his Mule "Evil Merodach."

Corresponding views of most of the photographs in the volume were also produced and distributed as stereographs. Stereoviews are itemized in Appendix 2 of Part 26 in THE GRAND CANON Volume 1.

- 237 NO DATE Photographs showing landscapes, geological and other features, of portions of the western territory of the United States, obtained in connection with Geographical and Geological Explorations and Surveys West of the 100th Meridian : season of 1872. [No imprint], [Caption and seal] U.S. War Department, U.S. Army, Corps of Engineers, [Washington, D.C.: U.S. Geographical and Geological Survey West of the 100th Meridian], [albumen prints, hand-assembled on heavy stock, in folio].

Summarized list of photographs included in the volume that relate to Grand Canyon and immediate vicinity:

10. Near Jacob's Pool, in Northern Arizona.
11. The "Vermillion Cliff," as seen from Jacob's Pool, Arizona.
12. Perched Block of Sandstone.
13. "The Bear," a Mass of Sandstone, fallen from the Cliffs near the Mouth of the Paria.
14. Cañon of Kanab Creek, near its junction with the Grand Cañon of the Colorado River.
15. "The Bath," a Dripping Spring in the Kanab Cañon.
- 16-21. Cañon of Kanab Creek, near its junction with the Grand Cañon of the Colorado River.
22. Mouth of the Kanab Creek.
24. Grand Cañon, Mouth of Kanab Wash.
25. Grand Cañon of the Colorado, near the Mouth of the Kanab Creek.
- 28-30. Three Views of the Marble Cañon, one of the Gorges of the Colorado, here 1,200 feet deep.
31. Devil's Anvil, near foot of To-ro-weap Valley.
- 32, 33. Northern Wall of the Grand Cañon of the Colorado, near the foot of To-ro-weap Valley.
- 34-39. Grand Cañon of the Colorado, near the foot of To-ro-weap Valley. River 3,000 feet below.

Corresponding views of most of the photographs in the volume were also produced and distributed as stereographs. Stereoviews are itemized in Appendix 2 of Part 26 in THE GRAND CANON Volume 1.

- 238 NO DATE Photographs showing landscapes, geological and other features, of portions of the western territory of the United States, obtained in connection with Geographical and Geological Explorations and Surveys West of the 100th Meridian : seasons of 1871, 1872, 1873 and 1874. [No imprint], [Caption and seal] U.S. War Department, U.S. Army, Corps of Engineers, [Washington, D.C.: U.S. Geographical and Geological Survey West of the 100th Meridian], [25 albumen prints, hand-assembled on heavy stock, in folio]. [1874?]

- 239 1875 List of landscape and stereoscopic views taken in connection with geographical explorations and surveys west of the one hundredth meridian. Washington, D.C.: U.S. Government Printing Office, 8, [1] pp. (With caption of U.S. Army Engineer Department.) [NOTE: This is now an exceedingly scarce publication, an original not known to be held in the U.S.; not seen for this bibliography.]

- 240 1983 Wheeler's photographic survey of the American West, 1871-1873 : with 50 landscape photographs by Timothy O'Sullivan and William Bell. New York: Dover Publications, Inc., [50] pp.

The Grand Canyon!

I. Primary Expedition Narratives

1879

Surveys in Utah and Arizona by Capt. Clarence Edward Dutton, 1878–1880 Under the Direction of John Wesley Powell

U.S. Geological and Geographical Survey of the Rocky Mountain Region *later U.S. Geological Survey

CLARENCE DUTTON was first. True, Joseph C. Ives (with Balduin Möllhausen) and John Wesley Powell may have been the first in time to write descriptions of their encounters with Grand Canyon, but Ives was a generalist, Möllhausen was a writer of popular books and articles and novels, and Powell figured the scene from the funneled perspective of the river down which his party rowed. They never were in advance of Dutton's pleasing Classical views that buttressed the canyon's features with analogies to great architecture and human spiritual cultures. The accounts of Ives, Möllhausen, and Powell are justifiably the pioneers of the Grand Canyon genre, but in terms of inner impression Dutton was the first; and every author since has emulated him, purposely or not, putting every possible spin on the theme, and even so much as quoting Dutton in order to embellish the accounts of their own encounters with the canyon.<sup>6</sup> One has only to examine, in full, all the other accounts in order to tally many of

---

<sup>6</sup> Möllhausen stepped out with the brief observation (in translation here), "There stood temples of marvelous architecture, long porticoes, and mighty but delicately formed pyramids; wide vaults, arched windows and gates opened up . . . ." Elsewhere he observed at Cataract Creek (Havasus Canyon), "The average breadth of this crag was not less than six miles, but it was as it were divided in two by a wall-like extension of the plateau, which was adorned with such strange formations that one really thought one saw before one the well-preserved ruins of an Indian city." (As quoted farther above, and as included fully in "Balduin Möllhausen's Grand Canyon: An English Translation from Travels into the Rocky Mountains of North America to the High Plateau of New Mexico [Reisen in die Felsengebirge Nord-Amerikas bis zum Hoch-Plateau von Neu-Mexico] (1861)", Earle E. Spamer, ed., Raven's Perch Media, Philadelphia, 2022, electronic document at <https://ravensperch.org>.) A brief note by John Strong Newberry, from his geological report of the Ives expedition, also foretells the never-ending architectural analogies by later writers: "Many of these buttes exhibit a singular resemblance to the spires and pyramids which form the architectural ornaments of the cities of the same themes; again and again. They are like the musical canon, in which a melody works with contapuntal imitations of it. The melody is Dutton's; and everything since is, really, an impersonation. In fact, so often have the same things been itemized, shifting phrases and choices of bullet-points from across the whole of Western and Eastern Civilizations, that the most egregiously predictable ones have been omitted from the transcripts that appear in this volume, usually with my note that "more of the same" has been skipped over. Not so with Dutton. In the sixteen pages he devotes to Point Sublime, he does sneak in a few geological technicalities, but only here and there, and he moves on with his romantic and sensitive perceptions; none of it can be discarded as imaginative.

The Grand Canyon!

I. Primary Expedition Narratives

Then there is—the Atlas! Not only does it now command five-figure prices in the antiquarian book markets—the text and the atlas together originally sold for $10.12—but it commands great respect among Grand Canyonphiles. One can only imagine the sort of administrative posturing there had to have been in order to fund the creation of the atlas—24 folio sheets, assembled in double-folio format (huge), comprising among them five geological maps and fourteen scenic (and physiographically informative) views. Three of those views make up the monumental "Panorama From Point Sublime" by William Henry Holmes: civilized nations." Even though both Möllhausen and Newberry—who incidentally traveled together—were truly the first to draw upon the grand architecture of the Grand Canyon, their notes either have not been known or have been overlooked by later writers. And further, Ives himself had begun the practice while reconnoitering in Black Canyon on the lower Colorado River, a month before the Grand Canyon visit by Möllhausen, Newberry and himself. There, Ives described scenes that we may appreciate as an unanticipated rehearsal for the Grand Canyon (p. 86 of his "General Report"): "Stately façades, august cathedrals, amphitheatres, rotundas, castellated walls, and rows of time-stained ruins, surmounted by every form of tower, minaret, dome, and spire, have been moulded from the cyclopean masses of rock that form the mighty defile."

---

The Grand Canyon!

I. Primary Expedition Narratives

These and Holmes' other lithographed views were created almost photographically, with the use of the camera obscura. And there is, too, the muddy impression of "The Transept" by painter Thomas Moran; in his style, habitually crowded:

(Library of Congress)

Sometimes Moran's atlas sheet was "Colorado muddy". In producing the volume, some copies were over-inked. This resulted in the leaves having had the tendency to stick together, which could be damaged when readers tried to peel them apart.<sup>7</sup>

But it is the view from Point Sublime that has stood the test of time; it is probably the one pen-portrait of the canyon that has been the most reproduced. Surprisingly, it is not overbearing in its word descriptions of the canyon and the world round about it—those sorts of impressions came with the visitors whose processions to the canyon in the coming years arrived aboard steed, wagon, automobile, motorcycle, train (whether with wooden benches or comfortable Pullman berths), boat (wooden, rubber, fiberglass, and other, even steel)—even on foot occasionally—they all wanted to "see the Grand Canyon". Then they suffered us their impressions. Some of them felt the necessity to back up their thoughts by quoting Dutton (and others), often without credit, but most turned on their heads to let blood rush to their overcome brains in order to lubricate and discharge every last adjective, simile, allegory, metaphor, idiom, and image, sometimes with insufferable detailing and other times

---

<sup>7</sup> Thanks to Richard D. Quartaroli and Daniel F. Cassidy for their observations and experiences.

The Grand Canyon!

I. Primary Expedition Narratives

just excruciatingly badly, at our tortured expense. We get the idea!—again and again and again.

At least, Dutton was first to craft the worldly views of the Grand Canyon, and he did not have to “get” anything, because he was on payroll. He did not have to write that chapter; but we are oh, oh so much better for it because he did. Surely he never imagined what the canyon would become, with its millions of yearly visitors. Thank heaven each of those millions has not sat down to write of their experiences “just for us”! So what is presented here in this volume, alongside Dutton and the venerable first explorers and travelers, are some of those who did bother to write of their canyon encounters, in various ways, before the true onslaught on the canyon came. I may regret saying this, much as Lt. Ives might today regret that he ever had said they would be “the last” ever to visit the canyon, but from here on out I can imagine that there is so much to distill, especially in the social media contexts of instantaneous communication, that any attempt to comprehensively gather it all up now is impossible; and the task of even trying to edit through it might be just as impossible (except perhaps with the help of Artificial Intelligence, as they call it, which is bound to be a hack job anyway). We certainly can be glad—overjoyed—that Dutton never had such help.

Astute readers may apprehend that I have almost wholly overlooked newspapers in this volume. In them is a trove of greater capital and mediocrity both; scattered to the four corners of the world. Good luck with that.

Charles F. Lummis—one of the early visitors, and a pretty good writer at that—said in 1895:

There are people who will write back full descriptions of the Great White Throne to the Podunk Palladium—if they shall succeed in smuggling their present intelligences into heaven. Meantime, some of them try to word-picture the Grand Cañon of the Colorado. But less immodest visitors will feel with a well-known writer who said: “The sense of proportion is not always in me. I have done many ill things. But put it on my tombstone that I have seen the Grand Cañon of the Colorado and never attempted to describe it!”<sup>8</sup>

---

<sup>8</sup> I have not found the source credited to the “well-known writer.” Perhaps Lummis himself?

The Grand Canyon!

I. Primary Expedition Narratives

Clarence Edward Dutton 1878–1880

Dutton, Clarence Edward

- 241 1882 The physical geology of the Grand Cañon district. U.S. Geological Survey, 2nd Annual Report, pp. 47-166. (U.S. 47th Congress, 1st Session, House of Representatives Executive Document 1, Part 5, Volume 3.) [Also seen as a separate, retaining original pagination.]
- 242 1882 Tertiary history of the Grand Cañon district : with atlas. U.S. Geological Survey, Monograph 2, 264 pp. [text, quarto]; Atlas, 24 sheets [double folio, sheets 21¼ × 17 inches].

Atlas title-page: Department of the Interior United States Geological Survey J.W.Powell Director Atlas to Accompany the Monograph on the Tertiary History of the Grand Cañon District by Capt. Clarence E. Dutton U.S.A. [vignette] Washington 1882 Julius Bien and Co. Lith. New York.

Atlas collation: title-page, "List of Atlas Sheets" (equivalent to Atlas Sheet I), 22 sheets (Atlas Sheets II-XXIII, comprising tinted and chromo-lithographic maps and scenic views).

John G. Ames (Comprehensive index to the publications of the United States government, 1881-1892, U.S. Government Printing Office, Washington, 1905, p. 556) indicates that the monograph was submitted for printing March 1, 1881.

Inasmuch as Dutton's description of the canyon seen in 1879 from Point Sublime on the North Rim has been widely quoted from, and included in anthologies, it could be worthwhile to omit this long text here—except that in doing so it would deny the object of this volume serving as a single source of quotations. Thus it is also reprinted here; and, being in digital format, users can easily extract from it for their own further needs. It is a magnificent chapter amidst a largely technical volume, aspects of which testify to Dutton's widely acclaimed poetic vision. These are, after all, his own felt expressions of his encounter with Grand Canyon—which set the tone for virtually every encounter people have had over the past century and a half (though, truth be told, when the 20th century began to age people who wrote of their experiences lost their ability to see—and label—grand architectural and classical visions; a loss, perhaps, or perhaps not). In the sixteen pages he devotes to Point Sublime, he does sneak in a few geological technicalities, but only here and there, and he moves on with his romantic and sensitive perceptions; none of it can be discarded as imaginative. His account begins with the approach to the rim at the end of the chapter preceding the Point Sublime chapter:

" • • • The route now becomes more rugged, leading across ravines and over intervening ridges, crossing the grain of the country, so to speak. But it is not difficult, for the pines have taken place of the spruces, and where the pines predominate the forest is very open. For eight miles from the Milk Spring we continue to cross hills and valleys, then follow a low swale shaded by giant pines with trunks three to four feet in thickness. The banks are a parterre of flowers. On yonder hillside, beneath one of these kingly trees, is a spot which seems to glow with an unwonted wealth of floral beauty. It is scarcely a hundred yards distant; let us pluck a bouquet from it. We ride up the slope.

"The earth suddenly sinks at our feet to illimitable depths. In an instant, in the twinkling of an eye, the awful scene is before us.

CHAPTER VIII.

THE PANORAMA FROM POINT SUBLIME.

"Wherever we reach the Grand Cañon in the Kaibab it bursts upon the vision in a moment. Seldom is any warning given that we are near the brink. At the Toroweap it is quite otherwise. There we are notified that we are near it a day before we reach it. As the final march to that portion of the chasm is made the scene gradually

The Grand Canyon!

I. Primary Expedition Narratives

develops, growing by insensible degrees more grand until at last we stand upon the brink of the inner gorge, where all is before us. In the Kaibab the forest reaches to the sharp edge of the cliff and the pine trees shed their cones into the fathomless depths below.

"If the approach is made at random, with no idea of reaching any particular point by a known route, the probabilities are that it is first seen from the rim of one of the vast amphitheatres which set back from the main chasm far into the mass of the plateau. It is such a point to which the reader has been brought in the preceding chapter. Of course there are degrees in the magnitude and power of the pictures presented, but the smallest and least powerful is tremendous and too great for comprehension. The scenery of the amphitheatres far surpasses in grandeur and nobility anything else of the kind in any other region, but it is mere by-play in comparison with the panorama displayed in the heart of the cañon. The supreme views are to be obtained at the extremities of the long promontories, which jut out between these recesses far into the gulf. Towards such a point we now direct our steps. The one we have chosen is on the whole the most commanding in the Kaibab front, though there are several others which might be regarded as very nearly equal to it, or as even more imposing in some respects. We named it Point Sublime.

"The route is of the same character as that we have already traversed—open pine forest, with smooth and gently-rolling ground. The distance from the point where we first touched the rim of the amphitheater is about 5 miles. Nothing is seen of the chasm until about a mile from the end we come once more upon the brink. Reaching the extreme verge the packs are cast off, and sitting upon the edge we contemplate the most sublime and awe-inspiring spectacle in the world.

"The Grand Cañon of the Colorado is a great innovation in modern ideas of scenery, and in our conceptions of the grandeur, beauty, and power of nature. As with all great innovations it is not to be comprehended in a day or a week, nor even in a month. It must be dwelt upon and studied, and the study must comprise the slow acquisition of the meaning and spirit of that marvelous scenery which characterizes the Plateau Country, and of which the great chasm is the superlative manifestation. The study and slow mastery of the influences of that class of scenery and its full appreciation is a special culture, requiring time, patience, and long familiarity for its consummation. The lover of nature, whose perceptions have been trained in the Alps, in Italy, Germany, or New England, in the Appalachians or Cordilleras, in Scotland or Colorado, would enter this strange region with a shock, and dwell there for a time with a sense of oppression, and perhaps with horror. Whatsoever things he had learned to regard as beautiful and noble he would seldom or never see, and whatsoever he might see would appear to him as anything but beautiful and noble. Whatsoever might be bold and striking would at first seem only grotesque. The colors would be the very ones he had learned to shun as tawdry and bizarre. The tones and shades, modest and tender, subdued yet rich, in which his fancy had always taken special delight, would be the ones which are conspicuously absent. But time would bring a gradual change. Some day he would suddenly become conscious that outlines which at first seemed harsh and trivial have grace and meaning; that forms which seemed grotesque are full of dignity; that magnitudes which had added enormity to coarseness have become replete with strength and even majesty; that colors which had been esteemed unrefined, immodest, and glaring, are as expressive, tender, changeful, and capacious of effects as any others. Great innovations, whether in art or literature, in science or in nature, seldom take the world by storm. They must be understood before they can be estimated, and must be cultivated before they can be understood.

"It is so with the Grand Cañon. The observer who visits its commanding points with the expectation of experiencing forthwith a rapturous exaltation, an ecstasy arising from the realization of a degree of grandeur and sublimity never felt before, is doomed to disappointment. Supposing him to be but little familiar with plateau scenery, he will be simply bewildered. Must he, therefore, pronounce it a failure, an overpraised thing? Must he entertain a just resentment towards those who may have raised his expectations too high? The answer is that subjects which disclose their full power, meaning, and beauty as soon as they are presented to the mind have very little of those qualities to disclose. Moreover, a visitor to the chasm or to any other famous scene must necessarily come there (for so is the human mind constituted) with a picture of it created by his own imagination. He reaches the spot, the conjured picture vanishes in an instant, and the place of it must be filled anew. Surely no imagination can construct out of its own material any picture having the remotest resemblance to the Grand

The Grand Canyon!

I. Primary Expedition Narratives

Cañon. In truth, the first step in attempting a description is to beg the reader to dismiss from his mind, so far as practicable, any preconceived notion of it.

"Those who have long and carefully studied the Grand Cañon of the Colorado do not hesitate for a moment to pronounce it by far the most sublime of all earthly spectacles. If its sublimity consisted only in its dimensions, it could be sufficiently set forth in a single sentence. It is more than 200 miles long, from 5 to 12 miles wide, and from 5,000 to 6,000 feet deep. There are in the world valleys which are longer and a few which are deeper. There are valleys flanked by summits loftier than the palisades of the Kaibab. Still the Grand Cañon is the sublimest thing on earth. It is so not alone by virtue of its magnitudes, but by virtue of the whole—its ensemble.

"The common notion of a cañon is that of a deep, narrow gash in the earth, with nearly vertical walls, like a great and neatly cut trench. There are hundreds of chasms in the Plateau Country which answer very well to this notion. Many of them are sunk to frightful depths and are fifty to a hundred miles in length. Some are exceedingly narrow, as the cañons of the forks of the Virgen, where the overhanging walls shut out the sky. Some are intricately sculptured, and illuminated with brilliant colors; others are picturesque by reason of their bold and striking sculpture. A few of them are most solemn and impressive by reason of their profundity and the majesty of their walls. But, as a rule, the common cañons are neither grand nor even attractive. Upon first acquaintance they are curious and awaken interest as a new sensation, but they soon grow tiresome for want of diversity, and become at last mere bores. The impressions they produce are very transient, because of their great simplicity and the limited range of ideas they present. But there are some which are highly diversified, presenting many attractive features. These seldom grow stale or wearisome, and their presence is generally greeted with pleasure.

"It is perhaps in some respects unfortunate that the stupendous pathway of the Colorado River through the Kaibabs was ever called a cañon, for the name identifies it with the baser conception. But the name presents as wide a range of signification as the word house. The log cabin of the rancher, the painted and vine-clad cottage of the mechanic, the home of the millionaire, the places where parliaments assemble, and the grandest temples of worship, are all houses. Yet the contrast between Saint Marc's and the rude dwelling of the frontiersman is not greater than that between the chasm of the Colorado and the trenches in the rocks which answer to the ordinary conception of a cañon. And as a great cathedral is an immense development of the rudimentary idea involved in the four walls and roof of a cabin, so is the chasm an expansion of the simple type of drainage channels peculiar to the Plateau Country. To the conception of its vast proportions must be added some notion of its intricate plan, the nobility of its architecture, its colossal buttes, its wealth of ornamentation, the splendor of its colors, and its wonderful atmosphere. All of these attributes combine with infinite complexity to produce a whole which at first bewilders and at length overpowers.

"From the end of Point Sublime, the distance across the chasm to the nearest point in the summit of the opposite wall is about 7 miles. This, however, does not fairly express the width of the chasm, for both walls are recessed by wide amphitheaters, setting far back into the platform of the country, and the promontories are comparatively narrow strips between them. A more correct statement of the general width would be from 11 to 12 miles. This must dispose at once of the idea that the chasm is a narrow gorge of immense depth and simple form. It is somewhat unfortunate that there is a prevalent idea that in some way an essential part of the grandeur of the Grand Cañon is the narrowness of its defiles. Much color has been given to this notion by the first illustrations of the cañon from the pencil of Egloffstein in the celebrated report of Lieutenant Ives. Never was a great subject more artistically misrepresented or more charmingly belittled. Nowhere in the Kaibab section is any such extreme narrowness observable, and even in the Uinkaret section the width of the great inner gorge is a little greater than the depth. In truth, a little reflection will show that such a character would be inconsistent with the highest and strongest effects. For it is obvious that some notable width is necessary to enable the eye to see the full extent of the walls. In a chasm one mile deep, and only a thousand feet wide, this would be quite impossible. If we compare the Marble Cañon or the gorge at the Toroweap with wider sections it will at once be seen that the wider ones are much stronger. If we compare one of the longer alcoves having a width of 3 or 4 miles with the view across the main chasm the advantage will be overwhelmingly with the latter. It is evident that for the display of wall surface of given dimensions a certain amount of distance is necessary. We may be too near or too far for the right appreciation of its magnitude and proportions. The distance must bear some ratio to the magnitude. But at what precise limit this distance must in the present case be fixed is not easy to determine. It can hardly be doubted that if the cañon were materially narrower it would suffer a loss of grandeur and effect.

The Grand Canyon!

I. Primary Expedition Narratives

"The length of cañon revealed clearly and in detail at Point Sublime is about 25 miles in each direction. Towards the northwest the vista terminates behind the projecting mass of Powell's Plateau. But again to the westward may be seen the crests of the upper walls reaching through the Kanab and Uinkaret Plateaus, and finally disappearing in the haze about 75 miles away.

"The space under immediate view from our standpoint, 50 miles long and 10 to 12 wide, is thronged with a great multitude of objects so vast in size, so bold yet majestic in form, so infinite in their details, that as the truth gradually reveals itself to the perceptions it arouses the strongest emotions. Unquestionably the great, the overruling feature is the wall on the opposite side of the gulf. Can mortal fancy create a picture of a mural front a mile in height, 7 to 10 miles distant, and receding into space indefinitely in either direction? As the mind strives to realize its proportions its spirit is broken and its imagination completely crushed. If the wall were simple in its character, if it were only blank and sheer, some rest might be found in contemplating it; but it is full of diversity and eloquent with grand suggestions. It is deeply recessed by alcoves and amphitheatres receding far into the plateau beyond, and usually disclosing only the portals by which they open into the main chasm. Between them the promontories jut out, ending in magnificent gables with sharp mitered angles. Thus the wall rambles in and out, turning numberless corners. Many of the angles are acute, and descend as sharp spurs like the forward edge of a plowshare. Only those alcoves which are directly opposite to us can be seen in their full length and depth. Yet so excessive, nay so prodigious, is the effect of foreshortening, that it is impossible to realize their full extensions. We have already noted this effect in the Vermilion Cliffs, but here it is much more exaggerated. At many points the profile of the façade is thrown into view by the change of trend, and its complex character is fully revealed. Like that of the Vermilion Cliffs, it is a series of many ledges and slopes, like a molded plinth, in which every stratum is disclosed as a line or a course of masonry. The Red Wall limestone is the most conspicuous member, presenting its vertical face eight hundred to a thousand feet high, and everywhere unbroken. The thinner beds more often appear in the slopes as a succession of ledges projecting through the scanty talus which never conceals them.

"Numerous detached masses are also seen flanking the ends of the long promontories. These buttes are of gigantic proportions, and yet so overwhelming is the effect of the wall against which they are projected that they seem insignificant in mass, and the observer is often deluded by them, failing to perceive that they are really detached from the wall and perhaps separated from it by an interval of a mile or two.

"At the foot of this palisade is a platform through which meanders the inner gorge, in whose dark and somber depths flows the river. Only in one place can the water surface be seen. In its windings the abyss which holds it extends for a short distance towards us and the line of vision enters the gorge lengthwise. Above and below this short reach the gorge swings its course in other directions and reveals only a dark, narrow opening, while its nearer wall hides its depths. This inner chasm is 1,000 to 1,200 feet deep. Its upper 200 feet is a vertical ledge of sandstone of a dark rich brownish color. Beneath it lies the granite of a dark iron-gray shade, verging towards black, and lending a gloomy aspect to the lowest deeps. Perhaps a half mile of the river is disclosed. A pale, dirty red, without glimmer or sheen, a motionless surface, a small featureless spot, inclosed in the dark shade of the granite, is all of it that is here visible. Yet we know it is a large river, a hundred and fifty yards wide, with a headlong torrent foaming and plunging over rocky rapids.

"A little, and only a little, less impressive than the great wall across the chasm are the buttes upon this side. And such buttes! All others in the west, saving only the peerless Temples of the Virgen, are mere trifles in comparison with those of the Grand Cañon. In nobility of form, beauty of decoration, and splendor of color, the Temples of the Virgen must, on the whole, be awarded the palm; but those of the Grand Cañon, while barely inferior to them in those respects, surpass them in magnitude and fully equal them in majesty. But while the Valley of the Virgen presents a few of these superlative creations, the Grand Cañon presents them by dozens. In this relation the comparison would be analogous to one between a fine cathedral town and a metropolis like London or Paris. In truth, there is only a very limited ground of comparison between the two localities, for in style and effects their respective structures differ as decidedly as the works of any two well-developed and strongly contrasted styles of human architecture[.]

The Grand Canyon!

I. Primary Expedition Narratives

"Whatsoever is forcible, characteristic, and picturesque in the rock-forms of the Plateau Country is concentrated and intensified to the uttermost in the buttes. Wherever we find them, whether fringing the long escarpments of terraces or planted upon broad mesas, whether in cañons or upon expansive plains, they are always bold and striking in outline and ornate in architecture. Upon their flanks and entablatures the decoration peculiar to the formation out of which they have been carved is most strongly portrayed and the profiles are most sharply cut. They command the attention with special force and quicken the imagination with a singular power. The secret of their impressiveness is doubtless obscure. Why one form should be beautiful and another unattractive; why one should be powerful, animated, and suggestive, while another is meaningless, are questions for the metaphysician rather than the geologist. Sufficient here is the fact. Yet there are some elements of impressiveness which are too patent to escape recognition. In nearly all buttes there is a certain definiteness of form which is peculiarly emphatic, and this is seen in their profiles. Their ground-plans are almost always indefinite and capricious, but the profiles are rarely so. These are usually composed of lines which have an approximate and sometimes a sensibly perfect geometrical definition. They are usually few and simple in their ultimate analysis, though by combination they give rise to much variety. The ledges are vertical, the summits are horizontal, and the taluses are segments of hyperbolas of long curvature and concave upwards. These lines greatly preponderate in all cases, and though others sometimes intrude they seldom blemish greatly the effects produced by the normal ones. All this is in striking contrast with the ever-varying, indefinite profiles displayed in mountains and hills or on the slopes of valleys. The profiles generated by the combinations of these geometric lines persist along an indefinite extent of front. Such variations as occur arise not from changes in the nature of the lines, but in the modes of combination and proportions. These are never great in any front of moderate extent, but are just sufficient to relieve it from a certain monotony which would otherwise prevail. The same type and general form is persistent. Like the key-note of a song, the mind carries it in its consciousness wherever the harmony wanders.

"The horizontal lines or courses are equally strong. These are the edges of the strata, and the deeply eroded seams where the superposed beds touch each other. Here the uniformity as we pass from place to place is conspicuous. The Carboniferous strata are quite the same in every section, showing no perceptible variation in thickness through great distances, and only a slight dip.

"It is readily apparent, therefore, that the effect of these profiles and horizontal courses so persistent in their character is highly architectural. The relation is more than a mere analogy or suggestion; it is a vivid resemblance. Its failure or discordance is only in the ground plan, though it is not uncommon to find a resemblance, even in this respect, among the Permian buttes. Among the buttes of the Grand Cañon there are few striking instances of definiteness in ground plan. The finest butte of the chasm is situated near the upper end of the Kaibab division; but it is not visible from Point Sublime. It is more than 5,000 feet high, and has a surprising resemblance to an Oriental pagoda. We named it Vishnu's Temple.

"On either side of the promontory on which we stand is a side gorge sinking nearly 4,000 feet below us. The two unite in front of the point, and, ever deepening, their trunk opens into the lowest abyss in the granite at the river. Across either branch is a long rambling mass, one on the right of us, the other on the left. We named them the Cloisters. They are excellent types of a whole class of buttes which stand in close proximity to each other upon the north side of the chasm throughout the entire extent of the Kaibab division. A far better conception of their forms and features can be gained by an examination of Mr. Holmes's panoramic picture [see Dutton's Atlas, Sheets 15-17] than by reading a whole volume of verbal description. The whole prospect, indeed, is filled with a great throng of similar objects, which, as much by their multitude as by their colossal size, confuse the senses; but these, on account of their proximity, may be most satisfactorily studied. The infinity of sharply defined detail is amazing. The eye is instantly caught and the attention firmly held by its systematic character. The parallelism of the lines of bedding is most forcibly displayed in all the windings of the façades, and these lines are crossed by the vertical scorings of numberless waterways. Here, too, are distinctly seen those details which constitute the peculiar style of decoration prevailing throughout all the buttes and amphitheatres of the Kaibab. The course of the walls is never for a moment straight, but extends as a series of cusps and re-entrant curves. Elsewhere

The Grand Canyon!

I. Primary Expedition Narratives

the reverse is more frequently seen; the projections of the wall are rounded and are convex towards the front, while the re-entrant portions are cusplike recesses. This latter style of decoration is common in the Permian buttes and is not rare in the Jurassic. It produces the effect of a thickly set row of pilasters. In the Grand Cañon the reversal of this mode produces the effect of panels and niches. In the western Cloister may be seen a succession of these niches, and though they are mere details among myriads, they are really vast in dimensions. Those seen in the Red Wall limestone are over 600 feet high, and are overhung by arched lintels with spandrels.

"As we contemplate these objects we find it quite impossible to realize their magnitude. Not only are we deceived, but we are conscious that we are deceived, and yet we cannot conquer the deception[.] We cannot long study our surroundings without becoming aware of an enormous disparity in the effects produced upon the senses by objects which are immediate and equivalent ones which are more remote. The depth of the gulf which separates us from the Cloisters cannot be realized. We crane over the brink, and about 700 feet below is a talus, which ends at the summit of the crossbedded sandstone. We may see the bottom of the gorge, which is about 3,800 feet beneath us, and yet the talus seems at least half-way down. Looking across the side gorge the cross-bedded sandstone is seen as a mere band at the summit of the Cloister, forming but a very small portion of its vertical extent, and, whatever the reason may conclude, it is useless to attempt to persuade the imagination that the two edges of the sandstone lie in the same horizontal plane. The eastern Cloister is nearer than the western, its distance being about a mile and a half. It seems incredible that it can be so much as one-third that distance. Its altitude is from 3,500 to 4,000 feet, but any attempt to estimate the altitude by means of visual impressions is felt at once to be hopeless. There is no stadium. Dimensions mean nothing to the senses, and all that we are conscious of in this respect is a troubled sense of immensity.

"Beyond the eastern Cloister, five or six miles distant, rises a gigantic mass which we named Shiva's Temple. It is the grandest of all the buttes, and the most majestic in aspect, though not the most ornate. Its mass is as great as the mountainous part of Mount Washington. That summit looks down 6,000 feet into the dark depths of the inner abyss, over a succession of ledges as impracticable as the face of Bunker Hill Monument. All around it are side gorges sunk to a depth nearly as profound as that of the main channel. It stands in the midst of a great throng of cloister-like buttes, with the same noble profiles and strong lineaments as those immediately before us, with a plexus of awful chasms between them. In such a stupendous scene of wreck it seemed as if the fabled 'Destroyer' might find an abode not wholly uncongenial.

"In all the vast space beneath and around us there is very little upon which the mind can linger restfully. It is completely filled with objects of gigantic size and amazing form, and as the mind wanders over them it is hopelessly bewildered and lost. It is useless to select special points of contemplation. The instant the attention lays hold of them it is drawn to something else, and if it seeks to recur to them it cannot find them. Everything is superlative, transcending the power of the intelligence to comprehend it. There is no central point or object around which the other elements are grouped and to which they are tributary. The grandest objects are merged in a congregation of others equally grand. Hundreds of these mighty structures, miles in length, and thousands of feet in height, rear their majestic heads out of the abyss, displaying their richly-molded plinths and friezes, thrusting out their gables, wing-walls, buttresses, and pilasters, and recessed with alcoves and panels. If any one of these stupendous creations had been planted upon the plains of central Europe it would have influenced modern art as profoundly as Fusiyama has influenced the decorative art of Japan. Yet here they are all swallowed up in the confusion of multitude[.] It is not alone the magnitude of the individual objects that makes this spectacle so portentous, but it is still more the extravagant profusion with which they are arrayed along the whole visible extent of the broad chasm.

"The color effects are rich and wonderful. They are due to the inherent colors of the rocks, modified by the atmosphere. Like any other great series of strata in the Plateau Province, the Carboniferous has its own range of characteristic colors, which might serve to distinguish it even if we had no other criterion. The summit strata are pale grey, with a faint yellowish cast. Beneath them the cross-bedded sandstone appears, showing a mottled surface of pale pinkish hue. Underneath this member are nearly 1,000 feet of the lower Aubrey sandstones, displaying an intensely brilliant red, which is somewhat masked by the talus shot down from the grey, cherty limestones at the summit. Beneath the Lower Aubrey is the face of the Red Wall limestone, from 2,000 to 3,000 feet high. It has a strong red tone, but a very peculiar one. Most of the red strata of the west have the brownish or vermilion tones, but these are rather purplish-red, as if the pigment had been treated to a dash of blue. It is not quite certain that this may not arise in part from the intervention of the blue haze, and probably it is rendered more conspicuous by this cause; but, on the whole, the purplish cast seems to be inherent. This is the dominant color-mass of the cañon, for the expanse of rock surface displayed is more than half in the Red Wall group. It is less brilliant than the fiery red of the Aubrey sandstones, but is still quite strong and rich. Beneath are the deep browns of the lower Carboniferous. The dark iron-black of the hornblendic schists revealed in the lower gorge makes but little impression upon the boundless expanse of bright colors above.

The Grand Canyon!

I. Primary Expedition Narratives

"The total effect of the entire color-mass is bright and glowing. There is nothing gloomy or dark in the picture, except the opening of the inner gorge, which is too small a feature to influence materially the prevailing tone. Although the colors are bright when contrasted with normal landscapes, they are decidedly less intense than the flaming hues of the Trias or the dense cloying colors of the Permian; nor have they the refinement of those revealed in the Eocene. The intense luster which gleams from the rocks of the Plateau Country is by no means lost here, but is merely subdued and kept under some restraint. It is toned down and softened without being deprived of its character. Enough of it is left to produce color effects not far below those that are yielded by the Jura-Trias.

"But though the inherent colors are less intense than some others, yet under the quickening influence of the atmosphere they produce effects to which all others are far inferior. And here language fails and description becomes impossible. Not only are their qualities exceedingly subtle, but they have little counterpart in common experience. If such are presented elsewhere they are presented so feebly and obscurely that only the most discriminating and closest observers of nature ever seize them, and they so imperfectly that their ideas of them are vague and but half real. There are no concrete notions founded in experience upon which a conception of these color effects and optical delusions can be constructed and made intelligible. A perpetual glamour envelops the landscape. Things are not what they seem, and the perceptions cannot tell us what they are. It is not probable that these effects are different in kind in the Grand Cañon from what they are in other portions of the Plateau Country. But the difference in degree is immense, and being greatly magnified and intensified many characteristics become palpable which elsewhere elude the closest observation.

"In truth, the tone and temper of the landscape are constantly varying, and the changes in its aspect are very great. It is never the same, even from day to day or even from hour to hour. In the early morning its mood and subjective influences are usually calmer and more full of repose than at other times, but as the sun rises higher the whole scene is so changed that we cannot recall our first impressions. Every passing cloud, every change in the position of the sun, recasts the whole. At sunset the pageant closes amid splendors that seem more than earthly. The direction of the full sunlight, the massing of the shadows, the manner in which the side lights are thrown in from the clouds determine these modulations, and the sensitiveness of the picture to the slightest variations in these conditions is very wonderful.

"The shadows thrown by the bold abrupt forms are exceedingly dark. It is almost impossible at the distance of a very few miles to distinguish even broad details in these shadows. They are like remnants of midnight unconquered by the blaze of noonday. The want of half tones and gradations in the light and shade, which has already been noted in the Vermilion Cliffs, is apparent here, and is far more conspicuous. Our thoughts in this connection may suggest to us a still more extreme case of a similar phenomenon presented by the half-illuminated moon when viewed through a large telescope. The portions which catch the sunlight shine with great luster, but the shadows of mountains and cliffs are black and impenetrable. But there is one feature in the cañon which is certainly extraordinary. It is the appearance of the atmosphere against the background of shadow. It has a metallic luster which must be seen to be appreciated. The great wall across the chasm presents at noonday, under a cloudless sky, a singularly weird and unearthly aspect. The color is for the most part gone. In place of it comes this metallic glare of the haze. The southern wall is never so poorly lighted as at noon. Since its face consists of a series of promontories projecting towards the north, these projections catch the sunlight on their eastern sides in the forenoon, and upon their western sides in the afternoon; but near meridian the rays fall upon a few points only, and even upon these with very great obliquity. Thus at the hours of greatest general illumination the wall is most obscure and the abnormal effects are then presented most forcibly. They give rise to strange delusions. The rocks then look nearly black, or very dark grey, and covered with feebly shining spots.

The Grand Canyon!

I. Primary Expedition Narratives

The haze is strongly luminous, and so dense as to obscure the details already enfeebled by shade as if a leaden or mercurial vapor intervened. The shadows antagonize the perspective, and everything seems awry. The lines of stratification, dimly seen in one place and wholly effaced in another, are strangely belied, and the strata are given apparent attitudes which are sometimes grotesque and sometimes impossible.

"Those who are familiar with western scenery have, no doubt, been impressed with the peculiar character of its haze—or atmosphere, in the artistic sense of the word—and have noted its more prominent qualities. When the air is free from common smoke it has a pale blue color which is quite unlike the neutral gray of the east. It is always apparently more dense when we look towards the sun than when we look away from it, and this difference in the two directions, respectively, is a maximum near sunrise and sunset. This property is universal, but its peculiarities in the Plateau Province become conspicuous when the strong rich colors of the rocks are seen through it. The very air is then visible. We see it, palpably, as a tenuous fluid, and the rocks beyond it do not appear to be colored blue as they do in other regions, but reveal themselves clothed in colors of their own. The Grand Cañon is ever full of this haze. It fills it to the brim. Its apparent density, as elsewhere, is varied according to the direction in which it is viewed and the position of the sun; but it seems also to be denser and more concentrated than elsewhere. This is really a delusion arising from the fact that the enormous magnitude of the chasm and of its component masses dwarfs the distances; we are really looking through miles of atmosphere under the impression that they are only so many furlongs. This apparent concentration of haze, however, greatly intensifies all the beautiful or mysterious optical defects which are dependent upon the intervention of the atmosphere.

"Whenever the brink of the chasm is reached the chances are that the sun is high and these abnormal effects in full force. The cañon is asleep. Or it is under a spell of enchantment which gives its bewildering mazes an aspect still more bewildering. Throughout the long summer forenoon the charm which binds it grows in potency. At midday the clouds begin to gather, first in fleecy flecks, then in cumuli, and throw their shadows into the gulf. At once the scene changes. The slumber of the chasm is disturbed. The temples and cloisters seem to raise themselves half awake to greet the passing shadow. Their wilted, drooping, flattened faces expand into relief. The long promontories reach out from the distant wall as if to catch a moment's refreshment from the shade. The colors begin to glow; the haze loses its opaque density and becomes more tenuous. The shadows pass, and the chasm relapses into its dull sleep again. Thus through the midday hours it lies in fitful slumber, overcome by the blinding glare and withering heat, yet responsive to every fluctuation of light and shadow like a delicate organism.

"As the sun moves far into the west the scene again changes, slowly and imperceptibly at first, but afterwards more rapidly. In the hot summer afternoons the sky is full of cloud-play and the deep flushes with ready answers. The banks of snowy clouds pour a flood of light sidewise into the shadows and light up the gloom of the amphitheaters and alcoves, weakening the glow of the haze and rendering visible the details of the wall faces. At length, as the sun draws near the horizon, the great drama of the day begins.

"Throughout the afternoon the prospect has been gradually growing clearer. The haze has relaxed its steely glare and has changed to a veil of transparent blue. Slowly the myriads of details have come out and the walls are flecked with lines of minute tracery, forming a diaper of light and shade. Stronger and sharper becomes the relief of each projection. The promontories come forth from the opposite wall. The sinuous lines of stratification which once seemed meaningless, distorted, and even chaotic, now range themselves into a true perspective of graceful curves, threading the scallop edges of the strata. The colossal buttes expand in every dimension. Their long, narrow wings, which once were folded together and flattened against each other, open out, disclosing between them vast alcoves illumined with Rembrandt lights tinged with the pale refined blue of the ever-present haze. A thousand forms, hitherto unseen or obscure, start up within the abyss, and stand forth in strength and animation. All things seem to grow in beauty, power, and dimensions. What was grand before has become majestic, the majestic becomes sublime, and, ever expanding and developing, the sublime passes beyond the reach of our faculties and becomes transcendent. The colors have come back. Inherently rich and strong, though not superlative under ordinary lights, they now begin to display an adventitious brilliancy. The western sky is all aflame. The scattered banks of cloud and wavy cirrus [sic] have caught the waning splendor, and shine with orange and crimson. Broad slant beams of yellow light, shot through the glory-rifts, fall on turret and tower, on

The Grand Canyon!

I. Primary Expedition Narratives

pinnacled crest and winding ledge, suffusing them with a radiance less fulsome, but akin to that which flames in the western clouds[.] The summit band is brilliant yellow; the next below is pale rose. But the grand expanse within is a deep, luminous, resplendent red. The climax has now come. The blaze of sunlight poured over an illimitable surface of glowing red is flung back into the gulf, and, commingling with the blue haze, turns it into a sea of purple of most imperial hue—so rich, so strong, so pure that it makes the heart ache and the throat tighten. However vast the magnitudes, however majestic the forms, or sumptuous the decoration, it is in these kingly colors that the highest glory of the Grand Cañon is revealed.

“At length the sun sinks and the colors cease to burn. The abyss lapses back into repose. But its glory mounts upward and diffuses itself in the sky above. Long streamers of rosy light, rayed out from the west, cross the firmament and converge again in the east, ending in a pale rosy arch, which rises like a low aurora just above the eastern horizon Below it is the dead gray shadow of the world. Higher and higher climbs the arch, followed by the darkening pall of gray, and as it ascends it fades and disappears, leaving no color except the after-glow of the western clouds and the lusterless red of the chasm below. Within the abyss the darkness gathers. Gradually the shades deepen and ascend, hiding the opposite wall and enveloping the great temples. For a few moments the summits of these majestic piles seem to float upon a sea of blackness, then vanish in the darkness, and, wrapped in the impenetrable mantle of the night, they await the glory of the coming dawn.”

---

Reprintings

- 243 1885 Tertiary history of the Grand Cañon district : with atlas. 48th U.S. Congress, 2nd Session, House of Representatives Miscellaneous Document 35, 264 pp. [text, quarto]; Atlas, 24 sheets [folded, laid loose in three-quarter leather folder with cloth ties affixed to boards on three open edges, and spine labels affixed; quarto]. (House series title-page accompanies text volume: The Miscellaneous Documents of the House of Representatives for the Second Session of the Forty-eighth Congress, 1884-'85. In seventeen volumes. Volume 11.—No. 35. Washington: Government Printing Office. 1885.) (SPINE TITLE FOR TEXT VOLUME: [top] "HOUSE MISCELLANEOUS DOCUMENTS 2<sup>D</sup> SESS., 48TH CONG. 1884-'85 VOL. 11"; [bottom] "DUTTON [rule] TERTIARY HISTORY OF THE GRAND CANON DISTRICT [rule] WITH ATLAS". SPINE TITLE FOR ATLAS: [top] "HOUSE MISCELLANEOUS DOCUMENTS 2d SESS., 48th CONG. 1884-'85 VOL. 11"; [bottom] "ATLAS".)

A re-release of Dutton (1882), as a part of the collated series of House Miscellaneous Documents for 1884-1885, not mentioned by Farquhar nor in Spamer's THE GRAND CANON until its 4th ed. (2022). Text and Atlas title-pages are the same as for Dutton (1882), retaining date, but text volume adds the House Miscellaneous Documents series title-page (1885) cited above; atlas does not include a separate House Miscellaneous Documents title-page although it is identifiable from its spine labels. Atlas Sheets differ from 1882 publication in that the double-folio sheets are vertically and horizontally folded to accommodate quarto format (vertical fold in center as in original double-folio state, then folded horizontally to achieve quarto size). Quarto format also corroborated in Checklist of Public Documents, Second Edition (U.S. Government Printing Office, Superintendent of Documents, 1895, p. 76). Folded Atlas Sheets each are also stamped with a numeral on the exterior (sheet verso) corner, enumerated 0 to 23, to facilitate identification of Atlas Sheets without having to unfold them: "0" is the title-page, "1" is the "List of Atlas Sheets" (equivalent to Atlas Sheet I), followed by 2-23 (Atlas Sheets II-XXIII, comprising tinted and chromo-lithographic maps and scenic views). Atlas title-page: Department of the Interior United States Geological Survey J.W.Powell Director Atlas to Accompany the Monograph on the Tertiary History of the Grand Cañon District by Capt. Clarence E. Dutton U.S.A. [vignette] Washington 1882 Julius Bien and Co. Lith. New York. [Points relating to physical arrangement are provided with the assistance of Daniel F. Cassidy and Richard D. Quartaroli.]

The Grand Canyon!

I. Primary Expedition Narratives

- 244 1886 The Kaibab Division of the Grand Cañon of the Colorado River, in Yavapai County, Arizona. (On the line of the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad.) Chicago: Rand, McNally and Co., 23 pp., map.
- Selections edited from Dutton (1882, U.S. Geological Survey, Monograph 2). Although the text is printed within quotation marks, significant editing is noticed; mostly, omitted passages are not indicated by ellipses. Includes his more narrative passages.
- 245 1977 Tertiary history of the Grand Cañon district : with atlas. (Introduction by Wallace Stegner.) Santa Barbara, California, and Salt Lake City: Peregrine Smith, Inc., 264 pp. [text]; Atlas, 23 sheets [folded, laid in].
- Facsimile reprint of Dutton (1882, U.S. Geological Survey Monograph 2). Edition of 1,500 sets, boxed.
- 246 2001 Tertiary history of the Grand Cañon district. (Introduction by Wallace Stegner, new foreword by Stephen J. Pyne.) Tucson: University of Arizona Press, pp. i-xxv, i-xiii, 1-264.
- Facsimile reprint of text volume of Dutton (1882, including color plates).
-

The Grand Canyon!

I. Primary Expedition Narratives

1889–1890

Denver, Colorado Cañon & Pacific Railroad Commercial Survey Under Robert Brewster Stanton

PROBABLY THE most sadly adventuresome of the Grand Canyon stories is the one about the railroad that wasn't going to be built to the canyon, but all the way through it.

Capitalists got the idea to ship coal (and all else) from the Rocky Mountain mines to the West Coast by rail, but that was going to require an economically direct route; and what better course than along a river? (The Colorado River, of course.) Never mind the small matter of there being a grand canyon (several, actually) en route. But railways had been built through the Rockies already, and this course seemed to be, relatively, a cinch.

The story is well known—as well known as Powell's, perhaps because, like Powell, three men died, including the president of the railroad company. But Stanton's companions were claimed by the river, not because they had quit the river and met their fates a long way away as befell Powell's companions. The Stanton disaster took place in Marble Canyon, on two different days in 1889, which ended the expedition for the season. They regrouped, returning to tackle the remainder of the project again in 1890, and straight away one man did have to quit, because of a broken leg. That was a dicey story in of itself, getting the man out of the canyon while he was unconscious. Unfortunately, he happened to be the expedition's photographer, and in those days photography was more than compose, point, and click. The expedition's leader, Robert Brewster Stanton, acknowledging that he was not in any sense a photographer, took up the responsibility. He confessed a few years later: "I had never adjusted a camera, had never seen the inside of a roll-holder. How did the thing work, anyway?"

Still, the public eagerly followed the survey's progress as it made its way along the river and through the canyons. Stanton on infrequent occasions managed to send out letters to correspondents and the press. It had been a while since there was this kind of engagement with an expedition in the field; not since Powell's expeditions three decades earlier. This time, though, it was a matter of commercialism. The scenery was beyond compare—of that there was no doubt—which could be interesting to a paying, traveling public—but over all was the matter of profits; profits from tons of shippable, saleable stuff. So the survey, photographed in detail, would prove how likely this could be. The figures could be contrived and juggled for savvy or unwary investors both; but the scenery could not lie to those who could make it all possible. Could a railway be built to the west coast by way of the canyons? In the end, Stanton said yes—although he said yes, with bluster, with his hat out for coins.

The Grand Canyon!

I. Primary Expedition Narratives

And the photographs? As the expedition proceeded through the Grand Canyon, Stanton had no way of knowing of his success or failure. Only after having had the opportunity to send out some plates to be processed did he receive word, three months later by telegraph at Peach Springs, “Negatives all right.” In the end, almost all of the sixteen hundred of them were good. Astonishing.

The Stanton views of the river through Grand Canyon are not only the precious record of a long expedition (were that Powell had had such a detailed record!), but they have proven invaluable in studies today of changes (significant and nil) that have occurred in a century. Geologists, hydrologists, and ecologists all have gleaned a lot from making these comparisons—thanks to Stanton’s luck. How much of it was dumb luck, compared to the luck that comes from learning as he went, perhaps can never been known, but his stories tell us much about the latter. (See a list of publications of rephotography on p. 14 herein.)

Robert Brewster Stanton 1889–1890

Denver, Colorado Cañon & Pacific Railroad Survey

Stanton, Robert Brewster

- 247 1889 The Colorado Canon survey. Engineering News, 21 (June 8): 532. [Item signed “S.”]
Letter to the editor; with appended note by the editor: “We shall hope to be able to give further details later of this interesting survey through one of the greatest wonders of the globe.”
- 248 1889 The Denver, Colorado Canon and Pacific Railroad project. Engineering News and American Railway Journal, 22 (September 21): 269-272, folded leaf facing p. 276.
- 249 1890 Colorado Cañon. American Geographical Society, Journal, 22: 334-337.
From Stanton’s notebook; with introductory paragraph and an interjection by unsigned author.

The Grand Canyon!

I. Primary Expedition Narratives

- 250 1890 Col. Stanton's recent descent of the Colorado River. American Naturalist, 24(281) (May): 463-466. From Stanton's notebook; with introductory paragraph and an interjection by an unsigned writer. Reprinted from The Evening Star (Washington, D.C., newspaper). Introductory paragraph also notes that the account was given to The Republican (a Denver newspaper).
- 251 1890 The Denver, Colorado Canon and Pacific Railway project. Engineering News, 24(42) (October 18): 341-344, 353-357. Includes Stanton photos and drawings made from Stanton photos by [F. P.] Burt of Engineering News. (Regarding F. P. Burt, refer to Charles Whiting Baker, "The Story of 'Engineering News'", Engineering News-Record, 78(1) (April 5, 1917): 6. Staff expansion in early 1887 had brought in Baker, and notes further, "At the same time, F. P. Burt, a young Canadian engineer with a special artistic talent, was brought to establish the nucleus of an illustration department." [ENTIRE NOTE])
- 252 1890 Through the Grand Cañon of the Colorado. Scribner's Magazine, 8(5) (November): 591-613. This is a Powellesque review of the railroad survey. Its many beautiful illustrations are, interestingly, lithographic reproductions of photographic views that were taken by Stanton during the expedition. What is transcribed here is the disastrous start of the Grand Canyon survey, and thereafter, Stanton's more personal remarks.
- "When, in the spring of 1889, I took charge of the survey for a railway line along this river, from Grand Junction, Col., to the Gulf of California, I considered myself favored. Previous to this time no party had traversed these cañons, except that of Major J. W. Powell, in 1869, and no one had ever made a continuous trip along the waters of this river from its head to its mouth.
- "With a naturally sanguine disposition, I had no conception of the dangers and hardships to be encountered in a journey by boat down a river that has a descent of over four thousand two hundred feet, and in a distance of less than five hundred miles contains five hundred and twenty rapids, falls, and cataracts. • • •
- "Our first expedition was organized by, and under the immediate charge of, Mr. Frank M. Brown, the President of the Railroad Company. When I took charge of the engineering work, the preparations were all complete, the boats bought and shipped to the river. We started from Green River Station, Utah, May 25th, with a party of sixteen men and six boats. The story of our journey as far as Lee's Ferry has been told, and I shall not repeat it [although, he does summarize that portion of the expedition]. • • •
- "• • • We reached Lee's Ferry, 150 miles below Dandy Crossing, July 2d. The next day President Brown started on horseback for Kanab, Utah, for supplies to take us through the remainder of the trip; for it was decided that Mr. Brown and myself, together with six others, Hislop, McDonald, Hansbrough, Richards, Gibson, and Photographer Nims, should go on and make an examination of the lower cañons, take notes and photographs, but without an instrumental survey.
- "On the morning of July 9th, Mr. Brown and the supplies having arrived, we started into the unknown depths of Marble Cañon, with three boats and our little party of eight.
- "The first day's run of ten miles was made without danger, making two heavy portages around the rapids at Badger and Soap Creeks. That night we camped at the lower end of the Soap Creek rapid. President Brown seemed lonely and troubled, and asked me to sit by his bed and talk. We sat there late, smoking and talking of our homes and our journey on the morrow. When I awoke in the morning Mr. Brown was up, and as soon as he saw me said, 'Stanton, I dreamed of the rapids last night, the first time since we started.' After breakfast we were again on the river in very swift water. Mr. Brown's boat, with himself and McDonald, was ahead, my boat, getting out from shore with some difficulty, was a little distance behind. In two minutes we were at the next rapid. Just as we dashed into the head of it, I saw McDonald running up the bank waving both arms. We had, for a few moments, all we could do to manage our own boat. It was but a moment. We were through the rapid, and turning out into the eddy. I heard McDonald shout, 'Mr. Brown is in there.' I looked to the right, but saw nothing. As our boat turned around the whirlpool on the left, the note-book which Mr. Brown always carried shot up on top of the water, and we picked it up as we passed.

The Grand Canyon!

I. Primary Expedition Narratives

"Mr. Brown's boat was about one-half minute ahead of mine. His boat went safely through the worst part of the rapid, but in turning out into the eddy an upshooting wave, so common in that river between the current and the whirlpools and eddies on the side, upset it without a moment's warning. Brown was thrown into the whirlpool, while McDonald was thrown into the current. McDonald as he came up saw Brown on the side of the current, and shouted to him, 'Come on.' He answered with a cheerful 'All right.' McDonald, carried down by the stream, 'was three times thrown under by the terrific tossings of the mad waters,' and with great effort reached the left bank, where the current rushed upon the shore at a sudden turn to the right. As soon as he recovered himself he saw Brown still in the whirlpool, swimming round and round. Rushing up the bank he shouted to us for help. In that whirlpool poor Brown battled for his life, till exhausted in the fight he sank, a hero and a martyr to what some day will be a successful cause.

"A noble man, and a true friend, he had won the love of everyone associated with him. We sat that whole day watching the ever-changing waters of that rapid—its whirlpools and eddies; but we did not realize, till the darkness gathered around us and we turned away to go to our camp, that we should never again see the face of our noble-hearted leader.

"In this world we are left but little time to mourn. We had work to do, and I determined if possible to complete the whole of that work. With this intention we started out next morning. Thursday, Friday, and Saturday we pushed on with our usual work, shooting through or portaging round twenty-four bad rapids, getting deeper and deeper between the marble walls. After a quiet rest on Sunday, Monday morning found us at the head of two very rough and rocky rapids. We portaged both of them. While the photographer and myself took our notes and pictures, the boats were to go on through the lower end of the second rapid to a sand-bar, a half-mile below. It was easy walking for us along the bank. The first boat got down with difficulty, as the current beat hard against the left cliff. My boat was the next to start. I pushed it out from shore myself with a cheerful word to the men, Hansbrough and Richards. It was the last they ever heard. The current drove them against the cliff, under an overhanging shelf. In trying to push away from the cliff the boat was upset. Hansbrough was never seen to rise. Richards, a powerful man, swam some distance down stream. The first boat started out to the rescue, but he sank before it reached him. Two more faithful and good men gone! Astonished and crushed by their loss, our force too small to portage our boats, and our boats entirely unfit for such work, I decided to abandon the trip, with then and there a determination, as soon as a new outfit could be secured, to return and complete our journey to the Gulf.

"From then our only object was to reach a side cañon leading to the north, through which to make our retreat.

"Just above Vassey's [sic] Paradise, in the deepest part we had seen, we camped for our last night in the cañon. The sad thoughts of the past few days crowded in upon us. A great storm was gathering over our heads. The rain was falling in a steady shower. No shelter below; not a dry blanket or a coat. About forty feet up on the side of the marble cliff I saw a small cave, with a marble shelf projecting over it. With some difficulty I climbed up to it. It was hardly large enough for my body, and not long enough for me to stretch fully out; but I crawled in, and, worn out by the work and excitement of the day, soon fell asleep.

"About midnight I was awakened by a terrific peal of thunder, and around me and over me raged one of the most awful storms it has been my fate to witness. I have seen the lightning play and heard the thunder roll among the summit peaks of the Rocky Mountains, as I have stood on some rocky point far above the clouds, but nowhere has the awful grandeur equalled that night in the lonesome depths of what was to us death's cañon.

"The lightning's flash lit up the dark recesses of the gorge, and cast ghastly shadows upon cliffs and sloping hillsides; and again all was shut in by darkness thicker than that of Egypt. The stillness was only broken by the roar of the river as it rushed along beneath me. Suddenly, as if the mighty cliffs above were rolling down against each other, there was peal after peal of thunder striking against the marble cliffs below, and, mingling with their echoes, bounding from cliff to cliff. Thunder with echo, echo with thunder, crossed and recrossed from wall to wall of the cañon, and rising higher and higher, died away among the side gorges and caverns thousands of feet above my head. For hours the tempest raged. Tucked away as a little worm in a cleft in the rock, the grandeur of the storm spoke as to the Psalmist of old; and out of the stillness came a voice mightier than the tempest, and said, 'Be still and know that I am God.' [Psalms 46:10] • • • "

The Grand Canyon!

I. Primary Expedition Narratives

The expedition, refitted with better boats and cork life preservers for all, returned to the river six months later; and again continued with misfortune.

"Marble Cañon seemed destined to give us trouble. On January 1st our photographer, Mr. Nims, fell from a bench of the cliff, some twenty-two feet, on to the sand beach below, receiving a severe jar, and breaking one of his legs just above the ankle. Having plenty of bandages and medicine, we made Nims as comfortable as possible till the next day, when we loaded one of the boats to make him a level bed, and constructing a stretcher of two oars and a piece of canvas, put him on board and floated down river a couple of miles—running two small rapids—to a side cañon which led out to the Lee's Ferry road.

"The next day, after finding a way out on top, I walked thirty-five miles back to Lee's Ferry for a wagon to take Nims where he could be cared for. But then came the tug of war—the getting of Nims up from the river, one thousand seven hundred feet to the mesa above. Eight of the strongest men of the party started with him early Saturday morning, and reached the top at 3.30 P.M., having carried him four miles in distance and one thousand seven hundred feet up hill, the last half-mile being at an angle of forty-five degrees up a loose rock slide."

What Stanton fails to mention is that Nims was unconscious the whole time, though he does remark on this in a later telling (in "Engineering with a Camera", 1893).

"In two places the stretcher had to be hung by ropes from above, while the men slid it along a sloping cliff too steep to stand upon, and in two places it was lifted up with ropes over perpendicular cliffs ten and fifteen feet high. The party reached the top, however, without the least injury to themselves or the sick man.

"Late on Sunday we bade Nims goodbye, leaving him in charge of Mr. W. M. Johnson, of Lee's Ferry, and we returned to our camp in the cañon below. Nims's departure was a great loss to the expedition. His work fell to me, and the remainder of the photographic work (some seven hundred and fifty views) was done without preparation or previous experience.

"We continued our journey over the same part of the river that we had travelled last summer, till January 13th, when we reached Point Retreat, where we left the cañon on our homeward march just six months before. We found our supplies, blankets, flour, sugar, coffee, etc., which we had cached in the marble cave [known today as Stanton's Cave], all in good condition. • • •

"With our new boats we ran nearly all of [the rapids], and portaged but few; over many of them our boats had danced and jumped at the rate of fifteen miles an hour, and over some, by actual measurement, at the rate of twenty miles per hour. To stand in the bow of one of these boats as she dashes through a great rapid, with first the bow and then the stern jumping into the air, and the spray of the breakers splashing over one's head, is an excitement the fascination of which can only be understood through experience. • • •

"Ten miles below Point Retreat, as we went into camp one evening, we discovered the body of Peter M. Hansbrough, one of the boatmen drowned on our trip last summer. His remains were easily recognized from the clothing that was still on them. The next morning we buried them under an overhanging cliff. The burial service was brief and simple. We stood around the grave while one short prayer was offered, and we left him with a shaft of pure marble for his headstone, seven hundred feet high, with his name cut upon the base; and in honor of his memory we named a magnificent point opposite—Point Hansbrough. • • •

Stanton's narrative continues with descriptive accounts of running rapids and surveying, and with generally descriptive views of the canyon itself. His more impressionistic reflections are reproduced here.

"The cañon grows more and more picturesque and beautiful the farther we proceed. The granite has lost its awful and threatening look, and slopes back in beautiful hillsides, of variegated black, gray, and green.

"At the side cañons, and from the bends of the river, the upper portions of the whole gorge are brought into view, showing the great marble and sandstone cliffs, benched back far away from the river, while mountains jut in close between the side cañons and washes nearly a mile and a quarter in height. As we sail along the smooth stretches between the rapids, each turn brings some wonderful picture more beautiful than the last. As we look down the river, or up a low side cañon, with the placid water between its polished walls of black, and gray, and green, for a foreground, there rise above the dark sandstone, tier upon tier, bench upon bench, terrace upon

The Grand Canyon!

I. Primary Expedition Narratives

terrace, stepping back farther and farther, and higher and higher, and in immensity of height and proportion seeming to tower almost over our heads. • • •

“• • • On many of the long stretches where the river can be seen for several miles, the picture is one of charming beauty with the walls of bright colors towering 2,000 and 3,000 feet overhead, and those beyond reaching to a height of over 6,000 feet, and its long swinging green slopes, with the quiet waters sparkling in the sun at their foot; for the rapids are much less frequent and the stretches of still water are growing longer and longer.

“In this section, for a few days, we had almost all the rainy weather we experienced during the whole winter. As the clouds gathered thick, they hung down low in the gorge, shutting out from view all the upper cliffs. The rain poured down in torrents, but it seemed lost in the immensity of the chasm. As the clouds rose we were treated to scenes rare and beautiful in the extreme. Over the brink of the upper walls came—first one and then another—hundreds of little streams, shooting far out into the air, and dropping hundreds and hundreds of feet over the cliffs, breaking up into sparkling spray before they struck the bench below. These formed thousands of smaller rivulets as they dropped farther and farther down, till the whole of the bright scarlet walls seemed hung with a tapestry of silver threads, the border fringed with white fleecy clouds which clung to the tops of the walls, and through which the points of the upper cliffs shone as scarlet tassels. As the sun broke through some side gorge, the cañon was spanned from side to side, as the clouds shifted their position, with rainbow after rainbow, vying to outdo in brilliancy of color the walls of the cañon themselves. • • • ”

They encounter Lava Falls (though Stanton does not mention its name). “When we find we must go over the rapid, with great effort we straighten the boats round and enter in good shape, bow on. It lasts but a moment. The cross-current strikes us, and we go broadside over the worst part of the rapid. Crouched down in the bottom, it is as much as we can do to keep from being tossed out as the boats roll from wave to wave. They are entirely unmanageable, and as we strike the whirlpools below we are spun round like a top; but finally, at the end of the rapid our little boats float into an eddy as quietly and gracefully as swans. • • •

“Wednesday night we camped under the shadow of what remains of that wonderful and awful volcano [that once had flooded the canyon]. It is dark and gloomy now. As I lay in my bed, I looked up through the moonlight at its now silent crater frowning down upon us, and tried to picture to myself the scenes of centuries ago, when it first belched forth its molten rock and poured it down for miles and miles through the valley, and into the surging torrents of this wild river. Who saw it? Who heard it? Did any but the eye of God look down upon the seething, boiling terrors of that time, as that upper river of molten fire ran down into that lower river of melted snow? [freely paraphrasing Powell’s original description]. • • •

“We remained at Diamond Creek ten days, replenishing our supplies and completing our survey up and down the river. Here the party was reduced to eight by the departure—except of Ballard—of the crew of the lost boat. • • • ”

Farther on, “We were all thrown forward. The boat filled with water, sank upon the rock, and stuck fast. Wave after wave in quick succession rolled over us. I tried to straighten myself up, when a great wave struck me in the back, and I was washed clean out of the boat into the whirlpool below the rock. For an instant I knew nothing; but as I was drawn down my consciousness returned, and as I was carried by that whirlpool, down, down, down, I wondered if I should ever reach the bottom of the river. The time seemed an age. The river seemed bottomless. In a few moments I was caught as by two forces—one around my legs, and another around my back—and twisting in opposite directions; they sent me whirling away, and I was shot to the surface fifty feet (I am told) down the rapid from where I went in.

“I caught my breath just in time to be carried under the next big wave—coming out again in the lighter waves at the lower end of the rapid. Thanks to my cork jacket I floated high above the water, but was carried along through the swiftest of the current. • • •

“One would think that after travelling through six hundred miles of these cañons, one would be satiated with beauty and grandeur, but in this fact lies the charm. Of the six hundred miles no two miles are alike. The picture is ever changing from grandeur to beauty, from beauty to sublimity, from the dark and frowning greatness of its granite walls, to the dazzling colors of its upper cliffs. And I stood, in the last few miles of the

The Grand Canyon!

I. Primary Expedition Narratives

Grand Cañon, spellbound in wonder and admiration as firmly as I was fixed in the first few miles in surprise and astonishment. • • •

"At 9.15 A.M., Monday, March 17th, we merged [sic] from the Grand Cañon into an open country, and on a peaceful and quiet river.

"What a change! What a relief! What a joy! Our task virtually accomplished, our dangers all left behind, and now (humanly speaking) a certainty, which we never felt before, of once more seeing our families and dear ones at home! With our camp that night beside a quiet, gently-flowing river, with not a sound to disturb, it is no wonder that we went to sleep with thankful hearts, and overslept ourselves in the morning."

They continued down the river, past the Needles and Yuma, to tidewater in Mexico. "Here we left our boats, and to me it was a sad parting. • • •

"We rested a day, and then, accepting the courtesy and four-mule teams of Senor Andrades, returned overland to Yuma, where, on April 30th, the party was disbanded."

253 1890 Through Great Granite Gorge. The Railway Conductor, 7(22) (November 15): 792-793.

From Stanton (1890, Scribner's Magazine). Author's name given as "R. B. Stannon" [sic].

254 1891 Through Granite Gorge. The Railroad Trainmen's Journal, 8(83) (January): 7.

From Stanton (1890, Scribner's Magazine).

255 1892 Availability of the cañons of the Colorado River of the West for railway purposes. American Society of Civil Engineers, Transactions, 26(523): 283-361, Plates 26-36 [NOTE: Plate 26 follows p. 361; other plates inserted within article.]

Includes "Discussion" by various authors, pp. 332-361: Alfred Francis Sears (pp. 332-339); O. F. Nichols (pp. 339-342); Samuel M. Rowe (p. 342); John E. Early (pp. 342-344); J. Francis Le Baron (pp. 344-349); Laltham Anderson (p. 349); J. L. Barlow (pp. 349-351); Lewis Kingman (pp. 351-355); and reply by Stanton (pp. 355-361).

256 1893 Engineering with a camera in the cañons of the Colorado. The Cosmopolitan, 15(3) (July): 291-303.

Here Stanton provides a more technical perspective of the proceedings of the river trip; at least as compared to his 1890 rendition in Scribner's Magazine. His account also covers the climb of a butte, with a great deal of personal reflection. We pick up his story after the grave injury of the expedition's photographer, Nims, when the man had to be carried from the canyon to safety. Afterward, Stanton realizes he must pick up the duties of photographer.

"I had never adjusted a camera, had never seen the inside of a roll-holder. How did the thing work, anyway? The photographer's book of record was at hand. It was full of columns, headed with all sorts of abbreviated notes and signs. They were so much Choctaw. All that was known, and all that could be found out from anyone in the party, was that the film should not be exposed so long in a bright sun as in a dark night. With that stock of knowledge and information the work began. The camera—a 6½ x 8½ Scovil & Adams instrument, with roll-holder—was focussed, and adjusted, and turned, and twisted; and every moment I became more excited and worried. At last, the roll-holder was put in place, the instrument carefully covered up with the focussing cloth, and the slide drawn; but as I attempted to take off the cap, I hesitated, dashed my hat upon the ground, and tore my hair, in desperation at the complicated state of affairs. While thus engaged, the cook picked up a kodak and took a snap-shot at me, and presented for my future contemplation the absurd picture I was making.

"This was the first of January, and it was not until March that we knew how our first picture turned out. In the meantime I had made over twelve hundred exposures. As soon as we reached Peach Springs a telegram went to W. H. Jackson, of Denver, to whom two batches of rolls had been sent for development, and it was a happy moment when the answer came, 'Negatives all right.' It may be stated here that out of some sixteen hundred negatives taken to the end of our journey, full ninety per cent. were clear, well-timed pictures. This was not skill. It was accident, but that kind of accident which owes its birth to that troublesome matron so often found wandering in the wilds of the west, and commonly called necessity. • • •

The Grand Canyon!

I. Primary Expedition Narratives

In the canyon at Bright Angel Creek, Stanton decides to ascend the side canyon to try to reach the rim.

"The point where we ascended was near the spot chosen by Moran for the subject of his great painting of the Grand cañon that hangs in the capitol at Washington. I have often stood before that painting in the senate gallery, and studied it, to see if it were possible to place upon canvas the grandeur, the beauty, the fantastic forms, and the startling changes of color that make this chasm the sublimest thing on earth. Mr. Moran's painting, while grand in its outline, and beautiful in its detail and coloring, is yet to me a disappointment and sorrow. It is a perfect representation of the scene, caught as it were by an instantaneous plate, and colored by a master's brush. But herein lies the disappointment; it is quiet, it is still. The Grand cañon is never still, is never quiet. It is a living, moving thing, ever changing in form and color, pinnacles and towers suddenly springing into being out of unseen depths. From dark shades of brown and black, scarlet flames suddenly flash out and then die away into stretches of orange and purple. How can such a shifting, animated glory be held still upon a canvas? Much less, how can such scenes of life and color be caught by the simple black and white of a silver print? But I am anticipating. We will climb the great north wall, and look upon this wonder for ourselves. • • •"

The climb is arduous and hair-raising in places, without water, and they find themselves not at the rim but on an outlying butte. This is understood now as a climb of the Tower of Ra—see Robert C. Euler, "The Climb to the Tower of Ra", in Robert H. Webb, Grand Canyon, a century of change : rephotography of the 1889-1890 Stanton Expedition (University of Arizona Press, Tucson, 1996), pp. 24-25; with one of Stanton's photos (February 10, 1890) and Euler's replicated photo (September 20, 1979), pp. 22, 23. They camp for the night; and dawn comes.

"Soon, far out in the east, over among the towers and cloister buttes of Shiva's Temple, break the first faint rays of the coming day. Slowly the whole eastern sky is lit up with a strange and curious light. Not the gray of an Atlantic dawn, but a pale blue that seems to mellow the rays of the rising sun as they flash through the gray and yellow openings between the upper towers, turrets and cathedral spires of this land of wonder and amazement.

"Yonder, lower down through that side gorge, the sun has crept. Crept so noiselessly, and yet so suddenly, that one is startled at the wondrous change. The farther side of the cañon is all aglow. The scarlet sandstones and dark red marbles flash back the rosy light, which, mingling with the hazy blue of the atmosphere, casts over the whole landscape a glamour that is known nowhere else.

"We hasten to the top of the butte behind us to better see the drama of the opening day.

"Far to the north, the great Kaibab plateau, covered with pure white snow, and fringed on its edge with the bright green of the stately pine, is sparkling in the morning sun, as if crowned with a diadem of myriads of clearest diamonds, decked with thousands of perfect emerald plumes. To the south and west the vision is bounded by the same high plateaus that lie north and south of the river.

"The whole landscape is a network of caverns, gorges and ravines, and between them are towers, temples and buttes of every form, dimension and design. As the sun rises over the surrounding platform, what a silent, curious change creeps over the whole scene!

"The clear light of the sun streams through every opening. The eastern walls of the templed buttes burn with almost living flame, and to the west are cast long shadows, so dark and so bold, that they seem as if portions of the night itself had been left by the way.

"The whole lower cañon is still in solemn repose: but as the sun's light forces itself down the dark shadows steal away to hide themselves. The inner gorge wakes from its night of slumber, and as shadow chases shadow, and the bright sunlight leaps first here and then there, now around a buttressed point, then into a deep alcove, the whole scene is a moving panorama of light and shade and mingled tints of celestial beauty.

"It is bewildering! One stands enchanted! The purplish blue of the atmosphere, though not of such a sleepy haze as in the summer time, gradually turns into a steely gray, as the sun rises higher and higher, and the sharp lines of the cliffs, that stood out so boldly at first, are blended into one indescribable mass of weird symmetry.

The Grand Canyon!

I. Primary Expedition Narratives

"From beneath the snow-capped summits the gray and yellow of the highest ledges gradually sink, as the eye descends, into a pale purplish hue, which suddenly flashes out into the fiery scarlet of the middle sandstones. Across the gray talus at their base the brighter scarlet combines with the rich, deep red of the marble cliffs, and this, gradually melting away and mingling with the purples and darker browns of the lower sandstones, rests for a base upon the black granite of the inner gorge.

"Across the chasm, to the southwest, where the sun now shines in all his glory, the noble amphitheaters are opening up their many-colored galleries to view. [He quotes briefly, without credit, from Dutton's (1882) monograph] 'Hundreds of these mighty structures, miles in length and thousands of feet in height, rear their majestic forms out of the abyss, displaying their richly-moulded plinths and friezes, thrusting out their gables, wing-walls, buttresses and pilasters, and recessed with alcoves and panels.' The architecture so grand, so bold, so wild, and yet grouped together with such symmetry, and over all the outer and inner walls hung, with so much grace, those parti-colored draperies in such varied tints, is yet in such blended harmony that none but He who first painted the lily and the rose could have been the artist or the architect.

"A morning on such a sculptured butte, in the presence of such awful grandeur, while slowly and noiselessly the darkness of night is changed into the beauty and sublimity of a perfect day, is like standing on some new Mount of Transfiguration, where language fails and description becomes impossible.

"But one cannot always remain among such enchanting scenes, and however much the beauty and grandeur of the panorama may appeal to us, the stern necessity of the duty awaiting us below becomes more real the longer we stay. The problem of the descent also become curious when we consider it. But it has to be faced. Our real work was awaiting us in the cañon below. It was a fearful task, the descent to the foot of the redwall limestone. By noon we reached the first pool of water in a side gorge, and rested and refreshed ourselves with many cups of delicious coffee.

"More hard work, very perilous, which adds enormously to the fatigue, is before us. We cannot return by the route over which we came, but have to seek a new one. And it is not until late that evening we are again in our camp on the river. The next day we resumed our journey to the gulf."

- 257 1893 The cañons of the Colorado River of the West, U.S.A. : three papers. New York: The author.
Collected reprints of Stanton (1890, 1892, 1893).
- 258 1902 Engineering in the depths of the Grand Canyon. In: The Grand Canyon of Arizona : being a book of words from many pens, about the Grand Canyon of the Colorado River in Arizona. [Chicago]: Santa Fe, Passenger Department, pp. 43-53. [Volume reissued 1906, 1909.]
- 259 1965 Down the Colorado. (Dwight L. Smith, ed.) Norman, Oklahoma: University of Oklahoma Press, 237 pp.
Stanton's unpublished manuscript on the Colorado River railroad survey is finally printed, with introduction and annotations.
- 260 1978 Through the Grand Canyon of the Colorado. In: Babbitt, Bruce (compiler), Grand Canyon: An anthology. Flagstaff, Arizona: Northland Press, pp. 37-45.
Abridged from "Through the Grand Cañon of the Colorado", Scribner's Magazine (1890).
-

The Grand Canyon!

I. Primary Expedition Narratives

Other Expedition Accounts

Nims, Franklin A.

- 261 1892 Through mysterious cañons of the Colorado. Overland Monthly, Series 2, 19 (March): 253-270.

A long narrative of running the Colorado River with the Stanton expedition to survey the Denver, Colorado Cañon & Pacific Railroad, though with no dialog pertaining to surveying, and infrequent remarks on the scenery. Only in closing does Nims offer any overall impressions of the canyon, but which just as easily could have been suggested by the impressions of others who had been to the Grand Canyon. See Nims (1967) for the publication of his diary.

“. . . few persons can conceive the magnitude of [the canyons] or the colossal sublimity of the mysterious Grand Cañon; and it is almost impossible to measure space with the eye. The carvings by the hand of time and the elements of the fantastic designs, intricate and remarkable tracings upon the face of these stupendous walls, seem, without any stretch of the imagination, to be sculptured by a mighty architect and colored by a master hand. • • •

“It is majestic in its sublimity, its grandeur surpassing anything in the known world. A true word picture is simply impossible. The awe inspiring spectacle is supreme, whether viewed from above or below.

“When the railroad is built it will give to the tourist searching for wonders a ride through the most magnificent gorge in this world, over the most gigantic and stupendous feat of railway engineering known, or that man has dared to think of.”

Nims, Franklin A.

- 262 1967 The photographer and the river, 1889-1890 : the Colorado cañon diary of Franklin A. Nims with the Brown-Stanton railroad survey expedition. (Dwight L. Smith, ed.) Santa Fe, New Mexico: Stagecoach Press, 76 pp. (“Limited Edition[.] The first printing is limited to six hundred copies.”) [Dust jacket title: The photographer and the river, 1889-90 : Franklin A. Nims’ Colorado canyon diary.]

---

Contemporary Publications Noting the Stanton Expedition

Anonymous

- 263 1889 Chief Engineer Stanton on the Denver, Colorado Canyon and Pacific R.R. Engineering News and American Railway Journal, 22(33) (August 17): 160-162.

- 264 1889 The Grand Cañon railway project. Railway World, 15(33) (August 17): 770-771.

- 265 1889 An adventurous survey. Engineering News and American Railway Journal, 22(35) (August 31): 194-195.

Excerpts from correspondence of R. B. Stanton.

- 266 1889 [Exhibition of photographs by Robert Brewster Stanton.] In: Engineering Societies [SECTION]. Engineering and Building Record, 20(17) (September 21): 231 [number also published in London October 5].

Meeting of American Society of Civil Engineers, date and location not specified; “Robert B. Stanton exhibited after the close of the meeting, a large number of photographs of scenery in the Grand Canon of the Colorado, where he has recently been making a railroad survey.” (ENTIRE ITEM)

The Grand Canyon!

I. Primary Expedition Narratives

- 267 1890 [Denver, Colorado Cañon & Pacific Railroad.] Engineering News and American Railway Journal, 23 (March 15): 249.
- "The latest advices from the Cañon are that Chief Engineer Stanton and his party of railroad surveyors reached the mouth of Diamond Creek, on the Arizona line, on March 1. The trip through the Grand Cañon of the Colorado had been one of much danger and excitement, but had been, so far, successful in every way. A short stretch only of comparatively open river remains to be covered before the party emerges." (ENTIRE ITEM)
- 268 1890 [Stanton railroad survey.] Engineering News and American Railway Journal, 23 (March 22): 276.
- Includes quotation from a letter received from Robert B. Stanton dated March 8 at Peach Springs, Arizona.
- 269 1890 [Denver, Colorado Cañon & Pacific Railroad.] Engineering News and American Railway Journal, 23 (March 29): 300.
- Includes quotation from an item in the Denver Republican that was received from Robert B. Stanton.
- 270 1890 [Denver, Colorado Cañon & Pacific Railroad.] In: Miscellanea [SECTION]. Engineering (London), 49 (April 4): 424.
- "The adventurous survey for a railroad down the Grand Cañon of Colorado [sic], which has been in progress for some time, is now completed, so far as the preliminary work is concerned, and from the information thus gained it seems that there will be little difficulty in running a line through this awful gorge, as there is a natural bench from 20 ft. to 150 ft. above high water mark. Indeed it is stated that the line will not require one-half the heavy work that has been necessary in constructing lines amongst the mountains of Colorado." (ENTIRE ITEM)
- 271 1890 [Denver, Colorado Cañon & Pacific Railroad.] In: The Week [SECTION]. The Iron Age, 45 (April 17): 641.
- "Chief Engineer Robert B. Stanton, who is making the survey of the Grand Canyon of the Colorado River, pronounces the route practicable for a railroad, as the grades can be overcome and the curvatures will be slight, through a distance of 900 miles. The scenery surpasses anything elsewhere found in America." (ENTIRE ITEM)
- 272 1890 [Robert Brewster Stanton in San Diego.] The Great Southwest (San Diego and National City, California), 2(7) (July): 1.
- "Colonel Stanton, who recently completed a survey of the Grand Cañon route, is coming to San Diego again and will remain here two or three months and complete his report. He and the other surveyors are enthusiastic over the Grand Cañon. They say it has scenery more glorious than anything else in this country. Colonel Stanton says the outlet of the road will be San Diego, the Colorado being left at Yuma. A branch will also be built down to the gulf and both places be made ports of entry. He thinks there will be a grand rush of travel to this country when the road is completed." (ENTIRE NOTE)
- 273 1893 A rescue on the Colorado. Deseret News, (July 8): 631 [p. 14 in issue pagination].
- A partial synopsis of Robert Brewster Stanton's article in The Cosmopolitan, "Engineering with a Camera in the Canyons of the Colorado", regarding the injury and rescue of Franklin A. Nims; with quotation favorable to Mormons.
-

The Grand Canyon!

I. Primary Expedition Narratives

Other Publications

Pace, Paul S.

- 274 2016 To a far shore; Robert Brewster Stanton and the Colorado River railroad survey. The Nevada Traverse (Nevada Association of Land Surveyors), 43(1): 4-6, 24-26; (2) (June): cover, 3, 4-6, 24-25.

Smith, Dwight L.

- 275 1960 The engineer and the canyon. Utah Historical Quarterly, 28(3) (July): 263-274.
- 276 1962 (ED., ANNOTATOR) Robert B. Stanton's plan for the Far Southwest. Arizona and the West, 4(4): 369-380.

Smith, Dwight L., AND Crampton, C. Gregory

- 277 1987 (EDS.) The Colorado River survey : Robert B. Stanton and the Denver, Colorado Canyon & Pacific Railroad. Salt Lake City: Howe Brothers, 305 pp.

Stiles, Helen J.

- 278 1964 Down the Colorado in 1889. The Colorado Magazine (State Historical Society of Colorado, Denver), 41(3) (Summer): 225-246.

Webb, Roy

- 279 1991 Robert Brewster Stanton; the man and his river. Canyon Legacy (Dan O'Laurie Museum), (12): 8-18.
- 279a 1996 Grand Canyon, a century of change : rephotography of the 1889-1890 Stanton Expedition. Tucson: University of Arizona Press, 290 pp.
- 280 2011 "Some facts with no explanation": the strange tale of the Stanton Expedition. Grand Canyon River Runner, (12) (Spring): 1-3.

Wesson, E. W. G.

- 281 1906 Down the Grand Canyon. Wide World Magazine (London), 18(104) (November): 129-137.
- Seemingly plagiarized from Robert Brewster Stanton's account of the expedition through Grand Canyon, according to A. R. Crook, "Misrepresentations of nature in popular magazines", Science, New Series, 24 (December 14) (624): 779.
-

. . . one may be glad if he can win the conviction that in a world so strenuous with obvious duties and conscientious impulses no man has got to describe the Grand Cañon.

— Prudden, 1898

The Grand Canyon is just the Grand Canyon, and that is all you can say.

— Lummis, 1902

It is a noticeable fact, and one which the general reader may regard with quiet amusement, that all the writers who even attempt to allude to the Grand Cañon quote copiously from each other . . . .

— Whiting, 1906

The canyon is a theme only for the gifted poet, and he depicts on the page only his emotions; or the painter, who must, through the imagery of the artist soul, speak of what he feels, not what he alone sees, or he is lost.

— Bohn, 1911

But is nature really as freakish as this?

—Doe, 1916, critiquing a painting by Dodge MacKnight

It was never intended to be described.

— Elder, 1922

The Grand Canyon!

PART II

TO, INTO, AND EXPRESSING
THE GRAND CANYON

A KEY TO MARGINAL SYMBOLS

APPEARS ON PAGE 15

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

1870

[Brown, Robert]

- 282      1870      Horæ sylvanæ. Studies of the forests, forest trees, and forest life of north-west America. The Country Gentleman (London), 4: [SEPARATELY PAGINATED APPENDIX, IN PARTS].

Botanical in content but cited in this bibliography for its general, if ill informed, brief, second-hand description of Grand Canyon. See "Canyons", p. 15, which includes notice of "the great canyon of the Colorado in Sonora [sic] • • • So narrow is it, however, that it is said the Indians will cross at this giddy height [5,000 feet] on cottonwood trees which have fallen across the chasm."

"Horæ Sylvanæ" is cited variously, without date ("1869?" attribution seen), unsigned but with authorship further attributed to "Brown, Robert [of Campster]" (thus); pagination various, including 1-64 [et seq.?], but pp. 1-32 noted in copy seen by Spamer (an incomplete work).

Findlay, Alexander George

- 283      1870      A directory for the navigation of the North Pacific Ocean : with descriptions of its coasts, islands, etc., from Panama to Behring Strait and Japan, its winds, currents, and passages. Second edition. London: for Richard Holmes Laurie, 1,007 [1,008] pp. [Cover title: North Pacific Directory.]

See "The Rio Colorado", pp. 131-133. Includes note of "that most wonderful natural phenomenon—the Grand Cañon", which is "quite useless to man" (apparently taking Joseph C. Ives at his word).

1872

DeMotte, H. C. [DeMotte, Harvey C.]

- 284      1872      Six days on the Kaibab. The Alumni Journal (Illinois Wesleyan University), 2(10) (October): 233-239. [Unsigned, but in context known to have been written by the Alumni Journal's co-editor, H. C. DeMotte.]

"The 8th [of August] was set apart for a visit to the Grand Canyon of the Colorado, from our camp five or six miles distant. The Major, Prof. T. and wife, one of our guides (Ben.) and myself composed our party, while George kept camp and Quah, the other guide, with rifle, started on the chase [for food]. Our route was down one of those beautiful valleys so common here, along which on either side, at intervals, were little dells, skirted with balsam, spruce and pine and beautifully decked with richly variegated flowers. At length we climbed a gentle slope and stood upon the brink. No language can describe the scene which greeted our eyes. Immediately beneath us, apparently within a stone's throw of our feet the opening'chasm lay. Our point of observation was upon the first precipice or upper bank of the Grand Canyon. At this point we judged it to be about 1000 feet high and nearly vertical. Then spread out at its base was a valley of red sandstone eight or ten miles wide through which the Colorado cuts its tortuous channel. • • •

"We gazed upon the panoramic view spread out before us with intense interest and awe. Far to the southwest was the Colorado, seemingly a silvery line, winding northward to a point which one unused to such immeasurable expanse and dizzy heights, would judge to be beneath his feet, but which was full four miles away; then turning

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

westward for some distance with strangely varying course it made a southward bend and the dim distance hid it from our vision. • • •

"An approaching storm warned us to quit the spot, nor longer stand bewildered amid this grand display of majesty and might; and so our steeds were headed toward our camp. • • •

"The 11th of August was a bright, beautiful Sabbath and ere the sun could cast his rays on camp the Major, Prof. and I were in our saddles, intent upon a view of the grandest part of Grand Canyon. No church going bell called to holy meditation and yet here in these solitudes one strongly felt the spirit of worship, for in these mountain fastnesses God's handiwork is seen and in the yawning gulfs toward which we hastened His awful majesty and power appear. Our ride was exceedingly pleasant and an hour brought us to a lateral canon into which we gazed to see the rugged base chiseled into lines of beauty by the 3000 feet which separated us from it. Passing on to a projecting point we could see the Colorado winding its way amidst the wildest desolation. Far to the south lay the San Francisco mountains and north of west, in the dim distance, Mt. Trumbull broke the line of our horizon. We gazed upon the wondrous scene spread out in panoramic view before us—a scene which nowhere else on all this globe of ours can be found, and which few have ever witnessed. We sat in silent awe, spell-bound, not speaking lest the magic power which held our spirits in mute ecstasy might vanish. Reluctantly we left the scene and turned our steps toward camp. Our view of the Grand Canyon was ended and we were now to make due haste to reach the Pahria river at which place the boats lay anchored and the boys anxiously awaited our arrival."

1874

A., O.

- 285 1874 New-York. In: Vermischte Nachrichten [SECTION]. Zeitschrift für Bildende Kunst, Beiblatt, 9(37) (June 26): columns 595-597. [In German.]

See column 595, note of Thomas Moran exhibition of "The Chasm of the Colorado".

Bliss, J. S.

- 286 1874 (ED.) The Northwestern Lyceum Magazine, and annual list of lecturers, readers and musicians, season of 1874-75. Janesville, Wisconsin: Gazette Printing Co. [Wrapper title: The Northwestern Lyceum Magazine, Published in the Interests of Lecturers, Readers, Concerts and Lyceums.]

See p. 6, "Maj. J. W. Powell, (Explorer)" is listed among lecturers for hire; and "Maj. J. W. Powell, the distinguished explorer, again on the rostrum", pp. 41-47, back wrapper (including illustrations). Entry for Powell includes subsections that comprise collected newspaper articles from various places that reported on Powell's lectures: "Major Powell in Pike's Opera House, Cincinnati" (Cincinnati Gazette), pp. 42-43; "Major Powell in Brooklyn" (extract from Brooklyn Daily Eagle), pp. 43-44; "The Canons of the Colorado" (from the Cincinnati Enquirer, Washington Chronicle, Chicago Journal), pp. 44-46; "The People Found by Major Powell" (from Chicago Post), pp. 46-47. Also see illustration, rear wrapper, "Scene in Marble Canon".

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

1875

Bliss, J. S.

- 287 1875 (ED.) The Northwestern Lyceum Magazine. And annual list of lecturers, readers and musicians, season of 1875-76. Janesville, Wisconsin: Gazette Printing Co. [Wrapper title: The Northwestern Lyceum Magazine, Published in the Interests of Lecturers, Readers, Concerts and Lyceums.]

See p. 6, "Maj. J. W. Powell, (Explorer)" is listed among lecturers for hire; and "Maj. J. W. Powell", p. 47.

1876

Bliss, J. S.

- 288 1876 (ED.) The Northwestern Lyceum Magazine, and annual list of lecturers, readers, and musicians, season of 1876-7. Janesville, Wisconsin: Gazette Printing Co. [Wrapper title: The Northwestern Lyceum Magazine, Published in the Interests of Lecturers, Readers, Concerts and Lyceums.]

See p. 7, "Major J. W. Powell (Explorer)" is listed among lecturers for hire; and "Maj. J. W. Powell, (Explorer,)", p. 53. [Editions for 1877, 1878 not seen.]

1879

Bliss, J. S.

- 289 1879 (PUBLISHER) The Northwestern Lyceum Magazine and list of lecturers, readers and musicians, season of 1879-80. Janesville, Wisconsin: J. S. Bliss. [Wrapper title: In the Interest of Lecturers, Readers, Concerts and Lyceums, Season of 1879-80. Northwestern Lyceum Magazine.]

See p. 7, "Powell, Major J. W.—The Great Explorer."; no separate notice among lecturers' descriptions. See "Good Words", p. [6] of advertisements section following p. 53: "Major J. W. Powell, the Great Explorer. J. S. Bliss: I beg to assure you that I remember with pleasure our former business relations, and the pleasant time I had in your company. * * Let me assure you that I shall always be pleased to hear from you and to reciprocate your favors to the best of my ability." (ENTIRE NOTE) (Ellipsis, thus.)

1880

Amram [pseudonym]

- 290 1880 [Letter.] Deseret News, (September 1): 10 [issue pagination].

Trip to Mount Trumbull, dated St. George, August 12, 1880.

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

1881

- 291 1881 All aboard for sunrise lands. A trip through California across the Pacific to Japan, China and Australia. Boston: D. Lothrop and Co., 384 pp.

See p. [10] and Chapter 2, "Western Freaks", pp. 23-41, which through a fictional narrator, "Uncle Nat", and free use of illustrations from John Wesley Powell, describes to "Rick" and "Ralph" the Colorado River and its canyon lands.

1882

Benjamin, S. G. W.

- 292 1882 A pioneer of the palette. Thomas Moran. The Magazine of Art (London, Paris, and New York), 5 (February): 89-93, plate facing p. 93.

Cushing, Frank Hamilton

- 293 1882 The Nation of the Willows. Atlantic Monthly, 50(299) (September): 362-374, (300) (October): 541-549. [See also Cushing (1965).]

Frank Hamilton Cushing was an American anthropologist from the Smithsonian Institution who was best known for his work with the people of Zuni Pueblo. In 1882 he was sent by John Wesley Powell to attempt to trade with the Hopi at Oraibi, which was unsuccessful. He was guided onward so that he could visit the Havasupai in Cataract Canyon (Havasupai Canyon), the first "study" trip to these people. This is his account of that trip, the first part of which details travel from Zuni to Oraibi, then to set out toward Cataract Canyon. Appearing contemporaneously with Clarence E. Dutton's (1882) monumental first authentic description of the canyon view as seen from Point Sublime (see in Part I of this bibliography), Cushing offers the same for Cataract (Havasupai) Canyon on the South Rim.

"One winter night, some Indian brothers told me of a most marvelous country toward the sunset, covered by waterless wastes and vast pine forests, and cut through by cañons as deep as the peaks of the Sierra Madre are high. 'A veritable land of summer,' they said, 'deep down in a cold country, where sit our younger brothers, the Kuhni kwe [Havasupai].'

"'Are they a nation as great as our own?' I asked, wondering whether the old chief were telling me of a people of to-day, or of the personages of some fireside tradition of his forefathers.

"'Oh, no,' he replied; 'there are but a few houses of them. They are wiser than the Navajos, and sit still in a cañon so deep that a little stone rolled from the top sounds like thunder ere it strikes the bottom. The road down is a whole day long, and only a little while in the middle of the day do you see the sun from below. • • •

"I had to wait a year and a half for instructions; to use my authority as a chief, and to rant through two big councils, before Tsai-iu-tsaih-ti-wa—a young Indian who had been there—would consent to guide me. He and Tits-kemat-se, Captain Pratte's Cheyenne protégé, educated at Hampton, and sent out by my directors as companion and assistant in the field, were my only companions • • •

Finally, approaching Cataract Canyon, "Who would have imagined that between the terraced plains which we saw ahead and the one we were passing through was a cañon, which, though narrow, was so deep that no one could cross it for miles up or down its length? Even the entrance to that tremendous chasm can scarcely be pictured to one who has not seen the like. Perhaps the mention of its beauty and sublime depth, its silence, until the dislodgment of a single pebble awoke thundering echoes from its jagged abysses, may suggest a conception of the road-way into the home of the Kuhnis. No more readily can I describe to one who has not traveled with Indians our first descent of twelve hundred feet, almost vertical, except to say that we here wound around a great bank of talus, with tons upon tons of rock impending above us, there scrambled over great rocks, and crept along a foot-wide trail, where one mistaken step would have precipitated us hundreds of feet; and how at last we reached and made camp on the seeming bottom, but with hundreds of feet still below us, and cooked supper by the light of a single ray of sunlight, which shot boldly down the length of the cañon through the eternal shadows of the place.

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

"The Indians, before sleeping, told me that, when the waters of the world had risen and overwhelmed the nations of their ancestry, from Kuhni to the Rio Grande, A-hai-iu-ta, the sublime infant, the twin god of war, the guarder and guider of the Pueblo races, had perseveringly dug a little outlet where we now stood; and the devouring waters, rushing through, had worn this great chasm, leaving the marks of their foam and fury on the banded rocks, which rose everywhere above us, and almost echoed our faintest whispers. 'Nor have the waters yet ceased flowing, as you shall see to-morrow, when you cross the river by which the Kuhni have life.'

"In the morning we resumed the trail, less abrupt, but still rapidly downward. I shall have to hasten on through the labyrinths of that sublime cañon without attempting description, where forty-three abrupt turns are made, each one deeper, each turn narrowing the vision, yet always revealing some giant fortress or castle, in styles of architecture never dreamt of by human minds, never reared by human hands. At one place, we would see, looking giddily down from the gray summit rocks, where the gray cliffs parted from the red, as if ashamed of their soberer color, the little swallow-nest houses of a bygone persecuted race. At another, we would pass the mouth of a resounding cave, the walls of which were painted with emblems, and whose nooks were the hunting shrines of the strange inhabitants. Once the rocks seemed to close above us, and only a narrow strip of sky could be seen from our pathway. Finally, the last knot was tied in the fringe of my buckskin shirt, the last turn made in the course of the cañon, and we entered a grove of fresh green willows and cotton-woods. We passed the mouth of a giant stream, which rushes from the base of two thousand seven hundred feet of precipice, already a river in volume, a torrent in force; for, 'as I told you yesterday, the waters of the world have not yet ceased flowing.'

"The first Ha-va-su-pai I saw may be taken as a type of his race. But lightly clothed, a strange close bead-band around his temples, he swiftly passed from one bush to another as we emerged from the little grove. Below us stretched a green, moist plain of sandy soil, nearly two miles long by half a mile at its greatest width. We could catch only occasional glimpses of it through the rank growth of willows, the leaves of which everywhere brushed our heads as we rode along the river trail. These glimpses, however, revealed numerous cultivated fields of corn, beans, sunflowers, melons, peaches, apricots, and certain plants used in dyeing and basket-making, and usually carefully protected by hedges of wattled willows or fences of cotton-wood poles. Everywhere these fields were crossed and recrossed by a net-work of irrigating canals and trails. Here and there were little cabins, or shelters, flat-roofed, dirt-covered, and closed in on three sides by wattled flags, canes, and slender branches; while the front was protected by a hedge like those of the fields, only taller, placed a few feet before the house, and between which and the house burned smoky little fires. The houses were always nestled down among the thick willows bordering the river, or perched on some convenient shelf, under the shadows of the western precipice. In several places, within some of the great horizontal cracks of these western cliffs, and often high up, were little buildings of stone laid in mud plaster, and not unlike the cliff-dwellings we had observed on the way down, and of which ruins exist in almost every cañon throughout the great Southwest.

"When we again caught sight of our Kuhni, in a little opening near the trail, he was evidently uncertain whether to run forward and warn the tribe—whose voices, mingled with the barking of dogs and the murmuring of the river, could be heard below—of our coming, or wait to greet us. Finally, he shouted, in a rapid, gurgling, soft sort of language, that the villagers were coming; and then, with a sort of questioning smile, turned toward us, keeping up a ceaseless gibberish, but eyeing me closely, and evidently thinking me the most curious member of the party. He guided us through the willows to a crossing of the river, and as we rode up the opposite bank we were greeted by a waiting crowd of men, women, and children, who were gathered around two or three huts in front of a little sweat-house, closely covered with blankets. From out this primitive Turkish bath, heedless of the excited gestures of the presiding medicine man, issued in a cloud of steam a real American, red as a lobster,

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

and half blinded by the steaming he had just passed through. At first he greeted me most blankly, eyeing me as he would a ghost, but ultimately he became talkative. This exile proved to be a prospector, named Harvey Sample,—‘Sani pu,’ the Indians called him,—who had accompanied a cavalry expedition to the cañon from Prescott, a few days previously; and having been left alone by his companions, was getting along as best he could with the Indians. Pu-hi-ka-kai led the way further down the river to about the middle of the plain, where, near a beautifully sheltered hut, a former host welcomed him and us with jolly cordiality; gorged us with succotash; cleared the principal portion of his hut of women, children, and dogs, for our use; and soon after summoned a council, which kept us blinking, jabbering, and smoking until past midnight.”

Thus Part 1 of Hamilton’s account ends. He begins Part 2 with some background on the Colorado River country and the richness of the Havasupai abode, introducing the reader again to the way down into the canyon before relaxing into some long descriptions of what is there, in some ways reminiscent of the poetic work of Clarence E. Dutton on the North Rim (though published in 1882 it is unclear whether Hamilton had yet seen Dutton’s work [see Dutton in Part I of this bibliography]).

“Only two trails descend this cañon: the one from the southeast,—by which we entered,—with a southern branch, over which the cavalry had passed; the second from the southwest, winding and climbing through a maze of side cañons, a wonderful example of Indian engineering skill, unsurpassed in grandeur, difficulties, or dangers. The passage of either of these trails, especially of the latter, requires the greater part of the day. From the entrance at the head of the little side cañon, tending down from the southeastward, through which the first-described trail leads, forty turns are made, each one leading further downward, and revealing entirely new views of the indescribably grand and beautiful rock scenery. During all this passage of more than twenty miles, scarcely a place is encountered that a stone’s throw or an arrow-flight would not span, notwithstanding the depth gradually increases to three thousand feet. In some places the rocks overhang the traveler’s head on either side, leaving only a narrow strip of sky, while at others the opening assumes a funnel shape: the gray lime sandstone, which forms the upper half of the rock walls, gradually slopes back a quarter of a mile, where it suddenly ascends in a rugged series of promontories, buttes, and cliffs; the red sandstone, which forms the immediate cañon-border, more obdurate, retains its primitive narrowness and angular beauty, only here and there worn by the blasts of rain and wind and sand. These features are characteristic until the last turn reveals a bending plain, in no place exceeding half a mile in width, formed by the junction of the lesser southwestern cañon with the main southeastern, and reinforced by the wearing of the emerging river for ages,—and this is the sandy, loamy plain where the Ha-va-su-pai or Kuhni kwe dwell, and the groves of cottonwood and willows grow. Below the little village, which numbers about thirty-five huts, are four beautiful cataracts, from which the stream derives its American name. The first two are inconsiderable, although beautiful, sheltered as they are by thrifty, irregular growths of cottonwood and willow, the forms of which are reflected, and torn into a thousand fragments of green and silver, by the rippling, boiling, surging, rushing waters. The geologic history of these two is repeated in a third and grander fall, a mile or two below the head of the village. Huge rocks have tumbled down to the very water’s edge from the cliffs on either side, which here almost meet each other, leaving only a broken path on the eastern bank, difficult for the passage even of foot travelers. The unaided waters have built for their own adornment a horseshoe-shaped, overhanging dam of carbonate of lime, three hundred feet in height, filling in the basin above, to the very surface of the pool, with a confused jumble of petrified trees, mosses, ferns, flags, and what not, preserving only one deep, narrow, serene channel through the middle. And from their stony, dead ancestry spring ever fresh trees, mosses, ferns and flags; their rootlets and dead leaves continually changing to stone, their branches shooting upward to form a network so green and massive that it hides the waters which are at once their life and destruction. Over the top and very edge of this rock-wall springs a dense grove of cottonwoods and willows, with branches so abundant and green and high that they challenge the blue, cloudless sky, which only here and there peeps through them into the waters. The whole Kuhni River spouts forth in a mass of snow and crystal blue from out this marvelous verdure, sprinkling the leaves with its spray in its downward course,—leaves which reveal only now and then the red and yellow of the rock-wall to which they cling. It flattens itself, splits, midway down, on a huge stalagmite of its own making, and sinks into the vast green pool at the bottom, one mass of spray and foam and mist. It is useless to try to paint these falls, with their crown of perennial verdure, their three hundred feet of crystal glory, their footstools of eternal, circling rainbows, which sink far into the clear green depths of the fathomless pools, or rise on the clouds of mist, and turn to ashes and lime on the leaves of the trees around them. You descend a series of niches cut into the vertical rockwall, and, after slipping and grappling, and covering yourself with lime, skinning your shins and nose, and meditating for a moment on eternity, you find yourself at the bottom. A huge side-cañon comes in from the right, and, joining the main one, widens your view. But what care you for sky and clouds? Are you not face to face with a fairy grotto under the falls, white as snow and streaked with red and yellow? Are you not among the rainbows, even holding your breath to count the glories around you?

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

"You turn your face from all this, cross the stream on a crust of lime bridging it below the pool, climb a great mound of fallen rocks under the shadow of thick, lime-frosted trees, and make your way with difficulty along the deep, narrow, almost straight, but impetuous channel of the river, through a low, tangled forest, for a mile or two, when you come to an opening, and hear the deep roar of another waterfall, the thunders of which echo eternally up and down the narrow, dark cañon. ••• You step a few rods beyond, and find yourself upon the brink of a precipice of four hundred feet, over which, to the right, plunges in an unbroken spout or sheet the whole river, striking the basin below with deafening thunder, and sending clouds of spray far into the dark, green chasm below. I cannot attempt to describe this waterfall. It is formed like the preceding one, but, while not so beautiful, is wonderfully grand. It is named by the Indians 'Mother of the waters;' and by prospectors 'Mooney Fall,' because an adventurer of that name, in attempting to descend the precipice hand under hand on a rope, became giddy, and fell upon the rocks below, where now his bones, ever washed and whitened by the limy mists, give to the Ha-va-su-pai a warning of the forbidden pass to the 'home of the mother of the waters;' for he believes that the spirits of his ancestors sometimes float up and down amid the mists and rainbows, or that animistic demons lurk in the green, shadowy depths of the chasm. •••

The remainder of the long article comprises a history of Western encounters with the Havasupai, and observations of the people, their lifestyles, and their beliefs, of course as seen through the eyes of a 19th century American anthropologist. However, one sentence in particular (p. 557) is telling and pertinent especially in view of today's vehement threat of uranium mining despoiling the aquifers of the Coconino Plateau: "The Ha-va-su-pai believes that the source of his river is sacred and pure; that polluted by the touch of man it would cease to give forth its waters, and the rocks of the cañon would close forever together."

He ends:

"A fairy story is this of the Nation of the Willows; and while science teaches us another tale, may we not poetically believe, with these simple natives, that they have always lived here, apart from the world of nations; that ever since they wandered forth from the four fertile wombs of mother earth, this little strip of land and river and willow, and the great rock-walls, so near together, yet so sublime and impassable, have bounded their generations of life, have had shadows cast on them by the smokeclouds of the numberless funeral pyres of all their unnamed dead?"

Linton, W. J.

- 294 1882 The history of wood-engraving in America. Boston: Estes and Lauriat, 71 pp.
- See pp. 39-40, and illustration facing p. 40, "Walls of the Grand Cañon. After Thos. Moran. Engraved by Annin. From Picturesque America. Published by D. Appleton & Co."

1884

Anonymous

- 295 1884 Grand Canon of the Colorado. Scientific American, New Series, 51(9) (August 30): 130.
- "At the last meeting of the Academy of Sciences, San Francisco, Prof. Davidson spoke of his recent visit to the Grand Canon of the Colorado at a point 160 miles east of the Needles, on the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad, which required only 21½ hours' time, and an expense of $10 for horses and guide and 75 cents a meal. He saw vertical walls, 2,700 feet high, 6,200 feet above sea level, where the Colorado River was 190 feet deep, and cannot imagine anything grander than the effect of sunset shining on these walls, only 10° from vertical, composed of different colored rocks, red sandstone, and the black overhanging rocks. The temperature was 136° Fahrenheit.” (ENTIRE ITEM)

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

- 296 1884 [“Professor Davidson” visits Grand Canyon.] English Mechanic and World of Science (London), 40 (September 5) (1105): 13.

“The Grand Canyon of the Colorado, 160 miles east of Needles, on the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad, was recently visited by Professor Davidson, who says he ‘saw vertical walls 2,700ft. high, and 6,200ft. above sea level, where the Colorado river was 190ft. deep, and cannot imagine anything grander than the effect of sunset shining on these walls only ten degrees from vertical, composed of different coloured rocks, red sandstones, and the black overhanging rocks. The temperature was 136 degrees Fahr.’” (ENTIRE ITEM)

Morrison, William H.

- 297 1884 Morrison’s stranger’s guide for Washington City. Illustrated with numerous engravings and map. Revised and brought down to the present time. Washington, D.C.: William H. Morrison, 56 pp.

See regarding the U.S. Capitol, under “Senate Chamber”, p. 17: “In the northeast vestibule of the Ladies’ Gallery may be found two of the finest paintings in the building, viz.: ‘The Grand Cañon of the Yellowstone’ and ‘The Grand Cañon of the Colorado,’ [sic] both the work of the eminent American artist, Thomas Moran.” (ENTIRE NOTE)
The second-mentioned piece is actually titled “The Chasm of the Colorado”; not illustrated here.

Walcott, Charles D.

- 298 1884 Report of Mr. Charles D. Walcott. In: Powell, J. W., Fourth Annual Report of the United States Geological Survey to the Secretary of the Interior 1882-’83. Washington, D.C.: U.S. Government Printing Office, pp. 44-48.

Although scientific reports are generally overlooked in this bibliography, Walcott’s general report to Powell includes remarks on his survey work in the eastern part of Grand Canyon during the winter of 1882-1883, a part of the canyon that was accessed by the purpose-built trail now known as the Nankoweap Trail. Inasmuch as this is a famous Grand Canyon experience, his remarks are noted here.

“Early in November Mr. George W. Shutt arrived with instructions from you to accumulate supplies and a force of men at the lower end of House Rock Valley. Illness prevented my taking an active part in this and the building of the trail down into the Grand Cañon at the head of Nun-ko-weap Valley, under your personal supervision. When this difficult undertaking was accomplished I was left by you, November 20, at the Trail camp, in Nun-ko-weap Valley, with instructions to study the pre-Carboniferous strata as far south in the cañon as possible.

“The party consisted of Charles H. Haskell, collector; John Brown, cook; Joseph Hamblin, packer. Provisioned for three months and provided with nine saddle and pack mules to transport the party, necessary supplies, and camp equipage, the work was at once begun by a detailed study of the Tonto Group. A mass of limestones passing down into sandstones below the Tonto was speedily proved to be of Cambrian Age throughout, and to underlie the Carboniferous red-wall limestone conformably by dip, but unconformably by a line of erosion. The strata beneath the Tonto Group was studied first in Nun-ko-weap Valley, then in Kwa-gunt, and on to Chnar Valley. Trails were built over the high ridges separating these valleys, as it was found impracticable to follow along the shore of the Colorado River; and the Great Buttes, separating the river from the inner cañon valleys, forced us to cross the ridges connecting them and the walls of the Kaibab Plateau to the west.

“The third camp was in the upper portion of Chuar Valley—a name proposed by you for the second large valley south of Nun-ko-weap Valley. At this camp Mr. Haskell succumbed to the feeling of depression resultant upon living in the depths of the canon, and I was obliged to send him to Kanab and thence home, Mr. Hamblin and the Indian mail carrier accompanying him to Kanab. Mr. Haskell is an excellent collector, and I regretted his going at that time, as I was left with but one man for two weeks, and was obliged to undertake many dangerous climbs on the cañon walls alone.

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

"On January 2, 1883, Joe Hamblin returned, bringing with him B. L. Young, and Achilles Brown as substitute for John Brown, the latter returning to Kanab. After this the party was not broken up until disbanded at the close of the field work.

"Camp was moved down to the shore of the Colorado, below Chuar outlet, early in January, and for the first time we were in the Grand Cañon proper, the inner cañon valleys forming a great amphitheater between the Kaibab Plateau and the Buttes stretching along and forming the west side of the lower portion of Marble Cañon. From this point a detailed study was made of Cbnar Lava Hill to determine the character and thickness of each flow of lava and also the relations of the hill to a great fault line which had been traced from its inception in Nun-ko-weap Valley along the west base of the six great buttes to the east end of Chuar Valley, where it forked, passing each side of the lava hill. It was here the data were obtained showing that the Tertiary fault had been superimposed on an old pre-Tonto fault, with a reversing of the throw of the latter.

"Moving back into the lower end of Chuar Valley, a trail was made up on to the ridge next south, advantage being taken of the one break in the Tonto cliff, up through which a trail could be built. When on the Tonto terrace (2,200 feet above the Chuar camp), we followed along its edge for several miles, camping the first night in a little cañon beside a few shallow water-pockets. The following day a heavy wind, accompanied by snow, compelled our remaining near camp, as the danger of falling off the cliff was greatly increased by the light, loose snow covering the crumbling débris. The wind quieting down, I went up to the summit of the Tonto Group and was delighted to find a narrow belt of Devonian sandstone and limestone between it and the Carboniferous. Obtaining a few fish-scales and several brachiopods, the return to camp was hastily made, as the temperature rapidly lowered with the clearing away of the clouds. During the night the water in the sandstone waterpockets was frozen solid, and we were compelled to build large fires and pile the ice about them in order to obtain water for the animals.

"Starting out, a trail was cleared as we proceeded, sometimes along the level terrace and again on the brink of the cliff, where a stumble or a false step would have sent man or animal over a cliff of from 300 to 800 feet in height and down a terraced slope a thousand feet or more. Heading the cañon of Un-kar Valley a broken place in the Tonto cliff permitted a trail to be worked zigzag down to the cañon bed, and as night closed in we camped at the upper end of that, narrow, dark inner cañon through which the Colorado flows in the Kaibab division of the Grand Cañon. From this camp the Lower or Grand Cañon Group of the pre-Tonto unmetamorphosed rocks were studied, including the interbedded lava beds, a displaced portion of which forms Chuar Lava Hill. To reach the Archæan, south of Vishnu's Temple, the Tonto terrace (2,200 feet above camp) was scaled and followed along for several miles to a narrow cleft which gave a passage down to the Archæan, 1,700 feet below. This terminated the work in that direction. The animals were getting weak from hard work and poor pasturage. The supplies were running low, and the building of a trail further was impracticable with the men and tools at hand.

"The section of the pre-Tonto Groups had been taken from the summit on the ridge between Nun-ko-weap and Kwa-gunt Valleys down to the Archæan, and the search for fossils to determine the geologic age of the strata continued until further search appeared useless in the Grand Cañon Group.

"January 25, camp was broken in Un-kar Valley and the back trail was taken to the water pockets. A short stop was made in Chuar and Nun-ko-weap Valleys to review the original observations made on the lava beds. February 5, the camp was moved up to the foot of the trail leading out of the cañon, and the following day we reached the old wagon camp on the slopes facing House Rock Valley. In going out one mule was killed outright and two badly injured.

"Several days were spent in tracing the extension of the Cambrian strata up Marble Cañon and in repacking the specimens brought out of the Grand Cañon. Putting the collections and what remained of our camp outfit into a wagon, the party returned to Kanab. After repacking the collections in boxes, the men were discharged, a contract for the delivery of the boxes at Milford, Utah, made, and I accompanied the wagons, via Toquerville, to that point."

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

1885

Lindau, Paul

- 299 1885 Aus der Neuen Welt. Briefe aus dem Osten und Westen der Vereinigten Staaten. Berlin: Verlag von Ferdinand Salomon, 385 pp. [In German.]
(transl. 'From the New World. Letters from the eastern and western United States.')

Lindau travelled across America in the summer of 1883, as Richard Oberländer (1885) records that Lindau was one of the party of Germans that descended into the canyon at Peach Springs.

See Chapter 19, "Das „Grand Cañon of the Colorado“ in Arizona" (pp. 286-306); a group of thirteen men, interestingly including an advance man of the Santa Fe Railway, visit the canyon at Peach Springs. With the exception of an introductory paragraph introducing the Colorado River basin and its canyons, this long item is transcribed in its entirety here (from pp. 287-306). It is an account that is more personable than other accounts of Peach Springs visits.

"Denn zu jeder großen Pacificbahn gehört nun einmal ein Naturwunder seltenster Art. Die Central-Pacific hatte ihr Yosemitethal mit den Riesenbäumen, die Nördliche Pacific brachte sogleich den Yellowstone-Park mit den Geysern, die Atlantic durfte nidyt hinter den anderen zurückbleiben; und siehe da das Schluchtengebiet des Colorado! Wenn die Amerikaner aber etwas Großartiges aufzuweisen haben, dann lassen sie es auch an der nöthigen Inscenirung nicht fehlen; sie sagen lieber viel zu viel als ein klein bischen zu wenig und sind von dem beängstigenden Gefühl, daß ihre Anpreisungen allzugroße Erwartungen und gerade deswegen eine gewisse Enttäuschung hervorrufen möchten, völlig frei. In eindringlichster Form schildern sie das, was die Bewunderung der Nichtkenner erregen soll, und die grellsten Farben sind ihnen nicht grell genug. Die ernsten naiven Gelehrten, die die Sache nur aus diesen Schilderungen kennen, sprechen es ihnen auch vertrauensvoll nach; und so darf es uns nicht befremden, wenn ein deutscher Wissenschaftler, der wohl schwerlich oder vielmehr: ganz gewiß nicht an Ort und Stelle gewesen ist, in seinem ruhigen Studirzimmer die folgenden Zeilen am Pulte niederschreibt und in einem verdienstlichen wissenschaftlichen Werke veröffentlicht:

"„Nichts auf der Erde“, so heißt es da wörtlich, „läßt sich mit dem Großen Colorado-Cañon vergleichen, und man muß, um Formationen zu finden, die sich dem Schluchtensystem des Colorado-Cañon an die Seite zu stellen vermögen, den Blick auf den Mond wenden und die gewaltigen Gruben betrachten, die man dort sieht und die den Namen „Rillen“ führen. In einer Entfernung von mehr als zweihundert Kilometern hat der Colorado stellenweise zweitausend Meter tief sein Bett ein gegraben, durch alle übereinanderliegenden Sedimentärschichten bis in den unterlagernden Granit hinein. Senkrechte Wände führen in die grausige Tiefe, in die das Sonnenlicht nur während einiger Stunden des Tages blidt.“

"In derselben Weise und wohl noch volltönender wurde uns das neue Wunder von allen Amerikanern gepriesen. Unsre Erwartungen hatte man auf's Aeüßerste gespannt und so hoch geschraubt, daß sie nicht übertroffen werden konnten.

"Die Station der Atlanticbahn, von der aus man den Ausflug nach den Coloradoschluchten unternehmen kann, führt den Namen Peach Spring. Da wir von da aus bis zum Schluchtengebiete noch immer eine Entfernung von etwa dreißig englischen Meilen oder fünfzig Kilometern zurückzulegen hatten, und da man uns darauf vorbereitet hatte, daß diese Expedition nicht ganz mühelos und bequem sein würde, so mußten wir, wenn wir uns auch nur kurze Zeit am Colorado aufhalten wollten, um Abends wieder an Ort und Stelle zu sein, den Tag zu frühster Stunde beginnen. Schon vor Sonnenaufgang waren wir also Alle zum Aufbruch fertig.

"Der Morgen war sehr frisch, beinahe kalt und hatte jene seltsame, intensiv Hellgrau leuchtende Färbung, die dem Frühlicht, das die Sonne noch nicht durchwärmt hat, eigenthümlich ist. Der kleine Flecken, dem ganz sicher jene große Zukunft blüht, die das auszeichnende Merkmal aller amerikanischen Städte ist, zählt zur Zeit neun Bretterbuden, darunter sechs „Saloons“, also Trink-, Sing- und Spielbuden, zwei Kaufläden und ein Privathaus. Die meisten „Saloons“ waren noch fest geschlossen; aber für einen derselben war der Tag auch

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

schon angebrochen, und durch die eben geöffnete Thür konnte man einen Blick in das Innere werfen. Es sah da nicht sehr einladend aus. Hinter dem Ladentische waren Ständer mit verschiedenen Sorten von Schnaps, und im Hintergrunde stand ein Billard. Auf diesem, auf den klebrigen Tischen und dem unsaubern Boden lagen sechs oder acht Menschen, von denen die Meisten noch schliefen, Andere sich eben zum Aufstehen reckten. Die nächtlichen Gäste, die mit unsern Besuchern des Asyls für Obdachlose eine große Aehnlichkeit hatten, jahren recht wüst aus. Ihre zerlumpte Kleider waren ganz bestaubt; wahrscheinlich waren es Erdarbeiter.

„Zu unserer Gesellschaft, die aus neun deutschen Gästen Henry Villards, den beiden Deutsch-Amerikanern Friedrich Heß aus San Francisco und Udo Brachvogel aus Newyork und unserm nunmehrigen Wirthe und Führer, dem General Agenten der Atchison-Topeka-Santa Fé-Bahn, Herrn C. B. Schmidt, bestand, war in der Nacht noch ein Dreizehnter hinzugekommen, eigentlich der Wichtigste für die bevorstehende Expedition. Sein Name: Hollabird, sein Geschäft: Touristen-Agent der eben genannten Gesellschaft, also ein Kommissionär für Naturschönheiten. Der Mann hatte die Aufgabe, Reisenden, die Land und Leute kennen lernen wollen, mit Rath und That zur Seite zu stehen und ihnen klar zu machen, daß es, abgesehen von allen andern Vortheilen, auf der weiten Welt nichts Schöneres gebe als das Land, das die Bahn durchschneidet. Er war ein Prachtmensch, dieser Mr. Hollabird, ein echter Typus des Westens, eine jener schneidigen, unermüdlichen und unerschrockenen Naturen, die sich unter den gewöhnlichen Bedingungen unserer Kultur gar nicht mehr so entwickeln können. Der Mann legt im Laufe eines Jahres wohl ein dutzendmal und öfter Strecken zurück, wie die von Petersburg nach Gibraltar, ausgerüstet mit einem kleinen Handkofferchen, ein paar wollenen Hemden, Papierkragen, Flinte, Revolver, Munition, einem Kamm, den er in der Westentasche, und der Zahnbürste, die er in der Patronentasche bei sich trägt. Dabei ist er immer freundlich, immer in gleichmäßiger Stimmung, nie ermüdet, und der Sinn für Entfernungen, Entbehrungen und Strapazen ist ihm völlig versagt. Er schläft auf einem Klappstuhl im rollenden Salonwagen so gut wie Unsereins im bequemsten Bett. Auf den ersten Blick fiel mir der Mann auf, und er gefiel mir während der Stunden, die wir zusammen verbrachten, immer mehr. Er war spindeldürr, mittelgroß und hatte ein ungewöhnlich intelligentes Gesicht von unbestimmbarem Alter. Ich hielt ihn für einen Fünfziger und hörte nachher, daß er das fünfunddreißigste Lebensjahr noch nicht überschritten hatte. Er war eine Art Kakerlake, völlig bartlos, mit silberweißem spärlichem schlichtem Haar, hellblauen, klugen Augen, die auf das Vergnügteste aus gerötheten, wimperlosen Lidern hervorblickten. Er hatte etwas von einer weißen Maus. Die dünnen Arme und fleischlosen Hände waren stahlhart. Mit leichtem, elastischem Schritt, die Doppelflinte auf dem Rücken, besorgte er Alles. Er war nicht umzubringen und bei der Heimkehr von einer Fahrt, die uns Alle bis zum Umfallen ermüdet hatte, gerade so frisch und aufgeräumt wie am Morgen vor dem Aufbruch.

„Zu unserer Beförderung standen in Peach Spring zwei Wagen, die mit je vier Maulthieren bespannt waren, zwei kleine, starke, des Kletterns gewohnte Pferde und zwei Maul thiere zur Verfügung. Diejenigen, die mit Maulthieren und Pferden am besten Bescheid wußten und auf dem Wege, den man uns gleich als ziemlich beschwerlich geschildert hatte, auch am leichtesten fertig zu werden hofften, wurden beritten gemacht. Es waren die beiden Deutsch-Amerikaner Udo Brachvogel und Friedrich Heß, Dr. Oswald, Rechtsanwalt in Frankfurt a. M., und Richard Oberländer aus Leipzig, ein sehr schwerer, beleibter Herr, der aber lange Zeit in seiner abenteuerlichen Jugend als berittener Polizist in Australien gewirkt hatte. Die übrige Gesellschaft vertheilte sich in die Wagen, deren einer ziemlich neu und unbedenklich, der andere aber sehr wenig vertrauenerweckend war. In diesem fragwürdigen nahmen mit der stolzen Zuversicht, daß Alles gut verlaufen werde, unter Andern Lasker und ich Platz. Während der ersten Viertelstunde ging auch Alles ganz gut. Da war noch so etwas Aehnliches wie ein schlechter Weg vorhanden. Aber das Vergnügen währte nicht lange.

„Der Boden ist hier unendlich dankbar. Troß der fabelhaften Dürre sprießt überall die üppigste Wüstenvegetation, und wo nur ein bischen Wasser vorhanden ist, bewaldet sich sogleich der Boden, und wir sehen herrliche üppige Pappeln, hohe Cottonwoods mit mächtigem Blätterdache. In dieser bewaldeten kurzen Strecke werden die Terrainschwierigkeiten schon etwas erheblicher. Wir werden gehörig gestoßen und geworfen; aber wir ertragen die kleinen Unbequemlichkeiten mit bester Laune. Links vor uns erblicken wir ein primitives Nachtquartier, das sich irgend ein wilder Abenteurer hergerichtet hat: neben zwei hohen Bäumen zwei in die Erde getriebene kleine Baumstumpfe, die durch Latten mit den Bäumen befestigt sind, ein umgestürzter Baumstamm ist davorgelegt; und in dem dadurch abgezielten viereckigen Raume ist dürres Laubwerk zu einem Lager gesammelt.

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

„Auf einmal kommt eine selir starke Senkung. Der Kutscher muß sich auf den Rücken des Maulthieres stützen, um nicht vom Bock zu fallen, und wir im Wagen umklammern uns liebevoll und bekämpfen die Gefahr, herausgeschleudert zu werden, mit vereinten Kräften. Zu seiner Betrübniß bemerkt nun der Kutscher, daß die Bremse nicht arbeitet, und als die nächste Höhe genommen werden soll, löst sich der eiserne Reifen von dem ausgedörrten Holze eines der Vorderräder. Der Kutscher hält, klettert vom Bock, sucht einen großen Stein und klopft die Geschichte zurecht, so gut es eben gehen mag. Wir fahren vergnügt weiter. Aber der Kutscher hat doch nicht dauerhafte Arbeit liefern können: nach fünf Minuten verschiebt sich der Reifen abermals. Wiederum wird gehalten, wiederum wird mit einem Stein geklopft, und diesmal ist es etwas dauerhafter, es hält wohl zehn Minuten. Dann aber muß der Ausbesserungsversuch leider wieder erneuert werden, und dann immer wieder in Intervallen von fünf bis zehn Minuten. Die Sache fängt an, etwas einförmig zu werden. Nach einer halben Stunde etwa gelangen wir an einen Brunnen. Der Kutscher besprengt nun die Räder, um das Holz quellen zu machen, und nun geht es auch eine Weile wirklich gut.

„Aber die Fahrt wird mit der Zeit in der That recht beschwerlich. Hätten Mr. Hollabird und der Kutscher nicht feierlich geschworen, daß sie dieselbe Strecke erst vor wenigen Tagen mit einem Fuhrwerk zurückgelegt hätten, ich würde es nie geglaubt haben, daß sich auf diesem Boden jemals ein Wagen mit Zugthieren habe bewegen können. Die lebhafteste Schilderung würde weit hinter der Wirklichkeit zurückbleiben. Nicht einmal der schüchterne Versuch eines Weges war wahrzunehmen. Durch ein ausgetrocknetes Flußbett mit beständigen Hebungen und Senkungen wurden wir von den tapfer arbeitenden Maul thieren gezogen, und die Tiefen waren so unvermittelt und steil, daß wir jeden Augenblick darauf gefaßt waren, kopfüber aus dem Wagen zu fliegen, daß wir mit der Stirn die Brust unseres Gegenübers berührten, daß der Kutscher, um sich auf dem Bock zu halten, sich beständig auf den Rücken des Maulthieres stützen mußte; und die Hebungen waren so gewaltsam, daß es uns geradezu schauderte, wenn wir bedachten, daß wir mit dem Wagen da hinaufkommen sollten. Alle Viertelstunden mußten wir wenigstens einmal absteigen. Dabei war das Bett des ausgetrockneten Flusses besäet mit Kieseln, mit großen und kleinen Steinen, mit abgerissenen Felsstücken. Wenn ein Rad darüber fuhr, so wurden wir in die Höhe geschnellert und kamen, Gott weiß wie, auf unsern Sitz zurück.

„Die willigen, kräftigen, muthigen Thiere machen bewundernswerthe Anstrengungen, aber man muthet ihnen Ueberviehsdies zu. Durch Steinwürfe werden sie von den nebenherschreitenden Kutschern angefeuert, und die drei großen zottigen Hunde, die bellend und zähnefletschend den Wagen umspringen, thun ein Uebriges. Die Sonne ist höher gestiegen, und gegen neun Uhr wird es drückend heiß. Da bricht auf einmal die Deichsel unseres Wagens. Der Kutscher stößt einen langen beredten gotteslästerlichen Fluch aus, aber das hilft nichts. Es wird eine große Konsultation abgehalten. Es wird behauptet, daß in Peach Spring nod ein Wagen sein solle. Der unsrige, der unbrauchbar geworden ist, wird bei Seite geschoben, und der Himmel weiß, was aus ihm werden mag. Als wir in später Nachtstunde heimkehrten, stand die Ruine noch da. Drei Thiere werden uns zur Verfügung gestellt, die auch abwechselnd von uns benußt werden, und auf dem vierten reitet der Kutscher nach Peach Spring zurück, um den Wagen zu holen und an der Coloradoschlucht wieder mit uns zusammenzutreffen. Die Locomotion ergiebt sich unter den sehr erschwerten Verhältnissen ganz von selbst. Die Insassen des besseren Wagens rücken noch ein bischen mehr zusammen, da werden noch ein paar untergebracht, man löft sich gegenseitig ab, geht eine Strecke zu Fuß neben dem Wagen her, tauscht mit den Reitern; kurz und gut, die Nothwendigkeit, das Gefühl, aufeinander angewiesen zu sein, und das Bestreben jedes Einzelnen, die Gesamtheit möglichst wenig zu stören und das Gesamtwohl möglichst zu fördern, setzt die Bedingungen fest.

„Die furchtbaren Stöße und Rucke, die wir im Wagen zu erdulden haben, die beständige Aufregung, daß wir umschlagen, denn die Räder der einen Seite sind mitunter vier bis fünf Fuß höher als die der andern, die Strapazen des unglaublich schwierigen Rittes, die Mühseligkeit des Gehens bei brennender Sonnengluth—alles das ertragen wir leicht und guten Muthes, denn die Landschaft, in die wir nun gelangt sind, bietet in der That ein ergreifendes Bild wildester Naturschönheit.

„Wir sind nun in eine der Seitenschluchten, die zum großen Cañon gehört, eingedrungen. Rechts und links von uns am Ufer des ausgedörrten Flußbettes, durch das wir im Schweiß unfres Angesichts feuchend unsern Weg nehmen, starren unendlich hohe mächtige Felsen auf, in einem Farbenglanze, der das Auge blenden macht. Auch in der Formation dieser Sandsteinfelsen ist derfelbe Charakter vorherrschend, den wir an den Bad Lands und von den Needles aus an dem Höhenzuge der sogenannten, „Schwarzen Berge“ im Hintergrunde wahr

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

genommen haben: auf breiter Basis erheben sich in schichtweise abgetheilten, stockwerkartig übereinander gethürmten Lagerungen in langsamer Verjüngung kolossale Sandsteinpyramiden, die vertikal von gleichmäßig parallellaufenden Furchen durchriff sind und gewöhnlich in einem breiten, gleichmäßig abgeplatteten Plateau abschließen. Coullisenartig schieben sich diese Felsen vor- und hintereinander, verschieden in der Höhe, aber einheitlich in ihrem Grundzuge. Auch die einzelnen Stockwerke sind von größerem oder geringerem Umfange. Bald bauen sich kleinere, durchrissene Schichten aufeinander, bald streben höhere und mächtigere Lagerungen auf. Der Grundriß der Felsen ist oft von herrlichster Willkür. Einige fallen geradlinig, wie mit dem Lineal gezogen, in fast fenkrechter Wand ab, andere scheinen mit scharfen Eckpfeilern besetzt zu sein und sind mit ihren dreieckig vorspringenden Spitzen und tief zurückweichenden abgerundeten Buchten einem versteinerten Schlosse oder einer natürlichen Citadelle vergleichbar.

„Am eindrucksvollsten aber wirkt neben der unglaublichen Großartigkeit der Verhältniffe doch die geradezu unbeschreibliche Farbenpracht. Es sind da Färbungen, bei denen einem das Auge übergeht. Ganze Felsschichten schillern hellbläulich, und die Schatten in den Furchen liegen im tiefsten Sèvresblau; dahinter glänzen in der Sonne in tiefrothem Golde, oder eigentlich in kupfergoldiger Färbung andere. Dann sieht man wieder stumpfes Gelb, mattes Olivengrün und das nüchterne Roth der Terracotta. Und über Allem wölbt sich der unvergleichliche blaue, vom Sonnengold durchfluthete Himmel von Arizona von gewaltiger Schönheit, die verstummen macht.

„Sieben Stunden lang begleitet uns unausgesetzt diese mächtige Schönheit in blendenden Farben und zerklüfteten Formen auf unserm beschwerlichen Wege, der die Kräfte der Rüstigsten nahezu erschöpft. Und diese Gleichmäßigkeit der Schönheit ist vielleicht der wesentliche Mangel der Cañonfahrt. Hätte Menschenhand dieses Schluchtengebiet gebaut, so würde man sagen: es ist nicht gut komponirt, es fehlt die kunstgerechte Steigerung. Wenn wir eine Stunde von Peach Spring entfernt sind, so thut sich uns das herrliche Bild auf, das von da ab bis zu unserm Ausgangspunkte stetig bei uns bleibt; und auch Großartigkeit

„bei großer Enge
Wirkt ermüdend auf die Länge.“

„Wenn wir etwas über die Hälfte des Weges zurückgelegt haben, so erblicken wir vor uns am fernsten Horizonte einen riesigen Felsen, der sich durch seine eigenartige Form und namentlich durch das besondere Leuchten seines Bronze-Kupferglanzes auszeichnet. Er hat die richtige Regelform. Gleichmäßig streben die durchfurchten Schichten zu der Spitze auf. Es ist ein wundervoller Berg. Die prosaischen Geographen, die das Gebiet zuerst durchforscht, haben diesen Berg wie viele andere ähnlich gestaltete einfach, „Zuckerhut“—Sugarloaf—getauft. Damit war Udo Brachvogel, der über die Herrlichkeit dieses Felsens in Helles Entzücken ausbrach, ganz und gar nicht einverstanden. Er behauptete, es sei ein Irrthum; und da ein anderer, ähnlich geformter Felsen im Coloradogebiete den poetischeren Namen der „große Wischnutempel“ führt, so wollte er durchaus, daß dieser, der uns stundenlang in seiner glänzenden Pracht entgegenleuchtete, der „kleine Wischnutempel“ heißen solle. So hat er ihn auch in seinem Berichte genannt, und er hat es uns zur Pflicht gemacht, von diesem Berg nie anders als vom „kleinen Wischnutempel“ zu sprechen.

„Die verschiedenen Lagerungen der Felsen an unsrer Seite bilden, wenn man eine große Strecke überblickt, ganz wundersam zerhackte Contouren in phantastischen Linien. Bald starren thurmartig hohe Spitzen und Nadeln, bald thun sich breite Plateaus auf, bald ziehen wellenförmig sich hebende und senkende Höhen dahin, und alle in ihren verschiedenen Abschattirungen so wildbunt und dabei doch so einheitlich schön, daß man von wahrhafter Bewunderung erfüllt und erschüttert wird. Ab und zu gewahrt man in den Felsen natürliche, vielleicht auch künstliche Höhlen, die den Indianern als Wohnstätte gedient haben und zum Theil wohl auch noch dienen. In dieser Gegend soll es aber nicht mehr viel Rothhäute geben.

„Während der Wagen über Stock und Stein polterte und die Reiter langsam und mühevoll ihren Weg suchten, schleppten wir, Lasker und ich, uns durch Sonnengluth ächzend und schwitzend daher. Lasker war weitaus der beste Fußgänger in unserer Gesellschaft, und er ertrug die starken Beschwerden mit einer Rüstigkeit, die unser Aller Erstaunen hervorrief. Gerade während seiner Krankheit, deren besorgnißerregende Symptome uns, die wir nun beständig mit ihm zusammen waren, nicht entgehen konnten, hatte sich sein Sinn für die Schönheiten der Natur, der ihm immer eigen gewesen war, wo möglich noch mehr entwickelt und vervollkommnet. Er hatte das Auge eines wahren Naturkindes. Nichts entging ihm. Jede Einzelheit gewährte ihm eine tiefe innige Freude, und die Großartigkeit dieser Natur entzündete in ihm wahrhafte Begeisterung. Er achtete nicht der stechenden

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

Strahlen der sengenden Sonne, nicht des Gerölls, das uns die Füße verwundete, nicht der stadhlichen spitzen Dornen der Cactus-pflanzen, die sich heimtückisch und schmerzhaft in das Fleisch unserer Beine bohrten. Mit freudeleuchtenden Augen blickte er auf zu dem seltsamen Glanze der Felsen und zu dem tiefblauen Fluthen des Himmels, und in leise murmelnden Worten gab er einmal um das andere seinem vollen Entzünden Ausdruck. Als ich ihm in ehrlicher Nüchternheit anvertraute, daß ich zwar auch von dem prachtvollen Schauspiele aufrichtig erfaßt sei, aber doch gestehen müsse, daß wir es mit den Strapazen des Tages etwas theuer bezahlten, sagte er mir: „Sie irren. Die Müdigkeit schlafen Sie aus, und von den Beschwerden des Weges erholen Sie sich; in den Eindrücken des heutigen Tages aber haben wir etwas Unvergängliches.“ Lasker hat Recht behalten.

„Mr. Hollabird hatte uns erzählt, daß unweit der Hauptschlucht ein neues „Hotel“ gebaut sei, das dem Fremden, der das Cañon besuche, alle möglichen Annehmlichkeiten biete. Ich hatte ein gewisses Mißtrauen dagegen; denn ich mußte mir sagen, daß ein Hotel in dieser Gegend, in der überhaupt noch keine fünfhundert civilisirte Menschen gewesen sind, und in der wir die ersten Deutschen waren—Robert von Schlagintweit hat das Coloradocañon zwar geschildert, aber nicht selbst besucht—, wohl etwas primitiv sein müsse; und meine Vermuthung sollte sich auch bestätigen. Es war eine einfache Bretterbude, die wir nach etwa achtstündiger Fahrt erreichten. Der Wirth war schon seit einigen Tagen auf unsern Besuch vorbereitet und hatte uns eine sehr gute Speise, Weißkohl, bereitet, die uns in Kombination mit den Vorräthen, die wir selbst mitgebracht hatten, vorzüglich mundete. Von diesem sogenannten Hotel aus hatten wir noch eine kleine Strecke von etwa zwei bis drei englischen Meilen zu Fuß zu machen, um nach dem Hauptcañon zu gelangen.

„Wir folgten dem Laufe eines silberhellen kleinen Rinnsals, das, wenn mich mein Gedächtniß nicht täuscht, den Namen des „Diamantenbaches“ trägt, in einer immer großartiger, immer mächtiger werdenden Felsscenerie. An gewissen Stellen schoben sich die Felswände allerdings sehr eng zusammen; und an diesen wenigen Stellen hatte die Landschaft auch etwas unheimlich Grausiges. Im Allgemeinen aber machte das Ganze doch neben dem Mächtigen mehr den Eindruck einer friedlichen, majestätisch huldvollen Natur. Nach einer etwa halbstündigen Wanderung, während der wir herzhaft hatten klettern müssen, sahen wir das Ende der Felsengasse,—dahinter, den Horizont abschließend, einen mächtigen senkrecht abfallenden großen blauen Felsen—und an dessen Sohle rauschendes lehmigrothes Wasser: den Colorado im vollen Sonnenschein!

„Es wirkte tief auf uns Alle, wir hatten so lange keinen Fluß gesehen. Und gerade hier, in dieser steinig, jandigen Dürre hatte das gelbrothe Wasser etwas wunderbar Belebendes. Wir holten tiefer Athem, schöpften neue Kräfte, und nach wenigen Minuten waren wir am Ziele unserer Wanderung angelangt. Zwischen den gewaltig hohen, steil, fast senkrecht abfallenden Felswänden quetscht sich das Wasser hindurch. Unser Blick reicht nicht weit, denn der Strom macht hier beständig starke Windungen. Wir können auch nur eine kurze Strecke am Ufer des Flusses auf schmalen Vorsprüngen vor angehen, und während dieser kurzen Wanderung müssen wir gehörig aufpassen, denn unmittelbar neben uns fällt auch der Felsen, auf dem wir stehen, senkrecht zu dem Strombette ab. Uns wird auf diese Weise allerdings nur eine bescheidene Probe der Großartigkeit des ganzen Schluchtengebietes geboten, aber sie genügt uns vollauf; und wenn wir uns vergegenwärtigen, daß diese wildherrliche Felsenzerklüftung mit dem rauschenden Wasser sich auf lange Meilen erstreckt, dann begreifen wir die Begeisterung, mit der die Amerikaner von ihrem großen Cañon des Colorado sprechen. Hier ist es schattig und kühl. Wir lagern uns auf einem Vorsprung des jäh abstürzenden Felsens, blicken in entzücktem Erstaunen hinüber zu der kahlen blauen Felswand, sehen im Hintergrunde die kupfergoldige Spitze des Kleinen Wischnutempels, starren auf zum tiefblauen von dem Sonnenfeuer durchglühten Himmel und hören zu unsern Füßen das Wasser des Colorado rauschen. Der Genuß ist zwar theuer bezahlt, aber wahrhaftig doch nicht zu theuer. Ungern verlassen wir diese feierliche Stätte und mit einem gewissen Unbehagen denken wir daran, daß wir auf demselben Wege, den wir gekommen, heimkehren und erst im Dunkel der Nacht wieder in Peach Spring eintreffen sollen.

„Auf dem Rückwege vom Colorado zum Hotel kommt zu den kleinen Unglücksfällen des Tages nach ein größerer. Einer unserer Gefährten gleitet auf dem Geröll aus und verstaucht sich den Fuß, so daß er nur mit großen Schwierigkeiten bis zur Bretterbude gebracht werden kann. Zum Glück haben wir einen Mediziner bei uns, der den ersten Nothverband anlegt, und zum Glück ist auch der verheißene kleine Wagen eingetroffen. Da wird der Invalide mit dem Doktor untergebracht, die Reiter besteigen ihre Pferde, traben voran, um wo möglich noch vor einbrechender Dunkelheit auf dem ihnen bisher unbekannt gebliebenen Wege zu unserem Ausgangspunkte zurückzugelangen, und wir Anderen pferchen uns in dem größeren Wagen zusammen. Hollabird

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

legt vergnügt schmunzelnd den größten Theil des Weges zu Fuß zurück, mit der Flinte auf dem Rücken neben dem Wagen leichtfüßig herschreitend, als ob nichts geschehen wäre.

„Die Rückfahrt läßt sich zunächst ganz gut an, denn die Hitze ist inzwischen erträglicher geworden, die Sonne steht schon tief am Horizont. Sie scheidet nicht, ohne ihre Farbenkünfte noch einmal und verschwenderischer denn je zu zeigen. Der Kleine Wischnutempel wird immer schöner und schöner. Die Gebirge sind schon in bläuliches Dunkel gehüllt, auf der Spitze des Bergkegels aber liegt noch in voller Pracht das Sonnengold. Längst ist der feurige Ball unsern Blicken entschwunden, längst haben sich all die bunten Farben, die unser Auge am Tage entzückt, zu einem unbestimmten Mischton feierlich und seltsam zusammengestellt, und noch immer leuchtet an dem dunklen Himmel in tiefrothem Kupferglanze der herrliche Gipfel des Berges auf. Als auch da der letzte Glanz erstirbt, liegt die Nacht über den schauerlich wirkenden Felsschluchten, durch die wir mit Lebensgefahr befördert werden. Aber je tiefer das Dunkel der Nacht, desto glänzender und herrlicher flimmert und glitzert der unermeßliche Himmel in einer Sternenpracht, wie sie nur der Süden kennt. Ganz tief am Horizont stehen da die vier großen Sterne unseres schönsten Sternbildes, des Großen Bären. Das leuchtet und schillert und funkelt wie Milliarden von Diamanten. Almählig hat sich auch unser Auge an die Dunkelheit der Neumondnacht ein wenig gewöhnt, und der Abglanz des Sternenlichtes ist stark genug, um uns ungefähr erkennen zu lassen, wo wir sind. Die Dauer und Gewöhnung hat auch unsere Nervenempfindlichkeit erheblich abgestumpft. Wir schrecken nicht mehr zusammen, wenn wir in die Höhe geschleudert oder auf die Seite geworfen werden; und während wir bewundernd zum Glanze des wundervoll bestirnten Himmels aufblicken, denken wir gar nicht daran, daß wir beständig in Gefahr schweben, aus dem Wagen geschleudert zu werden und Hals und Beine zu brechen. Die Thiere können kaum noch von der Stelle, und die Hunde sind so matt, daß sie mit eingeklemmtem Schwanze, die Zunge weit herausstreckend, sich um nichts mehr kümmern. Der Kutscher wird nicht müde, den Pferden zuzuschreien, und Hollabird, der vergnügt neben den Thieren hergeht, unterstützt ihn.

„Plötzlich hält Mr. Hollabird an. „Da drüben ist Jemand!“ sagt er. Unser Wagen hält. Wir lauschen mit größter Aufmerkjamkeit.

„„Hören Sie nichts?“ wiederholt Hollabird. Wir müssen die Frage verneinen. „Da treibt Jemand sein Thier an,“ jagt der Agent mit größter Bestimmtheit, und gleich darauf stößt er einen hohen, weithinhallenden Schrei aus.

„Nun hören wir aus weiter Ferne allerdings eine Antwort.

„„Es wird doch keiner von unsern Reitern sein?“ Wir rufen wiederum, wir versuchen Feuer anzuzünden, aber es will uns nicht gelingen.

„„Wir müssen weiter,“ sagt der Kutscher. Wir protestiren energisch; denn wenn es einer der Unsrigen wäre, der sich verirrt hat, so wäre es doch unverantwortlich, ihn hier seinem Schicksal zu überlassen. Wir rufen wieder, und bald vernehmen wir auch den Ruf aus größerer Nähe. Der Vereinsamte, dessen Zurufe an das Maulthier Hollabirds scharfes Ohr mitten in dem Lärm unseres Wagens und unter den Zurufen unjres Kutschers vernommen hatte, ist nun so nahe an uns herangekommen, daß wir seine uns zugeschrienen heiseren Worte vernehmen. Er ruft uns auf Englisch an: wer wir sind? Wir fragen ihn, zunächst ebenfalls englisch, dann aber deutsch, ob er zu unsrer Gesellschaft gehört; und nun hören wir, nicht mehr weit von uns entfernt, eine heisere Stimme die Worte rufen, die gleichzeitig tragisch und komisch auf uns wirken: „Ja, ich bin hier allein in der Wildniß! Doktor Oswalt! Ich habe mich verirrt!“

„Nach wenigen Minuten stieß Oswalt zu uns. Er hatte durch andauerndes lautes Schreien nach den Gefährten seine Stimmbänder so überreizt, daß er kaum noch sprechen konnte. Seit mehr als drei Stunden irrte er allein in der felsigen Wüstenei umher. Er hatte sich sagen müssen, daß er voraussichtlich keinem Menschen begegnen würde und daß, wenn ihm ein solcher in den Weg laufen sollte, dieser wahrscheinlich weniger liebevoll als boshaft sein dürfte. Er hatte daher zunächst mit großer Umsicht sein Checkbuch vernichtet, um nicht vielleicht von einer abenteuernden Bande unter Bedrohung mit dem Revolver zu Unterschriften genöthigt zu werden, die ihm später unbequem werden könnten. Schließlich hatte er sich dann an den Gedanken gewöhnt, die Nacht allein in der Felsenschlucht zu verbringen, und nur die Kunde, daß hier noch manche recht unangenehme wilde Thiere, namentlich Wölfe und Klapperschlangen, unbewacht umherlaufen, hatte ihn einigermaßen verstimmt.

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

„Was war nun vorgefallen? Wie hatte er sich von den übrigen Reitern getrennt? Es war eine ganz einfache Sache. Der dicke Oberländer hatte seinen Rock ausgezogen, und hinter sich am Sattel befestigt. Die Befestigung hatte sich gelöst, und der Rock war verloren gegangen. Oswald, der zur leichten Kavallerie gehört hatte, wollte dem schweren Freunde die Gefälligkeit erweisen, den Rock zu suchen und kehrte um. Die Andern waren langsam weitergeritten. Dr. Oswald mußte eine größere Strecke zurücklegen, als er geglaubt hatte. Endlich fand er richtig den Rock. Als er nun aber das Maulthier antreiben wollte, wiederum den Rückweg nach Peach Spring anzutreten, versagte dasselbe einfach den Dienst. Vergeblich wandte er alle möglichen Ueberredungskünste an; er peitschte es, er trat es, er warf es mit Steinen—das charakterfeste Thier ließ sich in seinem Willen in keiner Weise erschüttern; es blieb ruhig an Ort und Stelle. Nach einer Weile war es den andern Reitern aufgefallen, daß Dr. Oswald nicht wieder zu ihnen gestoßen jei; fie ließen ihre Thiere nun langsamer gehen, machten Rast, zündeten Feuer an, aber Dr. Oswald kam nicht. Sie sagten sich, daß er jedenfalls mit unsern Wagen zusammengetroffen sei und sich uns angeschlossen habe, und ritten vergnügt weiter. Nach langer, langer Zeit siegte die menschliche Beharrlichkeit über die thierische. Oswalds Maulthier bequeme sich zur Umkehr. Aber es ließ sich Zeit; es blieb stehen, wann es ihm beliebte, graste, rastete, und der Reiter konnte nichts mit dem Thiere anfangen. So war die Nacht hereingebrochen, und er war allein geblieben.

„Als Oswald uns diese Geschichte erzählte, sagte unser Kutscher mit großer Ruhe: „Ich habe mir gleich gedacht, daß so etwas vorkommen würde. Das Thier kann ja nicht mit den andern mitkommen. Es ist auf beiden Augen blind und überhaupt in schlechtem Zustande.“

„Weswegen hat man mir denn ein solches Thier gegeben?“ rief Dr. Oswald entrüstet aus.

„Weil wir kein anderes haben,“ jagte der Kutscher, ohne sich irgendwie zu ereifern.

„Oswald setzte sich zu uns in den Wagen, Mr. Hollabird versuchte sein Heil auf dem alten, untauglichen, blinden Thiere, aber auch er wurde nicht damit fertig. Es wurde hinter unserm Wagen festgebunden und ließ sich nun mitschleppen.

„Auf dem Heimwege gab es noch allerhand mehr oder minder lustige Zwischenfälle. Die Einen behaupteten, sie hätten ein unglaublich leuchtendes wundervolles Meteor niederfallen sehen, Andere erzählten, um für einen sehr unmotivirten Satz, den unsere Pferde plötzlich machten, eine Erklärung zu finden, daß fie ganz deutlich im Sande eine ziemlich große Schlange hätten davoneilen sehen, und wieder Andere wollten sogar das eigenthümliche Klappern vernommen haben. Vielleicht hatten Alle die Wahrheit gesagt. Es wäre ja gar nichts Merkwürdiges gewesen, wenn hier ein Meteor niedergeschossen oder eine Klapperschlange über den Weg gekrochen wäre, aber die Skeptiker verhöhnten alle diese Beobachtungen und machten daraus die Geschichte zurecht, daß wir auf dem Heimwege Zeuge gewesen seien, wie ein Meteor eine Klapperschlange erschlagen habe.

„Endlich, um die mitternächtige Stunde trafen wir Alle in Peach Spring wieder zusammen. Die Reiter, die schon seit drei Stunden auf uns warteten, waren in äußerster Beunruhigung über unser Geschick; sie hatten Stunden unsagbarer Angst ausgestanden. Sie sahen uns in ihren wilden Phantasien mit zerschellten Schädeln im Flußbett umherliegen. Auch fie hatten allerhand Beschwerden erduldet. Oberländers Maulthier hatte ebenfalls gestrikt; der dicke Schriftsteller war dem Thiere zu schwer, und es hatte sich ohne Erregung einfach hingesetzt, so daß der frühere reitende Schutzmann von Australien in Arizona ganz sacht auf seine Beine zu stehen gekommen war. Das Maulthier hatte diesen stummen, aber beredten Protest mehrfach wiederholt, schließlich hatte es sich indessen doch in das Unvermeidliche geschickt. Wir waren Alle wie gerädert, und unsre Verlustliste des Tages war keine ganz geringe. Der Schwerstgeschädigte, Dr. Siemens, hatte sich den Fuß so empfindlich verstaucht, daß er während der folgenden Tage beständig in liegender Stellung im Wagen bleiben mußte. Er ertrug das Mißgeschick mit bewunderungswürdigem philosophischem Gleichmuth. Der des Reitens entwöhnte Oberländer war nach dem fünfzehnstündigen Ritt am andern Morgen kein Mensch mehr. Aechzend schleppte er seine schmerzenden Glieder und die imposante Körperfülle daher. Der Eine hatte seinen Hut, der Andere seinen Stock, ein Dritter seine Weste verloren und Dr. Oswald seine Stimme. Wir Alle waren todtmüde, hatten kaum Zeit, uns zu entkleiden und verfielen alsbald in tiefen bleischweren Schlaf, der durch das Schwanken und Rollen unsres Wagens während der Nachtfahrt nicht weiter gestört wurde.“

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

(translation)

[changes in tense are those of the author, who includes references to other places on his trip]

[compare also Trautman (1985)]

‘Because every great Pacific railway has a natural wonder of the rarest kind—the Central Pacific had its Yosemite Valley with the giant trees, the Northern Pacific immediately brought Yellowstone Park with the geysers—the Atlantic could not lag behind the others—so behold the canyon of the Colorado! But if Americans have something great to show, they do not fail in the necessary staging; they would rather say far too much than a little too little, and are utterly free from the frightening feeling that their promotions might arouse excessive expectations and, precisely because of that, a degree of disappointment. In the most penetrating form they describe what should arouse the admiration of non-experts, and glaring colors are not glaring enough for them. Serious, naive scholars who only know the matter from these descriptions repeat it with confidence; and so it shouldn’t surprise us when a German scientist, who was hardly, or rather definitely was not there, writes down the following lines at the desk in his quiet study and publishes them in a meritorious scientific work:

“Nothing on earth,” it says literally, “compares with the Great Colorado Canyon, and in order to find formations capable of rivaling the gorge system of the Colorado Canyon, one must turn your gaze to the moon and look at the huge excavations that you see there, which bear the name ‘rilles’. At a distance of more than two hundred kilometers, the Colorado has dug its bed two thousand meters deep in places, through all the overlying sedimentary layers and into the underlying granite. Vertical walls lead down into the gruesome depths, into which sunlight shines only for a few hours of the day.”

‘In the same way, and probably even more sonorous, the new miracle was praised to us by all Americans. Our expectations were stretched to the utmost and set so high that they could not be exceeded.

‘The station of the Atlantic Railway [Atlantic & Pacific Railroad], from which you can take the trip to the Colorado gorges, is called Peach Spring [sic]. As we still had a distance of about thirty English miles or fifty kilometers to go from there to the gorge region, and as we had been prepared that this expedition would not be entirely easy and comfortable, we had to, even if we did only want to stay at the Colorado for a short time in order to be back on the spot in the evening, start the day at the earliest hour. So before sunrise we were all ready to leave.

‘The morning was very fresh, almost cold, and had that strange, intensely light-grey hue peculiar to early light that has not yet warmed through the sun. The little spot, which is sure to have that great future blooming that is the distinguishing feature of all American cities, currently has nine shacks, including six “saloons”, i.e. drinking, singing and gambling places, two shops and a private house. Most of the “saloons” were still firmly closed; but for one of them day had already dawned, and through the door that had just been opened one could throw a glimpse of the interior. It didn’t look very inviting there. Behind the counter there were stands with different kinds of brandy, and in the background there was a billiard table. Six or eight people were lying on this, on the sticky tables and the unclean floor, most of whom were still asleep, others just stretched to get up. The nocturnal guests, who bore to us visitors a great resemblance to the asylum for the homeless, look quite wild. Their ragged clothes were all dusty; probably they were earthworkers.

‘To our party, which consisted of nine German guests plus Henry Villard [American journalist and railway financier affiliated with the Northern Pacific Railway]; two German-Americans, Friedrich Hess from San Francisco and Udo Brachvogel from New York; and our present host and guide, the general agent of the Atchison-Topeka-Santa Fé railway, Mr. C. B. Schmidt; and a thirteenth had arrived during the night, actually the most important one for the forthcoming expedition. His name: [William Hyman] Hollabird, his business: tourist agent of the company just mentioned, i.e. a commission agent for natural beauty. The man had the task of providing advice and assistance to travelers who wanted to get to know the country and its people and to make it clear to them that, apart from all the other advantages, there was nothing more beautiful in the wide world than the country that intersects the [Santa Fe Railway] track. He was a fine man, this Mr. Hollabird, a real Western type, one of those dashing, indefatigable and intrepid people who can no longer thrive under the ordinary conditions of our culture. In the course of a year, the man covers distances a dozen or more times, such as the one from Petersburg to Gibraltar, equipped with a small hand case, a couple of woolen shirts, a paper collar, a shotgun, a revolver, ammunition, a comb that he keeps in his waistcoat pocket, and the toothbrush he carries in his cartridge

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

case. At the same time he is always friendly, always in an even mood, never tired, and he has completely lost his sense of distance, deprivation and hardship. He sleeps on a folding chair in the rolling saloon car as well as we do in the most comfortable bed. The man caught my eye at first sight and I liked him more and more during the hours we spent together. He was spindly thin, of medium height, with an unusually intelligent face of indeterminate age. I thought he was in his fifties and later heard that he had not yet turned thirty-five. He was a kind of cockroach, completely beardless, with sparse, straight, silver-white hair, bright blue, intelligent eyes, which gazed happily out of flushed, lashless lids. He was something of a white mouse. His thin arms and fleshless hands were as hard as steel. With a light, elastic step, the double-barreled shotgun on his back, he took care of everything. He couldn't be killed, and coming home from a trip that had exhausted us all, just as fresh and cheerful as he had been before we left in the morning.

'For our transport there were at Peach Spring two wagons drawn by four mules each, two small, strong horses accustomed to climbing, and two mules. Those who were best acquainted with mules and horses and who hoped to be the easiest to manage on the path, which had been described to us as rather difficult, were put on horseback. They were the two German-Americans Udo Brachvogel and Friedrich Hess, Dr. Oswalt, lawyer in Frankfurt a. M., and Richard Oberländer from Leipzig, a very heavy, portly gentleman, who had worked as a mounted policeman in Australia for a long time in his adventurous youth. The rest of the party divided into the carriages, one of which was fairly new and harmless, but the other inspired very little confidence. In this questionable space, with proud confidence that all would go well, Lasker and I took our places among the others. During the first quarter of an hour everything went quite well. It was something similar to a bad way. But the pleasure didn't last long.

'The soil here is unendingly beholden. After a phenomenal drought, the most lush desert vegetation sprouts everywhere, and where there is only a little water, the ground immediately becomes wooded, and we see magnificent lush poplars, high cottonwoods with a mighty canopy of leaves. In this wooded short stretch, the difficulties of the terrain are a bit more significant. We are properly pushed and thrown; but we endure the little inconveniences with the best of humor. On the left in front of us we see a primitive night's quarters that some wild adventurer has set up: next to two tall trees, two small tree stumps driven into the ground, which are fastened to the trees with slats, a fallen tree trunk is placed in front of it; and in the four-cornered space delimited by it, dry foliage is gathered into a bed.

'Suddenly there is a very steep downslope. The coachman has to lean on the mule's back to keep from falling off the box, and we in the carriage hug each other affectionately, with combined strength fighting the risk of being thrown out. To his dismay the driver now noticed that the brakes were not working, and when the next step was to be taken the iron tire came loose from the dried wood of one of the front wheels. The coachman stops, climbs down from the box, looks for a large stone and corrects it as well as he can. We happily drive on. But the coachman wasn't able to deliver permanent work: after five minutes the tire shifted again. Again holding, again tapping with a stone, and this time it's a bit more lasting, maybe ten minutes. But then, unfortunately, the repair attempt has to be repeated again, and then again and again at intervals of five to ten minutes. Things are starting to get a bit monotonous. After about half an hour we come to a well [spring]. The coachman now waters the wheels to make the wood swell, and now things are going really well for a while.

'But the journey does become very difficult as time goes on. Had Mr. Hollabird and the coachman not solemnly sworn that they had covered the same distance in a wagon only a few days before, I would never have believed that a wagon with draft animals could ever have moved on this ground. The most vivid description would fall far short of reality. Not even the timid attempt of a way could be perceived. Through a dried-up river bed, with constant ups and downs, we were being dragged by the valiantly working mules, and the dips were so abrupt and steep that we were prepared at any moment to fly headlong out of the wagon; we touched our foreheads to the breasts of those who met us, the coachman had to keep pushing on the back of the mule in order to keep himself on the box; and the rises were so violent that we almost shuddered to think that we were going to come up there in the wagon. We had to dismount at least once every quarter of an hour. The bed of the dried-up river was strewn with pebbles, with large and small stones, with broken pieces of rock. If a wheel went over it, we would be jerked up and, God knows how, returned to our seats.

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

'The willing, strong, courageous animals make admirable efforts, but they are expected to do this. The coachmen throwing stones cheered them on, and three big shaggy dogs, barking and baring their teeth, jumped around the carriage and did the rest. The sun has risen higher, and by nine o'clock it is getting oppressively hot. Suddenly the drawbar of our wagon breaks. The coachman utters a long eloquent blasphemous curse, but that doesn't help. A major consultation is held. It is said that there is a wagon north of Peach Spring. Ours, rendered useless, will be pushed aside and heaven knows what may become of it. When we returned home late at night, the ruins were still there. Three animals are put at our disposal, which we use in turn, and on the fourth the driver rides back to Peach Spring to fetch the carriage to meet us again at the Colorado Gorge. Locomotion happens all by itself under the very difficult conditions. The occupants of the better wagon move a little closer together, a few more are accommodated, you relieve each other, walk next to the wagon for a stretch, swap places with the riders. In short, the necessity, the feeling of being dependent on one another, and the endeavor of each individual to disturb the community as little as possible and to promote the common good as much as possible determine the conditions.

'The dreadful bumps and jerks we have to endure in the carriage, the constant excitement [fear] of turning over because the wheels on one side are sometimes four or five feet higher than those on the other, the rigors of the incredibly difficult ride, the toil of walking in the burning heat of the sun—we endure all this easily and in good spirits, for the landscape we have now arrived at offers a moving picture of the wildest natural beauty.

'We have now entered one of the side canyons that belong to the large canyon. To our right and left on the bank of the dried-up river bed, through which we make our way, our faces wetted in sweat, immensely high, mighty rocks stare up in a radiance of colors that blinds the eye. In the formation of these sandstone rocks, too, the same character is predominant that we saw on the Bad Lands and from the Needles on the ridge of the so-called "Black Mountains" in the background: on a broad base, they rise in layers, stacked like bedsteads in slowly tapering colossal sandstone pyramids, which are vertically penetrated by evenly parallel furrows and usually end in a broad, evenly flattened plateau. Like coulisses, these rocks pass in front of and behind each other, different in height, but uniform in their basic features. The individual layers are also of greater or lesser extent. Sometimes smaller, fractured layers build up on top of each other, sometimes higher and thicker deposits aspire. The ground plan of the rocks is often of the most magnificent arbitrariness. Some fall in a straight line, as if drawn with a ruler, in almost a vertical wall, others appear to be studded with sharp cornerstones and, with their triangular projecting peaks and deeply receding rounded bays, are comparable to a petrified castle or a natural citadel.

'But what is most impressive, apart from the unbelievable magnificence of the proportions, is the almost indescribable splendor of colour. There are colorings that catch the eye. Whole layers of rock shimmer light blue, and the shadows in the furrows lie in the deepest Sèvres blue; behind them shine in the sun in deep red gold, or actually in copper-gold tint others. Then you see dull yellow again, dull olive green and the sober red of terracotta. And above all arches the incomparable blue sky of Arizona, flooded with golden sunshine, of mighty beauty that makes one fall silent.

'For seven hours this mighty beauty accompanies us uninterruptedly in dazzling colors and jagged forms on our arduous path, which almost exhausts the strength of the fittest. And this uniformity of beauty is perhaps the essential shortcoming of the canyon trip. If human hands had built this ravine area, one would say: it is not well composed, it lacks the artful increase. When we are an hour from Peach Spring, the glorious picture unfolds before us, which from then to our point of departure remains steadily with us; and also awesomeness

"pain when very tight
fatiguing in the long run."

'On the horizon is a rock that stands out for its peculiar shape and in particular for the glow of its bronze-copper sheen. It has the right form. The furrowed strata rise evenly to the top. It is a beautiful mountain. The prosaic geographers who first explored the area simply christened this mountain, like many others similarly shaped, Sugar Loaf [Diamond Peak]. Udo Brachvogel, who burst out in delight at the splendor of this rock, did not agree at all. He claimed it was a mistake; and since another similarly shaped rock in the Colorado region bears the more poetic name of the "big Vishnu temple," he was determined that this one, which shone in its gleaming splendor for hours, should be called the "little Vishnu temple." That's what he called it in his report, and he made it our duty never to speak of this mountain other than the "little Vishnu temple".

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

The various positions of the rocks on our side form, when one surveys a large stretch, quite wondrously chopped contours in fantastic lines. Sometimes high peaks and needles stare like towers, sometimes wide plateaus open up, sometimes heights rise and fall like waves, and all of them in their different shades are so wildly colorful and yet so uniformly beautiful that one is filled with true admiration and is shocked. From time to time one sees natural, perhaps also artificial, caves in the rocks, which the Indians used to live in and in some cases probably still do. It is said that there are not many redskins left in this region.

While the carriage rumbled over hill and dale and the riders slowly and laboriously sought their way, we, Lasker and I, dragged along, groaning and sweating in the hot sun. Lasker was by far the best walker in our group, and he endured the severe ailments with a fortitude that amazed us all. It was precisely during his illness, the worrying symptoms of which we, who were now constantly with him, could not escape our notice, that his sense of the beauties of nature, which had always been his own, had developed and perfected where possible even more. He had the eye of a true child of nature. Nothing escaped him. Every detail gave him a deep, heartfelt joy, and the magnificence of this nature ignited in him true enthusiasm. He paid no heed to the piercing rays of the scorching sun, to the rubble that wounded our feet, to the thorns of the cactus plants, which treacherous and painfully pierced the flesh of our legs. With eyes that shone with joy he looked up at the strange splendor of the rocks and at the deep blue flood of the sky, and in softly murmuring words he gave expression to his full enthusiasm again and again. When I confided to him in honest sobriety that although I was genuinely moved by the magnificent spectacle, I had to admit that we paid dearly for it with the hardships of the day, he said to me: "You're wrong. Sleep off tiredness and relax from the discomfort of the road; but in today's impressions we have something imperishable." Lasker was right.

Mr. Hollabird had told us that not far from the main gorge a new "hotel" was being built, offering every possible amenity to the stranger visiting the canyon. I had a certain suspicion about it; because I had to tell myself that a hotel in this area, where less than five hundred civilized people have ever been and where we were the first Germans—Robert von Schlagintweit has described the Colorado Canyon but has not visited it himself—is that it must be primitive; and my suspicion should also be confirmed. It was a simple wooden shack that we reached after about an eight-hour drive. The innkeeper had been prepared for our visit for a few days and had prepared us a very good meal, white cabbage, which we enjoyed excellently in combination with the supplies we had brought with us. From this so-called hotel we still had to walk a short distance of about two or three English miles to get to the main canyon.

We followed the course of a silvery little rivulet, which, if my memory serves me correctly, bears the name of the "Diamond Stream", in a rocky scenery that was becoming ever grander and more powerful. In certain places, however, the rock walls pushed together very closely; and in these few places the landscape also had something eerily horrid about it. In general, however, the whole thing gave the impression of a peaceful, majestically benevolent nature next to the powerful. After a hike of about half an hour, during which we had to climb hard, we saw the end of the rock alley—behind it, ending on the horizon, a mighty, vertically sloping, large, blue rock—and at its bottom rushing, loamy-red water: the Colorado in full sunshine!

It had a deep effect on all of us, we hadn't seen a river for so long. And just here, in this stony, sandy drought, the yellow-red water had something wonderfully invigorating. We took a deep breath, drew new strength, and after a few minutes we had reached the goal of our hike. The water squeezes between the enormously high, steep, almost vertical rock walls. Our eyes don't go far, because the current here constantly makes strong turns. We can only walk a short distance along the bank of the river on narrow ledges, and during this short hike we have to be careful, because right next to us the rock on which we are standing falls perpendicularly to the stream bed. In this way we are offered only a modest sample of the grandeur of the entire gorge area, but it is quite enough for us; and when we consider that this wildly glorious cleft of rock, with its rushing water, stretches for long miles, then we understand the enthusiasm with which the Americans speak of their great canyon of the Colorado. It's shady and cool here. We lie down on a ledge of the abruptly falling rock, look in delighted astonishment across at the bare blue rock face, see in the background the copper-golden tip of the Small Vishnu Temple, stare up at the deep blue sky glowing with the sun's fire and hear the water of the Colorado at our feet rush. The enjoyment is dearly paid for, but really is not too expensive. We are reluctant to leave this solemn place, and with a certain uneasiness we think that we are to return the same way we came, and not to reach Peach Spring again until the dark of night.

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

On the way back from the Colorado to the hotel, the day's small accidents are followed by a larger one. One of our companions slipped on the scree and sprained his ankle, so that it was with great difficulty that he got to the shack. Luckily we have a medic with us to put on the first emergency bandages, and luckily the promised little wagon has also arrived. Then the invalid is accommodated with the doctor, the riders mount their horses, trot ahead in order to get back to our starting point, if possible before nightfall, by a route that has remained unknown to them, and the rest of us cram ourselves into the larger carriage. Hollabird, smiling happily, walks most of the way, with the shotgun on his back, pacing lightly beside the wagon as if nothing had happened.

The return trip starts off quite well, because the heat has meanwhile become more bearable, the sun is already low on the horizon. She does not part without showing her colorful achievements once more and more lavishly than ever. The Small Vishnu Temple is getting more and more beautiful. The mountains are already shrouded in bluish darkness, but on the top of the mountain cone the sun's gold still is in all its glory. The fiery ball has long since disappeared from our sight, all the bright colors that delight our eyes during the day have long since combined into an indefinite mixed tone, solemn and strange, and the glorious summit of the mountain still shines in the dark sky with a deep red copper glow. When the last glow dies away, night falls over the horrific rocky gorges through which we are transported at risk of life. But the deeper the darkness of the night, the more brilliantly and gloriously does the immeasurable sky flicker and glitter in a splendor of stars such as only the South knows. The four large stars of our most beautiful constellation, the Ursa Major, are very low on the horizon. It shines and shimmers and sparkles like billions of diamonds. Gradually our eyes have become a little accustomed to the darkness of the new moon night, and the reflection of the starlight is strong enough to give us a rough idea of where we are. Duration and habituation has also significantly dulled our nerves. We no longer flinch when we're thrown up high or sideways; and as we gaze up in admiration at the splendor of the wonderfully starry sky, we do not think that we are in constant danger of being thrown from the carriage, and breaking our necks and legs. The animals can hardly move, and the dogs are so exhausted that they don't bother about anything, with their tails pinched in and their tongues sticking out. The coachman never tires of shouting at the horses, and Hollabird, walking happily alongside the animals, supports him.

Suddenly Mr. Hollabird stops. "There's someone over there!" he says. Our wagon stops. We listen with the greatest attention.

"Don't you hear anything?" repeats Hollabird. We have to say no. "There's someone driving his animal," the agent chases with the greatest determination, and immediately afterwards he utters a high, far-resounding cry.

Now, from far away, we hear an answer.

"It won't be one of our riders, will it?" We shout again, we try to light a fire, but we can't.

"We must go on," says the coachman. We protest vigorously; for if it were one of us who got lost, it would be irresponsible to leave him to his fate here. We call again, and soon we also hear the call from a greater distance. The lonely man, whose calls to Hollabird's mule's keen ear had heard amid the noise of our carriage and the calls of our coachman, has now come so close to us that we hear his hoarse words shouted at us. He calls us in English: who are we? We ask him, also in English at first, but then in German, whether he belongs to our company; and now, not far from us, we hear a hoarse voice calling out the words, which strike us as tragic and comic at the same time: "Yes, I am here alone in the wilderness! Doctor Oswald! I'm lost!"

After a few minutes, Oswald joined us. By constantly shouting loudly for his companions, he had so overworked his vocal cords that he could hardly speak. For more than three hours he had wandered alone in the rocky desert. He had had to tell himself that he probably wouldn't meet anyone and that if someone did come his way, they would probably be less loving than malicious. He had therefore first destroyed his check book with great circumspection, so as not to be forced by an adventurous gang, threatened with a revolver, to sign signatures that might later become inconvenient to him. Eventually he got used to the idea of spending the night alone in the rocky gorge, and only the news that some really unpleasant wild animals, namely wolves and rattlesnakes, roamed around unguarded, had upset him to some extent.

What had happened now? How had he separated himself from the other riders? It was a very simple thing. The fat Oberlander had taken off his coat and fastened it to the saddle behind him. The fastening had come loose and the coat had been lost. Oswald, who had belonged to the light cavalry, wanted to do his heavy friend

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

the favor of looking for the coat and turned back. The others had slowly ridden on. Dr. Oswalt had to cover a greater distance than he had thought. Finally he found the coat. But when he now wanted to urge the mule to begin the return journey to Peach Spring, it simply failed. In vain he used every possible art of persuasion; he whipped it, he kicked it, he threw stones at it—the will of the beast with its strong character could not be shaken in any way; it stayed quietly in place. After a while the other riders noticed that Dr. Oswalt never joined them again; they now made their animals walk more slowly, rested, lit fires, but Dr. Oswalt didn't come. They said to themselves that in any case he [must have] had met our wagons and had joined us, and rode on happily. After a long, long time human persistence triumphed over animal persistence. Oswalt's mule consented to turn back. But it took its time; it stopped when it liked, grazed, rested, and the rider could not do anything with the animal. So night had fallen and he was left alone.

'When Oswalt told us this story, our coachman said very calmly, "I thought at once that something like this would happen. The animal cannot come along with the others. It is blind in both eyes and in general in a bad state."

''Why did they give me such an animal?" exclaimed Dr. Oswalt with an indignant look.

''Because we have no other," pursued the coachman without getting excited in any way.

'Oswalt sat down with us in the carriage, Mr. Hollabird tried his luck on the old, useless, blind animal, but he could not handle it either. It was tied behind our wagon and could now be towed along.

'On the way home there were all sorts of more or less funny incidents. Some claimed that they had seen an unbelievably bright, wonderful meteor fall, others, in order to find an explanation for a very unmotivated leap which our horses suddenly made, that they had clearly seen a rather large snake hurrying away in the sand, and still others even claimed to have heard the peculiar rattling. Maybe everyone was telling the truth. It would have been nothing strange if a meteor had shot down here, or a rattlesnake crawled across the path, but the skeptics scoffed at all these observations and made up the story that on the way home we had witnessed a meteor slaying a rattlesnake.

'Finally, about midnight, we all met again at Peach Spring. The horsemen, who had been waiting for us for three hours, were greatly alarmed at our fate; they had endured hours of unspeakable terror. In their wild fantasies they saw us lying around in the river bed with our skulls smashed. They, too, had endured all sorts of hardships. Oberlander's mule had also been strict; the fat writer was too heavy for the animal, and it had simply sat down without excitement, so that the former mounted policeman from Australia in Arizona had gotten to his feet very gently. The mule had repeatedly repeated this mute but eloquent protest, but finally accepted the inevitable. We were all exhausted, and our list of losses for the day was no small one. The most seriously injured, Dr. Siemens, had sprained his ankle so badly that he had to remain lying down in the wagon for the next few days. He endured the misfortune with admirable philosophical indifference. Oberlander, who had been weaned from riding, was no longer human after the fifteen-hour ride the next morning. Groaning, he dragged his aching limbs and imposing corpulence along. One had lost his hat, another his cane, a third his waistcoat, and Dr. Oswalt his voice. We were all dead tired, scarcely had time to undress, and soon fell into a deep, leaden sleep, which was not further disturbed by the swaying and rolling of our wagon during the night drive.'

Lockwood, J. E.

- 300 1885 The World's Industrial and Cotton Centennial Exposition. In: Wilson, Augustus (Mrs.) (ed., compiler), Parsons' Memorial and Historical Library Magazine. History of the Memorial and Historical Library at Parsons, Kansas, and other libraries in the state and elsewhere. With history of Parsons and Kansas in brief : how to go to the world's fair, La., and where to find it : letters : sketches : general literature : art : history : reminiscence : notes and comment. St. Louis, Missouri: Bechtold and Co., pp. 181-193.

Exposition in New Orleans, Louisiana. A promotional piece for the Memphis Short Route South Railway (Kansas City). See p. 190, regarding an exhibition by the U.S. Department of the Interior, including: "It exhibits models from the Patent Office and of natural scenery—the Grand Cañon of the Colorado, the Yosemite Valley, National

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

Park [i.e. Yellowstone], and, the Lakes of the North-west. It illustrates the methods by which the blind, the deaf and dumb, and the feeble-minded are taught to drink from the sweet fountain of knowledge." (ENTIRE NOTE)

Oberländer, Richard

- 301 1885 Von Ozean zu Ozean : Kulturbilder und Naturschilderungen aus dem Fernen Westen von Amerika. Leipzig and Berlin: Verlag und Druck von Otto Spamer, viii, 256, iv pp. [In German.]

See pp. 219-221. Oberländer's narrative describes his journey across America in the summer of 1883. The selection below, which he indicates is from his diary, jumps from descriptions of his trip down Peach Springs Canyon into unacknowledged borrowings of canyon impressions (omitted here, but fragments can also be recognized in the paraphrasing that comprises part of this text) from the publications by Dutton and Powell, all the while implying that these added paragraphs are first-hand observations. See Lindau (1885) for a much more engaging account of this trip into the canyon.

"Über meine eignen Eindrücke sei mir schließlich noch gestattet, einige Seiten meines Tagebuches beizufügen.

"Von Peach Springs in Arizona, Station der Atlantic- und Pacificbahn, brachen wir in mit 6 Burros bespannten, federlosen, möglichst unbequemen vierräderigen Buckboards, auf nur im fernen Westen von Amerika noch möglichen, meist durch ein jetzt im Sommer trocken liegendes, von der Gewalt des Wassers durchaus zerrissenes, mit zahllosen Steinen und Felsblöcken jeder Art und Größe erfülltes Flußbett führenden sogenannten Wegen nach dem ca. 30 km. entfernten Ziele auf. Schon aus der eben besuchten Satzbildung mag man sich einen annähernden Begriff von der halsbrecherischen, steilen und jäh abführenden Fahrt machen—die Wirklichkeit würde die harmlose Phantasie der heimischen Leser jedenfalls nicht erreichen. Mit Zittern und Zagen hatte ich die tolle Hinfahrt mit den Genossen zu Wagen und zu Fuß zurückgelegt; auf der bis zur Mitternachtsstunde sich erstreckenden Rückkehr nach Peach Springs wagte ich es nicht, meinen Körper nochmals in solche Gefahr zu begeben und zog den Rittaufeinem Burro vor, der seinerseits über die ungewohnte Last meiner Person nicht besonders erfreut gewesen sein wird.

"Ganz ohne Beängstigung ging aber auch die Heimkehr nicht von statten: der Weg war inzwischen nicht besser geworden, in der finsternen Nacht mußten wir uns blindlings der Führung der Tiere anvertrauen, dzu störten uns unheimlich die häusigen Klapperschlangen am Weg aus unsern Betrachtungen oder das nicht minder erschreckende Gebrumme der Bären, namentlich aber vermochten wir eine gewisse Furcht vor der bedenklichen Nähe feindlicher Indianer und verwegener Raubgesellen nicht zu unterdrücken, von deren Ausschreitungen wir vorher mehr vernommen hatten, als uns lieb sein konnte. Daß wir trotzdem alle den harrenden Eisenbahnwagen im höchsten Grade befriedigt erreichten, will ich nicht unerwähnt lassen.

"Mit besonderer Genugthuung konnten wir auch an passender Stelle Zeugnis hinterlassen, datz wir die ersten Deutschen gewesen, welche die überwältigenden Wunder des Grand Canon erschaut.

"Und der Grand Canon des Colorado ist etwas ganz Neues, noch nie Dagewesenes. Man mag alle erdenklichen landschaftlichen Schönheiten gesehen und bewundert haben, aber solche Größe und Schönheit patzt nicht in den Rahmen unsrer Begriffe. Es bedarf eines Verweilens nicht von Studen, sondern von Tagen und Monaten, um das alles in sich aufzunehmen. Nur langsam und allmählich fatzt man die überwältigende Schönheit, die anfangs geradezu mit Schrecken erfüllt.

"Wenn die Schönheit nur in der Größe und in den umgebenden Felspartien bestände, so könnte man dies mit wenigen Worten ausdrücken. Es gibt in der Welt längere und tiefere Thäler, auch gibt es Schluchten und Klamm, deren Umfassungen vielleicht höher sind als die Palissaden des Colorado. Das Ensemble bringt hier die Wirkung hervor. Gewöhnlich stellt man sich unter einem Canon einen tiefen, engen Einschnitt in die Erde mit fast senkrechten Wänden vor, und es ist gessermaßen ein unglücklicher Gedanke, den gewaltigen Pfad, den sich der Colorado durch das Gebirge gewählt hat, so zu nennen, da man mit diesem Worte etwas weniger Gewaltiges zu verbinden pflegt.

"In die dunklen Gründe dieser abschreckenden Schlucht, welche das Thor zu Dantes Hölle in das Gedächtnis bringt, dringt kaum das Tageslicht und zwischen den Steinen und Felsenblöcken fällt, schäumt und überstürzt sich im tollen Laufe und in granitenem Engbette der schmutziggelbe Colorado. Und welche in den grotesksten

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

Formen terrassenförmig zu beiden Seiten jäh aussteigenden Felsen! Dort ziehen sich in langer, ununterbrochener Reihe abwechselnd in Gelb, Braun, Rot, Blau, Weiß und andern Schattierungen des Regenbogens die dieser Gegend charakteristisch eigenen sogenannten Alkovenbildungen hin, Schichten horizontal liegenden, teils weichen, teils harten Gesteins. Erstere sind durch den Einfluß der Witterung ausgewaschen, letztere bleiben als viele tausend Regale stehen. Man möchte glauben, man befände sich in der Bücherei der Götter, und das ist tatsächlich der Fall, nur sind die Regale nicht für Bücher bestimmt, sie bilden vielmehr selbst die steinernen Blätter eines großen Buches. Wer die Sprache des Universums studieren will, der Geolog, der den Geheimnissen der Welterschöpfung näher treten will, der studiere hier in diesem offen vor ihm aufgeschlagenem Prachtwerke, er wird es nicht ohne Erfolg thun. In weiterer Folge erheben sich die grotesksten Felsbildungen; hier unterscheidet man deutlich die Form eines liegenden Löwen oder eines andern ungefügen Tieres, dort hebt sich aus der Masse des Gebirges als merkwürdigstes Gebilde Wischnus Tempel empor; Klöster, Paläste und Schlösser in allen Stilarten der antiken und modernen Baukunst, Figuren von Menschen und von Tieren in zierlicher oder massiver Gestalt glaubt man bei jeder der vielen, meist sehr kurzen Windungen zu unterscheiden. Wenn man von Point Sublime nach Süden blickte, war die Szenerie am schönsten und gewaltigsten, am unvergeßlichsten! Den Eindruck erhöhen die nie gesehenen Farbeffekte. Auf einem beängstigend tiefblauen Horizonte, den keine Wölkchen trüben, heben sich die haarscharfen Umrisse der bronzenen Felsen in ihrer unaufhörlich abwechselnden Formgestaltung ab, und wenn die Sonne tiefer sinkt und die Schatten des Abends sich auf die Landschaft legen, dann weinend diese Felsengebilde und der darüber sich wölbende, von Milliarden der funkelnsten Sterne erglänzende subtropische Himmel an neuem Reiz und an neuer überraschender Abwechslung der Farben und Gestalten."

(translation, in some measure freely)

'Finally, about my own impressions, allow me to add a few pages of my diary.

'From Peach Springs in Arizona, a station of the Atlantic and Pacific Railway, we set off on 6 burros and a springless, as uncomfortable as possible, four-wheeled buckboard [such as are] still possible to find only in the far west of America. The way, mostly now dry in summer, is completely torn up from the force of the water, with numerous stones and boulders of every type and size filling the river bed leading along so-called ways about 30 km. to our destination. From the description just attempted, one may get an approximate idea of the breakneck, steep and abruptly diversionary journey—reality would in any case not reach the unharmed imagination of the home reader. With trembling and hesitation I made the mad journey with my comrades by wagon and on foot; on the return to Peach Springs, which lasted until midnight, I did not dare to put my body in such danger again, preferring to ride on a burro, which in turn will not have been particularly pleased at the unaccustomed burden of my person.

'However, the return home was not entirely without anxiety: the path had not improved in the meantime, in the dark night we had to blindly entrust ourselves to the guidance of the animals, and the frequent rattlesnakes on the path bothered us eerily, from our point of view no less frightening than growling of bears, but in particular we could not suppress a certain fear of the alarming proximity of hostile Indians and daring robbers, of whose excesses we had previously heard more than we could have liked. I do not want to leave it unmentioned that we all reached the waiting railway carriage highly satisfied.

'With particular satisfaction we were also able to leave testimony in a suitable place [Julius Farlee's guest register at the Farlee Hotel?] that we were the first Germans to see the overwhelming wonders of the Grand Canon.

'And the Grand Canyon of the Colorado is something new, unprecedented. One may have seen and admired every imaginable scenic beauty, but such grandeur and beauty do not fall within the bounds of our imagination. It takes a contemplation not of hours, but of days and months to absorb it all. Only slowly and gradually do you grasp the overwhelming beauty, which at first fills you with terror.

'If beauty were only in size and the surrounding rock formations, it could be expressed in a few words. There are longer and deeper valleys in the world, also there are ravines and gorges, the borders of which are perhaps higher than the palisades of the Colorado. The ensemble is the effect here. A canyon is commonly thought of as a deep, narrow chasm in the earth with almost vertical walls, and it is sort of an unfortunate thought to call the mighty path that the Colorado has carved through the mountains by that name, since one tends to associate something less powerful with this word.

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

'In the dark depths of this dreadful gorge, which brings to mind the gate to Dante's hell, daylight hardly penetrates, and falling between stones and boulders the dirty yellow Colorado foams and rushes down the mad course in narrow granite beds. And what rocks rising abruptly in the most grotesque forms in terraces on both sides! There, in a long, uninterrupted series of yellow, brown, red, blue, white and other shades of the rainbow, the so-called alcove formations characteristic of this area stretch out, horizontal layers of partly soft, partly hard rock. The former have been washed out by the influence of the weather, the latter remain standing as many thousands of shelves. One would think one was in the library of the gods, and indeed one is, only the shelves are not for books, they are themselves the stony leaves of a great book. Anyone who wants to study the language of the universe, or the geologist who wants to get closer to the mysteries of the creation of the world—study here in this magnificent work opened before him; he will not do it without success. As a result, the most grotesque rock formations rise up; here one clearly distinguishes the form of a recumbent lion or some other unruly animal, there Vishnu's temple rises up from the mass of the mountains as the most remarkable structure; monasteries, palaces and castles in all styles of ancient and modern architecture; figures of people and animals in delicate or massive form one believes to see in each of the many, mostly very short forms. Looking south from Point Sublime was the scenery at its most beautiful and tremendous, most unforgettable! Never before seen color effects increase the impression. On a frighteningly deep blue horizon, which is not clouded, the sharp outlines of bronze rocks stand out in their constantly changing shapes, and when the sun sinks lower and the shadows of evening fall upon the landscape, these rock formations and the arching subtropical sky, glittering with billions of the brightest stars, weep with new charm and astonishing alternations of color and shape.'

W., J. F.

- 302 1885 [Letter, addressed from Needles, California.] In: Fraternal [SECTION]. The Railway Conductors' Monthly, 2(6) (June 1): 340-342.

See p. 342, comment on scenery "along" the Atlantic & Pacific Railroad, including, "most beautiful, (the) Grand Canon of the Colorado, 8,500 high [sic], a most wonderful sight, and would repay any visitor a trip over the road". See also pp. 341-342: "H. L. Northrup, chief traveling auditor . . . who has discovered an animal among the lateral canons to the 'Grand'—he has named the Prox—having two short legs on one side, seemingly formed by nature for running around sidehills—a wonderful freak in nature." (ENTIRE NOTES)]

W., R. B.

- 303 1885 Grand Cañon of the Colorado. Army and Navy Journal (Gazette of the Regular and Volunteer Forces) (New York), 23(11) (October 10): 212.

"Correspondence of [to] the Army and Navy Journal." A letter from an Arizonan, dated September 17, 1885, regarding a descent into Grand Canyon from Peach Springs. Includes culturally offensive remarks.

"Leaving the cars at 2 A. M., at Peach Springs Station, Atlantic and Pacific R. R., passing the remainder of the night at the hotel—one long room, subdivided into smaller ones by calico walls, reaching half way to the top—the tourist, in a double-seated buckboard, behind two good bronchos, goes 'kiting' down Peach Springs Cañon, past 'Peach Springs,' a series of good springs 4 miles from the railroad, where a fine peach orchard of perhaps 30 trees bearing good (western) peaches, planted by a ranchman before the Hualapai Indians had this land set apart for their reservation; down steep hills, over dyspepsia-curing rocks, past huge ocotilla cacti, and monster ones of the 'nigger-head' species, with gigantic dark, rocky masses of stone, many thousands of feet high and several miles long; he finally, after a ride of 18 miles, reaches the 'Grand Cañon Hotel,' two stories high, where the driver is proprietor, cook, guide, policeman and 'yarnist.' He charges $10 each person for the round trip, meals 75 cents each, and beds the same. Reasonable, as he has 'spent thousands of dollars' in road making, hotel building, etc.

"Of course everybody knows the cañon is about 400 miles long, with walls, in places perpendicular, and in others (mostly the case), consisting of two or three hills, with 'terraces' between them, the hills themselves

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

slanting, varying in height from 1,000 to 6,200 feet. The point near Peach Springs is not the grandest part, but it is as high as elsewhere. One mile below the hotel is the cañon with the Colorado River, said to be from 50 to 130 feet deep and 250 feet wide, flowing through. By holding on to rocks on the shore one can bathe in its swift, reddish waters. The waves seem to rush over rocks just beneath the surface, but the guide says the same appearance is noted at all times, and that with a 40 pound lead he has never reached bottom. Blank and myself bathed along the shore. Diamond Creek Cañon, emptying in the cañon here, is by far the grandest sight. Then Black Trap Rock, smooth and glistening as if oiled, rise up perpendicularly, at one place to 2,700 feet. In places these walls overhang. A crystal stream, flowing from a vast spring 40 miles up, furnishes water for the hotel. Although the 'gloomy grandeur' is overawing, still no cañons were seen where 'stars at middday are plainly visible' [repeating a frequently noted misconception]. The little, cool, clear stream was to us, Arizonians, one of the sights of the place, and Blank seemed 'awfully' delighted with an impromptu bath-tub made by damming up the creek, until the bottom, with its thousands of small pebbles, was as fine a couch as the ocean couch of Venus Amphitrite.

"We met an old Army scout, so he said, of Canby and Custer. • • •" Here the "Scout" yarns of his exploits, having nothing to do with the canyon.

"I and the driver, or to be more accurate, if not more grammatical, the driver and I, killed a rattlesnake in the cañon, which gave our loquacious friend cause to remark that a huge one was killed the other day, 9 feet long, with 23 rattles, and that it was now on display at Kingman. As we passed there at 4 A. M. I told him I was going to get off the cars to see it. He said it was in a saloon which was closed at that hour. So another chance in a life-time was missed.

"Many tracks of the Rocky Mountain sheep (or Bighorn of Mayne Read) were seen in the cañon, where they came to drink. A few deer are around. A 'still hunter' on the day we were in the cañon killed two, at one shot, at Peach Springs. The country abounds in jack rabbits, quail, and snakes, with here and there a wolf and its congener, a wildcat. The guide said there were not fifteen acres of arable land in the whole Malapai Mountain [sic], with an average width of 25 miles, and, following the Colorado, a length of 125 miles. A sub-tribe had a few acres cultivated in Diamond Cañon, the walls, thousands of feet high, being most effective fences, but an overflow washed gravel over it.

"In another cañon, 70 miles north, the An-Supies [Havasupai] cultivate, now, a few acres in their secure retreat. The Grand Cañon is 4,000 feet lower than Peach Springs. The latter is cool in summer—the former hot as Yuma. In winter snow is frequent at the latter, whereas frost has never been seen at the former. Although the height of these cañon walls has been scientifically measured, one can hardly believe that they are half as high as they really are."

304 1885 Grand Cañon of the Colorado. Internal Revenue Record and Customs Journal (New York), 31(41) (October 12): 322.

Letter dated September 17, 1885; regarding a descent into Grand Canyon from Peach Springs. "Correspondence of [to] the Army and Navy Journal." This item is typographically identical to that which appeared in the Army and Navy Journal two days earlier (see above). The publication office for both journals is the same, thus the same text block was used in both publications.

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

1886

Editor, Western Gazette

- 305 NO DATE Three months in the United States and Canada. By the Editor of the "Western Gazette." Yeovil [Somerset, England]: Office of "The Western Gazette" and "Pulman's Weekly News", 162 pp. [Preface dated January 1886.]

"The following series of papers appeared in 'The Western Gazette' and 'Pulman's Weekly News,' at somewhat irregular intervals, between November 1883 and September 1885." See "Parks and Canons", pp. 124-125; Colorado River and Grand Canyon, p. 125.

Stearns, J. W.

- 306 1886 Notes of a vacation ramble—IV. Albuquerque and beyond. Wisconsin Journal of Education, 16(12) (December): 493-498.

It is not clear whether or not Stearns was one of the tourists mentioned.

"At Peach Springs tourists for the Grand Canon leave the railroad. A stage ride of twenty miles brings them to a point where a descent into the canon can be made with tolerable ease, and a day or two may well be spent in examining this wonderful chasm, where the structure of the continent is laid bare, and the miracles of erosion, sculpturing these variously colored rocks into pinnacles, domes, turrets and towers, mock the marvels of human architecture. In the canon, four or five thousand feet below the surface of the earth, the heat at noonday is almost insupportable, so that explorations must be made at night and in the morning." (ENTIRE NOTE)

Tissandier, Albert

- 307 1886 Six mois aux États-Unis : voyage d'un touriste dans l'Amérique du Nord, suivi d'une excursion à Panama. Paris: G. Masson, 298 pp. [In French.]
(transl. 'Six months in the United States: a tourist trip to North America, followed by an excursion to Panama')

Tissandier traveled a large loop across the northern part of the U.S. in 1885, with several side trips including one to southern Utah and the Grand Canyon (as noticed on the frontispiece map). See in Chapter 5, which relates several excursions from a central base in Kanab, Utah. One excursion is to Toroweap; the other to Point Sublime. Both of these narrations are disappointing in their brevity, despite the inclusion of a lithographic view by Tissandier (his Plate IV), "Canon de Toroweap dans l'Arizona" ('Canyon of Toroweap in Arizona'), which is the only illustration (among many) of immediate interest to this bibliography. However, his narrative of the trip across the Kaibab Plateau, while extralimital to the present work and thus omitted here, is very detailed and has been extracted from at many times; and parts of his newly published book, including the Kaibab trip, were serialized in France, Germany, and The Netherlands. See Tissandier (2002) for an English translation (which was not consulted for the translation provided farther below).

"Mon premier voyage, convenu avec Nathan [Adam Nathan of Kanab], mon futur guide, eut pour but le mont Trumbull et les gorges de Toroweap.

"C'est une tournée de sept jours entiers; la difficulté de trouver de l'eau dans les déserts qu'il faut traverser rend cette exploration quelquefois pénible. • • •

"Nous n'avions pas du reste d' autre route à suivre pour atteindre la vallée sablonneuse de Toroweap auprès des cañons. Longue et relativement assez étroite, cette vallée est encadrée par des rochers colossaux de couleurs toujours surprenantes.

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

"Le soir nous n'eûmes pas à nous plaindre de notre campement au pied d'une muraille semblable à une forteresse. Ombragés par un vieux cèdre, nous sommes sur un immense plateau de rochers de grès aux formes arrondies, usées par les neiges des hivers. De nombreuses fleurs et des arbres rabougris ou des agaves qui ont parfois plus de quatre mètres de hauteur, des cactus, nous charment comme des décorations sur ces pierres aux couleurs rougeâtres ou dorées; au delà nos regards se reposent sur des murailles dentelées qui s'étendent à perte de vue et ferment l'horizon.

"Après un peu de repos nous marchons sur les énormes pierres, les escaladant souvent en nous aidant de nos mains ou sautant par-dessus de larges crevasses.

"Sous l'impression de la grandeur de ces déserts étranges j'avance avec un indéfinissable sentiment d'étonnement.

"La scène change, mais n'est pas moins étourdissante: voici à mes pieds les précipices grandioses de Toroweap, au fond desquels coule le Colorado (Pl. IV).

"C'est un spectacle inouï que ces gouffres d'érosion, profonds de 600 à 800 mètres, formés de parois à pic ou de gradins gigantesques descendant jusqu'au torrent (fig. 23) ["Grand cañon, vue prise à l'est de Toroweap", which appears on p. 81 and was copied without credit from Thomas Moran's sketch that appeared as John Wesley Powell's (1875) figure 32].

"Des bords du plateau supérieur je suis d'un regard émerveillé ces rochers qui forment des promontoires aux courbes les plus bizarres au-dessus des précipices.

"Nous avons à faire des détours sans fin, et à chaque instant ce sont des aspects nouveaux de plus en plus admirables.

"Dans d'immenses crevasses le géologue peut lire avec facilité toute la série des couches différentes dont sont formés les murs latéraux, et l'imagination reste confondue à la pensée de l'incalculable suite des siècles qui ont dû s'écouler pendant la formation successive de toutes ces merveilles.

"Voici quelques informations, que nous empruntons au livre de M. Powell [sic]: • • • " [Here Tissandier briefly summarizes what Powell explained about the canyons and terraces of the plateau.]

"Nous ne pouvions camper longtemps sur ce plateau de Toroweap, car l'eau commençait à nous manquer. Nathan et son fils avaient découvert un peu d'eau de neige fondue dans un creux de rocher, mais nos chevaux seuls ont pu en boire.

"Nous revenons à Kanab par le même chemin pour organiser une excursion au plateau de Kaibab. • • • " [The next seven pages of text comprise the journey across the Kaibab Plateau en route to Point Sublime.]

"Nous arrivons au Sublime Point. C'est un des points les plus élevés du plateau de Kaibab; il est situé à 2,600 mètres au-dessus du niveau de la mer. A cette hauteur les rochers forment une sorte de cap d'où l'on découvre tout le pays des cañons de l'Arizona, les murailles nommées Amphithéâtre indou et les hauteurs de Kwagunt Valley, le Temple de Siva, etc.

"De tous les plateaux de l'Arizona c'est celui de Kaibab qui offre le plus d'intérêt parce qu'il est couvert de forêts jusqu'à ses cimes les plus hautes. Les autres plateaux qu'on découvre de Sublime Point sont au contraire dénudés, donnant jusqu'à perte de vue l'aspect de déserts arides et effroyables. C'est un spectacle véritablement sublime et émouvant tout à la fois.

"Entre des fissures colossales je vois de temps à autre le Colorado rouler ses eaux dans les précipices et se perdre par des détours fantastiques à 1,800 mètres au-dessous de moi.

"Une des choses les plus frappantes de Kaibab, c'est l'absence absolue de cours d'eau.

"Cependant le climat y est fort humide. Les pluies sont fréquentes en été et la couche de neige est épaisse en hiver. L'eau stationne dans les creux des terrains et forme ainsi de nombreux lagoons entourés d'une végétation si luxuriante qu'on a dans ces endroits l'illusion d'un parc délicieux.

"Voulant visiter à loisir toutes ces merveilles, j'ai campé trois jours sur les bords d'un délicieux marais, le Forest Lagoon, entouré de légers peupliers blancs et de vieux pins. De là je pouvais facilement rayonner et jouir de tous les principaux points de vue."

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

(translation)

`My first trip, arranged with Nathan [Adam Nathan of Kanab], my future guide, was to Mount Trumbull and the Toroweap gorges.

`It is a full seven day tour; the difficulty of finding water in the deserts that must be crossed makes this exploration sometimes painful. • • •

`We had no other route to follow to reach the sandy valley of Toroweap near the canyons. Long and relatively quite narrow, this valley is framed by colossal rocks of always surprising colors.

`In the evening we had no complaints about our camp at the foot of a wall resembling a fortress. Shaded by an old cedar, we are on a huge plateau of rounded sandstone rocks, worn down by the winter snows. Many flowers and stunted trees or agaves which are sometimes more than four meters high, cacti, charm us like decorations on these stones with reddish or golden colors; beyond, our gaze rests on jagged walls that stretch as far as the eye can see and enclose the horizon.

`After a short rest we walk over the huge stones, often climbing them with the help of our hands or jumping over large crevices.

`Under the impression of the grandeur of these strange deserts, I move forward with an indefinable feeling of astonishment.

`The scene changes, but is no less stunning: here at my feet are the grandiose precipices of Toroweap, at the bottom of which flows the Colorado (Pl. IV).

`It is an incredible spectacle that these chasms of erosion, 600 to 800 meters deep, formed of sheer walls or gigantic steps descending to the torrent (fig. 23) ["Grand cañon, vue pris à l' est de Toroweap" ('Grand Canyon, view taken to the east of Toroweap'), which appears on p. 81 and was copied without credit from Thomas Moran's sketch that appeared as John Wesley Powell's (1875) figure 32].

`From the edges of the upper plateau I am amazed by these rocks which form promontories with the most bizarre curves above the precipices.

`We have to make endless detours, and every moment there are new aspects that are more and more admirable.

`In immense crevices the geologist can easily read the whole series of different layers of which the lateral walls are formed, and the imagination remains confused at the thought of the incalculable series of centuries which must have elapsed laying the formation succession of all these marvels.

`Here is some information, which we borrow from Mr. Powell's [sic] book: • • • '
Here Tissandier briefly summarizes what Powell explained about the canyons and terraces of the plateau.

`We couldn't camp for long on this plateau of Toroweap, because we were running out of water. Nathan and his son had discovered some melted snow water in a hollow in the rock, but our horses alone could not drink from it.

`We return to Kanab by the same way to organize an excursion to the Kaibab plateau. • • • ' [The next seven pages of text comprise the journey across the Kaibab Plateau en route to Point Sublime.]

`We are coming to Point Sublime. It is one of the highest points of the Kaibab plateau; it is located 2,600 meters above sea level. At this height the rocks form a kind of cape from which one can see the whole country of the canyons of Arizona, the walls called Hindu Amphitheater and the heights of Kwagunt Valley, S[h]iva Temple, etc.

`Of all the plateaus of Arizona it is that of Kaibab which offers the most interest because it is covered with forests up to its highest peaks. The other plateaus that we discover from Point Sublime are on the contrary bare, imparting as far as the eye can see the aspect of arid and terrible deserts. It is a truly sublime and moving spectacle at the same time.

`Between colossal fissures I see from time to time the Colorado roll its waters into precipices and lose itself by fantastic detours 1,800 meters below me.

`One of the most striking things about the Kaibab is the absolute absence of waterways.

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

'However, the climate there is very humid. The rains are frequent in summer and the layer of snow is thick in winter. The water stays in the hollows of the land and thus forms many lagoons surrounded by such lush vegetation that in these places we have the illusion of a delightful park.

'Wanting to visit all these wonders at leisure, I camped for three days on the banks of a delightful marsh, the Forest Lagoon, surrounded by small white poplars and old pines. From there I could easily roam and enjoy all the main viewpoints.'

1887

Allen, S. H.

308 1887 An interesting journey. Further descriptions of the geological trip. Deseret News, (July 27): 11 [issue pagination].

Letter, dated Mt. Pleasant, Utah, July 11, 1887, regarding the Kaibab Plateau and Lees Ferry region, and a descent into Grand Canyon on "Powell's trail" (i.e., Nankoweap Trail); the last installment of a series. A unique report, in that this was just seven years since geologist Charles D. Walcott had used this purpose-built trail during the winter of 1881-1882, when he studied the geology of the Nankoweap portion of the canyon. (The "professor" mentioned herein is James E. Talmage, then with the Brigham Young Academy in Salt Lake City.)

"Up to this time, our way seemed clear, not only to reach the cañon, but to go down into it over Powell's trail. But obstacles of no small size now appeared. We had understood that the best guides could be found at Demott [DeMotte] Park, so did not secure one at Kanab. There were men working at the Park who had been with Maj. Powell while he was making this trail into the grand cañon about seven years ago—the only place on this side of the cañon at which men had reached the river. We were anxious not only to look over the bank, but also to get to the river; however we could not secure the services of any white men as guides, as they thought it would be no use to attempt to go down that trail, for some of them went there two months after the trail was made and found that by reason of its being so badly washed out it would have to be rebuilt before being any way passable. On asking the Indian, he knowingly shook his head saying, 'Me no savvy Powell's po' (trail). Under these circumstances, no wonder some of the party doubted our being able to reach the river; but having come 500 miles, and this cañon being the

GRANDEST OF ITS KIND

on earth and as we could here pass over and examine a section of our earth's crust from 3,000 to 7,000 feet in thickness we were determined to go if it were possible. A ray of hope burst through the dark clouds on our horizon when the good man, Isaac Brown, of Draper, who cooked for Powell while at this place, could guide us through the famous Wild Cat Cañon. Mr. Brown took us to within five miles of a mountain called the 'Saddle,' [Saddle Mountain] from which Powell's trail starts down; after warning us impressively of the magnitude of the task before us, and some of the dangers in our path, those of heat, scarcity of water and difficulty in finding the trail being the greatest, he reluctantly left us, and in a very thoughtful mood we unburdened our pack animals and retired for the night. Next morning, June 10, at 7 a. m. the party started out on foot each man carrying as few things as possible. Seven 'slapjacks,' as many pounds of flour, two small tin cans of butter and two canteens of water made up our store of provisions. Had no bedding, not even our coats; carried two ropes, two hammers, one pistol, one opera glass and one cup and plate. At 11 a. m., after four hours of heavy climbing, we sat down on the 'saddle,' right at the

'JUMP OFF'

into the mighty gorge, and yet we were fifteen miles by trail from the river. For fifty miles north, about to Lee's Ferry, the grand cañon was exposed to view, looking like a huge fissure in the earth's crust—the apparent entrance to the 'bottomless pit.'

"Our supply of water was growing 'smaller by degrees and beautifully Jess;' it was about 15 miles to water to go back, or to go ahead, so for the first time in our lives we were put on rations, three spoonfuls of water to the man every time the company wanted a drink. Corporations, it is said, have no souls, and if this was not true of our company, some at least thought it never got thirsty. We started along the trail winding down into

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

the dizzy depths of that awful chasm, but the trail being covered with landslides and fallen timber in places we soon lost it on a steep side hill as we stood below a high ledge and at the top of a higher cliff. Finding the path again it was difficult to collect our party as each shout produced three or four jumbled though loud echoes. Picking our way along the zigzag trail we soon came to

'JACK'S LADDER.'

Here the trail is built almost like the rounds to a ladder, in a crevice between two cliffs about 800 feet high. At the foot of the 'ladder' lay the bones of two of Powell's pack animals bleaching in the sun ever since they fell over this precipice. A number of tourists have gone as far as the 'ladder,' and turned back, no one having gone over it for five years, but round after round we descended and perhaps would have shuddered at times had we not then been panting under the fierce rays of an Arizona sun which had double power in that steep 'box cañon' (an appropriate name if sweat were prefixed).

"We were now over the worst of the road, so with renewed vigor and determination we pushed on, though suffering for water. Providentially we soon discovered a nice spring gushing from a cliff, so gladly throwing out the remaining warm water from our canteens, we filled them again, and enjoyed a rest at this welcome spot.

"Eight or ten miles still before us, and having entirely lost the trail, we followed the wash made by the floods, sometimes going down ten feet at a jump. Rapidly descending deeper and deeper, the perpendicular walls rising higher, soon we heard the roar of the Colorado, and in a short time sat on its banks testing the quality of the turbid, rushing waters of this

MIGHTY STREAM.

"We enjoyed the bathing very much but the treacherous and shifting sand bars made it dangerous. The river here is swift and deep, near a quarter of a mile in width. Having no bedding, we worked ourselves into the sand as some of the Yava Pai Indians do, and stopped there all night, without much sleep, very tired and foot-sore. The perpendicular walls of the river are here 5,000 feet high, and we estimated that it is from 6,000 to 8,000 feet from the water to the top of the 'saddle'—(think of such a cañon and over 200 miles long)—between which we passed trees, shrubs and flowers common to every climate from temperate to semi-tropical region.

"'Yaut,' of the rose family, here grows twenty feet high and nine inches in diameter; the thin end makes a good cane, tough and light. The last four miles before reaching the river, we followed a beautiful stream of clear water which the Professor thought was 'Diamond Fork,' described by Powell. At the mouth of this creek are four or five acres of land quite level, from the cliffs to the river. There is a very large whirl-pool just here and on the banks we found ancient pottery made by the Moquis, (so the Piutes told us). Was there an Indian village here at one time? Or did the white man bring these specimens of pottery to this lonely place?

"Here we wish for the

LANGUAGE OF ANGELS

to adequately and properly describe the grandeurs of this mighty cañon, the tops of whose walls seem to unite with the blue of the firmament above. A whole article could be written on the formations which we saw in the immense thickness of crass [sic, crust] here exposed. At the top the rock is [sic] rich in fossil shells; the stratum next below is sandstone; limestone comes in the next place, then quartzite and then alumina. We found dog-tooth spar, beautiful specimens of calcite, some in limestone and some in sandstone, while the sandstone faced with quartz crystals resembled plates of diamonds. Several varieties of chacedony and micaceous sandstone were also found. Three miles from thy [sic] river a massive dyke of rock highle [sic] charged with iron oxide, has been forced through the strata, bending and contorting them considerably. Near here are several strata of clay making a beautiful picture by their variety and distinctness of colors, white, yellow, brown, black and green.

"As we expected, the springs down so far in the earth are quite warm, though the water is good. There are several standing up many hundreds of feet fitting though lonely monuments to the stillness and desolation which reign here forever. Still the mighty Colorado is at work eroding and chiseling down its banks which often fall in, bringing millions of tons of rock to be gradually disintegrated and borne away by the river to 'the ocean wild and wide.'

SLENDER COLUMNS OF ROCK

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

"While in the canyou [sic] we had to mix our bread in the sack and bake it on hot rocks. At 5.30 a.m., on the 17th, we started from this river for camp which we reached at 8 p. m. without serious accident. We might state that while going up a crevice where he had to hold on with both hands and feet, one man saw to his great annoyance a large hornet buzzing about uncomfortably near and then alighting on his cheek. Oh, what a look that hornet got! After walking about leisurely and eating the camphor ice, put on the sunburn, he departed quietly, leaving a mental sufferer only, to continue a toilsome climb unmolested.

"We said two of Powell's pack animals were killed while going down the trail; the skull of one of them can be seen in Prof. Talmage's cabinet, which, by the way, is one of the finest and most complete in the West."

Bates, E. Catherine [Bates, Emily Katharine]

309

1887      A year in the great republic. Vol. II. London: Ward and Downey, 317 pp.

See Chapter 1, "Westward Ho!", pp. 1-69, which includes this English woman's three-day visit to Grand Canyon at Peach Springs around May 1, 1886. This is perhaps the best, delightfully detailed record of the state of affairs in Peach Springs Canyon and at the Farlee Hotel.

"Early dawn landed us, some hours after time, at the miserable little collection of wooden shanties, containing some hundred inhabitants and honoured by the title of city known as Peach Springs.

"Poor as the place looked, it was still divided from our eager hopes by a quarter of a mile of sandy desert, and at four o'clock in the morning we were landed on the line, with no perceptible means of conveying ourselves and baggage across the intervening space.

"Meanwhile our train had steamed slowly off, so there was no possibility of escape for us; at length, after a good deal of difficulty, we persuaded a boy to show us the way to Mr. Farlie's [Julius Farlee] 'house,' as we called it in our ignorance, that being the name of the man who was supposed to run 'the stage' from Peach Spring to the Cañon of the Colorado.

"Crossing the sandy desert with rather crestfallen faces, we found that Mr. Farlie's boasted 'hotel' was simply a small wooden shanty, but any refuge was welcome. We discovered that he had not yet received the telegram explaining a change of day in our arrival, necessitated by the overcrowded state of the trains.

"However, he hustled up, showed us into two primitive but perfectly clean rooms, and volunteered to fetch our hand-bags from the depot, much to our relief.

"A few hours later we were up and dressed, and then found that the Farlie mansion did not attempt to provide food for its inmates.

"You were expected to walk across the sand to the depot for breakfast, and a very fair one we got, but were very much 'hurried up' in eating it by Mr. Farlie, whose impatience in getting us under weigh was inexplicable to me.

"Appleton says, 'The road to the cañon from the line is eighteen miles, and a good one.'

"It turned out to be a good twenty-three miles and over a thoroughly bad route, although certainly never quite so intolerable as the road to the Mammoth Caves.

"We thought we had already reduced our baggage to the very lightest 'marching order,' but found that even so the capabilities of the ramshackle 'buckboard' honoured by the name of 'stage' were overstrained, especially as the provisions for our stay had also to find room, as well as the 'cook,' who was to be left with us up the cañon.

"The 'stage' consisted of a bare bit of boarding, slung on wheels with a couple of primitive seats capable of holding two people each by a little squeezing and both facing forwards.

"The 'cook' appeared to be a sulky-looking fellow of eighteen or nineteen, who sat in front with Mr. Farlie and declined to be drawn into any sort of conversation.

"Later we learnt to appreciate the wry excellent qualities of 'Billy' at their true value, and to prefer him infinitely to our more talkative but less satisfactory host.

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

"Billy told me afterwards that he was twenty-seven years old, and he had certainly lived through experiences enough to have been seventy-seven, but his slight figure and smooth boyish face made it difficult to realize that he was even a full-grown man.

"He was not only to be our cook, but our housemaid, parlour-maid, guide, companion, and friend for the next three days, during which we were thrown completely on his hands and at his mercy.

"Our stage had no covering from the fierce sun beating down at eleven o'clock in full force upon our heads, but the drive was sufficiently beautiful to atone for much discomfort.

"The first two or three miles over the sandy plains were rough and interesting, but then the road improved and we soon entered the valley leading up the cañon.

"Mountains of granite and old red sandstone rose on either side of us to a height varying from five to seven thousand feet. The sun shining fiercely on the deep crimsons and glowing yellows at the rocky cañon sides, gave us a splendid panorama of colour effect.

"At length we reached a sort of rocky 'divide,' called 'Inspiration Point,' at the bottom of which the worst part of the road begins, and pretty bad it is for some eight miles.

"Still the grand rocks on either side and the peaceful green valley through which we drove, made up by their beauty for all discomfort and weariness.

"The wild flowers were coming out in great profusion after the late snows had disappeared. Cactus and aloe lined our path. The bowl-like 'barrow cactus,' said to contain water for the weary traveller, grows here very freely, also a pretty shrub called the ocatero [ocotillo]. This has long dark green stems, which rise up from its centre waving in the air, and at the end of each stem is a bright red blossom composed of numberless small buds, which blossom into tiny star-like red flowers. It takes a whole bunch of these latter to form what looks like one good-sized blossom.

"The ocatero grows from four to ten feet high, and the larger specimens have some thirty or more of these waving long green arms.

"A sort of large yellow primrose grows here in great profusion, and in the sand, nearer the river, a lovely white blossom of the primrose family, but reminding one more, in shape, of the wild rose.

"We passed many willow trees and several specimens of the acacia on our road.

"The heat grew fiercer as the day advanced. At length, about 3 p.m., coming over a hill, with eyes still straining right and left towards the grand mountain peaks on either side of us, we saw a tiny wooden hut in the distance, looking like a child's toy house, and I said laughingly to our guide:

"'I suppose that is the sort of place you are going to take us to at last?'

"'It looks very like it,' he answered quietly, and to my dismay I found that I had unwittingly hit upon the dismal truth.

"Still, matters might have been worse. Anyway, I knew we had some meat and potatoes under the seat, if they had not been shaken out en route.

"And nothing could deprive us of the glorious mountains and the heavenly blue sky, which were important factors in our happiness, although I am bound to place them on this occasion after the beefsteak and potatoes. Is this not a veracious history? And had we not travelled now for some forty hours or more with much fatigue and discomfort and with little rest or food?

"Having seen us safely deposited in our palatial abode and shared our meal there, Mr. Farlie told Bill to look up the horses (which had been turned out loose) with a view to returning to Peach Springs.

"We had not hitherto freely appreciated the fact that we were to be left entirely alone with one wild 'Western boy,' so many miles from any habitation, and with no means of getting away until our host chose to make another fifty mile journey on our behalf.

"It was now Friday afternoon. We drank a last 'stirrup cup' with Mr. Farlie in the form of some excellent Californian port, a bottle of which he had brought up with him; and he promised to return for us on the Sunday

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

at latest, when a 'gentleman' would be coming to take some views, and would wish to stay at the wooden shanty for this purpose.

"This would mean that we must turn out, as there were only two small rooms in the place and no division between them worth mentioning.

"Still, we thought that two days would probably give us ample time to explore the neighbourhood, and we never doubted that sufficient provisions had been left for us, or that we should be released on the day specified.

"Our confidence on both these points proved to be ill-founded; but this is anticipating events.

"Our tiny little wooden box of a house had doors back and front which were kept constantly open, so that it was almost like living in the open air, and the heat was much too great for any question of draughts.

"Two or three chairs (one a 'rocker') and an old sofa bed completed the downstairs furniture; a little room being partitioned off from one corner to serve as a kitchen.

"Up a narrow ladder stair were our two primitive rooms, one of which was approached without any sort of landing, straight from the ladder.

"A wooden partition, not reaching by any means to the rafters above, divided this from the other room, which had a white sheet hung over its exit on to the stair ladder.

"My room rejoiced in no such luxury as looking-glass nor wash-stand of any kind, but a tiny tin bowl on the only chair in the room served for the latter.

"The first evening we felt too sick and weary from the great heat and fatigue combined to do anything but sit quiet in the entrance to our hut, watching the glorious mountains of glowing granite around us and making a desultory plan for going up the valley to Diamond Crick early next day, when Billy assured us we should be in the shade nearly all the time. 'May day' dawned upon us in all brightness and beauty.

"Billy, who had spent his night on the sofa-bedstead below, was up betimes, and cooked us an excellent breakfast of bacon, tomatoes, Indian corn, brown bread, coffee, &c., and by nine o'clock we were under weigh for our expedition, having been somewhat detained by the necessity for allowing our cook to do his 'house and parlour maid' work before he joined us.

"The plan was for Billy to walk some three or four miles up the crick (a narrow mountain stream) with us, leave us there, and return 'home' in case Mr. Farlie should bring any other visitors up.

"Meanwhile we could amuse ourselves as we chose, and Billy would start to meet us again in the cool of the afternoon, when his cooking labours (in case Mr. Farlie did arrive) would be over.

"We had taken some food in a small tin can, and should therefore be independent for some hours to come.

"It was a hot, weary tramp, constantly crossing and recrossing the little stream or 'crick' which lower down goes to join the Colorado River.

"We passed bushes of willows and acacias of various kinds, the cat's claw specimens amongst the latter.

"The walk seemed endless, owing to the burning heat, but the views of the dark granite mountains around us were magnificent. The gorge became by degrees so narrow that these mountain tops seemed towering far into the sky and quite beyond our powers of vision at such close quarters.

"Presently we came upon some very large rocks in the centre of the road and had to climb over these with 'Billy's' assistance, and so reached on the other side a pretty little waterfall which falls for the distance of a few feet only, but in a very strong volume of water.

"A stony cave near here seemed a good shelter from the sun, and here our friend left us to eat our lunch, whilst he returned up the valley to our starting point.

"The 'lunch,' consisting of very inferior cold bacon, was quite uneatable, viewed by our happy standard of that day, so we took the bits of bread round it and ate them with some curious preserve that had been placed at the bottom of the can, and we made some excellent lemonade from the crick water and two lemons which Billy had thoughtfully put in for us at the last moment.

"We then walked some mile or two further up the valley, the gorge becoming at length so narrow that we could almost span it with outstretched arms, and the mountain tops appearing more inaccessible than ever.

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

"After a little more dabbling in the water by the fall, on our return to the cave we tidied up the remains of our very frugal meal, picked up the tin can once more and began the homeward journey in good earnest.

"Now came the tug of war.

"It was impossible to scale the boulders of rock again without Billy's help, yet the choice lay between that and going some two feet deep into the stream, which had no 'landing' here at the other side, only steep walls of rock rising sheer out of its depths.

"In despair we chose the certain wetting to the possible risk of breaking our necks and plunged boldly in, the water being up to our knees.

"A few moments' walking brought us to some stepping-stones and here our troubles for the moment ended.

"We were much relieved to meet our faithful Billy, on the way home. He had made a fruitless journey, having found our little shanty as empty as when we left it.

"It was now four o'clock in the afternoon. The sun's heat was becoming intolerable and I began to fear sunstroke for one or other of us. Moreover we were much exhausted by the long tramp, rather hungry after a very meagre meal, and our feet were blistered by the sharp stones over which we had so often crossed the stream. Added to all of which we were now wet through by our plunge into the crick.

"At last we reached the blessed haven of our little wooden house and got some supper, and better still, the intense luxury of a bath, for I had brought my india-rubber bath with me as a positive necessity of life, and Billy was always ready to get me a pail of water from the crick behind the shanty.

"One of the finest peaks before our eyes as we sat in the front of our most primitive abode was called 'Prospect Point,' and the view from this over the surrounding cañon was said to be magnificent.

"Mr. Farlie had spoken of the ascent as a little half-hour's run, that might be taken at any odd time. My experience of it was very different to this, but the view certainly repays any one for the exertion of reaching it, which in the case of an ordinary lady is very considerable.

"Billy admitted that several men had got half-way and returned. Doubtless this was laziness, but a very rough and in many places almost perpendicular scramble up the bed of a mountain torrent covered with loose stones and with nothing to hold by, to a height of over 2,500 feet can scarcely be called an 'easy little walk,' except for a lady well accustomed to mountaineering.

"We were both thankful that a slightly strained foot prevented my friend from making the attempt on the strength of this delusive description. She would certainly never have arrived at the top, and might in all human probability have had a very nasty fall in making the attempt.

"It was arranged overnight that Billy should make me an early cup of coffee and that he and I should sally forth as near 5 a.m. as possible, to see the river, which lies some mile and a half below our shanty, and then make the ascent of Prospect Point.

"Walking in the opposite direction to Diamond Crick, by the pretty willow-bordered stream and with lovely wild flowers greeting us on every side, we reached an open plateau with a regular panorama of grand mountains all round us.

"Beyond lay a field of fine white sand, and on reaching this we first heard the sound of the rushing river, which flows at right angles to the crick and is hidden by the shelving bank of sand until you are within a few yards of it.

"This Colorado River is 150 feet deep by 300 feet wide, and is full of strong currents, the snow waters from the mountains giving it a very muddy look.

"These mountains stand up grandly from the opposite shore, and on this occasion we saw them to the greatest advantage, with the rising sun just warming into glowing beauty their rugged sides.

"Two of the finest peaks are called 'Solomon's Temple' and 'The Tower of Babel.' After a little rest, sitting on the white sands, and drinking in this peaceful yet magnificent view, we retraced our steps a short way until we came to the very precipitous mountain torrent bed which begins the ascent to Prospect Point.

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

"Thirty minutes of very stiff climbing brought us on to the first saddle of the mountain, and already we were repaid by the view over the chain of mountains with the Colorado river winding at their base, which had been hidden from us below.

"Another good half-hour's scramble brought us on to some undulating slopes covered with cactus and wild flowers; ocatera bushes grew in great profusion here.

"This walking was a pleasant relief before climbing the last peak of all to the real Prospect Point, which lies at the bottom of the Pyramid Rock, and can only be approached in this round-about fashion. It was now 8.30 a.m. and I was completely tired out by the heavy climb."

Here, the author's reminiscence takes a long turn to the imaginary, as she believed Billy, producing a six-shooter, might be out to hold up the women, or worse, murder them for a watch and sundries and take off. Returning to the rest of the day . . .

"The descent from Prospect Poin't was terribly rough and stony and the heat overpowering, with the thermometer at 105° in the shade.

"By eleven o'clock we were once more safely at home and longing for a good meal; having had nothing but a small cup of coffee since the previous evening.

"Alas! our real troubles were now to begin. Billy was at length forced to tell us that the meat had given in! It seemed that Mr. Farlie had only left enough for one day, having declared at the last he should return on the Saturday, which he had failed to do.

"All our hopes now rested on the 'photographing gentleman' who was confidently expected this day (Sunday). So we sat down to a very small piece of bacon and some weak coffee and tried to feel that we were not hungry after it. Billy no doubt was accustomed to fasting, and my friend had been quietly resting all the morning, but a six hours' expedition had given me a most inconvenient appetite under the circumstances.

"The afternoon passed, no Mr. Farlie; evening came on. It was too late now to expect him. Supper was another shock to our feelings. The bacon had given in now, likewise the coffee, tomatoes, sugar and lemons. A little Indian corn, some very weak sugarless tea and some dry bread formed a very insufficient evening meal, but poor Billy looked so unfeignedly distressed by the position of affairs that we tried to make as light of it as possible for his sake.

"He evidently looked upon Mr. Farlie's failure to appear and our 'short commons' as in some way a slur upon his own honour and hospitality and put down the hard bread and weak tea with an apparent sulkiness that was really intended to conceal his wounded pride. • • •

"Our next morning brought a change of meal, no tomatoes, no Indian corn, I might have said no tea, for our beverage by this time had almost arrived at hot water, pur et simple. A very hard piece of fossilized bread, some two inches square and baked the previous Thursday, was put down by Billy in front of us with a rueful face and a dismal attempt at a joke: 'You two ladies had better settle with a six-shooter which of you is to have that. There is not enough to divide.'

"Matters now were really becoming serious. We were absolutely without food, and there was no sign of our deliverance being at hand. Mr. Farlie having failed to come Saturday or Sunday, might leave us yet another day if the photographer did not chance to arrive.

"We discovered afterwards this was nearly being the case, for the expected guest did not come at all, and Mr. Farlie said, 'he was in ever so many minds about coming as it would have suited him better to come next day, and he thought we should get along pretty well.'

"Fortunately for us he reconsidered this first conclusion, and by half-past one, when our hopes were growing fainter, and we were preparing for another twenty-four hours of absolute fasting, the welcome sound of wheels was heard and Mr. Farlie arrived.

"There arrived also some tough but most acceptable bacon.

"Billy made us a farewell cup of tea, and presented us with two stringy bacon sandwiches for the road, and by five o'clock we were once more en route, leaving our most kind and faithful young 'cook' to keep house alone, with many sincere regrets.

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

"We had been told to bring plenty of warm wraps to the cañon. Possibly this may be good advice in February or March, but in late April the heat was overpowering, and I believe the place is quite intolerable to the ordinary traveller in July and August.

"The dryness and lightness of the atmosphere, however, help one very much in bearing a degree of heat there which would unfit one for any exertion elsewhere.

"The drive back to Peach Springs was very much more trying than our former experience of the road. To begin with, it takes some six hours instead of four, as it is very much steeper going back. Darkness soon came on. There was nothing more to be seen after that, and we were faint and weak from want of proper and sufficient food.

"Poor Billy's coarse bacon sandwiches were almost uneatable, simply because we could not get our teeth through them, and we had not a drop of water or liquid of any kind. Mr. Farlie did not encourage any loitering by the way to find anything to drink, and we were too much exhausted to insist upon his doing so.

"All things, however, come to an end, and so at length did this weary drive, but not until eleven o'clock at night, by which time the one small 'store' in the village was shut up, and our dream of finding some bread or biscuits proved hopeless.

"Our train on West was two hours late as usual, so we lay down in our old quarters, dressed as we were, Mr. Farlie promising to wake us up in time to catch the train when it was telegraphed.

"We were waked up all too soon from a heavy sleep and hurried across the sandy common to the station at 4 a.m.

"Sick and faint from fatigue and want of food, we soon lay down in our upper berths, the only ones procurable, for the train was crowded.

"We had not left Peach Springs much over half an hour when two tremendous concussions came, one close upon the other, and then we were at a dead standstill."

Train wreck! And her adventures continued.

Finck, Henry T.

310 1887 From Los Angeles to St. Louis. The Nation (New York), 45 (1166) (November 3): 349-350.

Principally about a solo trip into the Grand Canyon at Peach Springs and Diamond Creek; dated "St. Louis, October 17."

"The train did not arrive at Peach Spring till 6:30, and half an hour later left me alone—all, all alone—in an Arizona village consisting of five saloons, six dwelling houses, a 'stage' office, and an Indian camp in the background. Peach Spring is so called, apparently, because no peach grows within a hundred miles, and because the only spring in the neighborhood is four miles from the depot, whence the water is pumped to the station with an engine fed with coal that is brought there from the station. The man [Julius Farlee] who has this coal contract, also undertakes to convey tourists to the Grand Cañon. He is an intelligent man, whose enterprise, without any aid or even encouragement from the railroad company, has built a fair road, twenty-three miles in length (not eighteen, as the railroad circular states), generally along or in a dry river bed, which, after every freshet, calls for extra labor in clearing away the rocks wildly strewn about by the strong current. As there is no possibility of missing this road [down Peach Springs Canyon], I secured a pony of Mr. Farlee, and started alone for the Cañon; and on the whole way I saw no soul except an Indian climbing a tree near the road. • • •

"But the mountain scenery is unique and grand, and becomes more so the nearer we approach the Grand Cañon. For the road is a regular descensus Averno [descent from Avernus, a volcanic crater near Naples], taking us deeper and deeper down between the prison walls; and when we reach the end of it we are almost a mile nearer the sea level than we were at Peach Spring. At a spot about a mile from the river Mr. Farlee intends to erect a large hotel. Sandstone, granite, and other fine building material lies about in profusion, and only needs to be hewn and piled up architecturally. At present there is nothing but a very primitive hut, with accommodations for about a dozen persons. The 'hotel' is run by one man, whose special duty it is to keep his end of the road in order, and a lonely life he must lead in this solitary hut, twenty miles from any other human habitation. When there are no guests to take care of, he fills his canteen with water and starts up the valley to roll the stones out of the road. In the evening he wraps himself in his blanket and goes to sleep, with the starry firmament for a roof, regardless of the possible disagreeable neighbors, such as centipedes or rattlesnakes. He says he sleeps in the open air two-thirds of the time, and has not been ill for thirty-five years. Yet the heat in this part of the Cañon (which is so deep that stars are visible in the daytime [repeating a frequently stated but impossible observation], and at night I saw a million more stars than ever before) must be a terrible strain on his system, as it sometimes rises to 120 in the shade, with not a breath of air.

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

"I shall never forgive this man, or his employer, for having nothing sour in the house except a spoonful of very bad vinegar—no pickles, lemons, or even a grain of lemon sugar—which, by the way, every traveller in hot regions should always carry with him. So I had to content myself on arrival with four cups of tea and six or seven glasses of water. The water is good, although superstitious people might hesitate to drink it, as it comes from a brook—Diamond Creek—which seems to be bewitched. Just in front of the hotel a portion of this creek, about half a mile in length, disappears every day towards noon, although above and below this place it flows on merrily and abundantly. About ten o'clock at night the water suddenly returns to the deserted portion of the bed. Mr. Farlee has repeatedly dug down many feet to find the subterranean brook-bed, but in vain. It almost seems as if the water, after leaving the cool and deep Diamond Cañon, were afraid of being absorbed by the superheated air in the open space in which the hotel is situated, and therefore concealed itself underground.

"••• But it must be frankly admitted that those who visit the Grand Cañon, with anticipations at fever heat from reading Powell's exciting and poetic description of his adventurous trip down the Colorado, will be somewhat disappointed at first sight of this river. •••

"Yet in truth it is foolish to . . . expect that all the wonders of Mr. Powell's long tour should be concentrated in one place for the convenience of tourists. The sad fact is, that the most sublime portions of the cañon are at present inaccessible except to those who are willing to undergo the same dangers and hardships as Maj. Powell. •••

"To the Grand Cañon, Diamond Creek seems to afford the only entrance. The A. and P. R. R. entertains a project of building an eighty-mile branch road from Flagstaff to the Cañon. Such a road . . . would, however, arrive at the top instead of the bottom of the Cañon, which would thus lose some of its cathedral grandeur. Possibly the tourists might be let down to the river by means of a miner's shaft, in which case a ride of a few miles down the river on a boat . . . should be added to the programme. But after all, this would be at the Marble Cañon only. For the Grand Cañon, Peach Spring will probably remain the stopping station; and for their partial disappointment in the Grand Cañon itself tourists will be amply repaid by a visit to the Diamond Cañon, which is reached by going up Diamond Creek a few miles from Mr. Farlee's hotel."

(Six years later, Finck also visited the canyon at Hance's, about which see Finck, 1893.)

1888

Culmer, Henry L. A.

311 1888 Scenic attractions of Salt Lake City. The Western Galaxy, 1(3) (May): 408-417.

"The Great Gorge of the Yellowstone . . . , the Royal Gorge of the Arkansas . . . [and] the Valley of the Yosemite . . . grow weak before the awful Gorge of the World, the Grand Canyon of the Colorado in south-eastern Utah [sic]." (ENTIRE NOTE)

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

Curzon, George N.

312 1888 The valley of waterfalls. Macmillan's Magazine, 58 (July) (345): 184-191.

About Yosemite, but the concluding long paragraph regards Grand Canyon, ending, "I know nothing in the world at all comparable to this. The cañons of Yosemite and the Yellowstone are great; but a greater than either is here." Also reprinted in Littell's Living Age, Series 5, 63 (August 4): 296-302.

Goodman, L. A.

313 1888 Letters from California. Missouri State Horticultural Society, 30th Annual Report, pp. 353-374.

See "San Bernardino", pp. 367-371; specifically the remarkable note, p. 371:

"Well, our homeward journey on the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Railroad, a delightful and pleasant one it was, and although it was our aim to stop a day at the Grand Canyon of Colorado [sic], and one day at Santa Fe and one day at Las Vegas [New Mexico], yet when we started on the trip and the nearer we got towards home, the more anxious we became, and first one stop was passed by, and then when we reached the other place it was more easy to pass it by, so that by the time we reached the third we came right along and arrived at Kansas City February 19th, the day before we had agreed to come when we started away on the 12th of January."
(ENTIRE NOTE)

Gray, Asa

314 1888 Conspicuous plants of the Grand Cañon. From: Tracy, S. M., Report of an investigation of the grasses of the arid districts of New Mexico, Arizona, Nevada, and Utah. In: Report of an investigation of the grasses of the arid districts of Texas, New Mexico, Arizona, Nevada, and Utah, in 1887. U.S. Department of Agriculture, Botanical Division, Bulletin 6, p. 13.

Botanist Samuel Mills Tracy visited Peach Springs Canyon during a Southwest collecting trip in the summer of 1887 (his brief account is under "1887", farther below). In his report he transcribed a list of plants seen by the prominent American botanist Asa Gray when he and his wife visited the Farlee Hotel May 3-4, 1885. Gray had written the short list in the Farlee visitors' book. Of course the indefatigable botanist Gray would have been botanizing even while being a tourist, but what else he might have written in the book is lost. Alas, while the Farlee visitors' book does not survive, all is not lost; see a few comments Gray made in correspondence in 1885 (next below).

Tracy's transcription follows:

"In a 'visitors' register' kept at the camp here I find a note by Dr. Asa Gray, as follows:

CONSPICUOUS PLANTS OF THE GRAND CAÑON.

Fouquieria splendens, Ocotillo.

Acacia Lemmonii (Cat's claw).

Allionia.

On ground; flowers all day and all the year; shuts at night.

Fallugia paradoxa.

Bush, with white rose-like flowers on slender stalks.

Cowania Mexicana.

Like the last. Many greenish-white blossoms.

Larrea Mexicana (creosote).

Porophyllum.

With yellow, sweet-scented flowers in balls on slender twigs.

Erigonum inflatum (Indian pipe-stem).

Abronia.

In sand by the river; small white flowers in a cluster.

Oenothera albicaulis.

Large flowers, separate.

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

Erythrea calycosa.

Herb with red star-shaped flowers."

Landau, Wilhelm von

- 315 1888 Travels in Asia, Australia and America, comprising the period between 1879 and 1887. Part I. New York: George Landau, 357 pp.

See pp. 195-196, where is noted, "From Peach Springs is the departing point for the Grand Cañon of the Colorado, one of the greatest natural wonders in the world. The Grand Cañon of Colorado was made known to the world only a few years ago by the adventurous voyage of my worthy friend, the Major Powell, down the river." Only a brief physical description of the canyon then follows.

Lemmon, J. G. [Lemmon, John Gill]

- 316 1888 Grand Cañon of the Colorado. Overland Monthly, New Series, 12(69) (September): 244-256.

The article includes long remarks concerning the canyon's physiographical place in the landscape of the Southwest, the James White affair and Powell's explorations, and the lower Colorado River country and the Colorado Desert. It returns to the subject beginning on p. 252, with a trip to the canyon at Peach Springs by botanist Lemmon and his botanist wife, Sara.

"In May of 1884 we resolved again to visit the great wash of the Colorado, and to explore,—in part, at least,—the denuded region from whence it came. There is an easy and very interesting descent to the Grand Cañon, but not the most stupendous view of it, gained by a short trip from Peach Spring [sic], a station on the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad, about one hundred miles east of Needles, and just opposite the long southern bend of the cañon. The elbow is only twenty-three miles by Farley's [sic, Farlee] stage from Peach Spring,—and this is the usual point where travelers leave the train for the trip to the great phenomenon.

"We arrived at Peach Spring at two o'clock in the night, and experienced a reception characteristic of new railroad towns of the period. We were conducted by a brakeman to Farley's tent, the only habitation known as a hotel in the town, and were quartered in a portion of it curtained off by cheap calico.

"Scarcely had we lost consciousness, when pistol shots were heard, and a loud, querulous female voice outside announced that two gamblers in an adjoining saloon had been quarreling, and that 'Jem Smith was shot full of holes.'

"Some of the bullets passed through and over our tent, causing us to lie awake shivering until daylight. . . .

"The traveler visiting the Grand Cañon from the station of Peach Spring first climbs up two miles to a saddle, then descends rapidly along the wash of a narrow valley, the dry bed of one of thousands of streams that form the tributaries of the great river.

"The walls seemingly rise as you rapidly descend between them, cutting across ledges upturned at every angle. From side to side the eye turns, and exclamations rise to the lips. About eight miles down the wash you come near the first startling cliffs, off to the right. Dark and splintered they challenge attention, and Farley [Julius Farlee] asks you to guess how high they are.

"You resolve that, however formidable the spurs appear, they shall not warp your judgment. My wife thought them at least eight hundred feet high. I, determined to rely on experience, decided they were only four hundred. Farley smiled, and said, 'I helped to measure them with the railroad surveyors, and they are over 1200 feet.' • • • A mile farther, we ascend a low spur, and are on 'Inspiration Point.'

"Here the mules are halted for a moment's general view of the amphitheater beyond. Wonder begins to give place to astonishment. • • • Down, down we rumble over the cobblestones that for a time conspire to prevent steady conception of the increasing glories. Emerging from the widening wash the grand 'Pyramid' of enormous and symmetrical proportions [Diamond Peak] is in full view. On the left, the colonnaded and many-spired 'Westminster Abbey.' A turn in the road to the south reveals the magnificent 'Sunset Peak' . . .

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

"Beyond the 'Pyramid,' to the left across the great chasm, rises the 'Tower of Babel,' with its diminishing rings of parti-colored strata terminating in a cap at the elevation of 5,500 feet above the river. Near it, resplendent in lofty portico and mansard roof, is 'Girard College,'* 6,250 feet from foundation stone to beetling gable. The glorious 'Sunset Peak' has a similar elevation, while beyond rise still loftier objects.

"Hardly does it avail to institute comparisons between these sculptured mountains and any structures made by man: when we reflect that all the noted edifices, monuments, and pyramids of human origin could be stored in the west corridor of 'Girard College,' like so many valises and trunks in the vestibule of a modern hotel. ••• At length Farley's cabin is reached; we alight from the buck board and find ourselves but a few feet from the bed of the small, clear, sweet-watered Diamond Creek. It is only two miles farther to the mouth of this creek where it debouches into the Colorado, but we are stupefied with great things, so gladly turn to explore for a few miles the upper Diamond Creek, reserving the greater object for another day, when rest and time shall have aided the powers of comprehension. ••• We took our alpen-stocks and threaded the narrow gorge with great interest, frequently passing under huge bowlders that were caught in the narrows, often obliged to spring across the curves of the little stream, or pausing to pluck rare ferns or flowers from the vertical walls. So deep and narrow became the rift that the darkness of twilight was experienced, and stars appeared in the narrow line of sky. [Lemmon repeats a frequently noted but impossible observation about Grand Canyon, that so gloomy and deep are the canyons that stars can be seen in daytime.] Next morning we put on our rubbers and clambered down the Diamond wash in the wet sand and over the rounded cobbles, the whole way radiant with strange shade and sun-loving plants, our hearts throbbing heavily with expectation as the narrowing walls more and more restricted our vision. Gradually, almost imperceptibly, the space of two miles was traversed, and we stood upon the sandy, flower-gemmed delta of the Diamond Creek, with the angry, turbid tide of the Colorado sweeping and swirling noisily past. The first sight of the river at this point is disappointing; at least it is in midsummer, the only time, it may be added, when it is at all approachable. It looks too small, too feeble, to be capable of all the labor and destruction evidenced to the eye on the plains below, and we look upon its brawling, muddy current almost contemptuously.

"And so, too, the environment disappoints. Where are the great buttes, the pyramids, the chasms? You see only sheer walls two thousand to four thousand feet high. You are too near, too low, too restricted.

"We returned to Farley's cabin for refreshments, then planned the ascent of 'Prospect Point,' and the trip to 'Jennie's Grotto,' one of the most sightly and inspiring lookouts on the Diamond wash. Slowly but surely the conviction comes that the grand plateau region, in its multifarious detail, is all that those best qualified by geological knowledge and prolonged examination have pronounced, the most sublime of all earthly spectacles.

"We returned to Peach Spring, but could not leave the vicinity of the cañon. Taking possession of a vacated school house for a month, we planned trips out to promontories of the Hualapai plateau projecting midway into the gorge looking into its great southern bend, and across upon the forty mile terrace of the Sheavwits plateau.

"It was from one of these dizzy observatories that we looked down into the grand sweep of the abyss and up through the fissures to the thousand sculptures of the plateau." Here, Lemmon runs through the geology of the canyon as discerned by Dutton, chiefly, then graduates to the usual recitation of world architecture, with a few less commonly recited edifices, and in so doing becomes probably the grand champion of Grand Canyon's comparators: "Cheops and Cephrenes", "St. Peter's in Rome", "St. Paul's at London", "the Bunker Hill monument and the Percelain Tower of Nankeen", "the Bartholdi Statue of Liberty", "the New Orleans World's Exposition", "Yo-Semite", "the Sierra", "Lake Tahoe"; he finds in fact "all the subordinate forms of architecture and sculpture known: amphitheater, dome, castle, temple, cathedral, monastery, abbey, church, cloister, chapel, mosque, mausoleum, catacomb, grotto, recess, niche, panel, arch, buttress, gable, roofs of all kinds, veranda, porch, portico, corridor, balcony, bay-window, pillar, pilaster, bracket, low and high reliefs, columns of all kinds,—with all their parts of pedestal, dado, base, shaft, capital, architrave, frieze, and cornice,—steeple and spires of every age, turret, tower, cupola, pinnacle, minaret, obelisk, monument, gargoyle, figureheads of all types of persons, resemblances of all animals known or impossible—all are there." But this is not all.

"Whatever has a name in military art or engineering is there: fortress and line of fortifications, each with their outer defences of bastion and ravelin, these in turn having every detail of curtain, angle, salient angle, gorge, flank, and face, with enclosed redoubts and artillery en barbette, protected by banquette, scarp and counter-scarp, parapet and abattis, blockhouse, casemate, bomb-proof with port-holes, stockades with cross-barred gates, field intrenchments, barricades, and rifle-pits; behind them, on the broad tables, entrenched camps, with parade ground, officers' quarters and privates' tents complete."

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

Lemmon continues with colors of the strata; probably fatigued, he writes hardly with the same enthusiastic sort of list. In grand summary he comes to the conclusion, in his last sentence, that it is all "too vast, too varied, too sublime, too appalling for adequate description." (!)

---

*As is usual with the recitation of great monuments as imagined in the Grand Canyon, we are familiar with these places and things. But one in particular never has been mentioned except by Lemmon—Girard College—which I feel needs some explanation. This is a grades 1–12 free boarding school for disadvantaged children, in Philadelphia. Founded in the will of international merchant and banker Stephen Girard (1750–1831), Girard College opened in 1848. Originally for "poor, male, white orphans" (as stipulated in Girard's will), today it is integrated, co-educational, and for underserved children whose parents may yet be alive. The main building, Founder's Hall (below, constructed 1833–1848) is the monumental structure Lemmon had had in mind when he mentioned "Girard College", the campus of which originally comprised this building and four complementary but plainer dormitory buildings (these all still survive and there are now many more buildings on the 43-acre campus). It is a magnificent marble edifice, following Girard's very specific floor plans, designed by renowned architect Thomas U. Walter (whose work also includes the original dome of the U.S. Capitol). Founder's Hall is acknowledged today as the high-point of Greek Revival architecture in America.

Founder's Hall is the architecturally significant main building of the Girard College campus, in Philadelphia. This was the original classroom and dining building but today it is used for ceremonial purposes and meetings, and contains a museum and the Stephen Girard archives, though it is not regularly open to the public. The main foyer (into which open the doors shown in the photo) also today houses Stephen Girard's sarcophagus.

View from the southeast. Note the automobile for scale.

(Library of Congress. Historic American Buildings Survey, PA-1731.)

(I have specially mentioned this not only to explain the unique reference by Lemmon, but to coincidentally note that I am an alumnus of the school, Class of 1969. At the time that I was a student there—from 1958, 1st–12th grades, skipping the 7th as did all students—the legal definition of "orphan" meant fatherless. —E.E.S.)

---

Moreau, F. Frédéric [Moreau, Félix Frédéric]

- 317 1888 Aux États-Unis : notes de voyage par F. Frédéric Moreau : avec un croquis de l'auteur. Paris: E. Plon, Nourrit et C<sup>ie</sup>, 263 pp. (Librarie Plon.) [In French.]
(transl. 'In the United States: travel notes by F. Frédéric Moreau: with a sketch by the author')

A travelogue from the summer of 1886. The sketch referred to appears as a collage of drawings in the frontispiece. See Chapter 10, "Le Grand-Cañon", pp. 99–110; a visit to Peach Springs, Arizona, and descent to Colorado River along Peach Springs Canyon and Diamond Creek. Also note the "Erratum" leaf tipped in on the half-title page, which indicates for p. 100 and following, "Lire Stage au lieu de Stadge" (transl. 'Read Stage

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

instead of Stadge). The misspelling also appears on the frontispiece collage, wherein a small sketch (reproduced herein below) is labeled "Peach Springs Stadge Office" that depicts actually the "Grand Cañon Stage Office" in Peach Springs. The chapter in French is quoted below, with ellipses that are part of Moreau's text; the translation follows it. Note: The author's use of the terms "Demon's Canyon" and "Demon's Creek" refer of course to Diamond, but they seem to have stemmed from a misunderstanding. In French, "diamond" is diamant, and "demon" is the similar-sounding démon; thus it is apparently Moreau's misunderstanding on being told, in English, the name of Diamond Creek. The hotel and stage proprietor, not named by Moreau, is of course Julius Farlee.

"Le nègre du pullmann-car était venu me réveiller, et vers trois heures du matin je descendais à Peach Springs. Que faire lorsque l'on arrive à pareille heure dans un hameau inconnu? Une femme descendue du train en même temps que moi m'indique, dans la nuit, le sentier qui conduit à l'unique auberge de l'endroit. Je n'avais pas fait vingt pas dans cette direction que des aboiements féroces se font entendre. Je m'arrête, j'essaye de tourner la position; mais aussitôt que je me rapproche, deux gros chiens, les fidèles gardiens du lieu, me barrent le passage en montrant les dents.

"Je me souciais peu d'entamer la lutte, et, résigné à attendre le jour, je me repliai sur la station du chemin de fer.

"En voyage, on apprend la patience. La nuit était splendide et fraîche, l'atmosphère d'une pureté admirable, et la voie lactée, comme une traînée de nuages indécis, courait d'un bout à l'autre du ciel. C'était assez de ce spectacle pour m'aider à supporter quelques heures passées, malgré moi, à la belle étoile.

"Petit à petit, la nuit devint plus claire, et, à la faveur de l'aube, je jetai un regard curieux sur le pays qui m'environnait. Le village était composé d'une dizaine de maisonnettes en bois parmi lesquelles il y avait bien cinq ou six saloons, genre d'établissement dont nous avons déjà fait la connaissance.

"A l'une des extrémités apparaissait mon auberge, avec sa façade carrée en planches, comme on en voit tant dans l'Ouest, montant ainsi qu'une cloison jusqu'au sommet du toit. Elle portait l'enseigne suivante:

Grand-Cañon stadge office.

Drawing labelled "Peach Springs Stadge Office"; a detail from the frontispiece of Moreau's travelogue that comprises a collage of rough sketches he had drawn of places he had visited.

(Author's collection)

"Je repris alors le sentier qui avait été quelques heures plus tôt témoin de ma peu glorieuse retraite. Cette fois les chiens me laissent passer sans difficulté; ils se hasardent même à venir flairer mes bottes; nous allons devenir les meilleurs amis du monde.

"C'est à l'auberge que je devais trouver la voiture et les chevaux nécessaires pour me conduire jusqu'au Grand-Cañon. Je frappe à la porte; le propriétaire vient m'ouvrir. Je lui expose aussitôt ce qui m'amène, et je lui demande s'il est possible de partir sans retard. "Je n'ai pas de chevaux["], me répond-il d'un air indifférent. ["]Nous avons eu ici un violent orage avant-hier; toutes mes bêtes sont parties."

"La nouvelle était désagréable, il n'y avait qu'à attendre... jusqu'à quand? Jusqu'au lendemain matin tout au moins, car il ne passe qu'un train par jour. Même en renonçant à mon excursion au Grand-Cañon, j'étais cloué là pour vingt-quatre heures. Je contempalai alors avec consternation ces collines arides, brûlées du soleil,

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

privées par les misérables maisons du village et la station du chemin de fer du seul charme auquel elles eussent pu prétendre: celui de la solitude.

"Il n'y avait encore d'éveillés dans le pays que mon hôte et moi. Pour réagir contre mon abattement, je commençai par prendre un croquis de l'auberge, puis je demandai de quoi écrire. Rédiger quelques pages de notes est, en voyage, un puissant remède contre l'ennui. Par une amère dérision le papier que l'on me donne porte, en tête de la feuille, une splendide diligence attelée de quatre fringants coursiers, emmenant vers des régions plus pittoresques un chargement de joyeux touristes. Hélas! quelle distance d'eux à moi!

"J'avais fini, trop tôt fini d'écrire, et j'allais gagner la station pour partager le repas des employés du chemin de fer, qui m'avait été indiqué comme la table d'hôte habituelle des étrangers, quand sortit de la chambre unique de l'auberge un individu qui s'arrêta en m'apercevant. Il me dévisagea, puis, après un moment d'hésitation, fit volte-face et rentra dans sa chambre. Je l'entendis donner de ci, de là, une demi-douzaine de tours de clef. Cela fait, il revint tranquillement, ferma sa porte et sortit. Il m'avait pris, tout simplement, pour quelque voleur de grand chemin, ou tout au moins pour un voyageur d'une délicatesse équivoque. Tout en souriant de l'aventure, j'étais assez satisfait de l'impression peu rassurante que produisait mon accoutrement tant soit peu sauvage. Il est des pays où il vaut mieux être pris pour un brigand que pour un honnête homme. Il en fut du reste de mon commis voyageur, car c'en était un (où n'en trouvet-on pas?), comme des deux chiens de garde, il nous fallut peu de temps pour lier connaissance.

"J'étais trop heureux de trouver quelqu'un avec qui causer, pour lui garder rancune du sentiment de défiance peu flatteur qu'il avait d'abord témoigné à mon égard.

"Neuf heures du matin sonnaient à peine, et la chaleur était devenue brûlante. Assis à l'ombre du petit auvent qui s'avancait au-dessus de la porte, mon ami le commis voyageur me donnait quelques détails sur le pays qu'il connaissait, du reste, assez mal. Mais j'avais, dans la personne de la femme de mon hôte, une interlocutrice autrement intéressante. Elle était venue prendre place auprès de nous, et, apprenant que j'étais Français, elle me demanda des nouvelles d'Europe. Elle s'exprimait assez bien, et avec une certaine prétention; elle semblait avoir reçu une éducation au-dessus de sa condition actuelle. Physiquement, elle avait l'air d'une vieille folle.

"En peu d'instants elle eut amené la conversation sur la politique, et, prenant un ton de conférencière, elle entama un panégyrique enthousiaste de la République universelle. Ce n'étaient que nations unies dans une paix sans fin, travailleurs heureux et riches, fortunes partagées.

"A la France incombait le rôle glorieux de réaliser le plan grandiose de la fraternité des peuples. Madame Louise Michel eût été bien heureuse! Pour moi, qui suis un peu sceptique à l'égard de ces utopies sociales, je m'amusais beaucoup d'entendre cette femme de voiturier me faire, au milieu d'un pays d'indiens, un sermon qui n'eût pas été déplacé à la salle Lévis.

"Cela m'aidait à prendre patience, et j'en savais gré à mon hôtesse! Pendant ce, temps son mari avait envoyé à la recherche des chevaux un cowboy de l'endroit. Il était revenu les mains vides.

"Ma journée s'annonçait mal. Un seul espoir me restait: un Indien, sur la promesse d'une piastre, s'était mis en campagne. Serait-il plus heureux?

"Monté sur un de ces petits chevaux au ventre ballonné, à l'air chétif et malingre, mais qui marchent des journées entières à la même allure, sans boire ni manger, il était parti au petit galop et avait disparu derrière les collines.

"Au bout d'une heure, l'Indien revenait, poussant devant lui trois chevaux qu'il avait pu rejoindre. Son instinct de sauvage lui avait permis de retrouver rapidement les traces des animaux et de les suivre. Je n'espérais guère, j'avoue, une aussi prompte réussite.

"La carriole est attelée, et nous partons. C'est d'abord un chemin qui monte, descend, tourne à travers un dédale de monticules; il n'y a pas dix mètres en terrain plat. La route a été grossièrement tracée par mon conducteur lui-même, qui se charge de l'entretenir. Des compagnies de collins, des jackrabbits se sauvent effarouchés dans les broussailles.

"Bientôt le Peach-Springs cañon s'ouvre devant nous. C'est une longue vallée, encaissée entre deux murailles de grès rouge. Les points de comparaison manquent pour en apprécier la hauteur. Elle sont, paraît-il,

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

sept ou huit cents mètres, et les taches sombres qui apparaissent là-haut, dans la roche, comme des nids de passereaux aux creux d'un mur, sont des excavations énormes dans lesquelles tiendrait sans peine une maison à quatre étages. Les couches du terrain, distinctes les unes des autres, donnent à ces parois l'aspect d'un escalier de géants. C'est là le caractère original de tous les paysages de la contrée. Devant nous, barrant le Cañon, une pyramide se dresse, régulièrement étagée. Sous les rayons du soleil qui décline, ces montagnes nues passent par les nuances les plus féériques de carmin et d'or. Au fond de la vallée, des plantes grasses nombreuses, cactus aux formes bizarres, croissent comme dans une serre chaude à la faveur du rayonnement de chaleur que leur renvoient les rochers: ici ce sont des palettes charnues, hérissées de piquants, là des massues puissantes, armées de pointes redoutables, ou encore de longs rubans côtelés, qui rampent ou se dressent au milieu des pierres brûlantes.

"Notre gîte pour la nuit était un chalet sans portes ni fenêtres, construit à la rencontre du Peach-Springs Cañon et du Demon's Cañon. Après un dîner sommaire où les conserves firent les frais de tous les services, j'allai me coucher en plein courant d'air, faute de pouvoir clore les issues. Malgré cette circonstance, qui aurait dû rendre la chaleur plus tolérable, je pus à peine fermer l'œil de la nuit. Lorsque je me mis au lit, les draps étaient chauds comme si on les avait bassinés. Cet air, qui passait sur mon visage, me brûlait les paupières, on sentait qu'il avait balayé toute une contrée de terre ardente; on eût dit le vent qui sort des ouvreaux d'un four.

"Le lendemain, je descendis jusqu'au bord du Colorado, qui coule à un mille ou deux de là. Une crique d'eau tranquille, une plage de sable plus fin que le sable de mer le plus léger, invitaient au bain. Mon élan fut arrêté par la vue des rapides vers lesquels la rivière, resserrée entre des éboulis de roche, se précipite un peu plus loin.

"Les montagnes qui dominent cette vallée solitaire dont le fleuve tient toute la largeur, atteignent deux mille mètres; elles surmontent les rives abruptes d'édifices singuliers. On pourrait croire qu'en ces lieux, les Titans ont cherché à escalader le ciel, et que ces gradins gigantesques sont les ruines de leurs travaux, les derniers vestiges de leur audacieuse tentative. Ici c'est un piédestal qui semble attendre son couronnement, plus loin les marches d'un temple, le soubassement d'une citadelle. Ailleurs c'est un piton plus élancé, qui rappelle fidèlement, pour employer une comparaison plus exacte que poétique, une longue-vue à moitié tirée, et reposant sur son objectif.

"En parcourant ces profondeurs mystérieuses qui eussent dignement servi de vestibule à l'Enfer de Dante, on se sent saisi d'admiration pour l'énergique audace de l'homme qui a osé le premier venir leur arracher leur secret. C'est au major Powell qu'en revient toute la gloire; son voyage n'est qu'une série de péripéties émouvantes et terribles... Tantôt cheminant avec ses compagnons sur la crête des escarpements, il lui fallait supporter toutes les angoisses de la soif. Les flots roulant à plusieurs milliers de pieds au-dessous d'eux aiguisaient leur supplice. Les malheureux devenaient fous, et voulaient se précipiter dans le vide. Ailleurs ils suivaient le fond du précipice. Alors les eaux tant désirées devenant leur ennemi, entraînaient l'esquif vers des cataractes inconnues, au milieu de l'obscurité des gorges. Maintes fois jetés au milieu des remous, les hardis voyageurs faillirent trouver la mort.

"Moins terrible et moins imposant, mais pourtant fort pittoresque, est le Demon's Creek, qui fut, dans l'après-midi, le but de ma promenade. Au fond d'une étroite fente de la montagne, une délicieuse petite cascade, tombant dans une vasque de rochers, m'offrit le double plaisir de la douche et du bain. Par malheur, l'eau était tiède; j'estime que sa température atteignait 35 degrés.

"Une question se pose naturellement à l'esprit de celui qui visite le bassin si curieux du Colorado. Comment les eaux ont-elles pu se frayer un passage aussi profond sur une longueur aussi considérable? Car ce n'est pas une fissure de la montagne que la rivière emprunte; le ravin au fond duquel elle coule, c'est elle-même qui l'a éreusé. Le major Powell suppose qu'avant le soulèvement de la région, le lit du Colorado était situé là où il est encore aujourd'hui. Le mouvement ascensionnel des couches de grès dont nous voyons aujourd'hui la coupe géologique sur les parois des vallées, se fit si lentement que le cours des eaux n'en fut pas dérangé. Celles-ci continuèrent de couler, creusant leur route et approfondissant leur sillon à mesure que s'exhaussait le sol. L'hypothèse n'est qu'à moitié satisfaisante, mais elle est plausible, et j'ignore si les géologues, de qui ces régions sont encore bien peu connues, ont donné de meilleures explications d'un phénomène naturel, peut-être unique au monde.

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

“Avant le quitter le chalet, j’inscris mon nom sur un volumineux registre qui fait le plus bel ornement de l’établissement. Je vois en le parcourant que, depuis deux ans, les visiteurs arrivent en assez grand nombre. Ils sont Américains pour la plupart; pas mal d’Anglais et d’Allemands aussi... De Français, fort peu; car malgré de soigneuses recherches, je ne relève que les noms de trois compatriotes.”

(translation)

This translation was first published by Earle Spamer, “Demons at the Farlee Hotel”, The Ol’ Pioneer (Grand Canyon Historical Society), 29(4) (Fall 2018): 3-6; that translation is repeated here, with minor corrections.

‘The black man of the Pullman car had come to wake me up, and about three o’clock in the morning I stepped off at Peach Springs. What to do when you arrive at such an hour in an unknown hamlet? A woman getting off the train at the same time as me tells me, in the night, of the path that leads to the only inn of the place. I had not taken twenty steps in this direction that a ferocious barking is heard. I stop, I try to move past; but as soon as I get closer, two big dogs, the faithful guardians of the place, block my way by showing their teeth. I cared little to begin a struggle, and, resigned to wait for day, I retired to the railway station.

‘When traveling, we learn patience. The night was splendid and fresh, the atmosphere of admirable purity, and the Milky Way, like a trail of indecisive clouds, ran from one end of the sky to the other. It was enough of this show to help me endure a few hours, despite myself, under the stars.

‘Little by little, the night cleared, and at dawn I looked curiously at the country around me. The village consisted of about ten wooden houses, of which there were five or six saloons, a kind of establishment of which we have already met.

‘At one end appeared my inn, with its square plank façade, as one sees so much in the West, rising as a partition to the top of the roof. It had the following sign:

Grand-Cañon stage office.

[See illustration farther above]

‘I then resumed the path which a few hours earlier witnessed my ungenerous retreat. This time the dogs let me pass without difficulty; they even venture to sniff my boots; we were going to become the best friends in the world.

‘It was at the inn that I had to find the cart and horses necessary to take me to Grand-Cañon. I knock on the door; the owner comes to open. I immediately explain what brings me, and I ask him if it is possible to leave without delay. “I have no horses,” he answered indifferently, “we had a violent storm here the day before yesterday and all my animals are gone.”

‘The news was unpleasant, just waiting—until when? Until the next morning at least, because only one train passes each day. Even should I give up my trip to Grand Cañon, I was stuck there for twenty-four hours. I then looked with consternation at those arid, sun-scorched hills, deprived by the miserable houses of the village and the railway station of the only charm to which they could have claimed, that of solitude.

‘The only ones awake in the country were my host and me. To work against my despondency, I began by taking a sketch of the inn, then wondered what to write. To write a few pages of notes is, while traveling, a powerful remedy against annoyance. By a bitter mockery the paper that is given me carries, at the head of the sheet, a splendid conveyance hitched by four dashing couriers, taking a load of happy tourists to more picturesque regions. Alas! how far they are from me!

‘I finished writing all too soon and went to the station to share a meal with the employees of the railway, which had been indicated to me as the usual table for foreigners, when out of the single room of the inn came an individual who stopped when he saw me. He stared at me, then, after a moment’s hesitation, turned around and went back to his room. I heard him from here give a half a dozen turns of the key. That done, he returned quietly, closed the door, and went out. He had taken me, quite simply, for some flight of the great road, or at least for a traveler of an equivocal delicacy. While smiling at the adventure, I was quite satisfied with the uncomfortable impression produced by my wild dress. There are countries where it is better to be mistaken for a brigand than for an honest man. It was a traveling salesman (for where can we not find one?), and like the two watch-dogs it took us a short time to get acquainted.

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

'I was too happy to find someone to talk to, to keep him feeling resentment of the unflattering distrust he had first shown towards me.

'Hardly nine o'clock in the morning, the heat had become burning. Sitting in the shade of the little awning that was over the door, my friend the salesman gave me some details of the country he knew, quite badly. But in the person of my host's wife I had an otherwise interesting interlocutor. She had come to take a seat near us, and, learning that I was French, she asked me news from Europe. She spoke well enough, and with a certain pretension; she seemed to have received an education above her present condition. Physically, she looked like an old madwoman.

'In a few moments she brought the conversation to politics, and, taking a lecturer's tone, she began an enthusiastic panegyric on the universal republic. It was only nations united in endless peace, happy and rich workers, shared fortunes.

'To France lay the glorious role of realizing the grand plan of the fraternity of peoples. Madame Louise Michel would have been very happy! [Michel was a free-thinking French woman at the time, of some notoriety for her views on politics and the evils of society.] For me, who is a little skeptical of these social utopias, I had great fun to hear this woman voiturier [one who rents horses and carriages] give me, in the middle of a country of Indians, a sermon which would not have been out of place in the salle Lévis [a dining room used for public meetings, a term often with socialist connotations].

'It helped me to be patient, and I was grateful to my hostess! Meanwhile her husband had sent a local cowboy out to look for the horses. He returned empty-handed.

'My day was bad. One hope remained to me: an Indian, on the promise of a dollar, was put on the hunt. Would he be more successful?

'Riding on one of those small horses with a stunted belly and a puny and sickly air, but who would walk whole days at the same pace without drinking or eating, he set off at a gallop and disappeared behind the hills.

'At the end of an hour, the Indian returned, driving before him three horses that he had rounded up. His wild instincts had made it possible to rapidly retrace the tracks of the animals and follow them. I had hardly hoped, I confess, such quick success.

'The cart is hitched, and we leave. The path goes up, down, turns through a maze of mounds; there is not ten meters in flat terrain. The road has been roughly drawn by my driver himself, who is in charge of maintaining it. On the hills jack-rabbits flee frightened in the undergrowth.

'Soon Peach Springs Cañon opens before us. It is a long valley, enclosed between two walls of red sandstone. Points of comparison are lacking to appreciate the height. They are, it seems, seven or eight hundred meters, and the dark spots that appear up there in the rock, like nests of sparrows in the hollow of a wall, are enormous excavations in which a four-story house could easily be occupied. The layers of the rocks, distinct from each other, give these walls their appearance. This is the original character of all the landscapes of the country in front of us. Barring the Cañon there stands a pyramid, regularly staggered [Diamond Peak], and under the rays of the traversing sun these naked mountans go through the most magical shades of carmine and gold. At the bottom of the valley, many succulent plants, cactuses with bizarre shapes, grow like in a greenhouse thanks to the radiation of heat that the rocks send back to them: here are fleshy palettes bristling with spines, there are powerful clubs, armed with formidable points, or still long ribbons which crawl or rise in the midst of burning stones.

'Our home for the night was a cottage without doors or windows, built at the junction of Peach Springs Cañon and Demon's Cañon. After a brief dinner where the canned food was part of the plan, I went to bed in open air because I could not close the doors. Despite this circumstance, which should have made the heat more tolerable, I could barely sleep the night. When I went to bed, the sheets were hot as if they had been just washed. The air which passed over my face burned my eyelids, and one felt that he had swept a whole country of burning earth; one might have said it was the wind coming out of the openings of a furnace.

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

'The next day I descended to the edge of the Colorado, which flows a mile or two away. A quiet cove of water, a sandy beach finer than the lightest sea sand, invited a bath. My enthusiasm was stopped by the sight of the rapids towards which the river, confined between rock screes, rushed a little further.

'The mountains which dominate this solitary valley, whose river fills the whole width, reach two thousand meters; they surmount the steep sides like singular buildings. One might think that in these places, the Titans sought to climb to the sky, and that these gigantic steps are the ruins of their works, the last vestiges of their audacious attempt. Here is a pedestal that seems to wait for its coronation, further the steps of a temple, the base of a citadel. Elsewhere there is a slender piton, which recalls faithfully, to use a comparison more exact than poetic, a telescope half drawn and resting on its objective lens.

'In traversing these mysterious depths which worthily serves as a vestibule in Dante's Inferno, one feels the admiration for the energetic audacity of the man who dared to come first to snatch their secret from them. It is to Major Powell that all the glory returns; his journey is only a series of moving and terrible events. Sometimes, walking with his companions on the crest of escarpments, he had to endure all the anxieties of thirst. The waves rolling several thousand feet below them sharpened their agony. The unfortunate ones went mad, and wanted to rush into the void. Elsewhere they followed the bottom of the precipice. Then the much desired waters became their enemy, carrying the skiff to unknown cataracts, in the midst of the darkness of the gorges. Many times thrown into the midst of the eddies, the bold travelers nearly died.

'Less terrible and less imposing, yet very picturesque, is Demon's Creek, which was, in the afternoon, the purpose of my walk. At the bottom of a narrow slit of the mountain, a delightful little waterfall, falling into a basin of rocks, offered me the double pleasure of showering and bathing. Unfortunately, the water was lukewarm; I estimate that its temperature reached 35 degrees [95° F].

'A question naturally arises in the mind of one who visits the curious basin of of the Colorado. How could the waters have made their way so deep over such a considerable length? Because it is not a crack in the mountain that the river follows; the ravine at the bottom of which it flows has been made by itself. Major Powell assumes that before the uprising of the area, the Colorado bed was located where it is still today. The ascending movement of the sandstone layers, the geological section of which we now see in the walls of the valleys, was so slow that the watercourses were not disturbed, and they continued to flow, digging their course and deepening their furrow as the soil rose: the hypothesis is only half-satisfactory, but it is plausible, and I do not know if the geologists, from whom these regions are still little known, have given better explanations of a natural phenomenon perhaps unique in the world.

'Before leaving the chalet, I write my name in a voluminous register which is the most beautiful ornament of the establishment. I can see from it that, for the last two years, visitors have arrived in fairly large numbers. They are mostly Americans; a good deal of Englishmen and Germans too—French, very little; because despite careful searches, I only find the names of three compatriots.'

1889

Anonymous

318 1889 [Filler.] Religio-Philosophical Journal (Chicago), 47(6) (September 28): 2.

A writer in the Syracuse (N. Y.) Journal who went to the bottom of the Grand Canon of the Colorado last winter, reports:

"I have been all through the Rockies from Montana to Central America and know what a chasm is, but the sight of that abyss took my breath away. From the top to the bottom it is fully six thousand feet. Over a mile below you can see the river tearing through the gorge, but not a sound can be heard, it is so far away. From one bank to the other it is apparently not over a quarter of a mile, but a matter of fact it is fully nineteen miles." (ENTIRE NOTE)

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

Allen, S. H.

- 319 1889 The Grand Canyon of the Colorado. Parry's Literary Journal, 5 (February): 166-170, (March): 201-206, (April): 241-246, (May): 281-287.

Hart, W. T.

- 320 1889 Down in Grand Cañon. Frank Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper, 69 (1777) (October 5): 160.

"'I went to the bottom of the Grand Cañon of the Colorado last winter,' said W. T. Hart to a St. Louis Globe-Democrat reporter, 'and am one of the few men who ever attempted the descent. I went there to examine a mine said to exist in the bottom of the cañon. I have been all through the Rockies, from Montana to Central America, and know what a chasm is, but the sight of that abyss took my breath away. From the top to the bottom it is fully 6,000 feet. Over a mile below you can see the river tearing through the gorge, but not a sound can be heard, it is so far away. From one bank to the other it is apparently not over a quarter of a mile, but, as a matter of fact, it is fully nineteen miles. My guide told me I would never be able to reach the bottom. It is certainly the most desolate place in the world. There is not a living thing down there—no insects, reptiles, or animals of any kind. Everything is dead. The mining prospect was worthless. Before the sun was up next morning we were on our way out, and it took us until ten that night to climb the wall of the cañon.'" (ENTIRE ITEM)

Landau, Wilhelm von

- 321 1889 Reisen in Asien, Australien und Amerika. Berlin: Hugo Steinitz, 508 pp. [In German.]

See Landau (1888) for remarks.

Linton, W. J.

- 322 1889 The history of wood-engraving in America. Part V. In: Montgomery, Walter (ed.), American art and American art collections : essays on artistic subjects by the best art writers, fully illustrated with etchings, photo-etchings, photogravures, phototypes, and engravings on steel and wood by the most celebrated artists. Vol. I. Boston: E. W. Walker and Co., pp. 465-482.

See pp. 474, 475, "Walls of the Grand Cañon. Engraved by Annin. After Thomas Moran. From 'Picturesque America.' Published by D. Appleton & Co."

1890

Ober, Frederick A.

- 323 1890 Acoma; a picturesque pueblo. American Architect and Building News, 29 (August 2) (762): 65-68.

Recollecting a trip in 1883: "Coming back to Albuquerque I went over the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad to the Grand Cañon, as far as it was then finished, descending to the cañon at 'Diamond Wash,' and at midnight, June 29, took the return train at Peach Springs for the Pueblo country." (ENTIRE NOTE)

Ober also had in 1884 taken note of access to the canyon at Peach Springs, though without personal comment: ". . . at Peach Springs one may leave the train, and penetrate to the heart of the Grand Cañon of the Colorado, twenty miles distant, through a gradually descending gorge called Diamond Wash, and behold the sullen waters of the imprisoned Colorado flowing between its mile-high walls of rock." (Ober, Mexican resources: A guide to and through Mexico [Estes and Lauriat, Boston, 1884], p. 9).

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

Raymond, Rossiter Worthington

324 1890 The Grand Cañon of the Colorado. New York Academy of Sciences, Transactions, 9 (March 10): 128.

Lecture, noticing only, "The lecture was fully illustrated by projections of original photographs."

1891

Dye, Eva Emery

325 1891 In the Grand Canyon. The Oberlin Review, 18(26) (March 31): 381.

"Mrs. Eva E. Dye was '82's class poet." This poem of hers was from the Oregon City Enterprise, the February "West Shore poetical contest" first-prize winner. Moreso than a personal reflection, in a variety of respects this seems to embellish upon the works of Powell and Dutton particularly.

Bend, dip the oar, away, away,
Adown the canyon grand and gray,
Where rapids roar and cliffs on high,
Embattled round, shut out the sky.
Where gorge, escarp, and fissure yawn
With phantom features in the dawn.
A streak of sky is all that tells
Of life on high, where daylight dwells.
Light up, ye rocks vermilion-hued,
The darkness of this solitude,
As on we glide where granite walls
Embosomed, hide huge waterfalls,
Whose distant dashings have their birth
Deep in the heart of mother earth.
Far up the heights the mountain sheep
Look down the canyon dark and deep.
And elk and deer secluded rove
In sheltered valleys far above;
The mountain lion builds his den
On high in some dark piney glen,
And 'neath red standstone ledges hide
Huge grizzlies up the canyon side.
Speed on, good boat, ere maelstrom snatch
Thee with an arm I cannot match,
Past Aztec watch towers on the peaks,
Where sleeps an age that never speaks,
Where flint chips still and temples trace
The tenure of a perished race;
Past dead volcanoes, where of old
The fire and flood in conflict rolled,
And molten lava dammed the tide
Along the canyon's blackened side.
Leap on, my boat, the wide earth win;
Too long this prison shuts us in;
For days and days this grsnite [sic] gloom
Has locked us in a living tomb.
I long for fields where free winds blow,
Where mallow, sage and roses grow,

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

Where God's glad daylight pours on high,
And all the earth is domed with sky.

Owens, J. G.

326

1891 The Grand Cañon. The Youth's Companion (Boston), 64(31) (July 30): 419.

Writing for an audience of adventurous youth, the author writes a delightfully detailed account of a solo descent (and ascent) by foot on Hance's trail.

"I had read several interesting accounts of visits to the Grand Cañon of the Colorado River in Arizona, but none describing the experience of a descent into the chasm. I was filled with a desire to have this experience.

"At Flagstaff, I procured a two-horse team in an easy buckboard, a driver, and provisions for six days. • • •

"Two days of uneventful but not uninteresting driving brought us to the rim of the cañon. • • •

He mentions all the places that he had seen thus far during the summer in New Mexico and Arizona and without pause or lead-in the reader is with him, suddenly, at the canyon: "But to describe what I saw on the rim of the Grand Cañon is not within my power. As I sat looking at the scene, the only record I could make in my journal was, 'I see at one glance all the grand things I have seen this summer.' There was Ta-ai-yal-lo-ne, there were the Zuñi Buttes, there was Cañon de Chelly; it seemed that everything had its counterpart in that grand and awful chasm.

"I was told that to make possible a descent to the river, the services of a guide would be necessary; but, deeming the price which the local guides asked beyond my means, I resolved to go alone.

"I asked Mr. John Hance, who lives in a cabin near the rim of the cañon:

"'How far is it from the rim to the river?'

"'Seven miles,' he answered.

"'Has any white man besides yourself ever gone down there alone?'

"'Yes, one or two. Many start, but few ever reach the river.'

"'How long a time is required to go down and back?'

"'I can do it in one day, but it is a hard climb, and most persons take two or three days for it.'

"'Has any one ever gone down and back in one day without a guide?'

"'No, not that I know of.'

"'Are there any ropes or rope ladders to descend?'

"'Yes, five or six.'

"'Are they sound?'

"'I don't know. A man and his wife broke one last week.'

"I assured him that I was going down and back the same day; and in spite of his warning that I could not do it, I set out early next morning, taking with me a little boiled ham, a loaf of bread, and a small can of grape-butter, all deposited in a small muslin bag. My driver accompanied me to the rim of the cañon.

"On the way we stopped at the Hance cabin, and I paid the regular toll for the use of the trail—fifty cents.

"As I stood on the rim of the cañon, ready to begin the descent, I must confess that I felt a little uncertain of the wisdom of my course, but I had no notion of turning back.

"Mr. Hance told me that the distance from the rim of the cañon to the river was seven miles; the vertical depth more than six thousand six hundred feet; the distance from the rim to a cabin on the trail, three miles; vertical depth to the cabin, four thousand feet; length of longest rope, fifty feet.

"With neither coat nor waistcoat, carrying only my journal and my lunch, I was ready for the descent. I noted the time, which was just seven o'clock and forty minutes; and bade good-bye to my driver, requesting that if I should not return by the afternoon of the next day he should come down to seek me.

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

"The trail is so steep that one can scarcely keep on his feet. I walked, ran, slid and rolled down the three miles to the cabin in just an hour and two minutes.

"The scenery all the way was exceedingly interesting. Looking down, one would see a prominent ledge or bench of rock, perhaps a thousand feet below, from which would rise a magnificent butte. A quarter of an hour's travel would bring him to a level with this base; and in the next quarter of an hour he would see it rise a thousand feet above his head.

"That I found an exceedingly interesting thing to do; to pick out prominent points, both at a level with me and far below, and then stop occasionally and see how we had changed position. In fact, I think that is about the only way one can gain an idea, inadequate though it be, of the great descent he is making.

"At the cabin, I found a beautiful stream of clear, cool water, which was very refreshing. Here I divided my lunch, leaving some for my return. After half an hour's rest I pushed on.

"The cañon here, which is merely a side cañon leading down to the river, was perhaps five hundred feet wide, with walls nearly vertical, a thousand feet high. On every hand the scenery was indescribably grand. The cañon was narrowing, the walls were getting higher; the whole scene was becoming more impressive and majestic.

"The indications of the trail were growing exceedingly faint. I had gone perhaps three miles from the cabin. The cañon had narrowed to about twenty-five feet, with its walls sloping an an angle of over eighty degrees.

"I had descended through the sandstone and shale, and was already several hundred feet into the granite, when I came to the first rope ladder. I was glad to see it, for it assured me that I was on the right trail, although it brought visibly before my mind the fact that the dangerous part of my journey had yet to be accomplished.

"The ladder was about ten feet long. I tested its fastenings, and easily descended.

"A few steps beyond, a single rope hung over a ledge of vertical rock fifteen feet high. As I had no means of examining the fastening, I hesitated for a moment, for I knew the hardest strain would come upon the rope just as I should round the top of the ledge and be farthest from the rock below. I ascended [sic] safely, and then soon had to descend a gentle slope, clinging to a rope about forty feet long.

"When I had gone about one hundred feet, the cañon had narrowed in one place to a width of about five feet, and at the bottom was a pool of water about eighteen inches deep. The walls were so smooth and round that it was impossible to pass the pool without getting wet. Removing shoes and stockings, I got over nicely, and, as I expected to meet even a worse case in a moment or two, I proceeded with bare feet on the smooth granite.

"Turning a sharp angle in the cañon I had scarcely gone forty feet when I heard the roar of a heavy fall of water, and found myself hemmed in on both sides by steep walls, with a waterfall about fifteen feet high in front of me. On the level of the rock below the falls I saw a bunch of rope lying against the all of the cañon, as if it had been washed there.

"I at once supposed that I had reached the end of my journey, and that the rope which I saw had at one time been used to get over the falls, but was now out of reach. Nevertheless, I decided to see what I could do toward climbing around the place.

"The granite was very smooth; and being barefoot, I found climbing rather a simple matter. I was getting along nicely and congratulating myself that I had got safely around the falls, when, to my horror, upon turning my head to the left, I saw below what at first appeared to be a descent without bottom.

"Climbing to the edge of the precipice and looking down, I concluded that this must be the great waterfall of which I had heard Mr. Hance speak, and that the rope I had noticed from the precipice now behind me had not fallen down from that, but was intended for this next descent.

"Making sure that the end of the rope was well fastened, I cast it over the falls. It hung straight in the midst of a cascade of water four feet wide and six inches deep. The rope appeared to be strong, and I determined to try it.

"The height was said to be fifty feet, but I think it was not so much. As I did not wish to have my watch and my journal ruined, I hid those articles with my trousers. As I was concealing them, it occurred to me that no one

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

was within at least six miles. As I have thought of it since, I have wondered if we have not become so accustomed to hide anything thus left that we might be said to do it almost instinctively.

"Below the falls there was a spot about ten feet square, perfectly dry. Down upon this I tossed shoes, stockings, shirt and lunch. My underwear I retained, to protect myself in some measure against the rocky wall. The descent through the falls was pleasant enough, the water having about the right temperature to produce an exhilarating reaction without chilling; and as I passed down the rope I was delighted as well as surprised to find the wall covered near its base with beautiful moss and maiden-hair ferns.

"Removing my wet apparel, I put on what dry clothing I had, and went on. I had gone about two hundred feet when I came to a place that troubled me. It was a slope, somewhat steep, but quite smooth, and no rope was in sight.

"Examining the place carefully, I decided that the best means of descent was the one I had used years ago on my grandfather's farm in descending straw-stacks. Only one objection presented itself—the part of my costume that was missing is the one usually most relied upon on such occasions. Nevertheless, I conformed to the inevitable, and slid down without serious injury. Only one who has experienced it can realize the excitement of danger in such a descent.

"Only one short rope remained for me, and almost leaping for joy, I found myself on the bank of the Colorado.

"The river was an angry, muddy torrent, with rapids at short intervals, flowing between rugged granite walls that rose almost perpendicularly from the water's edge. It seemed impossible to pass more than one hundred feet up or down the stream; and as I sat in the shadow of a mighty boulder, and enjoyed by battered lunch, I thought of Major Powell and his party, who passed through here in 1869. My wonder was, not that two [sic] members of the expedition had been lost, but that any should have escaped.

"Having looked upon the scene until it became deeply impressed upon my memory, I gathered a few pebbles to carry with me, and started on my return. The sliding place or 'shoot' was soon passed; such places on the whole more easy of ascent than descent.

"When I reached the base of the high falls a problem presented itself. My clothing was now all dry, and I wished to keep it so; for, if I should not attempt to go beyond the cabin that night, I did not wish to sleep in wet clothing; and if I should attempt to climb the trail, wet clothing would be an additional burden.

"In a few moments a plan suggested itself. I had brought with me from the river the little muslin bag in which I had carried by lunch. Removing all my clothing, even to shoes and stockings, I thrust everything, except my belt, into the bag. Fastening the belt to the bag I buckled it around my neck. Then stepping into the midst of the falls, with my face turned upwards, so that my nose should serve as a water-shed, the bag hanging under my head, I ascended the rope and reached the top with my clothing only slightly wet.

"The things I had hidden I found all right; and as I stopped for a little rest I wrote up my journal.

"I reached the cabin at four o'clock. I called to mind that I had been told that the ascent from there would require at least three hours. At that time of the year it is dark at half-past seven; so I concluded that if I started I must climb the whole distance in the time mentioned. I determined to go on, and not to look at my watch until I had reached the top.

"The distance is three miles; the elevation is said to be four thousand feet; and it was just half-past four when I started.

"In the first mile I do not think I ascended more than five hundred feet. That was covered with ease, and then I pressed on to the steeper part. After climbing hard for a while I sat down to rest.

"As I sat there, I remember looking up at some turret-like projections of rock on the rim, several thousand feet above me, and saying:

"'Well, I guess about four such pulls as this will bring me out.'

"I struggled on. Each interval between my rests was growing shorter, both as to space and time. The number of rests was nearer forty-four than four; and by the time I had reached the top I was so completely worn out that a pull of a few yards was enough to bring me to a halt.

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

"A dark shower which was raging on the rim had deceived me somewhat as to the hour; I supposed that it was later than it really was. As I threw myself on the ground under a piñon tree on the rim, my heart beating at the highest speed, and my flesh aglow, I looked at my watch. It was just twenty minutes past six. I had come from the cabin to the rim in just one hour and fifty minutes.

"As I dragged myself to the door of Mr. Hance's cabin, the old man met me. He was unwilling, at first, to believe that I had reached the river. I told him of my experience on the ropes, and he was convinced. It is unnecessary to mention that I slept well that night.

"The next forenoon I spent along the rim of the cañon, contemplating its grand and ever-changing scenery." And just as suddenly as he had arrived at the canyon, so his canyon exploits end. He continues a bit with a relatively refreshing climb of the San Francisco Peaks, and the view from the top.

"The day was beautifully clear. Not a cloud hung on the horizon. The air was pure, even for Arizona, for frequent showers during the last month had removed all the dust. I was on the summit of the highest peak in Arizona, and before me lay the most extensive view I had ever looked upon.

"To the north the Grand Cañon, sixty miles distant, the scene of my labors two days before, was clearly traceable, the river flowing south through Marble Cañon, and then turning west through the Grand Cañon proper. The course of the Little Colorado, emptying into the Colorado at the elbow, so to speak, was clearly seen for forty miles towards the northeast. Far in the distant east were the Moqui Buttes. To the southwest was Bill Williams Mountain, and directly west was Kendrick's Peak.

"To the west and south of my position, looking like a mighty oasis in a still mightier desert, was the great piñon forest, stretching north and south for ninety miles. It was a bird's-eye view I shall never forget; and as I descended the peak I felt I had seen nature's grandest scenery."

Warner, Charles Dudley

327 1891 The heart of the desert. Harper's New Monthly Magazine, 82 (February): 392-412.

Includes a trip to Grand Canyon at Hance's.

"[The Grand Canyon District], fully described by the explorers and studied by the geologists in the United States service, but little known to even the travelling public, is probably the most interesting territory of its size on the globe. At least it is unique. In attempting to convey an idea of it the writer can be assisted by no comparison, nor can he appeal in the minds of his readers to any experience of scenery that can apply here. The so-called Grand Cañon differs not in degree from all other scenes; it differs in kind. • • •

"If the Grand Cañon itself did not dwarf everything else, the scenery of these plateaus would be superlative in interest. • • • Human experience has no prototype of this region, and the imagination has never conceived of its forms and colors. • • •

"The section of the Grand Cañon seen by those who take the route from Peach Springs . . . , though wonderful, presents few of the great features of either the Kaibab or the Kanab divisions. • • •

"In our journey to the Grand Cañon we left the Santa Fe line at Flagstaff, a new town with a lively lumber industry • • •

"The cañon is also reached from Williams, the next station west, the distance being a little shorter, and the point on the cañon visited being usually a little further west. But the Flagstaff route is for many reasons usually preferred. • • •

"Flagstaff is the best present point of departure, because it has a small hotel, good supply stores, and a large livery-stable, made necessary by the business of the place and the objects of interest in the neighborhood, and because one reaches from there by the easiest road the finest scenery incomparably on the Colorado. The distance is 76 miles through a practically uninhabited country, much of it a desert, and with water very infrequent. No work has been done on the road; it is made simply by driving over it. There are a few miles here and there of fair wheeling, but a good deal of it is intolerably dusty or exceedingly stony, and progress is slow. In the daytime (it was the last of June) the heat is apt to be excessive; but this could be borne, the air is so absolutely dry and delicious, and breezes occasionally spring up, if it were not for the dust. It is, notwithstanding the novelty of the adventure and of the scenery by the way, a tiresome journey of two days. A day of rest is absolutely required at the cañon, so that five days must be allowed for the trip. This will cost the traveller, according to the size of the party made up, from forty to fifty dollars. But a much longer sojourn at the cañon is desirable.

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

"Our party of seven was stowed in and on an old Concord coach drawn by six horses, and piled with camp equipage, bedding, and provisions. A four-horse team followed, loaded with other supplies and cooking utensils.

• • •

"The way seemed long. With the heat and dust and slow progress, it was exceedingly wearisome. Our modern nerves are not attuned to the slow crawling of a prairie wagon. There had been growing for some time in the coach a feeling that the journey did not pay, that, in fact, no mere scenery could compensate for the fatigue of the trip. The imagination did not rise to it. 'It will have to be a very big cañon, said the Duchess [not otherwise identified].

"Late in the afternoon we entered an open pine forest, passed through a meadow where the Indians had set their camp by a shallow pond, and drove along a ridge, in the cool shades, for three or four miles. Suddenly, on the edge of a descent, we who were on the box saw through the tree-tops a vision that stopped the pulse for a second, and filled us with excitement. It was only a glimpse, far off and apparently lifted up—red towers, purple cliffs, wide-spread apart, hints of color and splendor; on the right distance, mansions, gold and white and carmine (so the light made them), architectural habitations in the sky it must be, and suggestions of others far off in the middle distance, a substantial aerial city, or the ruins of one, such as the prophet saw in a vision. It was only a glimpse. Our hearts were in our mouths. We had a vague impression of something wonderful, fearful, some incomparable splendor that was not earthly. Were we drawing near the 'City'? and should we have yet a more perfect view thereof? Was it Jerusalem, or some Hindoo temples, there in the sky? 'It was builded of pearls and precious stones, also the streets were paved with gold; so that by reason of the natural glory of the City, and the reflection of the sunbeams upon it, Christian with desire fell sick.' [quoting, without credit, John Bunyan's The Pilgrim's Progress]. It was a momentary vision of a vast amphitheatre of splendor, mostly hidden by the trees and the edge of the plateau.

"We descended into a hollow. There was the well, a log cabin, a tent or two under the pine-trees. We dismounted with impatient haste. The sun was low in the horizon, and had long withdrawn from this grassy dell. Tired as we were, we could not wait. It was only to ascend the little steep, stony slope—300 yards—and we should see! Our party were straggling up the hill. Two or three had reached the edge. I looked up. The Duchess threw up her arms and screamed. We were not fifteen paces behind, but we saw nothing. We took the few steps, and the whole magnificence broke upon us. No one could be prepared for it. The scene is one to strike dumb with awe, or to unstring the nerves; one might stand in silent astonishment, another would burst into tears.

"There are some experieuces that cannot be repeated—one's first view of Rome, one's first view of Jerusalem. But these emotions are produced by association, by the sudden standing face to face with the scenes most wrought into our whole life and education by tradition and religion. This was without association, as it was without parallel. It was a shock so novel that the mind, dazed, quite failed to comprehend it. All that we could grasp was a vast confusion of amphitheatres and strange architectural forms resplendent with color. The vastness of the view amazed us quite as much as its transcendent beauty.

We had expected a cañon—two lines of perpendicular walls 6000 feet high, with the ribbon of a river at the bottom. But the reader may dismiss all his notions of a cañon, indeed of any sort of mountain or gorge scenery with which he is familiar. We had come into a new world. What we saw was not a cañon, or a chasm, or a gorge, but a vast area which is a break in the plateau. From where we stood it was 12 miles across to the opposite walls—a level line of mesa on the Utah side. We looked up and down for 20 to 30 miles. This great space is filled with gigantic architectural constructions, with amphitheatres, gorges, precipices, walls of masonry, fortresses terraced up to the level of the eye, temples mountain size, all brilliant with horizontal lines of color—streaks of solid hues a few feet in width, streaks a thousand feet in width—yellows, mingled white and gray, orange, dull red, brown, blue, carmine, green, all blending in the sight into one transcendent suffusion of splendor. Afar off we saw the river in two places, a mere thread, as motionless and smooth as a strip of mirror, only we knew it was a turbid boiling torrent, 6000 feet below us. Directly opposite the overhanging ledge on which we stood was a mountain, the sloping base of which was ashy gray and bluish; it rose in a series of terraces to a thousand feet wall of dark red sandstone, receding upward, with ranges of columns and many fantastic sculptures, to a final row of gigantic opera-glasses 6000 feet above the river. The great San Francisco Mountain, with its snowy crater, which we had passed on the way, might have been set down in the place of this one, and it would have been only one in a multitude of such forms that met the eye whichever way we looked. Indeed, all the vast mountains in this region might be hidden in this cañon.

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

“Wandering a little away from the group and out of sight, and turning suddenly to the scene from another point of view, I experienced for a moment an indescribable terror of nature, a confusion of mind, a fear to be alone in such a presence. With all this grotesqueness and majesty of form and radiance of color, creation seemed in a whirl. With our education in scenery of a totally different kind, I suppose it would need long acquaintance with this to familiarize one with it to the extent of perfect mental comprehension. • • • ”

The author describes the atmosphere, lapsing into a long quotation from Clarence Dutton. Then he progresses from the usual exclamations, to the unusual:

“I was continually likening this to a vast city rather than a landscape, but it was a city of no man’s creation nor of any man’s conception. In the visions which inspired or crazy painters have had of the New Jerusalem, of Babylon the Great, of a heaven in the atmosphere with endless perspective of towers and steeps that hang in the twilight sky, the imagination has tried to reach this reality. But here are effects beyond the artist, forms the architect has not hinted at. And yet everything reminds us of man’s work. And the explorers have tried by the use of Oriental nomenclature to bring it within our comprehension, the East being the land of the imagination. There is the Hindoo Amphitheatre, the Bright Angel Amphitheatre, the Ottoman Amphitheatre, Shiva’s Temple, Vishnu’s Temple, Vulcan’s Throne. And here indeed is the idea of the pagoda architecture, of the terrace architecture, of the bizarre constructions which rise with projecting buttresses, rows of pillars, recesses, battlements, esplanades, and low walls, hanging gardens, and truncated pinnacles. It is a city, but a city of the imagination. In many pages I could tell what I saw in one day’s lounging for a mile or so along the edge of the precipice. The view changed at every step, and was never half an hour the same in one place. Nor did it need much fancy to create illusions or pictures of unearthly beauty. There was a castle, terraced up with columns, plain enough, and below it a parade-ground; at any moment the knights in armor and with banners might emerge from the red gates, and deploy there, while the ladies looked down from the balconies. But there were many castles and fortresses and barracks and noble mansions. And the rich sculpture in this brilliant color! In time I began to see queer details: a Richardson house, with low portals and round arches, surmounted by a Nuremberg gable; perfect panels 600 feet high, for the setting of pictures; a train of cars partly derailed at the door of a long low warehouse, with a garden in front of it. There was no end to such devices. • • • ”

He rises to recite the presence of Niagara and Yosemite, and the geology of the canyon—“I have space only to refer to the geologic history in Captain Dutton’s report of 1882, of which there should be a popular edition.” (If only Warner could have foreseen!)

“The splendid views of the cañon at this point given in Captain Dutton’s report are from Point Sublime, on the north side. There seems to have been no way of reaching the river from that point. From the south side the descent, though wearisome, is feasible. It reverses mountaineering to descend 6000 feet for a view, and there is a certain pleasure in standing on a mountain summit without the trouble of climbing it. Hance, the guide, who has charge of the well, has made a path to the bottom. The route is seven miles long. Half-way down he has a house by a spring. At the bottom, somewhere in those depths, is a sort of farm, grass capable of sustaining horses and cattle, and ground where fruit trees can grow. Horses are actually living there, and parties descend there with tents, and camp for days at a time. It is a world of its own. Some of the photographic views presented here [three full-page engravings of the canyon accompany the article], all inadequate, are taken from points on Hance’s trail. But no camera or pen can convey an adequate conception of what Captain Dutton happily calls a great innovation in the modern ideas of scenery. To the eye educated to any other, it may be shocking, grotesque, incomprehensible; but [quoting Dutton] ‘those who have long and carefully studied the Grand Cañon of the Colorado do not hesitate for a moment to pronounce it by far the most sublime of all earthly spectacles.’

• • •

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

"The day is near when this scenery must be made accessible. A railway can easily be built from Flagstaff. The projected road from Utah, crossing the Colorado at Lee's Ferry, would come within twelve miles of the Grand Cañon, and a branch to it could be built. The region is arid, and in the 'sight-seeing' part of the year the few surface wells and springs are likely to go dry. The greatest difficulty would be in procuring water for railway service or for such houses of entertainment as are necessary. It could, no doubt, be piped from the San Francisco Mountain. At any rate, ingenuity will overcome the difficulties, and travellers from the wide world will flock thither, for there is revealed the long-kept secret, the unique achievement of nature."

1892

Adair, Eliza Ann

328 1892 A trip to the Grand Canyon. In: For Our Little Folks [SECTION]. Juvenile Instructor, 27 (September 15): 582.

Writer is 11 years of age, from Orderville, Utah. Item is in its entirety:

"Last summer I went out to the Buckskin Mountains [Kaibab Plateau] with my parents. My father tended a flock of sheep out there.

"On the twenty-fourth of July, as we could not attend the celebration in town, my father hitched up the horses and took us down to the Grand Canyon, which was three miles from where we were camped. The Grand Canyon is the deepest and grandest in the world.

"We could not see the river which runs through it because the canyon was so deep and we were so high above it. It was a grand sight to see the high ledge, and the beautiful trees all around.

"There are a great many deer in these mountains. After dinner my father went out to see if he could kill some deer. He shot at one but did not kill it. At a distance we saw a stream of water falling over a ledge, but it was so far off it looked like a silver thread shining in the sun."

Coolbrith, Ina H.

329 1892 In the Grand Cañon. Lippincott's Magazine, (September): 407.
Illustrated with a sketch that is rather improbable for Grand Canyon (artist's signature not deciphered).

The strongholds these of those strange, mighty gods
Who walked the earth before man's feeble race,
And, passing hence to their unknown abodes
In farther worlds, left here their awful trace.
Turrets, and battlements, and toppling towers,
That spurn the torrent foaming at their base,
And pierce the clouds, uplifting into space.
No sound is here, save where the river pours
Its ice-born flood, or when the tempests sweep
In rush of battle, and the lightnings leap
In thunder to the cliffs; no wing outspread
Above these walls, lone and untenanted
By man or beast,—but where the eagle soars
Above the crags,—and by the gates they guard,
Huge and as motionless, on either hand,
The rock-hewn sentinels in silence stand,
Through the long centuries keeping watch and ward.
Up from the sheer abysses that we tread,
Wherein pale Shadow holds her mystic sway,
And night yields never wholly to the day,

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

To where, in narrowing light far overhead,
Arch capping arch and peak to peak is wed,
We gaze, and veil our eyes in silent awe,
As when Jehovah's form the prophet saw.

- 330 1892 In the Grand Cañon. The Grange Visitor (Lansing, Michigan), 18(18) (102) (September 15): 6.
Credited to "September Lippincott's" (see above).

Credner, Hermann [Credner, Carl Hermann]

- 331 1892 Durch die San-Francisco Mountains zum Grand Cañon. Nach einem Vortrage. Aus allen Welttheilen (Leipzig), 23(3) (March):. [In German.]
(transl. 'Through the San Francisco Mountains to the Grand Canyon. After a lecture.')

Goebeler, E.

- 332 1892 Der Grand Cañon-District des Coloradoflusses. Prometheus (Berlin), 4(6)(162) (November 9): 86-91, (7)(163) (November 16): 103-108, (8)(164) (November 23): 119-123. [In German.]
(transl. 'The Grand Canyon District of the Colorado River')

Apparently recast from the narrative of Dutton (1882; see in Part I of this bibliography).

Higgins, C. A. [Higgins, Charles A.]

- 333 1892 Grand Cañon of the Colorado River. Chicago: Passenger Department, Santa Fe Route (printed by Henry O. Shepard Co.), 32 pp. [Booklet later printings 1893, 1897, 1900, 1901.]

Surely the most engaging of the early promotional materials, by the man who was not surprisingly "in special charge of advertising" for the Santa Fe Railway. Reprinted and extracted by the Santa Fe for more than two decades afterward. Profusely artistic and poetic in his descriptions of the canyon's forms and moods, it really all comes down to:

"There is but one Grand Canyon. Nowhere in the world has its like been found."

Still, I would be remiss were I to overlook Higgins' one most memorable perspective, which contains the line now immortalized in wood above the porch on the north side of El Tovar (in italics here):

"Then darkness falls, and should there be a moon, the scene in part revives in silver light, a thousand spectral forms projected from inscrutable gloom; dreams of mountains, as in their sleep they brood on things eternal."

Hovey, Horace Carter

- 334 1892 The Grand Canyon of the Colorado. Scientific American, 66 (June 18): 392-393.

"My aim in this article shall be to tell the tourist what he may expect to see at Hance's, or at least what I did see during my four days on the rim and in the depths." Takes note of the "boundless wilderness of grandeur at which it seems a sin to point an impertinent little kodak". See also remark appended to the end of the entry for Stainier (1893).

- 335 1892 On the rim and in the depths of the Grand Canyon. Scientific American, 67(6) (August 6): 87-89.

Apparently a reprinting of the item in the June 18 issue (above). Perhaps promotional items.

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

Lummis, Charles F.

- 336 1892 A tramp across the continent. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 270 pp. [With reprintings under the same imprint. Also reprinted by University of Nebraska Press (Lincoln, 1982) with introduction by Robert E. Fleming.]

A solo tramp by foot across America, in Arizona following the railroad, pausing to tramp afoot to see the Grand Canyon at Peach Springs (while suffering from an arm broken earlier in the trip). He had also acquired the company of a dog. Lummis's unique encounter with the canyon (pp. 242-248) is transcribed below.

"There was nothing worthy of record in the days to Peach Springs, though none were uninteresting. At that little station on the railroad I stopped to visit the greatest wonder of the world—the Grand Cañon of the Colorado. A twenty three mile walk north from Peach Springs led us first over a low ridge of dreary gravel hills, and then steeply downward more than three thousand feet, to the bottom of the most stupendous abyss upon which the eye of man has looked. After the first few miles the rough road winds at the bottom of the Peach Springs 'Wash,' itself a grander cañon than any of Colorado's wonders. From the deep snows of three days before we had descended to the tropics, and found verdure and full-leaved bushes and springing flowers. Birds sang and butterflies hovered past. The wild majestic cliffs loomed taller, nobler, more marvellous, at every step, until the Wash ran abruptly up against a titanic pyramid of roseate rock [Diamond Peak], and was at an end, and we turned at right angles into the grander cañon of Diamond Creek. The sun was already lost behind the left-hand walls, but the rock domes and pinnacles high above were glorified with the ruddy western glow. For another mile we hurried on, clambering over rocks, penetrating dense willow thickets, leaping the swift little brook a score of times and a long, jarring leap was not the most comfortable thing for me just then. And at last, where the cliffs shrank wider apart, a vast rock wall, 6000 feet in air, stood grimly facing us, and the brook's soft treble was drowned in deep, hoarse roar that swelled and grew as we climbed the barricade of boulders thrown up by the river against the saucy impact of the brook, and sank in silence beside the Rio Colorado.

"I dragged together a great pile of driftwood and built a roaring fire upon the soft, white sand, for there must be no catching cold in that arm. In half an hour I moved the fire, scooped a hollow in the dry and heated sand, rolled our one blanket about Shadow [Lummis's dog, a greyhound] and myself, and raked the sand up about us to the neck. And there we slept, beside the turbid river, whose hoarse growl filled the night, and under the oppressive shadow of the grim cliffs, whose flat tops were more than a mile above our heads.

"I shall not attempt to describe the Grand Cañon of the Colorado, for language cannot touch that utmost wonder of creation. There is but one thing to say: 'There it is; go see it for yourself.' • • • Before daybreak next morning we were up and climbing one of the rugged terraced walls of a vast butte to get the view from its crest. It was a toilsome and painful climb to me, thanks to the arm, and at the easiest points it is no easy task for any one; but the reward of that groaning, sore, skyward mile lay at the top. From that dizzy lookout I could see a hundred miles of the stupendous workshop of the Colorado—that ineffable wilderness of flat-topped buttes threaded by the windings of the vast cleft.

"The descent was ten times worse than the ascent—more difficult, more dangerous, and more painful. Once I backed over a little ledge, and reaching down my foot found nothing below. A startled glance over my shoulder showed a narrow cleft fifty feet deep just below me! I had not seen it in my look from farther along the ledge, whence only the shelf which the gully split was visible. It was a trying situation. I was too tired to do the old college-day trick of 'chinning' by one hand, and besides, that hand had a very different hold from a smooth horizontal bar or flying ring. The cleft was seven or eight feet wide, and about ten feet below me. I saw with the first trial that there was no getting back to the top of my ledge. My right arm was almost at full length to hold by the edge, and my feet were in a horizontal crack which admitted them two or three inches into the cliff. It required the utmost caution to keep my slung left arm from being squeezed against the rock, and such a squeeze would have made me faint with agony and fall. There were but two courses,—to try to jump so as to land on the side of the cleft, or to hang on till exhausted, and then drop to sure death. It did not take long to choose or decide upon the necessary precautions. It was a very doubtful undertaking,—to spring backward and sidewise from such a foothold, fall ten feet, and gain four laterally. The edge of the cleft was nearer my right hand by several feet, but I could not jump to the right, as you may readily see by placing yourself in a similar attitude, because that clinging arm was in the way. I was tired, more with pain than with exertion, and needed every bit

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

of strength and agility for that supreme effort. I shifted my feet into an easier position, loosened my hand clutch for a moment, and even hung my upper teeth upon a point of rock to ease my legs a few pounds. For a moment so, and then with a desperate breath I thrust my whole life into a frantic effort, and sprang backwards out into the air.

"If the Colorado Cañon ran all its seven hundred miles through cliffs of solid gold, I would not make that jump again for the whole of it; but now that it is all over, I am glad to have done it, for the sake of the experience, just as I am glad of a great many other things which were unspeakably fearful in their time. It was a well-judged jump, and it needed my best. I landed upon my back on the outer edge of the shelf, whence a push would have rolled me half a mile, unless one of those vicious pointed jags below had stopped me long enough to cut me in twain, and with my feet hanging over the brink of the cleft. Shadow had found an easy way, and joined me in a moment. Of course the heavy fall was unspeakable torture to the broken arm, and for some hours I lay there sick and faint in the blistering sun before there was strength in me to continue the descent. You may be very sure that I backed over no more ledges without a full knowledge of how the bottom was to be reached, and that it was a great relief to stand again in the fantastic wash of Diamond Creek.

"When we had done so much exploring as was possible in my crippled condition, and on the short rations I had been able to bring, we started back to Peach Springs, and arrived after a tiresome but uneventful walk, marked only by Shadow's first introduction to a rattlesnake. In all our trip together it had been weather too wintry for the snakes to emerge from their holes; but in this tropical valley we found a very large one that day. Shadow's fearlessness in 'tackling' any and all foes had been sheer impudent ignorance, and I was glad to find that there was one creature which he instinctively feared. His whole back was a-bristle, and his growls were fairly startling in their unaccustomed intensity; but he could not be persuaded to come near that ugly coil even when the snake was killed."

[Shortly later in the trip, on the desert, Shadow died after going mad (rabies?).]

Nordenskiöld, Gustaf

- 337 1892 Från fjärran västern : minnen från Amerika. Stockholm: P. A. Norstedt och Söners Förlag, 115 pp. [In Swedish.] [Library of Congress catalog adds notation: "Appeared originally in Stockholms dagblad. cf. Förord."; i.e., serialized in the Stockholm Daily.] (transl. 'From the Far West; memories from America')

Gustaf Nordenskiöld is best known as the Swedish scholar who was the first to scientifically study the archaeological sites at Mesa Verde. His 1891 visit to Grand Canyon, with two others, Al and Rob, is an unusual one, in that they reached it from the Hopi Mesas. From the Little Colorado River they were guided by an "old Mormon" down to the Colorado River on what must be the Hance Trail, although they were not Hance's guests, and only after the trip to the river did they spend a winter night at Hance's untended cabin. It is further unusual in that, despite the length of his narrative, he devotes no space to the canyon's overwhelming scenery (except a second-hand introductory paragraph), describing only the group's travels and travails. This publication seems never to have been translated. He begins his Grand Canyon exploit in Chapter VI, "Till Grand Cañon" ('To the Grand Canyon'), pp. 47-65.

"Intet gläder en amerikan så mycket som att höra, att något i hans land är »finest in the world» . Om Grand Cañon säga de, och det med rätta, att det är det största och djupaste svalg, som finnes på jorden, så stort, att man skulle kunna stoppa dit alla Europas Alper, utan att det skulle fyllas: »It beats any thing of that kind in the world.» • • •

"Vi hade Moki-byarna två dagsresor bakom oss och hade nyss uppnått några af mormoner anlagda nybyggen, civilisationens yttersta utposter från söder. Våra hästar voro uttröttade och behöfde hvila, innan vi anträdde färden till den några dagsresor väster ut belägna Coloradofloden. Vi dröjde därför några dagar hos mormonerna. Det var i ortens handelsbod vi förnyade bekantskapen med hvita män; indianer hade under en tid utgjort vårt enda umgänge. I en öfvergifven trång och halfmörk indiansk wigwam residerade handelsmannen bakom en smal disk och inklämd mellan höga varupackor, på hvilka öfrerst lågo en revolver och ett winchestergevär.

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

”Sedan vi avslutat våra proviantinköp, språkades en stund om dagens händelser, om indianer, hästtjufvar o. s. v. Därpå förde vi samtalet in på Grand Cañon och den bästa vägen dit. »Känner ni vägen dit?» frågade handelsmannen. »Nej, men vi ämna gå norr ut till Lee's Ferry och där gå öfver Colorado samt följa flodens norra sida». »Känner ni vattenhålerna och källorna? De äro svåra att finna.» »Nej, men vi ha en karta.» Så framtog kartan men visade sig alldeles otillförlitlig. Nu blandade sig en annan person i samtalet, en gråhårig axelbred gubbe, som hittills stått tyst vid disken, blossande på en mexikansk cigarett. Han frågade efter ändamålet med vart besök till Lee's Ferry, och då vi svarade, att vi blott ville se Grand cañon [sic], sade han, att han kände en mycket kortare väg dit och äfven kunde föra oss med våra packhästar ända ned till cañons botten och, om vi ville det, upp på andra sidan. •••••”

The next dozen pages are devoted to the journey across the Little Colorado River, where while waiting to meet the "old Mormon" who served as a guide, a few days were spent in exploring the area around the Little Colorado River, including its gorge, followed by a description of the ascent toward the South Rim of Grand Canyon. It is not immediately obvious, but the description of things indicates that they descended the Hance Trail before retreating to Hance's untended cabin.

”Vi hade kommit högt upp bland bergen och öfverskriqit den undre gränsen för de stora barrträdens region. Det kändes välgörande efter flera veckors färder genom ökenartade trakter att åter höra barrskogens sus öfver sitt hnfvud. Men ridten genom skogen varar ej länge. Plötsligt vid en krökning af stigen öppnar sig för våra blickar ett storartadt panorama. Vi stå vid cañons rand, och så långt ögat når, synes intet annat än brant efter brant terrassformigt höjande sig på bada sidor af en smal silfverstrimma djupt under oss. Slåta klippväggar af mörkröd sandsten, tusentals fot höga, nedanför dem väldiga stenras. Här och där ett klipputsprång lösrückt från bergväggen och danadt till en jättelik pelare.

”Den glesa busk- och örtvegetationen, som klängt sig fast här och där i bergskrefvorna och bland de lösa klippblocken, förmår ej gifva någon omväxling åt landskapet och bilda ett afbrott mot den blodröda sandstenen. Röda klippväggar och blå himmel, se där de enda färgerna i detta egendomliga landskap, som bär en prägel på samma gång af dyster ödslighet och imponerande majestät.

”Vi stiga af våra hästar, och nedstigandet börjar. Det går först i sicksack utför en lång brant backe, där klipporna rasat och tillåtit anläggning af en väg. Vi sänka oss hastigt och äro redan 1500 fot nedanför platån. Jag börjar redan tro, att vår vägvisare öfrerdrifvit svårigheterna vid nedstigandet. Men då slänges vägen plötsligt af ett bråddjup. Vi måste vika af till vänster, och nu går det i stället uppför. Vi förlora på detta sätt minst 500 af de 1500 fot vi tillryggalagt nedåt. Därefter går det åter nedåt, så oafbrutet än uppåt än nedåt på en sträcka af 10 kilometer, hvarunder vi kringgå en vid, halfcirkelformig brant. Under hela denna ytterst ansträngande vandring ha vi ej kommit en fot längre nedåt, och Colorado syntes alltjämt som ett smalt silfverglittrande band. Det börjar redan skymma. Vår 65-årige vägvisare slår sig ned för att hvila, kokar en kopp te med de sista dropparna i vattenkantin och äter en brödbit. Vi drifva på våra hästar och fortsätta för att hinna så långt som möjligt före mörkrets inbrott. Ändtligen bär det åter nedåt, men stigen blir redan i halfmörkret svår att följa. Vi upphinnas efter en stund af vår gamle vägvisare. Det är nu nästan fullstär.digt mörkt. Branterna synas ännu högre, bråddjupen, vid hvilka stigen slingrar sig fram, ännu djupare och hemskare. Vi följde en afsats med en klippvägg till vänster och ett bråddjup till höger. Främst drefvos fem hästar, efter dem kom jag, sist mina båda kamrater och vår gamle vägvisare med sina hästar. Plötsligt hör jag bakom mig ett rop: »Vänd åt höger!» För sent. Hästarna ha redan följt afsatsen vidare. Ett försök att springande genskjuta dem misslyckas. Afsatsen smalnar af hastigt. I stället för att vända om störta de skrämde djuren vidare bland stenar och snår. Där ser jag redan en af dem i ett ras af stenblock åka utför ned mot branten. Jag anser den förlorad, men i sista ögonblicket får den åter fast mark under fötterna. Nu kommer Rob med revolvern i hand, rusande efter hästarna, och försvinner efter dem i mörkret. Snart ser jag dem alla utom en komma rusande tillbaka i vild fart. Vid det smalaste stället på afsatsen lyckas vi hejda dem. Endast en i sänder kan komma fram: eljest skulle de tränga hvarandra ned i djupet. Men den sista är alltjämt borta. En blixtnögen bryter mörkret och följes af en knall, som mäktigt genljuder i branterna. Där kommer en häst i vildaste galopp skrämde af skottet rusande tillbaka efter de andra. Det var ej lätt att få bukt på våra skrämde hästar, sedan vi lyckats samla dem. När vi väl fått dem in på rätt väg, bär det i väg nedåt, alltjämt nedåt, så att man till sist tror, att det aldrig skall taga slut. Det är nio timmar sedan vi lämnade platån där uppe. Men nu börjar också slutningen att bli mindre, älfvens brus blir allt tydligare. De törstiga hästarna lyssna och påskynda sina steg.

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

"Där framför oss mellan några stora stenar glänser något genom dunklet. Det är Coloradoflodens vatten. Hur skönt att få lägga sig ned raklång på stranden och i långa drag dricka det friska härliga vattnet!

"Vi hade nått vårt mål; vi voro i botten af Grand Cañon, världens djupaste klyfta[.]"

The story immediately continues in Chapter VII, "Hemfärden från Grand Cañon" ('The journey home from Grand Canyon'), pp. 65-83:

"—Well, Capitano! Hur tänker ni, att vi ska komma ut ur detta fördömda håll, dit ni har fört oss?"

"—Samma väg som vi kommo naturligtvis.

"—Men vi ha minst 300 mil till Mancos?"

"—Nå?"

"—Vår proviant är nästan slut.

"—Vi ha mjöl och kaffe kvar.

"—Silfret är slut.

"—På två dollars när.

"—Och vår kredit?"

"—Lika med noll. Om vi också komme till en indiansk handelsbod, skulle man icke känna oss.

"—Och hästarna slutligen alldeles förbi, nästan utan mat i flera dagar. Jag önskar sannerligen vi vore hemma igu.

"—Vi få försöka med byteshandel. Ett af gevären kanske? Eller en af våra hästar?"

"—Dem få vi inte en cent för.

"—Försök att handla med den gamle mormonen; han tycktes just ej ha öfverflöd af ädla hästar på sin ranch.

"Så ungefär föllo orden mellan mig och Al tidigt samma morgon som vi ämnade börja den besvärliga uppklättringen ur Grand Cañon för att därefter anträda hemfärden till Mancos.

"Den, som sett oss, när vi började vår färd, skulle ej mer känt igen oss. Då trenne snyggt, för att icke säga elegant, klädda ryttare ridande lifliga hästar, som skeno af välmåga och togo minsta förevändning att sätta af i de galnaste språng. Nu efter en månads ridt genom vildmarkerna tre trasiga figurer, ridande de magraste ök. De hvassa klipporna vid nedstigandet i Cañon hade fullständigt slitit ut våra skodon. Al hade måst skära sönder sin ena sadelgjord och hade däraf skurit sig ett par sulor, som han sedan med skinnremmar fäste vid resterna af skodonen. De spår, som denna nya skobeklädnad kvarlämnade i sanden, skulle hafva varit en gåta för den skarpsinnigaste indian. Mina stöflar voro föga bättre än Als, och många timmar om aftonen vid lägerelden använde jag att experimentera i skomakaryrket med det resultat, att jag fann, att äfven en skomakare har åtskilligt att inhämta, innan han blir mästare i sitt yrke. I stil med skodonen var den öfriga dräkten: bara trasor. Hvad som gjorde våra missöden ännu kännbarare var, att det redan började lida långt in på vintern. Där uppe på slätten 5000 fot ofvanför oss snöade det, ehuru nederbörden här nere vid Coloradofloden föll som regn. Denna nederbörd var oss dock till stort gagn, ty nu kunde vi hoppas att äfven uppe på platån finna vatten.

"Det var middag, när vi voro färdiga att börja uppstigandet. Det hade vållat någon tidspiltan att finna hästarna, som gått ganska långt, förgäfves sökande efter bete på de nästan blott med kaktus bevuxna backarna vid floden. När allt är klart, stiga vi i sadeln, ty ett litet stycke närmast floden kunna vi rida. Men detta nöje är snart slut; det börjar Lära brant uppåt. Den gamle mormonen, vår vägvisare, stiger af sin lilla mulåsna.

"Vägen blir brantare. Vi stiga alla ur sadeln. Den gamle mormonen låter sin lilla mulåsna gå först, griper ett kraftigt tag i djurets svans och låter så bogsera sig uppåt. Hans stora järnsporre klirrar taktmässigt för hvarje steg. Blir vägen någon gång mindre brant, så ger han signal åt sin trogna åsna med ett ryck i dess svans. Genast stannar det lydiga djuret, den gamle tar några steg framåt, sätter foten i stigbygel och slänger det högra benet öfver sadeln. Sporren låter känna sin uppmuntrande verkan, och det går litet fortare fram ända till nästa brant. Vi andra gå hela vägen till fots; också blifva tillfällena att rida allt sällsyntare. Snart ha vi nått den plats, där vid nedstigandet om natten våra hästar skenade. Vi kunde nu öfvertyga oss om att, om ej mulåsnan, som rullade ned mot bråddjupet, i sista stund fått fotfäste, det knappast hade lönat sig att ens leta efter några rester af packningen nedanför branten.

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

”Det är förfärligt ansträngande att vandra oafbrutet uppåt. Ofta stanna vi en stund för att hämta andan. Några tusen fot ha vi redan under oss, men ännu återstår det värsta, en milslång krok rundt en halvcirkelformig brant, där vägen går utan afbrott än brant uppåt, än brant nedåt. Dock, vi ha beslutat att blott tillryggalägga halfva vägen i dag. Det har snöat här uppe, och vi böra enligt vår vägvisare finna vatten i några hålor i klippan. Vi ha dock långt kvar till denna plats, då det börjar mörkna. Floden, silfverstrimman där nere mellan de dystra klipporna, har länge sedan förbleknat. Allt högre stiga skuggorna på cañons branter. Vi vandra redan i djup skymning. Endast de släta, mörkröda sandsstensväggarna längst upp bada i intensivt solljus och sprida öfver omgifningen ett egendomligt rödt skimmer, som småningom förlorar sig nedåt i cañons nattsvarta mörker. Men den lysande ytan där uppe blir allt mindre. Snart är allt insvept i ogenomträngligt mörker.

”Ännu ha vi ej nått den plats, där vatten borde finnas. Mormonens mulåsa är den enda, som kan se vägen, och den får därför gå först. Plötsligt tycker jag mig se något glänsa nästan rakt nedanför oss. Jag ropar åt kamraterna; vi komma öfverens om att det ser ut, som om där finnes några små vattenpölar. Jag klättrar ned, trefvar med min hand i mörkret och känner den hala kalla ytan af en isbit. Upptäckten meddelas åt kamraterna, vi bestämma oss för att slå läger i närheten; platsen är snart utsedd, hästarna befriades från sina packningar. Al tar tvenne pytsar och går för att hämta vatten. Vi känna oss alla belåtna i tanke på en dryck vatten och en nödortfödig kvällsvard att stilla vår hunger. Där kommer han redan tillbaka, men, hvilken misräkning, pytsarna äro tomma. Det hade ej funnits en droppe vatten. Jag kunde dock ej misstaga mig, jag hade känt is med min hand. Jag var på sätt och vis ansvarig för att vi lägrat på denna plats och ej fortsatt längre bort, där vatten med säkerhet skulle finnas. Jag ville därför själf öfvertyga mig om anledningen till att jag trott mig upptäcka vatten, gick därför till stället, fann mycket riktigt is, men ej mer än som bekvämt kunde stoppas i västfickan. De öfriga vattenhål, som jag trott mig se, voro tomma. Ännu återstod dock en utväg att få vatten till kvällsvarden. Al fick af mormonen anvisning om de längre bort belägna vattenhål, dit vi ursprungligen ämnat oss. Han tog å nyo pytsarna och försvann i mörkret. För andra människor skulle det varit omöjligt att se något i den becksvarta natten, men Al hade mången gång gjort underverk, när det gällde att spana upp något vattenhål. Efter en lång väntan hördes plötsligt några höga rop i en helt annan riktning än den, hvarifrån vi väntade Al, och kort därpå skymtade en gestalt, som, klättrande öfver klippor och genom täta snår, skickligt balanserade tvenne vattenpytsar. Al hade funnit vattnet men på återvägen gått vilse och länge irrat ikring i mörkret, innan skenet af vår lägereld ledde honom på rätt väg.

”Ännu ha vi ej nått den plats, där vatten borde finnas. Mormonens mulåsa är den enda, som kan se vägen, och den får därför gå först. Plötsligt tycker jag mig se något glänsa nästan rakt nedanför oss. Jag ropar åt kamraterna; vi komma öfverens om att det ser ut, som om där finnes några små vattenpölar. Jag klättrar ned, trefvar med min hand i mörkret och känner den hala kalla ytan af en isbit. Upptäckten meddelas åt kamraterna, vi bestämma oss för att slå läger i närheten; platsen är snart utsedd, hästarna befriades från sina packningar. Al tar tvenne pytsar och går för att hämta vatten. Vi känna oss alla belåtna i tanke på en dryck vatten och en nödortfödig kvällsvard att stilla vår hunger. Där kommer han redan tillbaka, men, hvilken misräkning, pytsarna äro tomma. Det hade ej funnits en droppe vatten. Jag kunde dock ej misstaga mig, jag hade känt is med min hand. Jag var på sätt och vis ansvarig för att vi lägrat på denna plats och ej fortsatt längre bort, där vatten med säkerhet skulle finnas. Jag ville därför själf öfvertyga mig om anledningen till att jag trott mig upptäcka vatten, gick därför till stället, fann mycket riktigt is, men ej mer än som bekvämt kunde stoppas i västfickan. De öfriga vattenhål, som jag trott mig se, voro tomma. Ännu återstod dock en utväg att få vatten till kvällsvarden. Al fick af mormonen anvisning om de längre bort belägna vattenhål, dit vi ursprungligen ämnat oss. Han tog å nyo pytsarna och försvann i mörkret. För andra människor skulle det varit omöjligt att se något i den becksvarta natten, men Al hade mången gång gjort underverk, när det gällde att spana upp något vattenhål. Efter en lång väntan hördes plötsligt några höga rop i en helt annan riktning än den, hvarifrån vi väntade Al, och kort därpå skymtade en gestalt, som, klättrande öfver klippor och genom täta snår, skickligt balanserade tvenne vattenpytsar. Al hade funnit vattnet men på återvägen gått vilse och länge irrat ikring i mörkret, innan skenet af vår lägereld ledde honom på rätt väg.

”En kvällsvard följde nu, bestående af en kopp vatten och ett stycke ojäst bröd, kanske något knapphändig efter dagens ansträngningar. Al gaf mig den glädjande nyheten, att han lyckats uppgöra med »the old gent», att vi skulle förses med proviant för hemresan, när vi nådde hans ranch mot ersättning af en af våra hästar.

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

Denna häst var en förträfflig liten indianpony, som blott hade det öfvergående felet att ha utslitna hofvar. Vi hoppades således få bättre dagar i en framtid.

"Följande morgon efter en i hast intagen frukost enligt samma något enkla matsedel, fortsattes vandringen uppåt. Vid middagen hade vi blott den sista 1000 fot höga branten kvar, och fram på eftermiddagen nådde vi platån, utmattade, andtmtna och genomdränkta af svett. Där nere hade varit sommar, här uppe var iskall vinter. Tjocka drifvor täckte marken, och en bitande vind jagade framför sig yrande moln af snö genom den glesa skogen. Vi stego i sadeln, varma och svettiga, men det dröjde ej länge, innan vi skakade af köld. Fötterna kändes som isklumpar. Snö trängde in genom våra trasiga kläder och genomdränkte dem med isvatten. Nu hade vi sannerligen vatten öfvernog. Med sombreron neddragen öfver ansiktet, tänderna sammanbitna, händerna i fickorna och armbågarna tryckta till sidorna jagade vi fram allt hvad våra uttröttade hä!tar förmådde bära oss genom den hvinande snöstormen. Fem (engelska) mil är det blott till den öfvergifna timmerkoja, där vi sist redo förbi, och dessa fem mil förefalla som femtio. Ändtligen, hurra, där skymtar stugan. Ved, bränsle framför allt måste genast anskaffas. Några buskar ryckas upp under snön, ett par stora stockar släpas in i stugan. Det är svårt att med de stela fingrarna gräfva fram strykstickorna ur fickan, ännu svårare att få eld på den fuktiga veden. Men när alla dessa svårigheter öfvervunnits, hur härlig är ej den väldiga brasan! Alla mödor och ansträngningar äro genast glömda. Vi välsigna den man, som fick den besynnerliga ideen att bygga en timmerstuga midt i ödemarken. Vi känna oss öfverlyckliga att få värma våra frusna leder och stilla en glupande hunger med några usla brödbitar. Äter är den gamle mormonen i sitt kära Kalifornien, åter skildrar han sina grufvor med deras drömda outtömliga rikedomar.

"På morgonen går den sista resten af brödet; all proviant är slut. Vi ha ännu två dagsresor till mormonens gård men hoppas att finna indianer på vägen. Den första dagens ridt förde oss också till ett indianläger vid lilla Colorado. • • • "

(translation)

He begins in Chapter VI, "Till Grand Cañon" ('To the Grand Canyon'), pp. 47-65.

'Nothing pleases an American so much as to hear that something in his country is 'finest in the world.' Of the Grand Canyon they say, and rightly so, that it is the largest and deepest gorge on earth, so large that one could put there all of Europe's Alps without it being filled: "It beats any thing of that kind in the world." • • •

'We had the Moki villages two days' journey behind us and had just reached some of the Mormon settlements, the outermost outposts of civilization from the south. Our horses were exhausted and needed to rest, before embarking on the journey to the Colorado River, a few days' journey west. So we stayed a few days with the Mormons. It was in the local shop that we renewed our acquaintance with white men; Indians had for some time been our only companionship. In an abandoned narrow and half-dark Native American wigwam, the merchant resided behind a narrow counter and sandwiched between tall packages of goods, on which at the top lay a revolver and a Winchester rifle.

'After we finished our grocery shopping, we talked for a while about the day's events, about Indians, horse thieves, etc., etc. Then we brought the conversation into the Grand Cañon and the best way there. "Do you know the way there?" asked the merchant. "No, but we intend to go north to Lee's Ferry and there go over the Colorado and follow the north side of the river." "Do you know the water holes and the springs? They are hard to find." "No, but we have a map." The map was produced but turned out to be completely unreliable. Now another person got involved in the conversation, a gray-haired, broad-shouldered old man, who had hitherto stood quietly at the counter, smoking a Mexican cigarette. He asked about the purpose of each visit to Lee's Ferry, and when we replied that we only wanted to see the Grand Canyon, he said that he knew a much shorter way there and could even take us with our pack horses all the way down to the canyon's bottom and, if we wanted to, up on the other side. • • • • •'

[The next dozen pages are devoted to the journey across the Little Colorado River, where while waiting to meet the "old Mormon" who served as a guide, a few days were spent in exploring the area around the Little Colorado River, including its gorge, followed by a description of the ascent toward the South Rim of Grand Canyon. It is not immediately obvious, but the description of things indicates that they descended the Hance Trail before retreating to Hance's untended cabin.]

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

`We had come high up in the mountains and crossed the lower limit of the large coniferous region. It felt beneficial after several weeks of traveling through desert areas to once again hear the rustling of the coniferous forest overhead. But the ride through the forest does not last long. Suddenly at a bend in the path, a magnificent panorama opens up before our eyes. We stand at the edge of the canyon, and as far as the eye can see, nothing but steep after steep terrace-shaped rises on both sides of a narrow strip of silver deep below us. Smooth rock walls of dark red sandstone, thousands of feet high, below them huge rock falls. Here and there a rock outcrop detached from the rock wall and formed into a giant pillar.

`The sparse shrub and herb vegetation, which clings here and there in the rock crevices and among the loose boulders, is unable to give any change to the landscape and form a break against the blood-red sandstone. Red rock walls and blue skies, see there the only colors in this peculiar landscape, which bear a mark at the same time of gloomy desolation and impressive majesty.

`We get off our horses, and the descent begins. It first goes in a zigzag down a long steep hill, where the rocks have collapsed and allowed the construction of a road. We descend rapidly and are already 1500 feet below the plateau. I am already beginning to believe that our guide has exaggerated the difficulties of the descent. But then the road is suddenly blocked by an abyss. We have to turn left, and now it's going uphill instead. We lose in this way at least 500 of the 1500 feet we traveled downhill. Then it goes down again, uninterruptedly up and down on a stretch of 10 kilometers, during which we bypass a wide, semicircular slope. During all this extremely strenuous hiking we have not come a foot further down, and the Colorado still seemed like a narrow silver glittering band. It's already starting to get dark. Our 65-year-old guide settles down to rest, makes a cup of tea with the last drops in the water canteen and eats a piece of bread. We drive our horses and continue to catch up as far as possible before dark. Finally it carries down again, but the path becomes difficult to follow already in the semi-darkness. We are caught up to after a while by our old guide. It is now almost completely dark. The slopes are even higher, the abysmal depths at which the path winds its way, even deeper and scarier. We followed a ledge with a rock wall to the left and an abyss to the right. Five horses were mainly driven, after them I came, finally my two comrades and our old guide with his horses. Suddenly I hear a shout behind me: "Turn right!" Too late. The horses have already followed the ledge further. An attempt to shoot them back fails. The ledge narrows rapidly. Instead of turning around, the frightened animals continue to plunge among rocks and thickets. There I already see one of them in a race of boulders going downhill, down the precipice. I consider it lost, but at the last moment it gets solid ground under its feet again. Now Rob comes with the revolver in hand, rushing after the horses, and disappears after them in the dark. Soon I see them all except one coming rushing back at wild speed. At the narrowest point on the ledge we manage to stop them. Only one at a time can emerge: otherwise they would throw each other into the depths. But the last one is still gone. Lightning breaks through the darkness and is followed by a bang, which resounds powerfully in the slopes. There comes a horse in the wildest gallop, frightened by the shot, rushing back after the others. It was not easy to calm our frightened horses after we managed to collect them. Once we had them on the right path, it carries on its way down, still down, so that one finally believes that it will never end. It's been nine hours since we left the plateau up there. But now the slope is also starting to get smaller, the river's noise is becoming clearer. The thirsty horses listen and speed up their steps.

`There in front of us between some large stones something shines through the darkness. It's the waters of the Colorado River. How nice to be able to lie down straight on the beach and drink the fresh, wonderful water for a long time!

`We had reached our goal; we were at the bottom of the Grand Canyon, the world's deepest gorge[.]'

The story immediately continues in Chapter VII, "Hemfärden från Grand Cañon" ('The journey home from Grand Canyon') (pp. 66-83):

``Well, Capitano! How do you think we're going to get out of this damned hole you're led to?"

``The same way we came, of course."

``But [don't] we have at least 300 miles to Mancos?"

``Well?"

``Our provisions are almost gone."

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

“We have flour and coffee left.”

“The silver is gone.”

“With two dollars.”

“And our credit?”

“Equal with zero. If we also came to a Native American trading post, you would not know us.”

“And the horses have gone almost without food for several days. I really wish we were home again.”

“We may try barter. One of the rifles maybe? Or one of our horses?”

“We do not get a cent for them.”

“Try to deal with the old Mormon; he just did not seem to have an abundance of noble horses on his ranch.”

So roughly the words fell between me and Al early that morning as we were about to begin the awkward climb up from the Grand Canyon and then embark on the journey home to Mancos.

The one who saw us, when we began our journey, would no longer recognize us. Then three handsome, if not elegantly dressed riders rode lively horses, which shone with prosperity and took the slightest pretext to set off in the craziest leaps. Now, after a month's ride through the wilderness, three broken figures, riding the leanest beasts. The sharp cliffs on the descent into Canyon had completely worn out our footwear. Al had had to cut one of his saddle belts and had cut a couple of soles from it, which he then fastened to the remains of the footwear with leather straps. The traces left by this new shoe cover in the sand would have been a mystery to the most astute Indian. My boots were little better than Al's, and I spent many hours in the evening by the campfire experimenting with the shoemaking profession, with the result that I found that even a shoemaker has a lot to gain before he becomes a master in his profession. The rest of the suit was in the style of the footwear: only rags. What made our mishaps even more palpable was that it was already beginning to suffer the winter. Up on the plain 5,000 feet above us, it was snowing, though down here on the Colorado River was falling like rain. This precipitation was of great benefit to us, however, for now we could hope to find water up on the plateau as well.

It was dinner, when we were ready to begin the ascent. It had been a waste of time to find the horses, which had gone quite a long way, searching in vain for pasture on the almost only cactus-covered slopes by the river. When everything is ready, we get on the saddle, because we can ride a little bit closer to the river. But this pleasure is soon over; it starts going steeply upwards. The old Mormon, our guide, rises from his little mule.

The road becomes steeper. We all get out of the saddle. The old Mormon lets his little mule go first, grabs a strong grip on the animal's tail and then lets himself be towed upwards. His big iron spur jingles rhythmically with each step. If the road ever becomes less steep, he gives a signal to his faithful donkey with a jerk in its tail. Immediately the obedient animal stops, the old man takes a few steps forward, puts his foot in the stirrup and throws his right leg over the saddle. The spur shows its encouraging effect, and it goes a little faster until the next steep stretch. The rest of us walk all the way on foot; the opportunities to ride are increasingly rare. Soon we reached the place where, at the descent at night, our horses had been galloping. We could now convince ourselves that, if not for the mule which rolled down to the abyss, gaining a foothold at the last moment, it would hardly have been worthwhile to even look for any remnants of the pack below the precipice.

It is terribly strenuous to hike incessantly. We often stop for a moment to catch our breath. We already have a few thousand feet below us, but the worst remains, a mile-long loop around a semicircular slope, where the road goes without interruption steeply upwards, steeply downwards. However, we have decided to cover only halfway today. It has been snowing up here, and according to our guide we should find water in some holes in the rock. However, we have a long way to go to this place, as it starts to get dark. The river, the silver strip down there between the gloomy cliffs, has long since faded. The shadows rise higher and higher on the slopes of the canyon. We are already hiking in deep twilight. Only the smooth, dark red sandstone walls at the top are bathed in intense sunlight and spread over the surroundings a peculiar red shimmer, which eventually gets lost in the canyon's night black darkness. But the luminous surface up there is getting smaller. Soon everything is shrouded in impenetrable darkness.

We had not yet reached the place where water should be. The Mormon mule is the only one who can see the way, and it must therefore go first. Suddenly I think I see something shining almost directly below us. I

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

shout to my comrades; we agree that it looks as if there were some small pools of water. I climb down, stumble with my hand in the dark and feel the slippery cold surface of an ice cube. The discovery is announced to the comrades, we decide to camp nearby; the place is soon designated, the horses were freed from their packs. Al takes two buckets and goes to fetch water. We all feel satisfied given a drink of water and a needy supper to satisfy our hunger. He's already back, but, what a miscalculation, the buckets are empty. There had not been a drop of water. However, I could not make a mistake, I had felt ice with my hand. I was in a way responsible for the fact that we camped at this place and not further away, where water would certainly be available. I therefore wanted to convince myself of the reason why I thought I was discovering water, so I went to the place, found a lot of real ice, but no more than could be conveniently put in my vest pocket. The other water holes, which I thought I saw, were empty. However, there was still a way out to get water for the evening service. Al was instructed by the Mormon about the water caves farther away, where we had originally intended. He took the buckets again and disappeared into the darkness. For other people it would have been impossible to see anything in the pitch black night, but Al had often done wonders when it came to scouting a water hole. After a long wait, suddenly some loud shouts were heard in a completely different direction than the one from which we were expecting Al, and shortly afterwards a figure loomed, who, climbing over cliffs and through dense thickets, skilfully balanced two buckets. Al had found the water but on the way back got lost and wandered around in the dark for a long time, before the light of our campfire led him on the right path.

'An evening supper now followed, consisting of a cup of water and a piece of unleavened bread, perhaps a little scanty after the day's efforts. Al gave me the good news that he had succeeded in settling with "the old gent" that when we reached his ranch we would be provided with provisions for the journey home in exchange for one of our horses. This horse was an excellent little Indian pony, which only had the temporary fault of having worn out hooves. We thus hoped to have better days in the future.

'The following morning, after a hasty breakfast according to the same somewhat simple menu, the hike continued upwards. At dinner we had only the last 1000 feet high slope left, and in the afternoon we reached the plateau, exhausted, breathless and drenched in sweat. Down there had been summer, up here was icy winter. Thick drifts covered the ground, and a biting wind chased in front of it dizzying clouds of snow through the sparse forest. We got on the saddle, hot and sweaty, but it was not long before we shook from the cold. Feet felt like lumps of ice. Snow penetrated through our torn clothes and soaked them with ice water. Now we certainly had water left over. With the sombreros pulled down over our faces, our teeth clenched, our hands in our pockets and our elbows pressed to the sides, we chased forward everything our weary horses could carry us through the whining blizzard. It is only five (English) miles to the abandoned log cabin, where we were at last ready to pass, and these five miles seem like fifty. Finally, hooray, there is a glimpse of the cottage. Firewood, fuel in particular, must be procured immediately. Some bushes are pulled up from under the snow, a couple of large logs are dragged into the cottage. It is difficult with stiff fingers to dig out the andirons from the hearth, even more difficult to get fire on the damp wood. But when all these difficulties have been overcome, how glorious is the great fire! All efforts and fatigue are immediately forgotten. We bless the man who got the strange idea to build a log cabin in the middle of the wilderness. We feel overjoyed to be able to warm our frozen joints and still a voracious hunger with some lousy pieces of bread. Once more the old Mormon [ruminating, as he had done when they first met him] is in his beloved California; again he depicts his mines with their dreamed inexhaustible riches.

'In the morning the last remnant of the bread is gone; all provisions are gone. We have a trip of two more days to the Mormon farm but hope to find Indians on the way. The first day's ride also took us to an Indian camp near Little Colorado. • • • '

Tobie, Edward P.

- 338      1892      The country for which you fought. Scenes and incidents of a trip to the Pacific coast. II.—From Colorado to San Francisco. First Maine Bugle (First Maine Cavalry Association, Rockland, Maine), "Campaign II. Call 10." [i.e., 2(10)] (October): 6-28.

The article pertains to a rail trip to California. Although the author did not go to the Grand Canyon, he notes that William Wallace Bass came aboard the train at Ash Fork. The poem of which he transcribes a portion is very likely from Bass's promotional literature for Bass Camp, at Grand Canyon. He would later produce his separate booklets of Grand Canyon verse. See here pp. 10-11:

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

"We also had a visitor on the train—W. W. Bass, proprietor of the Grand Canyon stage line, who was on board for business connected with his line, and who left each one of us a poem entitled, 'The Grand Canyon of the Colorado,' a quotation from which is here given, not only as a specimen of western advertising, but because it gives an inkling of how a canyon really looks, though each one has its own peculiarities:

Now we reach the Colorado,
On its rocky walls we stand,
Gazing down in speechless wonder—
Never was a sight so grand;
Here a terrace, there a steeple,
Gilded spires of heights unknown,
Towering mountains, raging river,
All within these walls of stone;
Ever changing, never ceasing,
Light and shadow blending hues,
Granite, marble, lime and sandstone,
Forming panoramic views.
Here we find in grand succession,
Each formation, old and new.
Gracious book of information
Nature has prepared for you.
What a field for art and science;
Poet, painter, every mind,
In this wondrous work of nature
Fitting food will surely find."

Warner, Charles Dudley

339 1892 Our Italy. New York: Harper and Brothers, 226 pp.

See in "The heart of the desert", pp. 177-188, and "On the brink of the Grand Cañon.—The unique marvel of nature", pp. 189-200, which reprint from Warner (1891; see above).

Whitmell, Charles T.

340 1892 A visit to the Grand Cañon of the Colorado River, U.S.A. (With lime-light illustrations, photographs, and views). Cardiff Naturalists' Society, Report and Transactions, 24(1): 1-20, plate. ("Read on 22nd October, 1891, before the Cardiff Naturalists' Society.")

Text of a lecture based on a visit to the canyon at Peach Springs in late July, 1883. The article contains one illustration, between pp. 12/13, depicting a view at Toroweap reprinted from Dutton (1882). Includes a great deal of historical background, including material from Ives, Newberry, and Powell, and he spends a considerable amount of time describing his trip en route to, and leaving from, Peach Springs. What is transcribed here is that portion where he details his canyon visit.

"We were due at Albuquerque at 9.20 p.m. by the time-table, and, as the other train was timed to leave at 8.30, I feared I should not get forward that night. The only explanation I can give is that there was an alteration of time, due to our difference of longitude, and that the two railways keep different hours. My ticket from Albuquerque to Peach Springs cost over 37 dollars for the 465 miles, or about £8, the price per mile being thus about 4d. • • •

"The Atlantic and Pacific Railroad is at present the only one which brings tourists to the neighbourhood of the Grand Canon, and the nearest station on the line is Peach Springs, some 16 miles due south of the River. It was a very small place at the time of my visit, containing perhaps a dozen houses. I had to sleep in the railway

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

car as there was no hotel, though there was a restaurant attached to the station, and I managed afterwards to get a shake-down in the dining-room.

"Mr. Hymer, an American, had travelled by the same train as myself to Peach Springs, and we decided to visit the Great Cañon together. We found that the Buckboard—a rough conveyance—had gone with another party yesterday, so we arranged to ride. We hired two horses, but the one assigned me began to buck—a most ugly fault. The feet are planted near together, then a sudden upward spring is given with the object of dislodging the rider. Hymer, who was a much more practised horseman than myself, said he should decline to ride the animal; so another was procured, a deplorably slow beast, I am sorry to say, but free from the vice of bucking.

"Bucking, writes the late Mr. Pierrepont, is a vice peculiar to the western broncho or cayuse. Imagine the sensation of feeling a horse curl its tail and head under its legs, bow its back, shoot up into the air like a catapult, and come down stiff-legged. It is all very well for the Western professional horse-breaker, but is like dynamite to the inexperienced.

"About 1.30 p.m. we left Peach Springs for a hot and fatiguing ride of about 23 miles. After an ascent of some three miles, we descend to the Springs, four miles from the railway station. The water, pumped up by a steam engine, is conducted to the buildings at the Depot, from which in turn is brought the coal that works the engine.

"As the road is through a very thirsty country, and goes for the most part along a dry river-bed, we took canteens of water with us. We go on always descending, and passing between very lofty walls of horizontally stratified rock. As we descend it gets closer and warmer. I do not remember any breeze in this deep, and at first fairly broad, valley, which is known as New River Wash [Peach Springs Canyon]. After heavy showers it may have a little water for a short time, but usually is dry. At the pumping station, where there is, I suppose, always some water, trees of cotton-wood (a species of poplar) were growing.

"To the north are fine distant views of lofty bluffs, above and beyond the Colorado chasm. The dry cañon, along which we are going, runs from south to north, and is tributary to Diamond Creek, which is joined about a mile above the big River. The rock terraces on either side of our ravine are of very striking appearance. They consist of an alternating series of steep vertical cliffs or ledges and short slopes. Along each slope, at the foot of each cliff, is a talus of debris fringed with vegetation. The ledges are clearly of material much harder than that of the slopes.

"There is little vegetation, except cactus, and such other plants as can live in an arid climate. Cactus plants were plentiful. They are oddly-shaped weird-looking prickly shrubs. Some were very large and threw out their fantastic branches to the height of a small tree. Others were squat with enormous ovate thorny stems and leaves. Some grew up on the cliffs. The fruit, not yet ripe, tasted acid, but was not altogether unpleasant, and helped to diminish thirst.

"At places we heard the curious chirping of small frogs, and frequently saw lizards darting about our track. These lizards exhibited protective mimicry, their colour closely resembling that of the rocks over which they moved. There was little other sign of life; and, for most of the way, no sounds but those made by ourselves broke the oppressive stillness. Centipedes, scorpions, and snakes probably abound in the valley, but I did not happen to see them.

"Some distance beyond the Pumping Station we reached Middle Springs, and near here met the buck-board returning with yesterday's party. With them was Young, the man who keeps the log-shanty by the Colorado, and he turned back with us. At Middle Springs we halted awhile to water our horses. The water was muddy, warm, and swarming with life, both animal and vegetable. I could not touch it, but my companions were not so nice.

"The heat was terrible. We were under the full glare of an almost tropical sun, and nothing but the exceeding dryness of the air saved us from sunstroke. During the remaining half of our ride there is said to be only one spring, and this I do not recollect seeing.

"We go on down, down, down, descending some 3,700 feet from our starting-point, the Railway Station, altitude 4,900 feet, to the Colorado River, 1,200 feet, above the sea-level. The ravine narrows as we get further into it. For some miles, we have had in front of us Diamond River Butte [Diamond Peak], a huge pyramidal

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

horizontally stratified semi-detached rock, which, owing to the clear atmosphere, looks very much nearer than it really is.

"I was much struck with the beauty of the sunset light, lingering on lofty walls of rock behind and high above the actual sides of the valley. There was a delicate rosy tint on the distant lofty bluffs of the Colorado Cañon, the upper rock being of pale coloured grayish limestone. The tall cliffs on our right, towards the close of the day, assumed a most unearthly appearance, a kind of phosphorescent glimmering green. Darkness came on before we reached our destination, which is on Diamond Cañon Creek close to the Butte; and without Young's help we should scarcely have found our way. Wearied and hot we reached the Hut about 8.30 p.m. The temperature must have been about 90° in the shade.

"The accommodation was of a very rude description, the shanty having been ready only ten days. There were two rooms, one below the other, and furniture was conspicuous by its absence. After a meal of tinned meat we went up to the sleeping room, whose walls were of boards with wide chinks between. The ventilation was thus wonderfully good, but the heat made repose almost impossible. The night was singularly clear, and the heavens were studded with brilliant stars.

"Next day (Tuesday, 31st July), my thermometer marked 90° in the shade in the early morning. It is said that the temperature in shade sometimes reaches 120°; what then must it be in the sun?

"After breakfasting on canned beef and milkless coffee, Hymer and I set out for the Grand Cañon. As already stated, New River Wash ends in a valley called Diamond Cañon, the junction being about a mile south of the big River. Having walked a mile down Diamond Creek, we reached the Grand Cañon of the Colorado—a memorable moment, as it was the realisation of wonders of which I had read some fifteen years before.

"Here the Colorado is a swift muddy stream flowing round a sharp angle in a general north-east to south-west direction. Magnificent cliffs rise opposite to the mouth of Diamond Cañon, the creek of which joins the main River at the water level, so that this tributary ravine cannot be worn any deeper, except with the deepening of the main valley; it has reached a base-level of erosion. Some of the escarpments near this part of the big chasm are more than 3,000 feet high, and huge horizontally stratified pyramids of rock tower aloft. Looking up and down the Cañon, one sees immense precipices, rising, more or less, like stairs, and cliffs behind cliffs, the 5,000 feet contour being reached about two miles from the river. I clambered up some distance along the southwest bank below Diamond Creek. It was rough work, and the view was not much improved.

"I bathed in Diamond Creek near its mouth. The water was very shallow, but clear and fairly cool. The limpid purity of the stream, contrasted with the turbid flood of the main River, may have suggested the epithet 'Diamond.' The walls of the Big Cañon consisted of rock horizontally stratified, resting unconformably on a kind of granite, the junction being very uneven. Not unfrequently rocks of trappean character occurred I have called the foundation rock granite, but it is really, I believe, a highly metamorphosed schist.

"Dr. Newberry thus tabulates the strata shown in section by the Cañon wall at this point:—At the base, massive granite rising to 600 feet, then a series of beds of limestone shale and sandstone for about 1,600 feet, topped by 1,000 feet of coralline limestone.

"We returned to the shanty for lunch, and then, with Young as guide, I set out to explore Diamond Cañon. Hymer, tired with the heat, stayed behind. As we ascend the ravine it narrows rapidly and becomes a truly impressive gorge, prisoned in by gloomy perpendicular walls more than half a mile high, tapering into pyramids.

"Proportion is a most important element of sublimity, and the effect produced on the mind by this deep narrow tributary cañon is, in its way, quite as great as that produced by the Grand Cañon itself at this part of its course.

"We followed up the gorge for some two miles and a half, and then, under a small waterfall, I had another most refreshing bath, the water being cooler than it was lower down. I mention these personal trifles, because they illustrate the desire produced by this dry climate for moisture. The rock, almost black in colour, resembled trap, and was often veined. We returned to the log-house, and ate the dinner prepared for us by Hymer, practically a second edition of our breakfast.

"About one o'clock, in the full blaze of a burning sun, we began our return journey up New River Wash, halting at Middle Springs at 4.30. We reached Peach Springs about 8.30, as night was coming on, after a hot and fatiguing ride of some seven hours. On the way I reduced my thirst by eating the cactus or prickly pear fruit. This was about the size of a small plum, with a dark red pulp and small black seeds.

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

"Shortly after my return to England I visited the Cheddar Cliffs, and, standing under that magnificent mural precipice, was vividly reminded of the far grander scenery I have just described. But at Cheddar the highest cliff is only 450 feet, and what is this to the giant rock-escarpments along the Colorado?

"The track along New River Wash and Diamond Creek is the most convenient way of getting to the Big Cañon, and is said to be the only route by which one can really enter the Cañon on a level with the River, to reach which in other places requires a steep climb down over precipitous rocks.

"So level are some of the side terraces of the Cañon, that it has seriously been proposed to run a railway along the chasm. The distance of 1,019 miles through the cañon district would comprise only 20 miles of tunnelling, and 99 of granite-cutting.

"Unfortunately, I was not able to visit the grandest portion of the Grand Cañon. It is over 200 miles long, and the finest parts are a good deal further up the river than Diamond Creek. To reach them it is necessary to camp out for some days, and journey many miles through uninhabited country. What I saw was most impressive and awe-inspiring, but as nothing to the transcendent scenery associated with the Kaibab Plateau, the unparalleled sublimity of which will be referred to later on [in Whitmell's lecture, where he quotes Dutton]."

1893

Boston. Museum of Fine Arts

- 341 1893 Museum of Fine Arts. Print Department. Catalogue of a selection of prints, arranged chronologically to illustrate the various processes of engraving invented from the 15th to the end of the 18th century. November 25, 1893, to May 20, 1894. Boston: Alfred Mudge and Son, 65 pp.

See under "United States", p. 19, "Annin. 236. Walls of the Grand Cañon. After Thos. Moran.—'Datur Hora Quieti.'" (Latin, transl. 'An hour of quiet'.) (ENTIRE ITEM)

Burke, John M. ("Arizona John")

- 342 1893 (COMPILER; WITH THE AUTHORITY OF General W. F. Cody ("Buffalo Bill")) "Buffalo Bill" : from prairie to palace : an authentic history of the Wild West : with sketches, stories of adventure, and anecdotes of "Buffalo Bill," the hero of the plains. Chicago and New York: Rand, McNally and Co., 275 pp.

See "An Episode Since the Return From Europe" (pp. 273-275); specifically, p. 275: "[From Denver] They took the trail to the Grand Cañon of the Colorado . . . they crossed at Lee's Ferry, thence going on to the Kaibal [sic] Mountains, viewing the grandest scenery on earth . . . ." (ENTIRE NOTE)

Credner, Rudolf [Credner, Georg Rudolf]

- 343 1893 Über seine Reise nach dem Grand Canon des Colorado im Staate Arizona in Nordamerika. From: Sitzungsberichte [for 9 March 1892]. In: Mitteilungen aus der Gesellschaft. Die Vereinsjahre 1890-93. Geographischen Gesellschaft zu Greifswald, Jahresbericht, 5 [1890-1893]: 164-172. [In German.]
(transl. 'About his trip to the Grand Canyon of the Colorado River in the State of Arizona in North America.')

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

Finck, Henry T.

344 1893 The most sublime of earthly spectacles. The Nation (New York), 57(1472) (September 14): 187-188.

A visit to Hance's; item dated "Portland, Oregon, July, 1893." Includes the usual lengthy impressions of mountains swallowed up, "pagodas and Walhallas", and, of course, John Hance (without the tall tales—except maybe one—and maybe one of his own in the presence of the master):

"The superintendent of the camp told me a story of a Chinaman who was brought there as cook. He saw how people constantly came and went, staying half a week or longer, and as he could not see anything extraordinary about the tent village, he finally, at the end of his first week, asked the waiter what brought so many people to such an out-of-the-way place. The waiter promised to tell him after the dishes were washed; then he took him up the hill—only a minute's walk from the tent. Arriving at the brink, the Chinaman threw up his hands in astonishment and awe; he could not fathom the mystery, and the exclamation, "What for?" burst from his lips. Thereafter he daily sat there for an hour. • • •

"We have no standard of measurement for such cyclopean scenes. • • •

"[There is also] a sight, only a hundred feet to your right, to which I have never seen any reference, but which is more remarkable than the profile in the White Mountains, or any other rock-portrait I have ever seen—the image of a long-bearded old man with a most kindly and thoughtful expression. Every feature is perfect, and the face strikingly resembles Michael Angelo's Moses. • • •

"A student of the sublime can profitably spend a month here."

(Six years earlier, Finck had visited the canyon at Peach Springs, about which see Finck, 1887.)

Fisher, Mary Wager

345 1893 A day in the Grand Cañon. Outing, 22(4) (July): 261-264.

Diamond Creek and "Grand Cañon Hotel" (i.e., Farlee Hotel).

"To 'descend' from a railway car after an all-night's ride, at five o'clock in the morning, is to begin the day, maybe, wearily, but certainly with a sense of originality. It is like coming blindfold from elsewhere to the particular somewhere, and opening your eyes upon a perfectly fresh scene of which you have had no preliminary glimpses. At least that was the experience of 'The Three Fishers' when they alighted recently at a small collection of shanties in Arizona, that goes by the delicious name of Peach Spring—an appellation peculiarly refreshing and tantalizing in that arid region, where nothing is rarer than peaches and water. • • •

"The youngest member of the roving trio, a lad of such roseate years as to place implicit faith in railway folders and to believe in the full materialization of gorgeous advertisements, bounded, eager-eyed, on to the platform with a Young America shout, 'Where's the tallyho that's to take us into the cañon? This place doesn't look at all like the picture of it.' [see illustration farther below*] While the picture had the gorgeous gayety and 'movement' of a fashionable resort, the actual scene itself was absolutely forlorn from the standpoint of modern civilization . . . • • •

"[We were directed] to Farlee, who agreed to take us into the cañon for ten dollars each. It was twenty-three miles there and fifty back-measured by time. We could stay as long as we liked, and he would serve as guide and host, as he had a small but comfortable abiding place in the cañon, with meals at seventy-five cents. • • •

"As we sauntered back toward the station, we passed an inclosed lot which had sufficient wire stretched about it to keep two small horses from wandering away. This went by the name of 'coral,' and Farlee was just entering it, as he said, to 'catch Pop and Rowdy and hitch up.' The lad, whose curiosity anent the tallyho had in nowise abated, made bold to ask about it, when Farlee laughed and said that the coach had not yet arrived, but be hoped some day to have it drawn up at the station just as pictured in the railway folder. The slenderness of the ponies, and the actual vehicle, a rickety-looking buckboard, that a little later appeared to carry us to our destination, were enough to dissuade us from the undertaking, had it not been for Farlee himself, whose frank

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

and honest face and alert self-reliance were so assuring as to inspire confidence in his ability to extricate us from any difficulty into which we might fall by the way. • • •

"The buckboard was without cover, the sky was cloudless, the sun blazed down in full splendor, and, after the first few miles of comparatively level, dusty road, it was impossible to hold a sunshade, as both hands were required to keep one's body from being bounced off the 'tallyho.' Nothing less than the delicious air could have sustained me in that tremendous, never-to-be-forgotten ride. • • •

"As we proceeded down the cañon the way increased in roughness; my gloves were torn into tatters from efforts to hang on to the buck board. • • • Still, nothing seemed so grand and wonderful as we had expected; and we arrived at noon, after a jolting of three and a half hours, at the Grand Cañon Hotel—a rude little house, roughly boarded, but clean and comfortable, with a 'lounge' and rocking-chairs, as Farlee had said. Where the 'hotel' stood seemed to be the only building spot in the cañon, which here formed a junction with the 'Diamond Creek' and Colorado River cañons, and, in point of location and environment, it is unquestionably the most unique hotel in the country—maybe in the world. But we were too tired and too hungry to more than glance at the extraordinary sights about us. • • •

"[After "a steaming-hot dinner of canned foods"] we all started out to see the sights [of Diamond Creek], with Farlee as guide [and the next morning] we climbed to a height of 1,500 feet, to what goes by the name of Prospect Point, and from this elevation we had a 'bird's-eye view' of the wonders of the evening before. • • • The longer we looked at the cliffs, the walls, the vast rock exposure, the more they grew in magnitude. But the whole scene was one of appalling desolation. It was what one might fancy the place where the foundations of the earth were laid. On top of the 'point' was a cairn, to which each visitor must add a stone, and on the cairn was a bottle, into which each must slip his visiting-card. The lad amused himself in screeching with Farlee, to hear the echoes go banging around against the great rocks, and return again."

The long drive back up Peach Springs Canyon saw many wonders—"the Sphinx of Egypt", the "Great Chimney", the "Beehive", "Moses Striking the Rock", "Prophet at Prayer", and "Westminster Abbey".

"But, apart from all the wonderful figures and strange effects of rock outline, there was nothing more astounding than the great wall itself. • • •

"Some evenings later, as I was sitting in a hotel bed-chamber by the laddie, who was eight years old, and snugly tucked in bed, he said, with great gravity, 'Get a pencil and paper and write down, just as I say it, a poem I have composed

ON THE COLORADO RIVER

O! Mighty torrent, that flowest through the gorge!
The tops and crags of which thou hast worn through ages past,
Now are barren and sublime!
Now and then a bat fluttering through the air,
And cactus growing o'er the sides and hills.
And now and then a clump of shaggy trees,
And dainty silver-fish darting through the water;
And at sunset, some rocky point that sets aloft
Shines out like a crest of gold among the barren peaks."

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

* The "tallyho" was recalled from the letterhead of Julius Farlee's hotel and stage operation (below), which depicted a huge coach and four, festooned with festive travelers, as they dashed joyously to their destination. "Tally Ho!" is emblazoned on the side of the coach. It is obviously a printer's stock engraving, though an original source has not been identified.

(Courtesy of Shane Murphy)

Gray, Asa

346 1893 Letters of Asa Gray. Volume II. (Jane Loring Gray, ed.) Boston and New York: Houghton, Mifflin and Co. (The Riverside Press, Cambridge), pp. 369-838. [Also 1894 printing.]

See an extended, rambling letter to fellow botanist J. D. [Joseph Dalton] Hooker, dated September 26, 1884, to May 8, 1885, which includes the following entire notes relating to Grand Canyon:

Page 769: "May 4. In Farlie's Chalet hotel in the Grand Cañon of the Colorado." [Farlee Hotel, Peach Springs Canyon.]

Page 771: "Breakfast at Mohave. (I must send you a railroad map.) There took the Atlantic & Pacific Railroad, over the sandy desert to the Great Colorado at supper, to Peach Spring station at two A. M., and next morning in an easy 'buckboard wagon' twenty-two miles and 4,000 feet descent into this wonderful cañon, a piece of it, which its explorer, Major Powell, has made famous.

"This afternoon and evening we are to get up and back, and on in the night and morning to Flagstaff, and the ancient cliff dwellings." [He did not make it to the cliff dwellings (Walnut Canyon).]

Page 772: "May 8 ••• The cañon trip well repaid the journey and its rough accessories. Some of the views are those depicted by Powell. ••• From Mohave to the Colorado is very sandy and complete desert, descending eastward many hundred feet. Near Mohave lots of tree yuccas [Joshua trees], looking very like those in northern part of Mexico. From the Colorado to Peach Spring we passed in the dark, but had risen to about 6,000 feet, and we kept on an elevation of 4,000 to nearly 8,000 feet all across the rest of Arizona and New Mexico, the higher parts wooded with conifers, that is, Pinus ponderosa of the Rocky Mountains form and Juniperus."

Although Gray does not mention any botanizing at Grand Canyon in this series of correspondence, see Gray (1888), Gray's notes of "Conspicuous plants of the Grand Cañon" that he wrote in the Farlee Hotel visitors' register, May 3 [sic], 1885, as transcribed later by S. M. Tracy. Gray's western trip was in the company of Mrs. Gray. Regretfully, the guest book does not survive.

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

Ives, Halsey C.

- 347 1893 (CHIEF) World's Columbian Exposition, 1893 : official catalogue. Part X. Art galleries and annexes. Department K. Fine arts : painting, sculpture, architecture, decoration (Department of Publicity and Promotion, ed., M. P. Handy, Chief). Chicago: W. B. Conkey Co., Publishers to the World's Columbian Exposition, 141 pp.

See p. 15, under "Paintings in Oil", "284. The Inner Gorge of the Grand Cañon of the Colorado" by Samuel Colman, Newport. Not illustrated. (This listing also appears in a variant publication by Ives, p. 16 in: World's Columbian Exposition, 1893 : official catalogue. Part X. Department K. Fine arts (Department of Publicity and Promotion, ed., M. P. Handy, Chief). Chicago: W. B. Conkey Co. [sic, W. B. Conkey Co.], Publishers to the World's Columbian Exposition.)

Leland Stanford Junior University

- 348 1893 The Leland Stanford Junior University : second annual register, 1892-93. Palo Alto, California: The University.

See under "University Lecture Course", p. 114: "Major J. W. Powell, of Washington, D. C.—'The Grand Cañon of the Colorado.'" (ENTIRE NOTE) From a list of public lectures for 1892-1893. No scheduled date indicated.

Lummis, Charles F.

- 349 1893 The Grand Cañon of the Colorado. Californian Illustrated Magazine, 4(1) (June): 10-18.

Lummis prefers the canyon trip to Hance's. And his fears have been borne out.

"The opening of the new stage-line from Flagstaff has at last made the Grand Cañon of the Colorado easily accessible at its noblest point. For the first time in its history, this sublimest wonder of earth is really open to all sightseers. Before, the seeing it was at the cost of a journey uncertain, troublesome and exhausting. Now it is easy, even for women and children—as easy as I hope to see it. Far be the day when a railroad shall profane creation's masterpiece, with its infestation of the vulgar, to kill the joy of those with souls. For when a glory of nature is absolutely facile to the herd, it reeks with their inanity and is never again the same. • • •

"The Grand Cañon can be reached only from the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad and at three points. The nearest route is from Peach Springs, where the gorge is only twenty-three miles from the railroad. This route takes one to the bottom of the Cañon, via the Peach Springs and Diamond Creek Cañons, and is the route to be chosen between December and May, as it never has snow. It taps a far less noble part of the cañon than the two easterly routes, but a part still nobler than any scenery outside this wonderland. The route from Williams, whence one may also visit the wildly romantic Cataract Cañon by a ninety-mile drive, is about the same length as that from Flagstaff; and the scenery is very like. But it is a much harder road and offers no such accommodations for the traveler.

"The Flagstaff route is really the only one to be taken into consideration. It is open from May 1st to December 1st; both it and the Williams road being closed by snow during the winter. It has the best long mountain-road in the Southwest; and the trip is an easier one than that into the Yosemite. • • •

"It is one of the beauties of this route that it brings one to the greatest sight on earth almost without warning. Only once through the columnar trunks we catch a glimpse of a purple front so vast, so shadowy, so unearthly that the heart seems to stop for an instant; and as swiftly the vision is gone. • • •

"And where the Grand Cañon begins, words stop. In looking back across the years with all their blunders and follies, it is comforting to remember that at least I have never thought to describe the cañon of the Colorado. A hint, a suggestion, a faint and ridiculously inadequate comparison are all that are possible. Whoso tries more, a sense of the balance of things is not in him. • • •

"No man will ever really 'see' the Grand Cañon—it is inexhaustible, incomprehensible, endless. But it is well to see as much of it as one can. • • •

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

"Any trail which climbs over 6,500 feet in seven miles is of course warm climbing; but Hance's trail is harmless, if provocative of perspiration, and it gives an idea of the cañon which Humboldt himself could not have figured out from the rim. • • •"

"There is one Grand Cañon of the Colorado. Nothing else on earth is like it, or approaches it, or prepares for it, or suggests it. If you would see the first and the last place in the world, go to it."

- 350 1893 By stage into the cañon. In: Pen Pictures of Travel [SECTION]. Current Literature, 13(3) (July): 394.

Brief extract from Lummis's article in Californian Illustrated Magazine (above).

Moore, Robert

- 351 1893 (CHAIRMAN, EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE) Ethical Society of St. Louis : what it is and its work. St. Louis: Nixon-Jones Printing Co., 26 pp.

See p. 23, "Sunday Afternoon Popular Science Lecture Course"; list includes "March 5th—'The Grand Canon of the Colorado.' Prof. Wm. B. Potter." (ENTIRE NOTE)

Reeve, James K.

- 352 1893 The Grand Canon of the Colorado. American Agriculturist, 52(12) (December) [New Series, (563)]: cover [665], 669-670.

From the description, Reeve visited the canyon at Hance's.

"The greatest natural wonder in all the world is a vast chasm that forms a portion of the bed of the Colorado river in Utah and Arizona. I have never found any traveler of sufficient temerity to name any other work of man or of nature as being worthy of comparison with it. Being familiar with the descriptions which other travelers had given of it, I was prepared to behold a great wonder. But the imagination of a man is not equal to the task of picturing the cañon until he has actually beheld it. Mere figures are of little consequence in such matters, but it may help one's conception of it somewhat to know that this rift in the earth's surface is at one point a mile deep and twelve miles wide. • • •"

After offering geologists' descriptions of the origin of the canyon, he continues:

"That one is able to understand the process by which nature has worked does not lessen the effect of this masterpiece. What this effect is I have not yet found words to accurately describe. It seems to me that the chief impression is that of the complete insignificance of man, in the presence of nature in her loftier aspects. As one descends into the cañon this feeling deepens. The trail is long and rough, nearly four miles to compass the one of sheer descent, but every step is marked by a new wonder. • • • In places ropes must be used as there are sheer drops of forty feet, and it requires faith both in your rope and your guide.

"What one finds at the bottom of the Colorado cañon is worth the toil needed to reach it. Here is the heart of the river in its bed of beds. From the top of the gorge we had seen a little silvery stream; it is difficult now to believe that this is the same. Not more than three hundred feet wide, but with a velocity of fifteen miles an hour, it shoots forward with a violence and turmoil that rivals the Whirlpool Rapids of Niagara. There is another value to what one sees here that I appreciate, although some might not. It lies in the fact that this has been seen by so few. There is a certain satisfaction in being ahead of the rest of the world in doing and seeing things, and it may seem strange but it is true that this cañon, lying so close to a main route of our overland travel, has been visited by fewer people than have penetrated into the wilds of Africa. Until within the last twenty-five years it is probable that not more than a dozen white men had ever seen it, and even the stories that the Indians told of its existence were regarded as apochryphal [sic]. It is now easily reached, being but a day's stage journey from three different points on the Atlantic and Pacific railroad. Flagstaff is the best point of departure, as there is a regular line of stages from there to the most imposing part of the cañon. Travelers who visit the Pacific coast and who desire to see that which is best worth seeing on the way, cannot do better than to break the journey at Flagstaff and spend from three days to a week at the cañon."

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

Sheldon, W. L.

353 1893 Ethical Society, St. Louis. The Conservator (Philadelphia), 4(2) (April): 28.

Includes a simple note of a lecture in popular science given by William B. Potter: "Geology; or, the Grand Cañon of the Colorado".

Stainier, X. [Stainier, Xavier]

354 1893 A travers les États-Unis. Fin. Revue des Questions Scientifiques (Bruxelles), Series 2, 3 (January): 190-234. [In French.]
(transl. 'Across the United States. Conclusion.')

Continued from an article begun in the July 1892 issue, relating to the author's attendance at the 5th International Geological Congress that convened in Washington, D.C., in 1891. An excursion to the Rockies included a side trip (from Denver) taken by some of the geologists to visit the Grand Canyon, which is the text transcribed here (see pp. 218-231). What establishes this text as extraordinary is that it seems to be the only account of the trip to the canyon by this group of international geologists. While it is known that they encountered a storm en route, which waylaid them in a hastily convened bivouac camp, this seems to be only description of the stormy night's pause. So whereas most (ordinary) trips to reach the canyon have been omitted in this bibliography, this one is attended to with delight. Their ultimate destination was Hance's ranch on the rim. And of course, there is the description of the canyon itself—the first real overlook of the "crevasse", by a geologist, since Powell, though here as a new breed—the geologist-tourist. Regretfully, perhaps, he spends all too much time attempting to describe the forms and phases of the canyon's displays—like any other tourist. It is most disappointing, though, other than noting the presence of John Wesley Powell, no geological or archaeological remarks are recorded from him during their stay at the canyon.

[Powell had met the group in Flagstaff. Grove Karl Gilbert wrote for the Rocky Mountain excursion's guidebook (Emmons, citation follows) a geological description of the rail journey from Albuquerque to Flagstaff, concluding with the note (p. 472), "At Flagstaff the mode of travel changes; the party is conveyed by wagons and saddle horses, takes its meals out of doors, and sleeps in tents.*" ([footnote added by Gilbert in the post-expedition printing of the guidebook] "*the prophecy of 'tents' was not verified; the party bivouacked, and was so unfortunate as to encounter storms of rain, snow, and wind.") Gilbert also included in that volume a brief geological overview of the route from Flagstaff to Grand Canyon, pp. 472-473. —Samuel Franklin Emmons, ed., Geological Guide-Book for an Excursion to the Rocky Mountains, John Wiley and Sons (New York, 1894).] [See also further remarks at the end of this transcription of Stainier.]

"Il faisait nuit noire lorsque nous débarquâmes à Flagstaff, terminus de notre voyage en chemin de fer, et où allait commencer cette fois un voyage d'un nouveau genre. La transition est très brusque: il nous faut laisser là nos somptueux sleepings-cars [sic] et dining-cars pour nous lancer dans l'inconnu, coucher à la belle étoile et manger, comme on dit, de la vache enragée. Il nous reste une traite de 120 kilomètres à faire dans un pays absolument désert, dépourvu de toute subsistance, manquant presque complètement d'eau. Mais tell était l'attraction qu'exerçait sur nous le Grand-Canon que nous ne nous occupions guère de toutes ces difficultés, oubliant les obstacles devant la grandeur du but à atteindre. Une bonne partie de la matinée du lendemain se passa en préparatifs, en allées et venues pendant lesquelles nous fumes le point de mire de tous les badauds de l'endroit, et l'objet de la sollicitude de quelques Indiens Navajos qui, la cigarette à la bouche, venaient nous proposer charitablement de nous céder leurs couvertures bariolées pour la modeste somme de 100 francs. Lorsque notre caravane se mit enfin en marche dans les rues de Flagstaff, elle présentait un aspect réellement macabre. Pour conducteurs, nous avions quelques individus à la mine peu rassurante, comme on en trouve toujours dans les pays de frontières. Leurs vêtements dépennailés et les feutres rapés, quoique non pointus, qui couvraient leur tête, leur donnaient un grand air de ressemblance avec les personnages qui ont rendu célèbre la Calabre. Une partie de la bande des excursionnistes allait à cheval, le reste était entassé dans des pataches à l'aspect antédiluvien. • • •

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

"A notre tête se trouvait le major Powell, directeur du Service géologique des États-Unis, et dont le nom restera attaché à celui du Grand Canon qu'il a tant contribué à faire connaître. On sait, en effet, combien d'obstacles la nature avait accumulés, avec un soin jaloux, autour de cette merveille incomparable. ••• On comprendra donc avec quel enthousiasme nous quittâmes Flagstaff dans l'étrange équipage que l'on sait. La route, peu ou point frayée, gravit les obstacles avec un sans-gêne tout américain; aussi n'allons-nous pas vite et avons-nous le loisir voulu pour admirer le paysage qui certes en vaut la peine. •••

"Aussi fûmes-nous bientôt en pleine tourmente. Le vent, la pluie, la grêle, la tonnerre, rien ne manquait à la fête. Nos chevaux n'avançaient plus qu'avec peine et, sur ces entrefaites, l'obscurité ayant commencé à tomber, on décida de faire halte. Je n'oublierai jamais l'ahurissement qui s'empara des excursionnistes lorsque le chef-conducteur, nous montrant une sorte de terrain basaltique, nous dit: 'Voilà votre gîte!' A ce moment, les éléments faisaient rage, et, à en juger d'après la mine de certains, il y en avait plus d'un qui aurait souhaité se trouver ailleurs. Mais nous n'étions pas là dans un hôtel où, lorsqu'on est mal casé, on peut demander à changer: ici il n'y avait pas de choix possible. Aussi, après un premier moment de surprise bien explicable, tout le monde se décida à faire contre mauvaise fortune bon cœur, et bientôt la campement présenta l'aspect le plus animé. De tous les côtés on abattait les arbres à grands coups de hache, et l'on élevait d'énormes bûchers dont la flamme s'éleva bientôt, attisée par les vents et les matières résineuses. Leurs lueurs blafardes brillant de toutes parts entre les arbres éclairèrent alors le spectacle le plus étrange. Quelques géologues brandissant des poêles à frire s'improvisèrent cuisiniers, disposant avec art leurs beefsteaks et graissant leurs poêles avec du thé pour remplacer le beurre qui manquait. Ils remplirent bientôt le camp d'odeurs appétissantes. Pendant ce temps, d'autres préparaient, sous le nom de café, une mixture passablement trouble. Ajoutez à cela des tranches de jambon fumé, de solides croûtons de pain, et vous aurez une idée de notre menu. Groupés autour des feux, tous nos hommes faisaient disparaître leur portion avec un appétit à faire tressaillir dans leur tombe les mânes des trappeurs de Gustave Aymard. Le dîner achevé, il fallut songer au coucher et tâcher de tirer le meilleur part possible des deux grosses couvertures de voyage qui devaient nous tenir lieu à la fois de tente et de lit. La chose fut vite faite: chercher une place pas trop encombrée de pierres au pied d'un genévrier, s'entendre avec un camarade pour se réchauffer mutuellement et pour disposer une couverture au-dessus de nous en guise de tent, tout cela ne demanda qu'un instant. Finalement, nous enveloppant dans une couverture, après avoir chargé une dernière fois nos foyers, nous nous endormîmes malgré le vent, la pluie et le tonnerre qui faisaient rage. Quant à moi, je ne sais si ce fut l'effet du grand air ou celui de la fatigue, mais je dormis parfaitement.

"Le lendemain matin, à notre réveil, la pluie avait cessé de tomber, mais le vent soufflait avec force. En un clin d'œil nous fûmes sur pied, car notre lit de sybarite ne nous invitait guère à faire la grasse matinée. En attendant que nos conducteurs eussent rassemblé les chevaux et tout notre fournement, nous examinâmes avec intérêt le pays environnant. Tout autour de nous se dressaient les restes d'éruptions volcaniques. Certains cônes, d'une régularité parfaite, étaient même d'une telle fraîcheur qu'on aurait dit que leur volcan n'était éteint que d'hier. On distinguait encore parfaitement leur cratère, égoulé d'un côté, par lequel s'échappait une coulée de lave rougeâtre paraissant subitement pétrifiée.

"Notre étape de ce jour ne présenta rien de bien remarquable; elle se poursuivit tout entière dans la zone des pins pignons, très peu accidentée, car nous avons laissé derrière nous le massif volcanique du mont San-Francisco. Le terrain, détrempé par l'orage de la veille, offrit un grand obstacle à notre marche; aussi fûmes-nous encore contraints de faire une halte de nuit à quelques kilomètres du Grand Cañon.

"Tous ces retards ne faisaient que rendre plus vif notre désir d'arriver à notre but, et c'est avec une impatience fébrile que nous franchîmes les dix derniers kilomètres qui nous en séparaient et qui ne présentent d'ailleurs aucun intérêt. C'est là, en effet, une chose curieuse et qui contribue beaucoup à rendre si saisissant le Grand Cañon: en marche pendant des kilomètres sur un terrain plat et monotone, sans que rien fasse soupçonner qu'il y a aux environs une telle merveille. L'effet théâtral est ainsi puissamment ménagé; même lorsque l'on n'en est qu'à quelques mètres, le bord se relève et il est impossible de rien voir. Aussi, c'est un coup de théâtre lorsque, se penchant avec prudence au bord de l'immense crevasse, on embrasse d'un seul coup d'œil la plus grande et la plus stupéfiante merveille qu'il soit donné à l'homme de voir. La pensée cesse de fonctionner, et un vertige inénarrable vous prend en face de ce sublime spectacle: tout cela est tellement en dehors de ce que nous avons déjà vu, que notre esprit confondu refuse de croire à la réalité de son existence et que l'on se prend à demander si l'on rêve ou si l'on est éveillé. Il semble que le Créateur se soit dit: 'Je veux faire là quelque

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

chose de grand, d'incomparable; il y a pleinement réussi. La première impression que l'on a, en effet, lorsque la pensée commence à se ressaisir, c'est une impression de grandeur. Cet abîme de 2000 mètres de profondeur et de 20 kilomètres de large au sommet se déploie devant nous en une courbe majestueuse de plus de 400 kilomètres. Mais en même temps que cette impression de sublime grandeur nous terrasse, nous nous sentons réconfortés par un ensemble de douces sensations produites sur nous par l'indicible beauté du paysage et par l'éclatante lumière qui le baigne et en fait délicieusement valoir l'exquise délicatesse. C'est à tel point que l'esprit hésite, ne sachant s'il doit donner la palme de ses sensations à beauté ou à la grandeur. Le tout se confond dans une impression singulièrement exquise qui pénètre notre être. Nous nous sentons devenir comme meilleurs, une sève nouvelle circule dans nos veines; notre pensée, se dégageant de ses liens matériels, plane sur les abîmes avec volupté.

“Le Grand Cañon a tous les genres de beautés; il plaît autant par ses contrastes tranchés que par l'harmonie de ses formes. Au-dessus s'étend un ciel d'une sérénité implacable, dont la monotonie semble destinée à mieux faire valoir l'étonnante variété du Cañon. Le bord de la crevasse est d'une rectitude et d'une horizontalité parfaites; mais une fois que l'œil quitte cette ligne, placée la comme un repère, il s'égare dans un chaos: un fourmillement de lignes, de lumières, d'ombres et de taches qui papillote devant nous; ce n'est qu'au bout de quelque temps que l'œil s'habitue à ce spectacle et qu'on commence à distinguer les détails. On voit alors qu'en réalité c'est l'ordre dans le désordre; les formes vagues prennent corps, des monuments entiers semblent sortir de la pénombre et se dresser tout édifiés devant nous. On distingue aisément toutes les strates horizontales qui composent la paroi de la crevasse et qui lui donnent son aspect typique. Ici c'est une assise de grès rouge qui reste droite comme une muraille; là c'est une assise de schiste gris tendre qui s'étale en talus. Souvent un banc plus dur s'avance en saillie et simule une corniche; un autre banc moines consistant se tient en retrait et, sur tout cela la nature, s'exerçant avec sa féconde imagination, a découpé des colonnades, fouillé des niches, ciselé des moulures. C'est comme cela que, travaillant sur ce champ immense, la nature, sublime architecte, a élevé des monuments qui confondent notre entendement. Dans leur admiration enthousiaste, les premiers explorateurs ont baptisé tous ces monuments des noms les plus pompeux et qui leur paraissaient les plus propres à rendre les sensations qu'ils éprouvaient. Ici c'est le temple de Vichnou, édifice immense qui se détache du flanc opposé de la vallée et dont l'architecture bizarre rappelle bien les proportions et le goût d'un temple hindou. Plus loin s'élevant deux masses que le caprice de la nature a fait exactement pareilles. Plus loins encore nous croyons voir la silhouette du palais de justice de Bruxelles se profiler sur l'horizon, mais avec des dimensions cent fois agrandies. Si nous jetons les yeux à l'autre fois-gauche, nous voyons les parois de la crevasse, se rapprochant insensiblement, paraître enfin se rejoindre pour délimiter une gorge ténébreuse. A notre droite, au contraire, les flancs du Grand Cañon, s'écartant de plus en plus en décrivant une majestueuse courbe, circonscrivent un amphithéâtre romain aux proportions cyclopéennes. Nous voyons les assises qui forment les parois se déployer successivement en retrait les unes derrière les autres comme des gradins géants.

“Chacun de ces gradins a son caractère propre. L'assise supérieure, formé d'un grès calcaireux blanchâtre, se débite en morceaux prismatiques qui donnent à l'arête supérieure du Grand Cañon l'aspect festonné d'un rempart de place forte. Plus bas vient une assise parfaitement verticale de calcaire rouge, où il est creusé des niches énormes de qui lade loin sumulent parfaitement les portiques sculptés de nos cathédrales gothiques. Le fond de la gorge est bordé d'une roche massive aux contours irréguliers, arrondis, qui de ses murailles puissantes enserme directement le cours du fleuve sans laisser de moindre intervalle. Du haut de notre observatoire aérien, nous apercevons par places au fond du cirque les méandres du fleuve; nous distinguons les flots rouges bourbeux qui lui ont valu son nom de Colorado (coloré), et nous percevons même comme un murmure lointain le grandement de ses eaux. Ce qui contribue encore à rendre fois plus varié le grand amphithéâtre du Cañon, de c'est qu'une plus multitude grande de ramifications à crête dentelée se détachent de sa circonférence et viennent, comme autant de contreforts, mourir au fond de la cavité.

“Pendant toute cette journée nous sommes restés à admirer les aspects si divers qu'offre le Grand Cañon. Au fur et à mesure que le soleil se déplace, des jeux de lumière se produisent, les ombres se déplacent, des détails jusqu'alors inaperçus surgissent tout à coup, et la panorama ne reste pas un instant le même. Mais ce qu'aucune plume ne pourrait décrire, ce qu'aucun pinceau ne saurait rendre, c'est la lumière intense qui baigne le paysage. Pas une vapeur ne trouble la sérénité du ciel, et les rayons lumineux vont fouiller dans les moindres recoins, faisant ressortir les moindres détails avec un tel relief que nous sommes complètement trompés sur les distances. Il semble que l'on n'ait qu'à étendre le bras pour toucher le bord opposé de la gorge, qui est pourtant à 20 kilomètres de distance. Nous ramassons des pierres pour les jeter dans le fleuve, qui coule à 8 kilomètres de notre portée. Parfois, pour mieux plonger dans le gouffre, nous voulons gagner une crête avancée, et nous sommes tout étonnés, au bout d'une assez longue marche, de n'être pas avancés d'un pas dans la direction du but.

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

"Nous avons eu ce soir-là le bonheur de jouir d'un admirable coucher de soleil dans le Grand Cañon. A mesure que le globe lumineux s'abaissait vers l'horizon, l'ombre s'épaississait dans le fond de la gorge; une brume bleuâtre, éthérée, montait, montait insensiblement de l'abîme et noyait tous les objets. Les couleurs vives, éclatantes et rougeâtres du paysage faisaient place à la des tons grisâtres et tristes. Au moment où le soleil plongeait définitivement derrière l'horizon, la crête de la falaise s'illumina d'un coup comme une ligne dorée tranchant sur l'obscurité qui avait envahi tout le fond. C'est dans des moments pareils que l'âme se recueille et se replie sur elle-même. Pas un souffle de vent, pas un bruit ne trouble le silence et n'empêche d'entendre la grande voix de la nature.

"Nous avons passé trois journées délicieuses près du Grand Cañon, heureux comme dans le Paradis terrestre. Nous avions complètement oublié le monde extérieur et les heures s'écoulaient comme dans un songe. En compagnie de quelques amis, nous passions notre temps à flâner au bord de l'immense crevasse, nous comminquant joyeusement les impressions qui se présentaient à nous à chaque pas et que nous savourions en gourmets. Tantôt nos regards se portaient au fond de la crevasse et nous cherchions à pénétrer son secret; tantôt nos regards se portaient autour de nous, sur l'étrange paysage qui nous environnait. Avec son ciel implacablement serein, son sol aride et rocailleux, ses cactus et ses yuccas, ce paysage d'aspect si bien mexicain ne cessait de nous étonner. Fréquemment, nous trouvions à nos pieds d'intéressants sujets d'étude, et des traces du passage d'anciennes tribus indiennes, sous forme d'instruments de pierre, de poterie; j'ai même eu le plaisir de découvrir une superbe pointe de flèche à ailerons.

"Pendant que nous errions ainsi au sommet du Grand Cañon en quête d'impressions, d'autres de nos camarades étaient en route pour descendre au fond. Sur les centaines de kilomètres de parcours du Cañon, il n'y a que deux ou trois endroits où l'on puisse descendre dans la crevasse, et justement un de ces points se trouve près de l'endroit où nous étions. Un sentier y a été tracé grâce à M. John Hance, un enthousiaste amateur du Grand Cañon qui y réside depuis huit ans. Pendant l'été il habite au sommet, et pendant l'hiver il transporte ses pénates au fond de la gorge, où il trouve la température des plaines tropicales du Mexique. Jusqu'à moitié chemin, le sentier est accessible aux mulets, et il y a là une cabane en pierre qui sert à abriter les ascensionnistes, car il ne faut pas moins de 48 heures pour la montée et la descente. Au delà de la cabane, le sentier n'est plus accessible qu'aux piétons; il y a même plusieurs passages où, les parois étant à pic, il faut se laisser descendre au moyen de cordes et de crampons, quelquefois plusieurs centaines de pieds. Ce n'est qu'à la descente, paraît-il, que l'on peut se rendre compte de l'effrayante hauteur de certaines murailles qui, d'en haut, paraissent insignifiantes. En bas, ces énormes masses surplombantes semblent écraser l'homme de toute leur hauteur. Le spectacle le plus curieux dont on jouit dans cette descente est celui que l'on a lorsqu'on arrive tout à fait au fond, dans l'étroite gorge où le fleuve coule à pleins bords. Les flots bourbeux du Colorado roulent avec une rapidité et un mugissement effrayants. Jusqu'à plus de 30 mètres au-dessus du niveau actuel de fleuve, les roches sont polies comme un miroir par l'action de la boue et du sable que charrie le fleuve dans les grandes crues.

"Si le Grand Cañon présenté déjà tant d'attraits pour le simple amateur des beautés de la nature, quel intérêt n'offre-t-il pas au géologue! Jamais occasion plus favorable de scruter les mystères de la terre ne s'est offerte; la croûte terrestre, fendue comme d'un immense coup de lancette, nous dévoile sans réticence tous ses secrets. Sur près de 2000 mètres de hauteur, on voit à nu tous les terrains sans que la moindre végétation ou la moindre parcelle de terre viennent les obscurcir. Postés sur la crête du précipice comme dans un observatoire aérien, l'œil armé d'une bonne jumelle, nous détaillons sans fatigue toutes les couches. En bas, ce sont les strates de gneiss et de mica-schiste, assises fondamentales de la croûte terrestre dans lesquelles est creusé le lit du Colorado. De là jusqu'au sommet, toute la série des terrains sédimentaires est représentée au grand complet, jusqu'au carbonifère inclusivement. On saisit sans peine les allures de ces terrains et leurs rapports mutuels. Les assises sont généralement horizontales, mais il y a néanmoins quelques plissements. On voit aussi distinctement des cassures qui mettent en présence des roches d'âge très différent. De nombreux filons de roches éruptives, granite et diabase notamment, traversent les assises sédimentaires. On comprend avec quelle avidité nous dévorions les moindres détails de cette coupe naturelle étendue devant nous. Malheureusement, il n'est si beau jour qui n'ait sa fin, et il faut bien s'arracher avec regret de ces lieux enchanteurs. Nos prosaïques conducteurs font retentir l'air de leurs appels: c'est le moment de faire nos adieux au Grand Cañon du Colorado. Certes, les impressions mémorables que nous avons ressenties là la plus belle chose que nous ayons vue en Amérique. La nature s'est surpassée pour produire ce chef-d'œuvre; elle n'a rien fait de pareil ailleurs.

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

"Notre voyage de retour ne s'accomplit pas dans les mêmes conditions que l'aller: nous n'avions plus l'enthousiasme du départ et, d'un autre côté, les provisions fraîches étant complètement épuisées, nous n'avions plus de spectacles grandioses pour servir de compensation. Par contre, nous commençons à élever des tentes présentables au moyen de nos couvertures et de quelques bois. Je me rappellerai toujours notre première nuit passée, en retournant, à Red Horse Spring. Nous avons trouvé là, abandonnée, une cabane de colon avec un jardinet où croissaient des salades et des pommes de terre, et nous avons résolu de nous payer un extra. Avec l'huile de nos sardines et le vinaigre de nos boîtes à conserves, nous avons préparé une salade improvisée. Puis, avec des pommes de terre cuites sous la cendre et quelques tranches de lard, nous avons confectionné le menu d'un festin de Balthazar. Un peu de farine délayée dans l'eau, roulée en boulettes et cuite sur la poêle, nous tenait lieu de pain, et je vous assure que les mâchoires ne chômaient pas. Cette vie de campement était d'ailleurs fertile en accidents, dont un surtout m'est resté en mémoire. Les excursionnistes qui faisaient route à cheval étaient toujours en avant, n'étant pas embarrassés par les bagages. Un soir, les chevaux qui traînaient nos carrioles étaient tellement fatigués qu'il fallut faire halte sans avoir rejoint l'avant-garde. Pendant la nuit, celle-ci dépêcha vers nous un éclaireur à cheval pour venir des monts San Francisco, nous retrouvâmes la région des nuées et des vents. Cela nous valut le curieux spectacle d'une tempête de sable sur le désert du Petit-Colorado.

• • •

"Nous arrivâmes à Flagstaff, assez tard dans la nuit heureusement, car nous n'avions plus figure humaine. Depuis huit jours nous ne nous étions plus lavés ni déshabillés. Après avoir couché au pied des sapins, nos figures et nos mains étaient plaquées de taches de résine et nos cheveux remplis d'aiguilles de conifères. On comprendra aisément avec quelle volupté nous nous assîmes devant une table d'hôtel abondamment chargée et nous nous glissâmes dans des draps de lit bien blancs."

(translation)

'It was dark when we disembarked at Flagstaff, the terminus of our railroad journey, and where a new kind of journey was about to begin this time. The transition is very abrupt: we have to leave our sumptuous sleeping cars and dining cars there to launch ourselves into the unknown, sleep under the stars and eat, as they say, like a mad cow. We still have to deal with 120 kilometers in an absolutely deserted country, devoid of any subsistence, almost completely lacking in water. But such was the attraction exercised over us by the Grand Canyon that we paid little attention to all these difficulties, forgetting the obstacles in the face of the greatness of the goal to be attained. A good part of the next morning was spent in preparations, in comings and goings during which we were the target of all the onlookers in the place, and the object of the solicitude of some Navajo Indians who, smoking cigarettes in their mouths, came charitably to offer us their colorful blankets for the modest sum of 100 francs. When our caravan finally set out through the streets of Flagstaff, it looked truly macabre. As drivers, we had a few individuals with a somewhat reassuring appearance, such as one always finds in frontier countries. Their scruffy clothes and threadbare hats, though not pointed, covered their heads, giving them a great resemblance to the personages who have made Calabria famous. Part of the band of excursionists rode on horseback, the rest were crammed into antediluvian-looking pataches [two-wheeled horsedrawn carriages].

'At our head was Major Powell, director of the United States Geological Survey, whose name will remain attached to that of the Grand Canyon of which he has contributed so much to making known. We know, in fact, how many obstacles nature had accumulated, with jealous care, around this incomparable marvel. • • • It will therefore be understood with what enthusiasm our strange outfit left Flagstaff. The road, little or not cleared, climbs obstacles with an all-American lack of hindrance; so we do not go fast and we have the necessary leisure to admire the landscape, which is certainly worth it. • • • '

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

The group travels around the eastern side of the San Francisco Peaks, with its view of the desert of the Little Colorado River, but

‘We were soon in turmoil. Wind, rain, hail, thunder, nothing was missing at the party. Our horses were advancing only with difficulty and, meanwhile, darkness having begun to fall, we decided to halt. I will never forget the bewilderment that seized the excursionists when the chief driver, showing us a sort of basaltic terrain, said to us: “Here is your lodging!” At this time, the elements were raging, and, judging by the looks of some, there were more than one who wished they were somewhere else. But we weren't there in a hotel where, when you're in a bad place, you can ask to change: here there was no possible choice. So, after a first moment of quite explicable surprise, everyone decided to have good heart against bad luck, and soon the camp presented the liveliest aspect. On all sides the trees were cut down with great blows of the axe, and enormous pyres were erected, the flames of which soon rose, fanned by the winds and the resinous materials; their pale lights shining from all sides between the trees lighted up the strangest spectacle. A few geologists brandishing frying pans improvised as cooks, artfully arranging their beefsteaks and greasing their pans with tea to replace the missing butter. They soon filled the camp with appetizing smells. Meanwhile, others were preparing, under the name of coffee, a passably cloudy mixture. Add to that slices of smoked ham, solid-bread croutons, and you have an idea of our menu. Grouped around the fires, all our men made their portion disappear with an appetite to make the ghosts of Gustave Aymard's trappers quiver in their graves. When dinner was over, we had to think about going to bed and try to make the most of the two big traveling blankets which were to take the place of both a tent and a bed. The thing was quickly done: looking for a place not too encumbered with stones at the foot of a juniper, agreeing with a comrade to warm each other up and to place a blanket above us as a tent, all this did not require just a moment. Finally, wrapping ourselves in a blanket, after having loaded our hearths one last time, we fell asleep despite the raging wind, rain and thunder. As for me, I don't know if it was the effect of the fresh air or that of fatigue, but I slept perfectly.

‘Our leg this [next] day did not present anything very remarkable; it continued entirely in the zone of the pinyon pines, only a little hilly for we had left behind us the volcanic massif of Mount San Francisco. The ground, soaked by the storm of the day before, presented a great obstacle to our march; so we were again forced to stop for the night a few kilometers from the Grand Canyon.

‘All these delays only heightened our desire to reach our goal, and it was with feverish impatience that we crossed the last ten kilometers which separated us from it and which, moreover, presented no interest. This is, in fact, a curious thing and which contributes a lot to make the Grand Canyon so striking: walking for kilometers on flat and monotonous ground, without anything to suggest that there is such a marvel around. The theatrical effect is thus powerfully managed; even when you are only a few meters away, the edge rises and it is impossible to see anything. Also, it is a theatrical coup when, leaning cautiously over the edge of the immense crevasse, one embraces with a single glance the greatest and most astounding marvel to have been given to man. Thought ceases to function, and an indescribable vertigo seizes you in front of this sublime spectacle: all this is so outside of what we have already seen, that our confused mind refuses to believe in the reality of its existence and that we find ourselves wondering if we are dreaming or if we are awake. It seems that the Creator said to himself: “I want to do something great, incomparable;” he fully succeeded. The first impression one has, in fact, when thought begins to collect itself, is an impression of grandeur. This abyss 2000 meters deep and 20 kilometers wide at the top unfolds before us in a majestic curve of more than 400 kilometers. But at the same time as this impression of sublime grandeur overwhelms us, we feel comforted by a set of sweet sensations produced in us by the indescribable beauty of the landscape and by the dazzling light which bathes it and deliciously enhances its delicate exquisiteness. It is to such a point that the mind hesitates, not knowing whether to give the measure of its sensations to beauty or to greatness. The whole merges in a singularly exquisite impression which penetrates our being. We feel ourselves becoming better, a fresh sap circulates in our veins; our thought, freeing itself from its material bonds, hovers over the abysses with pleasure.

‘The Grand Cañon has all kinds of beauties; it pleases as much by its sharp contrasts as by the harmony of its forms. Above stretches a sky of implacable serenity, whose monotony seems destined to better emphasize the astonishing variety of the Canyon. The edge of the crevasse is perfectly straight and horizontal; but once the eye leaves this line, placed there like a landmark, it gets lost in chaos: a swarm of lines, lights, shadows and spots flickering in front of us; it is only after some time that the eye gets used to this spectacle and that one

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

begins to distinguish the details. We then see that in reality it is order in disorder; vague shapes take shape, entire monuments seem to come out of the shadows and stand erect before us. One easily distinguishes all the horizontal strata which make up the wall of the crevasse and which give it its typical appearance. Here it is a course of red sandstone which remains straight like a wall; there it is a bed of soft gray schist which spreads out in a slope. Often a harder bench juts out and simulates a cornice; another substantial monk's bench stands in the background, and over all this nature, exercising her fertile imagination, has cut out colonnades, excavated niches, chiseled moldings. It is in this way that, working on this immense field, nature, sublime architect, has erected monuments which confuse our understanding. In their enthusiastic admiration, the first explorers baptized all these monuments with the most pompous names which seemed to them the most appropriate to convey the sensations they experienced. Here is the temple of Vishnu, an immense building which stands out from the opposite side of the valley and whose bizarre architecture recalls well the proportions and taste of a Hindu temple. Farther on are two rising masses which the whim of nature has made exactly alike. Further still, we believe we see the silhouette of the Brussels courthouse looming on the horizon, but with dimensions a hundred times enlarged. If we cast our eyes to our left, we see the walls of the crevasse, approaching imperceptibly, finally seeming to join together to delimit a dark gorge. To our right, on the contrary, the flanks of the Grand Canyon, widening more and more, describe a majestic gourd, circumscribe a Roman amphitheater of cyclopean proportions. We see the foundations that form the walls successively deployed behind each other like giant benches.

Each of these steps has its own character. The upper course, formed of a whitish calcareous sandstone, cuts into prismatic pieces which give the upper ridge of the Grand Canyon the scalloped appearance of a rampart of a stronghold. Lower down comes a perfectly vertical bed of red limestone, where the working of the waters has dug enormous niches from which, from afar, perfectly sum up the sculpted porticoes of our Gothic cathedrals. The bottom of the gorge is bordered by a massive rock with irregular, rounded contours, which with its powerful walls directly surrounds the course of the river without leaving any gap. From the top of our aerial observatory, we see in places at the bottom of the cirque the meanders of the river; we can make out the muddy red waters which have given it its name, Colorado (colored), and we even perceive like a distant murmur the greatness of its waters. What contributes still more to make the great amphitheater of the Canyon more varied, is the fact that a greater multitude of ramparts with serrated crests detach themselves from its circumference and come, like so many buttresses, to end at the bottom of the cavity.

All day we remained to admire the so various aspects that the Grand Canyon offers. As the sun moves, plays of light occur, shadows move, hitherto unnoticed details suddenly emerge, and the panorama does not remain the same for an instant. But what no pen could describe, what no brush could render, is the intense light that bathes the landscape. Not a vapor disturbs the serenity of the sky, and the light rays dig into the smallest corners, bringing out the smallest details with such relief that we are completely deceived about the distances. It seems that one has only to stretch out one's arm to touch the opposite edge of the gorge, which is nevertheless 20 kilometers away. We pick up stones to throw them into the river, which flows 8 kilometers from our reach. Sometimes, the better to plunge into the abyss, we want to reach a near ridge, and we are astonished, after a fairly long walk, not to have advanced a step in the direction of the goal.

We had that evening the happiness of enjoying a wonderful sunset in the Grand Canyon. As the luminous globe descended towards the horizon, the shadow thickened at the bottom of the gorge; a bluish, ethereal mist rose imperceptibly from the abyss and drowned all objects. The bright, dazzling and reddish colors of the landscape gave way to greyish and sad tones. As the sun finally dipped below the horizon, the crest of the cliff suddenly lit up like a golden line cutting through the darkness that had invaded the entire background. It is in such moments that the soul collects itself and withdraws. Not a breath of wind, not a sound disturbs the silence and does not prevent the great voice of nature from being heard.

We spent three delightful days near the Grand Canyon, happy as in an earthly Paradise. We had completely forgotten the outside world and the hours went by like in a dream. In the company of a few friends, we spent our time strolling along the edge of the immense crevasse, joyfully communicating to each other the impressions which presented themselves to us at each step and which we savored like gourmets. Sometimes our eyes went to the bottom of the crevasse and we sought to penetrate its secret; sometimes our eyes were directed around us, on the strange landscape which surrounded us. With its implacably serene sky, its arid and rocky soil, its

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

cacti and its yuccas, this Mexican-looking landscape never ceased to amaze us. Frequently we found at our feet interesting subjects for study, and traces of the passage of ancient Indian tribes, in the form of stone implements and pottery; I even had the pleasure of discovering a superb finned arrowhead.

While we were thus wandering at the top of the Grand Canyon in search of impressions, others of our comrades were on their way to descend to the bottom. Of the hundreds of kilometers of the Canyon's route, there are only two or three places where you can descend into the crevasse, and one of these points is near where we were. A trail has been traced there thanks to Mr. John Hance, an enthusiastic lover of the Grand Canyon who has lived there for eight years. During the summer he dwells at the summit, and during the winter he transports his home goods to the bottom of the gorge, where he finds the temperature of the tropical plains of Mexico. Halfway up, the trail is accessible to mules, and there is a stone hut there which is used to shelter climbers, as it takes no less than 48 hours for the ascent and descent. Beyond the hut, the path is only accessible to pedestrians; there are even several passages where, the walls being steep, you have to let yourself down by means of ropes and crampons, sometimes several hundred feet. It is only on the descent, it seems, that one can realize the frightening height of certain walls which, from above, seem insignificant. Below, these enormous overhanging masses seem to crush the man with all their height. The most curious spectacle which one enjoys in this descent is that which one has when one arrives at the very bottom, in the narrow gorge where the river runs full. The muddy waters of the Colorado roll with fearful rapidity and roar. Up to more than 30 meters above the current level of the river, the rocks are polished like a mirror by the action of the mud and the sand that the river carries during great floods.

If the Grand Canyon already presents so many attractions for the simple lover of the beauties of nature, what interest does it not offer to the geologist! Never has there been a more favorable opportunity to scrutinize the mysteries of the earth; the earth's crust, split open like a huge lancet blow, unhesitatingly reveals all its secrets to us. Over nearly 2000 meters in height, we can see all the land bare without the slightest vegetation or the smallest plot of land obscuring them. Positioned on the crest of the precipice as in an aerial observatory, the eye armed with good binoculars, we detail all the layers without fatigue. Below are the strata of gneiss and mica schist, the fundamental layers of the earth's crust in which the bed of the Colorado is dug. From there to the summit, the entire series of sedimentary terrains is represented in its entirety, up through the Carboniferous. It is easy to grasp the appearance of these terrains and their mutual relationships. The layers are generally horizontal, but there are nevertheless some folds. We also see distinctly fractures which bring together rocks of very different ages. Many veins of eruptive rocks, granite and diabase in particular, cross the sedimentary foundations. We understand avidly what we devoured, the smallest details of this natural cut stretched before us. Unfortunately, it is not such a beautiful day that is coming to an end, and we have to tear ourselves away with regret from these enchanting places. Our prosaic conductors make the air resound with their calls: it is time to bid farewell to the Grand Canyon of the Colorado. Certainly, the memorable impressions we felt there the most beautiful thing we have seen in America. Nature has outdone herself to produce this masterpiece; it has done nothing like it elsewhere.

Our return journey was not accomplished in the same conditions as the outward journey: we no longer had the enthusiasm of the departure and, on the other hand, the fresh provisions having completely run out, we had no more grand shows to serve as compensation. On the other hand, we were beginning to put up presentable tents with our blankets and some wood. I will always remember our first night back at Red Horse Springs. We had found there, abandoned, a settler's hut with a little garden where lettuce and potatoes grew, and we had resolved to pay ourselves extra. With the oil from our sardines and the vinegar from our tin cans, we had prepared an improvised salad. Then, with potatoes cooked in the ashes and a few slices of bacon, we made the menu for a Balthazar feast. A little flour dissolved in water, rolled into balls and cooked on the pan, took the place of bread, and I assure you that our jaws were not idle. This life in the camp was, moreover, fertile in accidents, one of which in particular has remained in my memory. The excursionists who traveled on horseback were always in front, not being hampered by baggage. One evening, the horses that were dragging our carts were so tired that we had to stop without having rejoined the vanguard. During the night, the latter sent a scout on horseback to us from the San Francisco mountains, and we found again the region of clouds and winds. This earned us the curious spectacle of a sandstorm over the Little Colorado desert. • • •

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

'We arrived in Flagstaff, fortunately quite late at night, for we no longer looked human. For eight days we had not washed or undressed. After having slept at the foot of the fir trees, our faces and our hands were smeared with stains of resin and our hair filled with coniferous needles. It will be easy to understand with what delight we sat down in front of an abundantly laden hotel table and we slipped into very white bed sheets.'

John Hance's visitors' book survives today in the collections of the Arizona Historical Society, in Tucson. A substantial part of it was also published in 1899, compiled by G. K. [George K.] Woods: Personal impressions of the Grand Cañon of the Colorado River near Flagstaff, Arizona, as seen through nearly two thousand eyes, and written in the private visitors' book of the world-famous guide Capt. John Hance, guide, story-teller, and path-finder (Whitaker and Ray Co., San Francisco, for G. K. Woods, Flagstaff, Arizona Territory). Unfortunately, the volume contains substantial errors in transcription. John Wesley Powell's distinctive signature, "J.W. Powell" appears at the head of the list of those who traveled with the International Geological Congress, though Woods (p. 39) misspells it as "J. W. Powers". Below his signature is that of D. M. Riordan of Flagstaff, with whom Powell had visited there, followed by 28 signatures of the international travelers, without comments; but Xavier Stainier is not one of the signers. Interestingly, the first of the IGC signers is "Mary Caroline Hughes, Cambridge, England", who accompanied her husband, William. Stainier makes no mention of the presence of a woman in his account (above). Beside her signature is an artistic reproduction of the logo of the International Geological Congresses, still used to this day; two crossed hammers and the gloss, "Mente et Malleo" (Latin, "with mind and hammer"). These adjacent items are illustrated by Shane Murphy, "John Hance's Visitors' Book(s)", The Ol' Pioneer (Grand Canyon Historical Society), 32(1) (Winter 2021): 13-14.

Hance's visitors' book, as published by Woods, also includes a pertinent entry (p. 43): "April 9, 1892. First of the Season. Horace C. Hovey, Middletown, Conn. Intended to come last fall with Geological Congress, but am contented to open the ball for 1892, 'Mente et Malleo,' as special correspondent of Scientific American. Went down Hance trail with Mr. [Louis] Boucher, and stayed over night, returning next day; enjoyed it immensely. Found the trail in excellent order, and made the trip comfortably." Hovey immediately thereafter published in Scientific American some remarks on his trip to the canyon; see Hovey (1892).

Townsend, C. H. Tyler [Townsend, Charles Haskins Tyler]

355 1893 A wagon-trip to the Grand Cañon of the Colorado River. Appalachia, 7(1) (February): 48-63.

A trip to the canyon in July 1892. Townsend was an entomologist, the first to conduct such work at the Grand Canyon, as part of a group of naturalists who converged as two groups from New Mexico and Arizona. The group stayed at Hance's and spent several days in the canyon; a delightful tale with details unlike other stories about the trip down, which is well worth repeating all of it. He begins, explaining, "It was my good fortune during the past summer to make a trip by wagon from Las Cruces, New Mexico, to the Grand Cañon of the Colorado River, in the interests of the New Mexico College of Agriculture. Our party consisted of three persons, the other two besides myself being the college botanist, who was to look after the plants while I gathered in the insects, and one of the college students, who was to attend to the team and the various camp duties, such as gathering wood and cooking. The purely scientific results of the trip will be detailed elsewhere, and I shall confine myself here to describing the visit to the Cañon, with a mention of the more important itinerary incidents of the journey thither."

He details the trip to Flagstaff, which is where we pick up the story.

"[We drove] into Flagstaff the same evening; in other words, about 7 P. M. on July 1. We therefore conformed pretty closely to our intention of reaching Flagstaff about the first of July; and, strange to say, we found that the party from the University of Arizona had arrived only two hours previously! They had come a less distance, and had started before we did. • • •

"We were now only seventy miles by road from the Grand Cañon, the deepest and grandest part of it being a little west of north from Flagstaff, at Hance's place on the rim. On July 3 the combined Arizona and New Mexico party, being also augmented by the arrival of another professor from Las Cruces, who had come on the train, started from Flagstaff for the Cañon. We passed San Francisco Mountain on the way, having determined to stop and climb it on our way back. [They did, the account of which he published later in the same serial, pp. 149-

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

157.] About eight miles beyond the mountain, having taken the west road around it, we took the right-hand road by mistake and travelled fully ten miles on the old Mormon trail which leads up into Southern Utah. This was the first time on the trip that we missed our way. We had to come back the next day, and reached Cedar Ranch (Hull Spring) just at noon, in the midst of a thunder-storm,—the first rain we had seen since leaving Las Cruces, where it seldom rains! Just as we stopped, down came a fearful hail-storm, with enormous hail-stones, and we had to jump out and make the best of it, trying to unhitch the now almost frantic animals, which like ourselves were being pelted right and left. There were three of us to four animals; but it was with difficulty that we finally got them free of the harness and wagon, and dragged them into the partial shelter of some scrub junipers. The hail then ceased.

"The next day about noon we reached the rim of the Cañon in another thunderstorm. I had jumped out of the wagon and gone ahead on foot, and the Arizona party were behind us, having stopped for shelter under some trees while the rain was pouring down and flooding the road. The rain had slackened, and I reached Hance's place, which, with the Cañon and all the surrounding country for that matter, had been shut off from our view by the thick forest through which our road approaches the rim. Hance's cabin and the stage company's tents are situated in a little hollow only a few rods from the rim, but on a lower level. Up the slope I hurried, being the first one of the two parties to reach the rim, when a sight met my gaze, grand in the extreme, and utterly beyond the power of language to describe. I had seen Niagara, but there was no comparison between the two in the magnificent extent of distances and depths that lay spread out here before the eye. I had travelled by rail from the Mexican capital nearly to the coast, had seen the snow cap of Orizaba, and viewed vast plains from a height of thousands of feet in the mountains above. But this was more concentrated, and exhibited more rugged grandeur. I had read about the Cañon, had seen photographs of it, but still I was unprepared for this first view. No one can form any conception of this stupendous chasm until he sees it with his own eyes. A more definite approach to a conception may be had when it is stated that at least twenty echoes may be counted to a pistol-shot fired on the rim.

"• • • Down one of [the] side cañons, about seven miles in length, winds the Hance trail, made entirely by Mr. John Hance, who owns the place on the rim above referred to, where he has lived for the past eight years. He told us that he made it entirely with his own hands, aided by pick and shovel, and that it took him two years to do it. This is the path down which we were to proceed on the morrow."

[Readers may wish to compare the description of this descent and ascent to those by J. G. Oweens (1891) and by a woman identified only as "Yucca" (1893).]

"In the mean time dinner was prepared, the tents were set up, and the weather cleared. After dinner, it being too late to think of beginning the descent that afternoon, a portion of the party, myself included, determined to follow down the rim to the west about three quarters of a mile, where it appeared that by climbing out a narrow and dipping hog-back we could get upon an immense ledge of rock that stood some distance out in the Cañon, the top of which was about on a level with the rim. We reached the place, and found, as we had anticipated, that it was more difficult than it looked from afar; but with a little hard work we descended to the dip of the ridge, followed it out, and then climbed up toward the high ledge. With considerable difficulty we reached a point at the base of the cap rock, which went up perpendicularly seventy or eighty feet higher. Here farther progress seemed impossible, and the party was divided. Professor Toomey and I finally found a wide vertical fissure between two columns of the rock, in which boulders had lodged at various intervals; and feeling each one as we proceeded to see if it would hold firm, we finally reached the top. It was, however, a very ticklish climb, and a slip would have dropped us a thousand feet below. Professor Hagerty, who came on the train from Las Cruces to Flagstaff, also reached the top after us; but the rest of the party would not risk it. After leaving our names on a piece of paper under a sheltering rock on top, we most cautiously and laboriously descended, one at a time, as we had gone up.

"When we reached the base of the cap rock again, our attention was attracted to a huge boulder which lay very close to the edge of a shelving or inclined ledge on the west side of the ridge. This boulder was compact limestone, about three feet in two dimensions and two feet in the other, and we carefully estimated that it would weigh fully 2,800 pounds, or nearly a ton and a half. Its position on the edge of the sloping shelf was such that we believed our combined efforts would be able to set it off. There was a clear drop of a hundred feet below it;

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

then the ground sloped away rapidly for a long distance. We had set off many large rocks already at several places along the edge of the Cañon; but we estimated that if this one could be induced to go, its effect would outshine that of all the others put together. We had positive information that there was no one in this part of the Cañon; in fact, one could scarcely reach such a place either from above or below; so we lay down on our backs, all three of us, grasped some shrubs behind us with our hands, and placed our feet flat against the side of the rock. At a given signal we braced ourselves, and the great rock gradually slid off the shelf. It went down a hundred feet before striking, then with a rebound it struck a large live pine-tree and snapped it in two like a straw. After transforming a huge log into kindling-wood, it went on a short distance, struck a rock, and bounded forty or fifty feet across a small chasm, which it cleared in one mighty parabola. Striking on a ledge of rock on the opposite side, it did not break, but only raised an immense cloud of fine dust like smoke, and went crashing on. It continued without doubt for a mile before it came to a standstill, and its course could be marked down the gorge by the cloud of dust that it raised. It was without any doubt the grandest spectacle of the kind that we ever witnessed.

"On the morning of Friday, the 8th of July, we prepared ourselves for the descent into 'the hole.' Each man took a blanket, enough food to last him as long as he desired to stay in the Cañon, and collecting paraphernalia; the latter consisted in my own case of insect-net and handle, which I used for a walking-stick, two boxes for pinning insects in, insect-pins, cyanide and alcohol vials, note-book, etc. A photograph was taken of the combined party on the rim, just before we began the descent,—each man with his luggage on his back, or wherever he preferred to carry it. Mr. Cordley, of the Agricultural Department, Washington, who with myself constituted the bug-hunters of the expedition, took the photograph. The bugs were also persecuted by Mr. Cordley's brother-in-law, Mr. Swarthout, from Michigan, who accompanied and helped Mr. Cordley in collecting. Professors Toumey and Wooton were the botanists; and Professor Hagerty and Mr. Larkin, our driver, completed the party, which, therefore, numbered seven. We had considerable luggage, and Mr. Hance had kindly proffered us the use of his burros, at two dollars each a day. He told us we would find it hard enough to take ourselves down, without any further encumbrance; and we did not doubt (?)<sup>1</sup> his word in the least, but thought we could worry along some way and carry our own loads. We paid one dollar each for the privilege of going down Mr. Hance's trail,—which is a very modest sum for the amount of work that must have been put upon it. [footnote: <sup>1</sup> Mr. Hance showed us a rifle with which he said he had killed a deer so far off that the meat spoiled before he could get to it. The supposition was that the ground was moderately level, and it is only fair to suppose also that Mr. Hance was in his usual able-bodied condition at the time.]

"Proceeding up the rim for a quarter of a mile to the northeast, we came to the place where the trail leads down. Here was a small square area enclosed by fence. Getting through this, we started down the trail. The day was perfect. The first mile and a half is the steepest part of the descent; the trail zigzags, and yet is very steep. Two miles down is a stone cabin, known as 'Mr. Hance's winter residence.' This is 2,500 feet below the rim. I reached this in a few minutes over an hour and a half, and carried at least fifteen pounds on my back; the others came in later. Here we took lunch beside a small stream which rises from a spring near by. This stream sinks a few rods below the cabin, and seeps out again about a mile or so farther down the Cañon, whence it runs continuously to the Colorado River. After lunch, and a smoke on my part, we resumed the trail for the river. It was very hot. The walls of our side cañon began to spread out; then they narrowed again near the point where the stream seeps out. We followed down the stream, which was most picturesque, and soon came to the place which is called the Temple of Sett [sic], where an immense wall of rock overhangs the way. Still down we continued, the stream of clear water flowing through numberless natural bathtubs in the rock, eroded by the action of water. We would fain have plunged in these, but we were anxious to catch sight of the turbulent Colorado. Our Cañon had now 'boxed up,' and the walls approached closely on either hand. Ropes were used in descending drops in the granite. Then we had to go up a rope, and down another farther on. On we went, scrambling through narrow places which were entirely occupied by the stream.

"Mr. Larkin had been ahead of me for some time, but I was in turn ahead of the rest of the party. Suddenly, on turning an angle of the Cañon, I brought up on the edge of a shelf down which the stream dropped forty feet straight. At the bottom, on the gravel-bed, sat Mr. Larkin, and two travellers who had gone down the day before, and were now on their way back from the river. My appearance was the signal for a shout, which I lustily echoed. These fellows had been waiting to see the fun when the rest of us should appear on the brink. There was a rope

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

to go down, but it was wet from hanging in the water. I took off my shoes, threw my luggage to the spectators at the bottom, and with a wild yell, which was echoed by the others, I swung down the torrent. It was now my turn to see the fun; and we all waited. In about five minutes the relief corps appeared at the top with a look of inquiring dismay upon its face, and we set up a yell that might have brought the cliffs down upon us if they had not been firmly grounded. This strengthened their courage; and with considerable yelling on both sides, and unbounded laughter on our part below, they all finally reached the bottom in safety. The two travellers who had just come up from the river told us that the latter was still a quarter of a mile on; and we hurried along, after taking a photograph of the scene.

"Going down a last short rope, we emerged upon an enclosed area of white sand at the edge of the river, whose roar had been heard for some distance back. Here we sat upon the rocks, and satisfied our gaze upon the turmoil of waters, on which Powell and his party and later a Denver railroad party had had the hardihood to embark. Personally I would rather be excused from attempting the Colorado River in any kind of a boat. We went in bathing in some sheltered nooks along the edge; but if we had ventured out twenty feet anywhere, the fifteen-mile current would have transported us bodily to regions unknown. It required some courage to trust one's self even in the edge of it; and no idea can be formed of the intricate system of cross-currents, whirlpools, and breakers that exhibited themselves farther out. The depth of the river is unknown, its width at this point is nearly 300 feet, and the wall of rock on the opposite side rises nearly sheer 2,000 feet. The stream is visible here for only a very short distance, as the observer is in the mouth of a small box-cañon whose high and apparently inaccessible walls effectually shut off the view both above and below. The river therefore impresses one as emerging from the unknown, and gliding onward into a seemingly more terrible unknown. A photograph was taken of the stream at this point. Then we fished; but the fish did not bite. I fancied they were too busy dodging snags and escaping from cross-currents to give their attention to hooks. The water was muddy, and no fish could be seen except as they flopped out occasionally above the surface. Then we tried to see who could throw a stone across; only one man in the party succeeded. The two botanists now returned to spend the night at the stone cabin and make the climb to the rim the next morning.

"Mr. Cordley and myself camped on the sand at the edge of the river two nights, and made serious incursions upon the insect fauna up the side cañon during the daytime. We were deserted by the other three members the next morning. That afternoon, taking off our shoes, we climbed the almost inaccessible wall of rock on the left, or down-stream side, close to the water. After going up some extremely difficult walls of rock, in two or three different places, we reached a point which was probably 300 yards farther down stream than the mouth of our box cañon. Here we had an unimpeded view of the river for quite a long distance comparatively, until it made a bend to the west. We could also see farther up stream, and felt well repaid by the view for the labor it cost us to reach this point and get safely back again. On the following day we collected all the way up to the cabin, which we reached in the afternoon. We pinned insects the rest of the day, and fought jiggers all night, being filled with them from our constant contact with the bush for the last two days. We spent two nights here at the stone cabin, collecting and mounting insects all the next day, and that night we pecked our names in the solid rock near the cabin with a geologist's hammer.

"The next morning, Tuesday, July 12, we left the cabin at 7.30 A. M., and reached the rim at 10.30; thus taking just about twice the time in going up that we took in coming down. I carried up a Winchester in addition to my other luggage, and on reaching the top of the rim fired off all the shots that remained in the magazine, seven in number, as fast as I could work the lever. Thus ended our experiences in the Grand Cañon,—experiences which will always live in my memory."

Yucca [pseudonym]

356 1893 A woman's trip to the Grand Cañon. Goldthwaite's Geographical Magazine (New York), 5(7/9) (July/September): 258-267.

A trip by five women and four men to Hance's in 1892, before the stage line had been started, with a nicely detailed description of the descent into the canyon (and back up). She describes the journey from Flagstaff to the canyon, too, but which is omitted here in favor of the canyon experiences. And she ends with a sigh. ("Yucca" has not been identified, nor is it possible to ascertain who among the signers of John Hance's visitors' book [see

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

Woods, 1899] might be she—if she signed it—nor had anyone during the summer of 1892 signed with the title of lieutenant, whom she mentions [if he would have signed as such].)

"There was a flutter of excitement around an hotel, on the outskirts of Flagstaff, one bright morning last summer. Two vehicles, one with four horses the other with two, were drawn up in front of the door. There were three saddle-horses tied to various tree stumps in the vicinity, and a row of spectators, seated on the piazza and edge of the plank walk, encouraged by remarks, facetious and otherwise, the efforts of two or three men to test the strength and perfect the adjustment of the harness and saddles of the horses.

"Several women flitted in and out of the house bringing mysterious parcels, of every conceivable size and shape, to be stowed away in the bottom of the wagons, and there was an occasional chatter and bustle about some necessary article that was in danger of being forgotten. At length everything was ready. The drivers climbed to their seats, the different passengers took their places, the saddle-horses were mounted and, after considerable resistance, on the part of a balky horse, who evinced a decided preference to remain in town, with a cheer from the bystanders, we started a party of nine, five women and four men, en route for the Grand Cañon. • • •

"It was a queer procession that wended its way through the little town of Flagstaff that bright summer morning. First an ambulance, white covered and drawn by four horses, containing four people and a quantity of bedding and provisions. Next a rickety buckboard filled with Navajo blankets and horse-feed and perched on top of this a small woman, a long man and a demijohn guiltless of anything stronger than water. Behind these a young woman, the Lieutenant and a civilian on horseback. • • •

"Late in the afternoon we passed through the Coconino Forest, caught sight of the cliffs on the further edge of the cañon, lost them again while descending a hill, and soon after reached John Hance's cabin, in a pretty ravine between two green slopes, which was to be our abiding place for a day or two at least. It did not take us long to scramble up a knoll of a few hundred feet to the rim of the cañon and oh!—the wonderful, wonderful scene that met our eyes.

"Never having read Major Powell's book on the subject, I had imagined the Grand Cañon to be like other cañons, I had seen only larger, but I was not prepared for what Major Powell calls 'the most profound chasm in the world.'" [The only place that Powell seems to have written this—as "the most profound chasm known on the globe"—is in his preliminary Report of Explorations in 1873 of the Colorado of the West and Its Tributaries, by Professor J. W. Powell, Under the Direction of the Smithsonian Institution (U.S. Government Printing Office, 1874, p. 10).]

"It is true there were two high walls, the one on which we were standing and another fourteen miles away, but these were only secondary for in between lay cañon after cañon, running in every direction. One could not follow the course of the river, for one only caught here and there, what seemed to be a gleam of silver, but could see where some enormous power, probably water, had been at work and left to mark its way curious rock formations—castles, temples, forts—all situated on slopes or at the tops of high cliffs, each one perfect and distinct in its outline.

"It seemed like some magnificent Oriental city built upon hills, one lovely palace and temple above another and the ground beautifully terraced around each—all under a spell of enchantment.

"Nothing could have astonished one there. If I had seen the Prince of old, in gorgeous armor, riding up the rocky way to wake the Sleeping Princess, in one of those stony fastnesses, and break the long deep silence of the city with the busy hum of life, I would not have been surprised. It was all strange beyond description.

"One of the most marvellous things of all was the exquisite coloring. The rocks were all of red, brown and various colored sandstone and white and blue limestone. Sometimes all of these tints appeared in some splendid rock castle, often only one so that the variety was endless.

"Some of the terraces were covered with sage brush, which gave an olive tinge to the landscape and the darker shading of the cedar bushes, green shrubs and mosses added greatly to the scene.

"All this, with the soft haze of distance and tinted crimson and gold by the lingering light of the setting sun, made a picture weird and beautiful beyond one's wildest dreams.

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

"The length of the cañon is one thousand miles and the outer cliffs are over six thousand feet high. My first impression as I sat on a boulder, on the brink of one of these cliffs and looked into the abyss, was one of almost overwhelming awe. It was all so vast and strange and the silence so intense. A bird flying downward and circling slowly to the depths below filled one with terror.

"We lingered on the edge of the cañon until the sunset glory had faded into a delicate mauve and the twilight shadows were falling, then turned once more toward John Hance's cabin.

"The scene that lay behind us, while we were viewing the cañon, in what is known as the Coconino Basin, would anywhere else have been considered charming but seemed tame after what we had just seen.

"John Hance, on whose grounds we were to camp for a few days, is the guide into the cañon and is, in his way, quite a character. His imagination, which has ample time and suitable surroundings for cultivation, is unlimited, his repertory of stories inexhaustible, and his hospitality renowned.

"His house is a one-roomed log-cabin about fourteen feet square. The roof is of mud with sunflowers growing out of it and an old stovepipe answers for a chimney. There is a home-made fire-place of malapai rock at one end of the room, and when we returned from the brink of the cañon a bright fire was blazing in it, and preparations being made for our supper.

"That night we slept with no roof above our heads but the sky and a sheltering pine tree, one night with the mice in the log-cabin at Cedar Ranch [en route to the canyon], having been quite enough to satisfy any five women. We made our beds on one side of the camp-fire and the men made theirs on the other and, with the moon for a lamp and the distant howling of coyotes for a lullaby, we slept as only those who have slept in this glorious dry Arizona air can sleep.

"The next afternoon, as soon as the sun had gone away from the trail sufficiently to make walking endurable, we started down the cliff into the cañon, on our way to the Colorado river.

"We women discarded all unnecessary clothing and with a blouse waist, one ticking skirt, over a pair of trousers, stout shoes and cowboy hats tied under our chins, started down the trail.

"Jennie, a gentle little burro, belonging to John Hance led the way, loaded with two or three Navajo blankets, for bedding a small bag containing a few toilet articles and provisions for three days. John Hance went next and the rest of us straggled after as best we could.

"The thin people of the party evinced great eagerness to keep either far in advance or far behind the stouter members, who were frequently slipping and sitting down unexpectedly, often disturbing the equilibrium of the person nearest them.

"The trail into the cañon is excellent and to anyone whose head is at all clear perfectly safe. At every turn in the path the view changed and we caught glimpses of cañons in cañons and new wonders that we could not see from above.

"With many appeals to the demijohn of water, an occasional halt to repair the shoe of some fair damsel which had given out, we arrived at about six o'clock at a hut belonging to John Hance by the side of a cool spring.

"Having listened, before coming to the cañon, to the experience of a friend, who had once spent the night at this cabin and after many vain attempts to sleep had finally seated himself by the camp fire armed with a piece of wood to keep the mice at bay, we absolutely declined to sleep there, and although foot-sore and weary, with the effort of holding ourselves back to keep from slipping, on the loose stones, we marched on for another mile.

"There had been no water all the way down the trail until we reached the level ground near the cabin, and then we were continually crossing and re-crossing a brook, that rippled its way through many cañons, over numerous declivities to finally lose itself in the Colorado river.

"We camped, for the night, three miles from the river, in [a] box cañon with the brook gurgling along on one side of us. Supper was an easy and simple matter, we had brought so little with us, in the way of provisions and dishes, that it was soon dispatched, then we spread our blankets round the fire and with our backs against the rocks, told stories and made the walls of the cañon resound to songs, the like of which it never echoed to before, while we waited for the moon to rise.

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

"The moon had long been lighting the upper world before a beam reached us, but when the first stray gleam began to silver the peaks and turrets about us, the songs died on our lips and we sat in awed silence watching the marvellous transformations in every direction. Our box cañon was surrounded by the walls of other cañons still higher and long before we could see the moon itself its light touched the different rock formations, on the slopes and cliffs producing a most beautiful effect. Just beyond and considerably higher than the walls of the cañon, in which we were camped were some high cliffs of red sandstone, shaped like an amphitheatre which the moonlight and peculiar atmosphere of the cañon subdued to a rosy tint that was almost supernatural in its loveliness—it was a veritable fairy circle.

"We sat and watched these wonderful illuminations—first one dark spot became resplendent, then another—until the order was given to retire. We each received a Navajo blanket for a bed, and were told to go to sleep as we would have to start early in the morning before the sun could reach the trail to continue our journey to the river.

"With my blanket around me and a malapai rock for a pillow I lay for a long time bewildered by the wonderland about and unable to sleep. At last the face of the moon peeped over the cliff and lulled by the drowsy tinkle of Jennie's bell as she browsed near by I fell asleep.

"In the morning we found the loveliest wild flowers blooming about the brook, great white lilies with a delicious fragrance, tall yellow primroses, more delicate flowers of many varieties and a plentiful supply of Indian pinks or paint brush.

"As soon as our light breakfast was over we proceeded down the trail, going from one box cañon into another, crossing and re-crossing the brook, whose course we were following, until at length we came to a place where it dropped suddenly over a precipice in a fall of twenty or thirty feet. There was a level stretch of land below, then a cañon-wall to climb and when the top of that was gained a steep descent on the other side. There were no rope-ladders or even ledges for us to rest our feet upon in these steep places, as the rocks were worn smooth by the action of water, but all such obstacles had to be overcome if we wished to go to the river. So with a rope tied round our waists and dealt out slowly by some of the gentlemen above, we went, hand over hand down another rope fastened at the top and bottom of the fall.

"One by one sometimes gaining foothold, frequently slipping, we all reached the bottom in safety.

"We had to go over seven falls, before reaching the river the highest of these being sixty feet. It made one feel a little nervous to look from that height at the friends below and think that one's turn must soon come to descend into those depths.

"I was the last one to go down the highest fall and as I started from the top, after the rope had been adjusted around my waist, John Hance said 'Now if you can't find foothold don't be scared. Just let yourself slip.' So not being very tall after waving my feet wildly about for a while, to find something to rest them upon, I followed his injunction and proceeded to slip.

"The Lieutenant had placed himself on a perilous ledge near the top of the fall, to steady the rope and help us if possible. As I slid someone called out that I would misplace the rope, and fearing that if I did so I would drag the men from their various perches, for several of them were stationed at intervals to assist us in our descent, I loosened my hold rolled over and in a moment more was dangling in mid-air by the waist rope with a tiny stream of cold water flowing over me.

"At first I was alarmed, fearing that I had knocked the Lieutenant from his ledge, but when I had summoned courage enough to look in that direction and saw the white helmet still in its place and only a little dented from my rolling over it I had time to laugh at my own undignified position, although from the silence in the group below, I knew to an observer it did not seem any laughing matter.

"A little swinging and beating the rocks with my hands and feet and I reached the rope again and finally the ground.

"One more fall, not quite so steep as the others, a short walk in the sand in a box cañon and we had reached the river.

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

"The Colorado river is the most uncanny stream one could possibly dream of—it is a very nightmare of a river. It rushes black, sullen, turbulent between perpendicular walls of solid granite not a tree, shrub or any living thing in sight—only a torrent of muddy water dashing madly over jagged rocks and the sun beating unwinkingly down upon it. It is just such a river as Doré would have been delighted to portray. It might have been the River Styx itself—one almost looked around with a shiver for the ferryman.

"I could readily understand now the refusal of a gentleman of Flagstaff to join our party. He had never seen the view from the rim of the cañon, but some years ago, with two or three men trying to find a way to take some cattle out of the country, had been lost on the Mojave Desert, and after nearly dying of thirst, the party had wandered into one of the cañons of the Grand Cañon, with sides so high and narrow that they could see the stars in the day-time [repeating of often-told misnomer], and that cañon had terminated in the Colorado river. Here two of the men calked a wagon box with their under-clothing and with considerable difficulty crossed to the other side of the stream to see if they could find any way out of their predicament.

"They had to retrace their steps, however, and after several days wandering came upon some wagons belonging to a party of Mormons who had been massacred by the Indians and so found their way to a settlement. Little wonder after such an experience the invitation to accompany us should be declined with 'No thank you. I don't care to go to Hades on a pleasure trip.'

"It certainly could not have been warmer in any climate, no matter how tropical, than it was at the river that summer day, so after walking out on some stones to a ledge to obtain a better view of this most unattractive stream, we gladly turned our backs upon it to seek the shelter of some nook where the noonday sun did not linger.

"Late that afternoon we returned to our camping ground in the box cañon and early the next morning began our trip up the trail to the place where we had left our horses and wagons [sic].

"Some of the gentlemen had cut us sticks of mescal, a long pointed stalk that grows out of a cactus-like plant. These being light and strong were of great assistance in climbing.

"According to John Hance it is only seven miles from the rim of the cañon to the river, but Arizona miles must certainly be longer than those of any other part of the world, and as our camp ground was supposed to be three miles from the latter point we had still four miles to travel up a cliff that seemed nearly vertical. We had been told never to look at the top of the cañon as we climbed and so gazing unflinchingly at our feet, we toiled wearily on.

"One of the young ladies and myself had thus far refused all aid from the men, as we had started out with the knowledge that the trip would be a hard one and did not wish to be a burden to any of the men. We disdained the thought of being delicate young women.

"We had set out from camp at a few minutes before seven o'clock that morning and had been very brave at first, resting only at long intervals and in the most inviting places. As the morning advanced, one by one the different ladies of the party disappeared, with their escorts, somewhere in the trail above us until at last only my friend Miss A—, three gentlemen and myself were left creeping slowly up. At eleven o'clock we were still on the trail and so fatigued that we sat down to rest anywhere even in the dust and were willing to accept the least aid offered. Our throats were parched, the demijohn of water empty and someone, who had made a trip halfway down the trail the day before had drained the canteen we had carefully hidden for our return. We women sank now at almost every step. Once we dropped down to rest for a second and in that instant both fell asleep and dreamed. We were almost hysterical from weariness and it seemed to me if I had many yards further to go I should certainly die. With considerable assistance we at last reached the top more dead than alive and how strange it seemed to be once more on level ground.

"How we ever reached our camp again I never knew, but we did and had just enough strength left to crawl to our bed under the pine tree and throwing ourselves upon it fell at once into a deep sleep from which we awoke greatly refreshed.

"It was remarkable how quickly we recovered from our exhaustion, for with the exception of sore throats, which lasted several days, probably from the result of rapid respiration and lack of water, and a little stiffness

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

of the muscles we were quite ready to return home the next day, our only regret being that our delightful holiday was so soon to end.

"We reached Flagstaff without accident and with the feeling that we had communed with Nature heart to heart and that she had revealed to us some of her secrets.

"Recently a stage line has been established to the Grand Cañon, from Flagstaff, making the trip in twelve hours, and hotel accommodations, of a primitive sort, have been provided for tourists so that even now the journey is a comparatively comfortable one.

"There is also the prospect of a railroad and hotel in the near future. But it saddens one a little to think of those long echoes being roused by the shriek of a locomotive—that eloquent silence in which we listen with bated breath for the voice of God as it was heard in the beginning when His Spirit 'moved upon the face of the waters' and he said, 'Let the waters be gathered together and the dry land appear'—broken forever by the footsteps of civilization."

1894

Anonymous

- 357 1894 [Note on lecture and remarks.] From: Geological Section • • • March 20, 1894. In: Reports of Meetings [SECTION]. Birmingham Natural History and Philosophical Society, Journal (Birmingham, England), 1 [1894-1895]: 16.

"Mr. W. P. Marshall read a paper on 'The Grand Cañon of the Colorado River, Arizona.' The paper was illustrated by diagrams, maps, and water colour drawings. Mr. Councillor Wallis gave a description of his visit to the Cañon, with a detailed account of Hance's Trail. Dr. Lapworth suggested the probable cause of the formation of the Cañon. A cordial vote of thanks was given to Mr. Marshall for his paper." (ENTIRE NOTE)

Berg, Gustav (Freiherrn von)

- 358 1894 An Meine Lieben in der Heimat. Reisebriefe aus Nord-Amerika vom 25. Juli bis 28. November 1893. Wien: K. u. k. Hofbuchhandlung Wilhelm Frick, 201 pp., map. [In German.]
(transl. 'To my loved ones at home. Travel letters from North America from July 25 to November 28, 1893.')

Grand Canyon, see pp. 114-116; a rather rushed trip to Hance's.

"Am 3. October, Früh 6 Uhr, sassen wir auf dem Wagen zum Grand Cañon. Ich habe einmal erwähnt, das Leben in Amerika sei gar nicht so theuer, das ist richtig, wenn man auf der geraden Strasse bleibt, sich Morgens selbst rasirt und die Stiefel putzt, seine drei Meats (Mahlzeiten) im Tage verzehrt und nur Eiswasser trinkt. Wehe dem, der sich nicht damit begnügt! Für Rasiren und Haarschneiden ist man sofort seine 2½ fl. los, unser elender Wagen für zwei Tage zum Cañon kostete 150 fl. und für einen zweistündigen Spazierritt am Rande des Grand Cañon zahlten wir 18 fl.! Wohl betrug die Entfernung von Flagstaff 110 Kilometer, die Wege waren schauerlich und wir wechselten viermal die Pferde, aber 150 fl. ist auch viel Geld. • • •

"Gegen 6 Uhr Abends, als wir uns dem Cañon näherten, kamen zwei Reiter herangesprengt: Ministerialrath v. Ottlik und Herr László v. Goger aus unserem Ackerbau-Ministerium! Wir hatten mit denselben schon in Los Angeles verabredet, den Colorado Cañon gemeinschaftlich zu besuchen, durch die Einstellung des Bahnverkehrs war aber eine Unordnung in unser Programm gekommen, erwähnte Herren trafen einen Tag früher als wir in Flagstaff ein. Die Herren hatten unser heutiges Erscheinen wohl erwartet und waren uns entgegengeritten. Zwei hochgebildete, liebenswürdige Ungarn, mit denen wir durch Arizona und Colorado weiterreisten und dadurch eine höchst angenehme Reisegesellschaft erhielten. Sie waren vom Grand Colorado Cañon so entzückt, dass sie uns noch bei untergehender Sonne an den Rand desselben führten. In der That wunderbar, vielleicht das grösste Naturwunder der Welt! • • •

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

"Kein Lüftchen regte sich, die Sonne senkte sich zum Horizonte und sandte ihre letzten Strahlen auf die rothen Sandsteingebilde, und dann kam die Dämmerung und immer schauerlicher wurde unser Gefühl bei dem Blicke in den immer dunkler werdenden bodenlosen Abgrund! Wie lieblich erschien unserer Erinnerung dagegen der rosaroth gefärbte Cañon des Yellowstone-Parkes mit seinen glänzenden Wasserfällen und seiner lebendigen Natur! Der Colorado-Cañon ist unbeschreiblich schön, grossartig, überwältigend, aber schauerlich. Und doch gibt es auch Leben da unten! • • •

"Das Hôtel am Cañon bestand aus einem Dutzend kleiner und einem grösseren Zelte, welch letzteres als Speisesalon und Küche benützt wurde. Jeder von uns occupirte eines der Zelte, aber in der dunklen Nacht wehte über die Hochebene ein Sturm, der die Zelte in ihren Grundfesten erschütterte. Am Tage auf der Reise hatte die Sonne tüchtig gebrannt, in der Nacht war es bitterlich kalt und das Waschen am frühen Morgen mit dem eiskalten Wasser war ein zweifelhaftes Vergnügen. Trotzdem haben sich meine Ladies brav gehalten, ob sie in dem einsamen Zelte viel geschlafen, möchte ich nicht behaupten. Gerne wären wir einige Tage am Abgrunde des Colorado-Cañon gestanden, aber das Uebrige! Auch wünschten unsere Landsleute weiter zu kommen, so brachen wir nach einer Zeltnacht am frühen Morgen wieder auf und waren Abends 8 Uhr bei unserem chinesischen Koch in Flagstaff."

(translation)

'On October 3rd, at 6 o'clock in the morning, we sat on the carriage to the Grand Canyon. I once mentioned that life in America is not that expensive, that's true if you stay on the straight road, shave yourself in the morning and shine your boots, eat your three meals a day and only drink ice water. Woe to him who is not content with that! A shave and a haircut will set you back 2½ fl., our miserable carriage for two days to the canyon cost 150 fl. and we paid 18 fl. for a two-hour ride along the edge of the Grand Canyon! The distance from Flagstaff was 110 kilometers, the roads were horrible and we changed horses four times, but 150 fl. is also a lot of money. • • •

'About 6 o'clock in the evening, as we approached the canyon, two riders came galloping up: Ministerialrath v. Ottlik [see also Ottlik (1894)] and Mr. László v. Goger from our Department of Agriculture! We had already arranged with them in Los Angeles to visit the Colorado Canyon together, but the cessation of rail traffic had disrupted our program, the gentlemen mentioned arrived in Flagstaff a day earlier than we did. The gentlemen had probably expected our appearance today and rode to meet us. Two highly educated, amiable Hungarians, with whom we continued our journey through Arizona and Colorado, and were thus made extremely pleasant companions. They were so enchanted by the Grand Colorado Canyon that they took us to the edge of it even as the sun was setting. Wonderful indeed, perhaps the greatest natural wonder in the world! • • •

'Not a breeze stirred, the sun sank to the horizon and sent its last rays onto the red sandstone formations, and then dusk came and our feeling became more and more horrible as we looked into the ever darkening bottomless abyss! How lovely, on the other hand, did the pink-hued canyon of Yellowstone Park appear to our memory, with its glittering waterfalls and living nature! The Colorado Canyon is indescribably beautiful, grand, overwhelming, but horrifying. And yet there is life down there too! • • •

'The hotel at the Canyon consisted of a dozen smaller tents and one larger one, the latter being used as a dining room and kitchen. Each of us occupied one of the tents, but in the dark night a storm blew across the plateau and shook the tents to their foundations. During the day on the journey the sun had burned hard, at night it was bitterly cold and washing in the ice-cold water in the early morning was a dubious pleasure. Nevertheless, my ladies behaved well; I wouldn't say that they slept a lot in the lonely tent. We would have liked to have stood at the edge of the Colorado Canyon for a few days, but the rest [of the trip awaited]! Our compatriots also wished to go further, so we left early in the morning after a night in tents and were at 8 o'clock in the evening with our Chinese cook in Flagstaff.'

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

Brooks, Fred Emerson

359 1894 Old Ace and other poems. New York: Cassell Publishing Co., 208 pp.

See "The Grand Canyon of the Colorado", p. 167:

Midway to heaven I stand between two skies:
The blue above, the purple one below.
Far down the depths the screaming eagle flies,
To solitude the solitary foe.

Clutching a shrub, and leaning o'er the brink
I see a river dwindle to a thread;
So far below parched Nature may not drink;
A vein of life still pulsing through the dead.

The soft white clouds float o'er the canyon brown,
Like troops of angels stealing from the sky;
Thus heaven smiles brightest where earth wears a frown,
While grandeur ever lifts the soul on high.

Heaven finds on earth some quiet dwelling-place,
Where e'en the skeptic must his Maker scan
And cry in awe before Him, face to face:
How infinite is God! How puny, man!

Culmer, Henry L. A.

360 1894 Mountain art. Overland Monthly, Series 2, 24 (October): 341-352.

See pp. 346-347, critique of Thomas Moran's "Chasm of the Colorado" (not mentioned by title), which was then hanging in the U.S. Capitol. He notes (p. 347), however, in his critique of Moran's "Grand Cañon of the Yellowstone", that it is "the companion piece to the Utah [sic] subject referred to".

Graves, Frank K.

361 1894 Report of the Forty-third Annual Convention of the Vermont Teachers' Association, at Montpelier, September 29, 30, and October 1, 1932. In: The Thirty-third Vermont School Report, made by the State Superintendent of Education, to the Legislature, October, 1894. Montpelier: Watchman Publishing Co., pp. 53-56.

See p. 53: "Professor G. H. Perkins of the University of Vermont then delivered a lecture on 'The Grand Canon of Colorado.' [sic]" (ENTIRE NOTE)

Holloway, J. F.

362 1894 Our club. Cassier's Magazine, 6(36) (October): 468-479.

The Engineers' Club of New York. See p. 478, "Who, that was privileged to listen to our versatile member and mining engineer, can ever forget the splendidly painted word picture he gave us in an after-dinner talk, and which might well have been called 'The Vision of the Canyon of the Colorado?'" A brief recollection of a presentation probably made by Robert Brewster Stanton.

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

Huhn, Heinrich

- 363 1894 Eine Turnfahrt nach dem Stillen Meer. Amerikanischer Turner-Kalender (Milwaukee, Wisconsin), 15: 27-45. [In German.]
(transl. 'A gymnastic trip to the Pacific Ocean')

Grand Canyon, p. 30; brief description of a visit at Peach Springs.

"Etwa 150 Meilen weiter westlich kommen wir nach Peach Springs, von wo ein Weg nach dem großen Colorado Canyon, unbedingt der größten und schauerlichsten Felsensdilucht auf der Erde, abzweigt. Der Weg von hier nach dem großen Canyon ist nur 18 Meilen lang und wird entweder zu Fuß oder per Wagen zurückgelegt. Für die keineswegs geringen Strapazen dieses Weges wird der Reisende aber 10,000 fach belohnt durch die schauerlich-großartige Scenerie, die der Canyon dem Auge bietet. Nichts auf der Erde läßt sich mit dem großen Colorado [sic] Canyon vergleichen. In einer Entfernung von mehr als 150 Meilen hat sich der Fluß stellenweise 2000 Meter tief sein Bett gegraben bis auf den Granitboden hinab. Nahezu senkrechte Wände von 6000 Fuß Höhe thürmen sich auf und dämmen den wild dahin brausenden Strom ein. Nur während einigen Stunden des Tages gelingt es dem Sonnenlicht, die am Fuß der Schlucht dahinfließenden Wellen des Flusses mit seinem Golde zu umsäumen."

(translation)

'About 150 miles west we come to Peach Springs, from where a trail branches off to the great Colorado Canyon, arguably the largest and most terrifying canyon on earth. The trip from here to the great canyon is only 18 miles, either on foot or by wagon. For the by no means small hardships of this way, the traveler is rewarded 10,000 times by the awfully magnificent scenery that the canyon offers to the eye. Nothing on earth compares to the great Colorado [sic] Canyon. Over a distance of more than 150 miles, the river has dug its bed 2000 meters deep in places, down to the granite floor. Nearly vertical walls of 6000 feet tower up and curb the wildly roaring torrent. Only during a few hours of the day does the sunlight manage to encircle the waves of the river flowing at the bottom of the gorge with its gold.'

Nesmith, J. E. [Nesmith, James Ernest]

- 364 1894 Philoctetes and other poems and sonnets. Cambridge, Massachusetts: Riverside Press, 111 pp.

See "The Grand Cañon of the Colorado River", pp. 62-71 (one of Grand Canyon's lengthier monuments in verse); and "Point Sublime, Colorado Cañon", pp. 103-104:

THE GRAND CAÑON OF THE COLORADO RIVER

"He cutteth out rivers among the rocks." —JOB.

I.

The harmonies of this unfathomable world,—
The unimaginable music of the spheres,—
Flow thro' the universe with all the notes
Of mystery and terror in their tones.
The mighty Being burdens every star
With perplex'd music, awful harmonies,
Whose echo is the voice of winds and seas,
The noise of torrents and the sounding fall
Of ice cliffs in the cold and silent Alps.
So night by night the solemn harmony
Of nature, chaunted to the spiritual ear,
Flows thro' the depths of thought, tells how it past
By desert plains and valleys terrible,
Old lava floods and scoriac acres scurf'd
With sulphur, dross of ore and mineral scum,
High up on sombre Ætna's ruined sides:

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

By Krakatoa, and the earthquake peaks
Of topmost Chili, seen and heard far off.
At night, by seamen plying from the cape :
By polar oceans justling with huge bergs
And icy sea crags, quarried from the cliffs
That hang like spectres round the gleaming shores,
In the weird gloaming of an Arctic night.

II.

Such desolations and strange scenes of death
Might breed an awful doubt to stand in thought
Like giants in the twilight of a world.
Like a bold painter, for the picturesque
In undiscover'd lands a traveler,
Have I pursued the beautiful, and sought
The great scarr'd visions of the antique earth;
Upon the desert's wither'd face I learn'd
To trace the fading features of the Past;
And slept among its ruins desolate,
Its rigid deserts thick with upright rocks
Which rose in unimaginable forms
Rear'd by the Tiger God of glowing Fire;
Travers'd by wild ravines in whose bright depths
Tumultuous rivers glittered silently
Beneath the midnight stars and nomad moon.
The secret inmost dale of pathless woods
Is not to me a solitary spot;
The peaceful fellowship of aged trees
To me has been a pleasure, and I love
Upon a hush'd midsummer night to haunt
The ancient pinewoods when the moonbeams slant
Thro' their immense and sombre colonnades,
In silence wrapped and trancelike quietness,
As if some Merlin of the Forest wrought
A stillness round them, save what odorous winds
Sigh fitfully in dreams, and stir the dews,
Troubling the dusky giants in their sleep.
And at the death of dim autumnal days
Religiously I seek their columned aisles
By sweet and solemn visions tenanted;
What time the bright and speechless sun descends
With slow unwilling steps the western sky,
And burns upon the threshold of the night,
A fiery meteor with flashing hair;
Leaving his once serene domain the prey
Of darkness and the wreck of wandering fires,
As fallen kings, dethron'd and driven forth
Desert their doomed and blazing capitals;
Fusing the solid bulk of monstrous clouds,
That glow and burn and stretched like smouldering coals,
Fringe the nocturnal woods with gloomy flame.

III.

Eternal Nature, "Mother of Form and Fear,"
At dusk, at midnight, I have question'd thee,
Dumb Mother, eloquent with earnest eyes,—
When thro' the fragrant gloom thy face immense

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

Loom'd in the clouds, with awful indistinctness:
Among the mountains of the world my feet
Have moved beside the footprints of thy power;—
The awful ruins of the first of days
Around me I beheld,—the crags and peaks
Of many a formidable hill which stood
Of old environ'd with volcanian fire,
Which the eternal lichen years have made
The robber eagle's cold, unchanging haunt;
Which now in their unbroken quietness
Reflect from ages the tranquillity
That still inhabits the vast universe:
Whether in icy immortality
They glitter in the lightnings of the morn,
Sheath'd in perpetual snow of perfect sheen;
Or naked, bare,—masses of sullen rock,
They rise above a sea of stunted pines,
Whence many an avalanche of shatter'd stone
Descends, now stationary, motionless;
Vast floods of ruin loosen'd from the sky.
All seems eternal now and peaceful there,
And the incredible high Powers that dwelt,
In vastness and in light, among their peaks
Have vanish'd like the lightning from the sky
From their imperishable awful thrones,
Where insects and faint butterflies dare wave
The thinnest texture of ethereal wings,
Aye, in the inmost fane of former brightness:
Where puny man may climb with toil and pain,
And dare adventure his frail limbs and life
In the high places of primeval gods.
The solemn harmony of Nature rolls
Forever round those scarp'd and barren hills
And thro' the vales; O may my studied song,
Some echo, some faint cadence, some slight tone,
Win from that mighty sea of melody,
And the stretch'd scrutiny of my rapt mind;
Some feeble accent, faint and far away,—
That it may snatch a mortal utterance thus
And murmur of the ocean of the world;
Like distant breathings of a seaborne shell
Still haunted by the sound of winds and tides,—
The mimic music of the universe.

IV.

Lo! what a ruin, broad and terrible
And bright, the silent cataracts of time
Wrought here upon the texture of the earth;
Exposing visibly the hollow shell
And rocky frame of a primeval world,
In bony nakedness as if a sea
Withdrawn should leave its ancient basin bare.
Mysterious tides of sleep and death flow here,
Thro' these still chasms flow, not here confused
With the creative energies of life,
But almost to the sense made audible
In the tense silence of the wilderness,

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

A faint attrition round the crumbling rocks,
Glutting the viewless caves with voiceless streams.
From their colossal monuments around
The awful phantoms of ten thousand years
Look down in mockery of human power.
Domes, temples, pyramids,—dark gulfs between
And stony vales, unfathomable deeps,—
Rise here in hugest mimicry of Art
And walls magnificent of looming rock;
Their naked desolation and decay
Wrapp'd in pure color,—an ethereal veil
Upon their crags, which Ruin itself has wrought
In noble forms, Olympian, fair and large,
Proportion'd to the calm desire of gods,
In the simplicity of placid power.
Strange scene of death, where vast destruction takes Creative force, and builds enormous works;
Naked and stript, save where some tortur'd cedar Grasps with convulsive roots the dizzy edge
In terror, leaning forth, and seems to gaze
Far down with horror into the vast depths.

V.

Thus thou, mysterious Chasm, thou hast lain
Unnumber'd ages hid; around thee spread
Wide deserts, pathless woods, dark continents,
Unguess'd by the old gazing Intellect,
Yet the rude savage, taciturn and wild,
In ignorant fear and superstitious awe,
Heard thy invisible torrents and the voice
Of subterranean and tormented streams,
Woven in legends by the painted braves
And witchlike squaws around a smouldering brand.
Imagination, kindling as she flies
From peak to peak, from crag to crag, in vain
Lights up thy features with her feeble ray,
Wrapped in a dizzy trance where myriad shapes,
Like shadows, shades of the material world,
Wonders and visions, ruins and desolations,
Peer dimly on the brain and dimly fade;
Mingling the vast, the terrible, the bright,
Glimpses of desert wastes and burning sands,
The nakedness of the unfountain'd moon,
The fall of mighty rivers and the moan
Of midnight oceans at their endless task,
Foaming in vain around terrestrial shores.

VI.

Methinks a dreadful journey I did take
In the abyss, between the Thunder Crags.
Ruin on ruin hung above and cliffs
Whose heads among the clouds stood fearfully;
Naked and scarr'd and rude; their gloomy brows
Held high together over the dim gulf,
Touching their giant crags and jutting horns.
At night the distant and declining sun,
Haunting the clouds with his expiring rays,

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

Shot forth his beams in anger ere he sank
Behind the serried hills; the sombre cliffs,
Tall pinnacles, and rough-hewn obelisks,
Flush'd with unearthly and inconstant fires;
While Darkness, stealing from the fallen sun,
Crept forth to feed upon the tender light,
And batten on the gleam of dying day:
But soon the stars rekindled the dark sky,
In numbers like the pigeons that return
At dusk, from distant fields and groves,
With thunder of their multitudinous wings,
In myriads to their immemorial pines.
Then all those haggard heights and gloomy gulfs
And indistinguishable floods, were swiftly cross'd
By the white spirit of the wandering moon;
Whose soul look'd coldly down from her bright path,
Amid the clusters of her meteors,—
Like the scared image of a lady pale
Awaken'd from dark dreams to gaze upon
The awful spectre of an ancient wrong.

VII.

Like marble crags upon Pentelicus,
The wild and water—worn and moon-blanch'd cliffs
Lifted their silent countenances bright
Round the tormented stream that raged below,
A legion of wild billows lifted fierce,
Each like a vulture leaving his flat perch
But chain'd to earth and swiftly falling back,
Only to spring again more fiercely forth.
Except for the torrent gnawing at its heart,
In silence broken by its waves alone,
Lay all that mighty wilderness asleep,
Ghastly and rude and bare and desolate.
Brightening the dark skirts of a sombre cloud,
Far ran the moon along the infinite sky,
Hastening to her eclipse; while nature slept
In trancèd stillness strange and ominous.
Anon the thunder rais'd a solemn voice
In gloomy menace to the sullen earth;
Then came a giant brood of venom'd clouds
Herded by the dark genii of the storm,
And roll'd and tumbled by the gloomy winds;
The lightning like a crooked vein of fire
Fled thro' the depth and abysm of the night,—
While many a cliff with dreadful countenance
Look'd forth unmov'd from the unnatural sky.
All night the tempest raged, nor ceased
Until the fiery sun arose and glared
Upon its sullen rear with angry eye,
Where in the dreary west it brooded low,
Drifting before the sunbeams and fresh gales,
In cloudy hills on the horizon piled,—
With its decaying cliffs and toppling crags,
Decrepit whirlwinds and old wither'd walls.
So all day long the burning sun pursued
The ruin'd form of the old dying storm,

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

As a harsh master with vindictive force
Urges his gloomy cattle o'er the plain,
Scattering them onward with a ruthless brand;
Tho' their unwieldy hulks propell'd along
By insufficient fires and brutish minds
With no effectual speed plod on before.

POINT SUBLIME, COLORADO CAÑON

I.

Rainbow-hued, ragged, wild, and terrible,
The giant gulf lies open at my feet;
A wilderness of ruins that repeat
All architectural forms,—pinnacle
And pyramid and tower; the rocky shell
And ribs of some old crumbled world, replete
With horror, scorched by an intolerable heat:—
Some agony of Nature here befell!
The ponderous Earth alone in some fierce throe,
Convulsion, paroxysm, passion fit,—
Has force to shatter thus! Nay, far below,
The petty cause of the enormous pit,
Lost, buried in the gloom itself hath made,
The river burrows in eternal shade.

II.

The power that built above the cloudy skies
Andes and Caucasus with heads of snow,
Wrought here with equal strength in earth below,
And dug th' abyss by giant contraries;
Opening the mouths of monstrous cavities,
Whose depths profound are shut in walls which throw
Perpetual gloom; driving the rocks to flow
Like water to the seas whence they did rise.
Nature here turned upon herself with beak
And claw, and tore her breast in blind despair;
Her very entrails lie expos'd and bare,
The stony structure of a world antique,
Sculptur'd in mighty forms of dome and peak,
Uplifted far below in liquid air.

Ottlik, Iván. [Ottlik, Ivántól]

- 365 1894 Úti levelek Amerikából. Harmadik és utolsó közlemény. Budapesti Szemle (Magyar Tudományos Akadémia, Budapest), 78(210): 398-415. [In Hungarian.]
(transl. 'Travel letters from America. Third and final communication')

Author signs as "Ottlik Iván" (p. 415); name given on volume contents pages as "Ottlik Ivántól". This item comprises parts VI and VII of the Hungarian's visit to America. Part VI, dated "Flagstaff, Arizona, 1893 október havában." ('in the month of October 1893') (pp. 398-409), includes his record of a canyon visit at Hance's. They arrive after a wagon trip from Flagstaff (p. 402):

"Épen leáldozott a nap, mikor a sátor-táborhoz értünk, mely a Cannyon szélétől alig száz méternyi távolságra van berendezve, s melyet a Cannyon híres remetéjének és vezetőjének nevére «Hance's Camp» nek neveztek.

"Néhány holdnyi terjedelniű tisztás van itt a fenyveserdő sűrűjébe vágva. A tisztás egy réizje be van kerítve az ott legelésző lovak számára. E karám közepén gömbölyű, faragatlan fenyőfa-tönkökből épített kicsinyke

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

block-ház áll, melyben nyílt tűzhely mellett letelepedve találtuk a vendéglőst, vállalkozó szellemű fiatal yankeet, két csinos nővérel és az öreg Hance Jánost, a Colorado Canyon remetéjét.

“A karámon kívül hívogatón fehérlettek a két sorban kifeszített apró vászonsátrak. Ezek nagyobb része egy-egy útas befogadására van szánva, meglehetősen rusztikus egyszerűségű—de kifogástalan tisztaságú—tábori ágygyal, mosdóasztallal és székkal felszerelve.

“A két sor arról a kabin-sátor mellett áll egy nagyobb sátor, melyben a konyha és ebédlő van berendezve.

“Érdekes, festői látványt nyújtott ez az elhagyott, lakatlan vadon közepén berendezett kis vászon-város. De mi most nem sokat törődtünk ennek festői regényességével; mert magnetikus erővel vonzott partjaihoz a Canyon széle, melynek távolról vöröslő szirtfalai, midőn útunk utolsó pár kilométernyi részében néha egy-egy pillantásra föl-fölvillantak szemünk előtt, máris kezdtek némi halvány sejtelmet adni a csodadolgokról, melyek itt reánk várákoznak.

“Majdnem rohanó léptekkel siettünk tehát az erdő széléhez, mely egyszersmind a Canyon szegélye is.

“Bármily nagy várakozásokkal telten jöttünk legyen ide: mégis midőn kiérve a fenyvesek közül a meredek széléreértünk, önkénytelen kéjes borzadályal majdnem visszatántorodunk a földöntúli látványtól, mely ott elénkbe tárul, s akaratlanul is a bámuló elragadtatás fölkiáltása röppen el ajkainkról! Majdnem közvetlenül lábaink alatt, mintegy az alvilág bejárataként látjuk egyszerre föltárulni a föld titokzatos méhét. Beláthatatlan, feneketlen mélységbe hatol le tekintetünk, s a legtöbb helyütt hiába kutat, nem tudja fölfedezni a Canyon alapját. Csak itt-ott látjuk a szakadék mélyéből föltornyosuló, túlvilágian-kísérteties formájú szikla-alakzatok közt, a messze távolban, mélyen lábaink alatt föl-fölcsillanni az odalent szédítő rohanással, tajtékozó forgatagok közt tova hömpölygő folyam vizének csillogását. De a folyam ide a messzeségbe, zúgva-búgva vágató örvényeiről mit sem árul el, s gyarló szemünk kanyargó hullámaint inkább egy békén tova sikamló kis erdei patak ezüstszalagjának véli.

“Hiába kutat emlékezésünk alkalmas tárgy után, hiába erőlködik a képzelet, hogy olyan képet találjon, melyhez leírásunkban a Colorado-Canyont hasonlíthassuk: nincs a föld kerekiségén ehhez fogható sehol! • • •

“A szép verőfényes őszi nap után már este felé bűvös éjszakai szél kerekedett. Az éj beálltával a szél is mindegyre hevesebb lett, s végre éjjél tájban valódi orkánná fajult. Kis vászonsátorunk minden ízében recsegett, ropogott lökései alatt; úgy hogy minden perczen azt hittük, hogy a könnyű sátrakat mindenestől fölkapva, lakóikkal együtt a Canyon csábító mélyébe sodorja. • • •

“A Point Moranról visszatérőben Hance barátunk ahhoz az ösvényhez kalauzolt, mely a Canyon fenekéig levezet. Ezt az ösvényt bosszú, kalandos kutatások árán ő fedezte föl, és nem csekély munkával gyalogosok és ösvérek számára használhatóvá tette. Időnk, sajnos, rövidebbre volt szabva, hogysem a fáradságos leszállást a Canyon-fenekig megtehetjük volna, mert ez a kirándulás legalább még további két napot igényelt volna. Be kellett tehát érniünk azzal, hogy próbaképen pár száz méternyi mélységig leszálljunk a gyorsan kanyargó gyalogcsapás nyaktörően meredek lejtőin. De már ez a rövidke kóstoló is elég volt arra, hogy fáradságtól lihegve térjünk ismét vissza kirándulásunkból.

“Persze vezetőnk, ki egész életét itt, e meredek sziklák közt tölti, föl se vette ezt a kis fáradságot.

“Érdekes alakja volt e vezető ennek a magányos, misztikus vadonnak. Azért midőn visszatérve, a Canyon szélén pihenésre dőltünk, elmeséltettük vele élet-történetét. • • •

“Jól kipihentük fáradalmainkat, mire vezetőnk autobiographáját elmesélte, s azért lovainkra kapva, visszatértünk a sátor táborhoz. De nem soká volt itt sem maradásunk, - lunch után azonnal ismét nyeregbe ültünk, hogy most nyugat felé egész a Bissels-Point-ig haladva, barangoljuk be a Canyon partjait; nem győzve bámulni annak mindegyre változatosabb, s mentül tovább nézzük, annál újabb, annál meglepőbb képeit.

“Nehezen bírtunk megválni e helytől, mely mint hogy ha a gyermekkorunkban hallott tündérregéknek az élénk gyermekképzlet alkotta bűbájos színhelyeit varázsolta volna szemünk elé; s mely most e tündérvessző varázseréjével tartott magához lánczolja.”

(translation, in some measure freely)

“The sun had just set when we reached the tent camp, which was set up just a hundred yards from the edge of the Canyon, and which was called “Hance's Camp” after the name of the Canyon's famous hermit and guide.

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

'There are a few acres of clearing here cut into the thick pine forest. A part of the clearing is fenced for the horses grazing there. In the middle of this paddock is a small block house built of round, uncarved pine logs, where we found the innkeeper, an enterprising young yankee, his two pretty sisters, and old John Hance, a hermit in the Colorado Canyon, sitting by an open stove.

'Outside the paddock, the tiny canvas tents stretched out in two rows were inviting. Most of them are designed to accommodate a single person, with a rather rustic simplicity—but impeccably clean—equipped with a camp bed, washbasin and chair.

'Next to the two rows of cabin tents is a larger tent with a kitchen and dining area.

'This small canvas town, furnished in the middle of an abandoned, uninhabited wilderness, provided an interesting, picturesque sight. But we did not care much now for the picturesque novelty of this; because the edges of the Canyon attract with magnetic force, whose distant red cliffs, as they sometimes flashed up before our eyes for a moment in the last few kilometers of our journey, were already beginning to give some faint mystery of the wonders that await us here.

'So we hurried almost to the edge of the forest, which is also the edge of the Canyon.

'We came here with whatever high expectations: yet as soon as we reached the steep edge of the pine forests, we almost stumble back from the unearthly sight, which unfolds before us, and involuntarily cries of rapture fly from our lips! Almost just below our feet, as the entrance to the underworld, we see the mysterious uterus of the earth unearthed at once. Our gaze penetrates unpredictable, bottomless depths, and in most places it searches in vain, unable to discover the foundation of the Canyon. Only here and there can we see the otherworldly, spooky rock formations towering from the depths of the abyss, and in the far distance, deep under our feet, with a dizzying rush, the sparkle of water of a flowing stream. But in the distance the river tells us nothing about its galloping vortices, roaring and humming, and our eyes see the meandering waves more like the silver ribbon of a small forest stream gliding peacefully.

'We stand almost on the edge of the cliff in admiration; all our senses are captivated by this otherworldly sight. For a long time, we forget ourselves. And yet, no matter how long we look at it, at first sight we can only take in an uncertain chaos of thousands of impressions that affect our senses, without being able to distinguish, recognize, remember and engrave certain details of the miracle-sight that has been revealed to our eyes all at once: so new and unusual, unimaginable, something so completely beyond the proportions of known dimensions, that suddenly split the crust of the land, the magnificent Canyon of the Colorado River!

'No matter how much we search for a suitable object in our memory, no matter how hard the imagination tries to find an image to which we can compare the Colorado Canyon in our description: there is nowhere on earth like this! • • • '

[The author retires for a while into the already obligatory tossing of the world's great mountains into the chasm, offers a note of world architecture, recites the colors of the rainbow, describes great geometric shapes, and expresses astonishment at the false perspectives of distances. He describes the sounds and sights of the end of a boulder rolled into the canyon by Hance, pointing out that this is but one small action compared to the annual work of nature.]

'After the beautiful bright autumn day, there was a magical night wind towards the evening. As the night began, the wind became more and more intense, and at last around midnight it turned into a real hurricane. Our little canvas tent crackled in every gust under the crunching shocks; so that at every minute we thought it would plunge the light tents with all their inhabitants into the seductive depths of Canyon. • • • '

[The next morning they mount horses and set out for some sightseeing to Point Moran. But instead of more canyon descriptions he offers a dialogue on the dimensions of the canyon and its geological origins.]

'Returning from Point Moran, our friend Hance guided us on the path that leads to the bottom of the Canyon. He discovered this path, the result of adventurous research, and made it usable for pedestrians and mules. Our time, unfortunately, was short, so that we could not make the arduous descent to the bottom of the Canyon, because this trip would have taken at least another two days. So we tested the descent, going down a few hundred meters over the neck-breakingly steep slopes of the fast-winding route. But even this short tasting was enough to get us back panting for effort.

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

‘Of course, our guide, who spends his entire life here among these steep cliffs, did not have this effort.

‘This guide was an interesting figure in this lonely, mystical wilderness. So when we got back, we decided to relax on the edge of the Canyon, where he told his life story. •••’

[Regretfully, the rendition, which goes on for a while, is superficial, although it notes “a thousand kinds of adversity” without detail. Basically it is an account of how he landed at the canyon, with the usual details that are traditionally obscure.]

‘We had a good rest before our narrator recounted his autobiography, then when we got to our horses, we returned to the tent camp. But we didn’t have to stay here for long either—immediately after lunch we sat in the saddle again, now heading west all the way to Bissell’s Point [Bissell’s Point, now Comanche Point], roaming the rim of the Canyon, not unconvinced to stare at its increasing diversity, and the longer we looked, the newer, the more surprising the scenes.

‘We had a hard time leaving this place, which is as if the magic scenes heard in a fairy-tale childhood had been enchanted before our eyes; and to which we were now chained by the magic of this fairy destination.’

[One of Ottlik’s companions on this visit to Hance’s was Gustav Freiherrn von Berg, who also published a record from correspondence (see Berg, 1894).]

1895

Brooks, Fred Emerson

- 366 1895 The Grand Canyon of the Colorado. The Magazine of Poetry (Buffalo, New York), 7(1) (January): 57.
- Reprints Brooks (1894).

Coolbrith, Ina H.

- 367 1895 Songs from the Golden Gate. Boston and New York: Houghton, Mifflin and Co., (The Riverside Press, Cambridge), 159 pp.
- See “In the Grand Cañon”, p. 44. Reprints Coolbrith (1892).

Credner, Hermann [Credner, Carl Hermann]

- 368 1895 Über das Colorado-Plateau zum Grand Cañon; ein Vortrag. Geographische Zeitschrift (Leipzig), 1: 481-497. [In German.]
- (transl. ‘Across the Colorado Plateau to the Grand Canyon; a presentation.’)
- Principally a lecture on the geology and physiography of the region.

Dowd, Clifton B.

- 369 1895 The canyons of the West. Facts and impressions culled from a visit to the Colorado Canyon, and the other stupendous gorges which help to make American scenery the grandest on earth. The Argosy (New York), 21(1) (October): 3-7.
- Cursorily describes a visit at Peach Springs, with remarks on the canyon north of Flagstaff. Other than the usual comments on grandeur, though hardly elaborated upon by the writer, the following comprises the essential “facts and impressions” of his visit to Grand Canyon.
- “The Atlantic and Pacific Railroad is the only one by which tourists can reach the Grand Canyon conveniently. The nearest station is twenty three miles to the south—Peach Spring. One wonders why this appellation was bestowed. The only spring in the vicinity is several miles away, and peach trees are practically unknown.

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

"In company with a guide, I made my first trip to the canyon on horseback. The heat was intense, and the generous flask of lemonade with which I had provided myself, acting on the advice of my companion, proved a godsend.

"The road from Peach Spring to the canyon runs through a most barren region, and not a living thing did we see during the journey but a brace of hawks. We entered by way of Diamond Creek, seemingly the only entrance to that portion of the Grand Canyon.

"Infinitely grand as is the view obtainable in this way, but a few of the most wonderful features of the canyon may here be seen. The most sublime portions are inaccessible to any but hardy frontiersmen, or at least to those tourists who are willing to undergo the considerable dangers and hardships of such exploration. Such a trip the writer hopes some day to take.

"The Atlantic and Pacific Railroad contemplates building an eighty mile branch road from Flagstaff to a still nobler portion of the canyon. The trip may be made by wagon today. The road runs through superb natural parks, and despite the distance it is not an irksome journey. • • •

"The Diamond Canyon is one of the hundreds of side canyons which enter the greater one. It is twenty seven hundred feet deep, and while more or less insignificant alongside its huge neighbor, is well worthy a visit."

Fitz-Mac [MacCarthy, Fitz-James]

370 1895 The world is cleft. Great Divide, 12: 202-203.

See remarks under Fitz-Mac (1899).

Guinn, James M.; Barrows, H. D.; AND Dooner, P. W.

371 1895 Report of the Publication Committee. Historical Society of Southern California, Annual Publication, 3(3): 60.

Includes title of paper read at the September 1895 meeting: "'The Grand Cañon of the Colorado,' by Mrs. Mary E. Hart." No details.

Henshaw, Samuel

372 1895 Boston Society of Natural History. In: Societies and Academies [SECTION]. Science, New Series, 2(52) (December 27): 902.

"Mr. L. S. Griswold discussed some geographical and geological features of the San Francisco Mountains and the Grand Canyon of the Colorado, describing in some detail the petrified forests. The paper was illustrated by a series of lantern slides." (ENTIRE NOTE)

James, George Wharton

373 1895 The waterfalls of Cataract Canyon. Southwestern Empire, 1 (March): 5-6.

374 1895 Hance, and the Grand Canyon. Southwestern Empire, 1 (May): 35-37.

Lummis, Charles F.

375 1895 The greatest thing in the world. Land of Sunshine, 3(4) (September): 195-198. [Item is not signed, but author attribution appears in volume index as "C. F. L.", Lummis also being the serial's editor.]

"There are people who will write back full descriptions of the Great White Throne to the Podunk Palladium—if they shall succeed in smuggling their present intelligences into heaven. Meantime, some of them try to word-picture the Grand Cañon of the Colorado. But less immodest visitors will feel with a well-known writer who said:

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

'The sense of proportion is not always in me. I have done many ill things. But put it on my tombstone that I have seen the Grand Cañon of the Colorado and never attempted to describe it!' And one writer took thither a critic, who had grown restive under his superlative statements. When they climbed together from Hance's camp and stood suddenly upon the brink of that greatest thing in the world, neither had words. But when they had stared till darkness shut out that wonder and came stumbling back to camp, the one laid his hand to the other's shoulder and whispered: 'And? It beats the liar, no?' And the other took a long breath and said: 'That it does. No liar can catch up with it!'

"There is no describing the Grand Cañon; but a few general truths about it may lead those who really have souls to go and see it. It is the greatest chasm on earth—the longest, widest, deepest, most magnificent. The Yosemite and the Yellowstone are noble where they are, but lucky in being far from this incomparably nobler and vaster gorge. They could play hide-and-seek in its immensity and never find one another. All the White Mountains and Alleghenies and Adirondacks, all the Colorado and Northern Pacific cañons, could be tucked away in petty corners of it and never noticed. The greatest quebradas of the Andes or the Alps or the Himàlayas are babies beside it. There is only one thing which keeps it from being the most famous scenery in the world, as it is already the grandest; and that is that it is in a country whose patriots import such ideas as they have. Up to this time, two Englishmen see the Grand Cañon for every American that does.

"It is so easily reached that there is no pardon for them who neglect it. The Pullmans of the Santa Fe overland carry one to Flagstaff, Arizona, the growing town among the pines at the foot of Mt. Agassiz; and thence a comfortable stage-ride brings one to the camp on the very verge of the Canon. There is no hardship about it. Adequate accommodations are there, in the Presence that would make anything but a porker forget whether he ate or starved. It is one of the few things in this advertising world which really 'beats the liar;' which can never be overstated nor exaggerated; a masterpiece upon which the Almighty has spent his eloquence, and before which the tongue of man turns dumb. It is a thing which has never been adequately pictured and never will be. The best photographers in America, the greatest artists in the United States, have beaten their heads against it. They have got some fine pictures, it is true; but no one knows better than themselves how utterly they have failed to show the real Grand Cañon." (ENTIRE ITEM)

Newkirk, Garrett

376 1895 Arizona. In: Rhymes of the States [series]. St. Nicholas, 22 (September): 962.

Brief poem embedded in a full-page composite drawing of Arizona scenes (principally a canyon scene) and a sketch map on which the Grand Canyon is labeled "Gr. Colorado Canon". Grand Canyon stanza displayed in bold (here).

A wealthy miser is this State,
As many a miner 's found;
He keeps his silver and his gold
Safe buried in the ground.

And here we find the grandest sight
That man has ever seen,
Where Colorado's rapids flow,
Deep in their vast ravine.

Along the western boundary
The waters southward go,
And join the Californian gulf
By way of Mexico.

The summer days are very long,
The deserts hot and dry;
And there great cactus plants abound
Full twenty-five feet high.

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

Parshall, Arthur L.

377 1895 The Grand Canon of the Colorado. Locomotive Firemen's Magazine (Peoria, Illinois), 19(3) (March): 234-235.

Written from the perspective of a visit to Hance's; effusive for the most part, and (with credit here to Parshall) with barely a mention of the world's architecture and without casting mountain ranges into the void.

"Those who have viewed the Grand Canon of the Colorado, say: 'We have seen the Grand Canon,' with very much the same liberality of language with which we speak of having 'seen' the stars. Our sight blunders over a vast wilderness of wonders and brings away a few impressions. No human being will ever really see the Grand Canon—it is endless, incomprehensible, inexhaustible. Its majestic boundlessness does not open to any one point of view."

The author goes off on a tangent, describing the physically magnificent, telescopically revealed features of the moon, finishing, "In the moon then we have a rival excelling the Grand Canon of the Colorado in depth simply. • • •"

"But let us return to the hotel, that we may partake of an early supper, and get to bed as soon as we can conveniently, for we want to be up in the morning before the first faint rays of dawn, that we may view one of the beauty scenes of the Grand Canon.

"There are only two views of the Colorado River Canon that can be called beautiful, sunrise and sunset; and the time of year, Indian Summer. Except on these occasions there is nothing pretty, handsome or beautiful; it appears as though his Satanic Majesty had more to do with its construction than any one else; it is simply grand! There never has been and never can be any description written of the Grand Canon of the Colorado that will convey the merest idea of the horrific sublimity that opens to one's view. But our brain wearies trying to grasp it all and we fall to sleep.

"Three o'clock the next morning finds us on our way to a promontory some distance from the hotel, that we may better view the King of Day at his scene shifting.

"As we proceed, the approach of twilight becoming more perceptible warns us that we must hasten our footsteps if we would see the gorge as it reposes in darkness, and before the first scene is changed. The one essential thing is a clear sky, as the entire play depends upon atmospheric refraction, and as the amount of refraction varies with the temperature, moisture, and on other conditions of the atmosphere, you see how necessary it is that there be no clouds above us, nor none below in the Canon.

"We have gained the promontory; there are no tickets, no reserved seats, we are free to view nature in one of her sublimest scene shiftings.

"There is no place on earth where one may sit perfectly still, and have the infinite scene shifters change the stagesetting so strangely and so rapidly.

"Soon far out in the east over amongst the towers, terraces, pallisades, and cloister buttes, break the first faint rays of the dawning day. As the approaching twilight becomes more perceptible a scene is gradually unfolded to our view with which nothing on this mundane sphere can compare, not even an Alpine sunrise. Slowly the entire eastern horizon is lit up with a peculiar, strange light, entirely different from an eastern dawn, a bluish tint that seems to soften and mellow the brighter rays of the rising sun as they flash through the gray and yellow openings between the upper terraces, towers, domes and cathedral spires in this land of architectural grandeur. Wonder and amazement? Note books drop from nerveless fingers, the arm hangs listlessly by the side. Still the wondrous transfiguration goes on; hands of angels hidden from mortal view shifting the scenery of the Canon; mountain peaks disappearing from view and new ones appearing from some hidden recess, 'the last still loveliest.' [quoting Byron]. The Canon is filling with the inflowing tides of the morning light, which come pouring down from above in one large ocean of radiance, ever creeping lower down into the Canon.

"Look! Below us, down through that side Canon the sun has crept, crept so noiselessly and stealthfully, yet so suddenly, that one is surprised, startled at the wonderous change. The sun's rays striking the domes, buttes, pinnacles and the opposite side of the Canon, have set it all aglow. The crimson and dark red sandstones, flash back a rosy light that, as it mingles with the hazy blue of the atmosphere, casts a glamour over the entire landscape that is known no where else on the face of the globe. As we stand enchanted and gaze upon the scene, the mind reverts to all of the descriptive writers that we have ever read and a tinge of melancholy sadness comes over us at the thought that the trenchant pen of the mighty Macauley can never depict the sublimity of the scene before us." Parshall quotes a couple of paragraphs of "Macauley", probably needlessly; and anyway he probably meant Fitz-James MacCarthy (known as Fitz-Mac)—yet the quotation actually is from the pen of Robert Brewster Stanton, both as he probably read in the Santa Fe Railway's widely distributed The Grand Canyon of Arizona.

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

"As we turn our faces to retrace our steps to the hotel, each seems to be saying to himself 'What a visible representation of the invisible Almighty's unseen industry; what a Titanic contest between time and meteoric forces, in the heart of the vast arena of the American Desert.' We prepare to take the trail for the river, a descent of seven thousand feet in six miles. But reader we bid you adieu here . . . ."

Shoshone [pseudonym] [Wolfe, Walter M.]

- 378 1895 The outing of six.—III. Vermilion Ranch, an alcove in the Pink Cliffs. Forest and Stream, 45(11) (September 14): 224-225.

This is an installment of a five-part article about a naturalist's vacation in 1895, from Provo, Utah, to the Grand Canyon. Part III ends with lead-in (following) to Part V (see next citation, below). (Part IV, in the September 21 issue, pertains only to that part of the journey from Kanab, Utah, onto the Kaibab Plateau; omitted here.)

"On Tuesday afternoon we decided that it would be impossible for us to take the sheep wagon across the desert and through the mountains, and a Mr. Rider kindly let me have his buckboard without charge. We were fortunate in procuring the services of 'Uncle John' Stewart to guide us to the Grand Basin Cañon [sic]. Mr. Stewart has accompanied the U. S. Survey on several expeditions. He was the first white man to set foot in DeMotte Park, and during the present season he has a sheep herd within a few miles of Point Sublime. Mr. Stewart offered to accompany us, and all arrangements being completed at 10 o'clock on Wednesday morning, June 26, we set out on the last stage of our Journey."

- 379 1895 The outing of six.—V. Point Sublime—the Grand Canyon—homeward. Forest and Stream, 45(13) (September 28): 266.

"There are some scenes in the presence of which the most sublime emotions are lost in the awful sense of the infinite, where the grandest form of expression is absolute silence. A Church may reproduce in some degree Niagara; a Gifford catch some glowing tints from the sunset sky; a Kingsley or a Hearn find language to portray the varying phases of a West Indian day, but brush and pen are powerless as one stands on the edge of Point Sublime. The very heart-beat is stilled and the overpowering realization of the relationship between insignificant creature and omnipotent Creator makes the boldest man veil his face and exclaim with the psalmist of old, 'What is man, that Thou art mindful of him?' [Psalms 8:4]

"As I sat in the shade at Kanab and read aloud Capt. Dutton's inimitable chapter on 'Point Sublime,' it seemed to us all a beautiful bit of fanciful wood painting—exaggerated and overdrawn. And now, looking back at that never-to-be-forgotten morning, I wonder at the boldness of the man, for language is powerless to express the emotions of the soul, and the half cannot be told. Those who are privileged to look into the abyss and see the massive forms and ever-changing tints that mortals cannot imitate nor words describe can but faintly grasp and vaguely conceive that which their sight presents to them, while for those who depend upon the writer or the artist for their knowledge even an imagination of the chasm of the Kaibab is as impossible as a definite conception of an orthodox paradise.

* * * * *

[page ellipsis is the author's]

"The pointers had passed their second quadrant, and as I looked at them through the trees I saw that the night was more than half gone. There was just the suspicion of a breeze in the tops of the balsams and spruces that were noiselessly nid-nodding beneath the starlit sky. From the native meadow down the creek came the tinkle of the horse-bell. Nature was asleep. There was no sound of bird or bug or rustling branch; even the

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

murmur of the brook was hushed. I arose, and the air, laden with life-giving fragrance, made me feel like another being. In a few minutes I had a fire blazing and the coffee-pot on. Then I wrangled the saddle horses and, looking at my watch, aroused the dreaming camp with the call:

“Boys, it’s 3 o’clock. All aboard for sunrise at Point Sublime.”

“As the flush of early dawn crept through the tree tops we started out. There were eight of us, Mr. Stewart being accompanied by his son, and we had three of the horses saddled so that we were able to take turns in riding. Our guide said that Milk Springs was but three miles from the point, but when we returned he acknowledged his mistake, for it was a long eight. We went down the creek for perhaps a quarter of a mile and then turned abruptly toward the mighty river of the West, climbing a low ridge whose farther side was the outer bank of the cañon itself. When we reached the level summit it was broad daylight. Under our feet was a carpet of mosses and flowers. Spruces and firs had disappeared and great pines blended their branches in a living canopy above our heads. The silence was profound. There was no song of bird; no murmurs from the swaying boughs. Nature herself was mute before her masterpiece. The forest ends. The moss carpet overhangs the brink of a wall that drops a sheer thousand feet. Is it the cañon? No, but one of those vast lateral amphitheaters into which Manhattan Island might be dropped, and its grandest buildings, loftiest spires seem but anthills at the bottom of the abyss. Far down it we peer until the transept loses itself in the blackness of the profound chasm. Even as we look a change, magical, brilliant, instantaneous, comes across the picture. Far to the east, over the plateau of the Paria, rises the sun. His rays touch the tops of the farther cliffs. These spring into life. Rainbow tints reflect [sic] from them up to the very zenith, down into the dark nooks and alcoves, wrapped but a moment before in the slumbers of night. And as the sun climbs higher the daylight descends, until from a mile below into the ethereal blue above there is one glorious expanse of scintillating diamonds, rubies and sapphires that, reflected and refracted by the violet veil, clear as crystal yet tinting all, make the south one kaleidoscopic mass of ever-changing arches, spires, crystals. Human eye cannot grasp nor human mind conceive the splendor there displayed, and yet this was not the Grand Cañon, simply a side chapel in the vast cathedral.

“Then our path withdraws, and once more we tread the forest mazes. Suddenly from the right comes the crack of a rifle, followed by a desultory fusillade. An uninjured buck gallops proudly out of sight. This episode past we hasten on, too eager to note the dusky grouse that fly from the boughs above or the flowers that fleck the moss below. Ahead, jutting far to the southwest, is a promontory. It is not timbered, as is the country through which we have passed, but is covered with sagebrush and lies as bare as the desert under the rays of the rapidly rising sun. It is that which we have come hundreds of miles to see—Point Sublime. No longer is the moss beneath our feet. Behind is a wall of pine; before, clear in the dry, transparent atmosphere, are the snow-crowned ranges of central Arizona. We brush our way through clumps of rare and magnificent cacti with all their gorgeous splendor of purple, crimson, scarlet and gold; through stalks of giant yuccas, whose creamy bells, nodding a dozen feet above our heads, had long since chimed in the matins of an approaching day. Rising above these is a solitary cedar. To it we hasten. Suddenly—as suddenly as the lightning’s flash—the earth opens at our very feet. The eye sees below, around, the grandest panorama of earth—seen, but the mind cannot perceive, for with that glance the heart fails, the very senses become powerless; time, space, personality itself is lost in the contemplation of Infinity.

“For hours we stayed there. The transcendent beauty of the morning glided into the sleeping majesty of noon, the crystal veil enhancing every change of form and color. The longer we dwelt upon the picture the more supernatural, the more indescribable did it become. If there should be but one grand scene of all those I have visited that I could again behold it would be the Grand Cañon of the Colorado as I saw it on that perfect June morning. From Greenland Point on the east, over Powell’s Plateau to the lofty peaks of Logan and Trumbull and the more distant terraces of the Ninkaret [sic] on the west, every detail was impressed as with a stylus on the tablets of memory, and as I look back I see the glorious picture, old as man himself, and yet eternally new as plainly as I saw it then.

“The return to camp was made in the noontide heat, but our path was shady and we had time to observe the more quiet beauties of nature, that relieved the mental strain to which we had been subjected. Up the trees scampered the graceful white-tailed squirrel. About us were the birds of a new clime. Up hill and down we went—from semi-tropic heat up to the realm of sub-Alpine flowers. On that homeward walk we obtained

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

Corallorhiza multiflora, Clematis douglasii, Fritillaria pudica, and, mirabile dictu, a single specimen of Calypso borealis, as shy and beautiful as in the woods of Maine or of the Adirondacks.

"By 5 o'clock we had finished dinner and turned our faces homeward, stopping for the night with the 'V. T.' outfit in De Motte Park. Early Tuesday morning we bade adieu to Mr. Stewart, who returned to his sheep. We headed for Kanab, via Jacob's Lake, at which point we had the misfortune to lose our way and get on the Lee's Ferry trail. So after traveling all night on the desert without food or water, at 10 o'clock on Tuesday morning we drove once more to Mr. Robinson's door and were received, hungry, tired and dirty as we were, with genuine Utah hospitality."

Walcott, Charles D.

- 380 1895 The United States Geological Survey and its methods of work. Engineers' Club of Philadelphia, Proceedings, 12(1) (April): 44-61.

Text of a lecture. See p. 61, note at conclusion (the paragraph in square brackets, thus, is the Proceedings' editor's part of the quotation):

"Before closing, I wish to have thrown upon the screen a few views illustrating some of the scenic topography of the West. They are principally views of southern Utah and of the great canyon of the Colorado, and they will give you a slight idea of the rugged grandeur of this Wonderland of America.

"[The speaker then described the several views thrown upon the screen.]" (ENTIRE NOTE)

Walker, J. B.

- 381 1895 Great railway systems of the United States. Sixteen hundred miles of mountain railways. The Cosmopolitan, 19(1) (May): 17-28.

Regarding the Rocky Mountain region. Not in itself pertinent to this bibliography, but inexplicably includes a reproduction (p. 28) of a painting by Thomas Moran, "The Grand Cañon of the Colorado River."

Zeppelin, Max Graf von [Zeppelin, Constantin Max Graf von]

- 382 1895 Das Grand Canon des Colorado in Arizona. Vom Fels zum Meer (Stuttgart), 14(2) (April/September): 261-263, 266-267. [In German.]
(transl. 'The Grand Canyon of the Colorado in Arizona')

Zeppelin was a German zoologist and explorer, the son of Ferdinand Adolf Heinrich August Graf von Zeppelin, the inventor of the eponymous German rigid airship. His account here begins with notes on his American trip in 1892 and features his visit to the canyon at Hance's, with a descent to the Colorado River. The account here is in a serial difficult to find in American sources—his other writings about Yellowstone, also visited on this trip, are much more well known. Rather more than usual is quoted here because of its peculiar attentions to American accommodations, and of the fact that en route to the canyon the rather affluent group seems to have fallen prey to a stage coach company's owner who may have been jealous that another person had accommodated the Germans. At the canyon, his references to "donkeys" (Eselen) can also be translated as "asses"; he did not refer to them as "mules" (Maultiere), which seems peculiar for a zoologist.

"Zu den vieltaufend Reisenden, welche 1892 nach Amerika zogen, gehörte auch ein kleiner Kreis von acht Herren, unter denen ich mich befand. Wir waren in hohem Grade neugierig und gespannt, mit eigenen Augen zu sehen, was von all den falt ungläublichen Dingen, welche amerikanische und andre Blätter über die Ausstellung in Chicago verkundet hatten, Wahrheit oder Dichtung sei!

"War so die „Fair“ auch für uns die treibende Kraft, so hatten uns doch in erster linie die uns allen gemeinsamen Interessen der Jagd zusammengeführt, sowie das Verlangen, die Vereinigten Staaten und ihre thatkräftigen Bewohner, die durch rastlose Arbeit innerhalb eines Jahrhunderts eine neue Welt geschaffen haben, aus eigener Unfsahauung einmal kennen zu lernen.

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

„Nahezu fechs Monate verwendeten wir auf die Reise, wir besahen uns die Hauptsehenswürdigkeiten der Union und verwilten bald hier, bald dort längere oder kürzere Zeit. Die „weiße Stadt“ am Michgan Lake übergehe ich vollständig, man hat ja über Chicago und seine Ausstellung so unendlich viel gehört und gelesen, daß einem dieses Thema lägst „über“ ist. Der Zweck meiner Veröffentlichungen soll vielmehr der sein, den Lesern dieser Zeitschrift einige Nautrbilder aus dem Westen zu schildern, aus Gegenben, welche noch nicht so allgemein bekannt und besucht sind, wie der Often des landes mit seinen monotonen Millioinenstädten, und deshalb vielleicht von einigem Interesse sein dürsten. Auch einige unsrer Jagdpartien sollen späterhin hier beschrieben werden. • • •

„Die endlosen Fahrten durch die Prairie gehören keinswegs zu den größten Annehmlichkeiten. Wie naiv ist doch der glückliche eropäische Kinderglaube, daß amerikanische Bahnfahrten das Nonplusultra von Bequemlichkeit seien! Wer, wie wir, über 16000 Meilen auf amerikanischen Bahnen zurückzulegen das Glück hatte, ist sich nicht nur darüber absolut klar, daß diese fürs Auge allerdings ganz wunderbaren Pullman-Cars und andre Palastwägen im praktischen Gebrauch höchst unbequem sind, sondern auch darüber, daß man in Amerika, wenigstens im Westen, meist viel langsamer fährt, als bei uns. Die Durchschnittsgeschwindigkeit gewöhnlicher Züge beträgt etwa 33 Kilometer per Stunde, in Deutschland 45. Schnelligkeiten wie die der Jagdzüge Berlin-Köln oder Hamburg mit 70 und mehr Kilometer werden nur auf den östlichen Bahnen erreicht und in einzelnen Fällen auch wohl übertrossen. Eine Waffe Zeit geht durch überflüchtig langen Auenthalt auf Stationen verloren und ebenso beim Passieren von Brücken zweifelhaften Characters damit, daß ein Zugbeamter erst die Brücke daraufhin flüchtig untersucht, ob wohl der Zug ohne zu große Gefahr barüber fahren kann. Abgesehen von allen möglichen Beläftigungen von seiten des Personals hatten wir von der Hitze unendlich zu leiden, Wolken groben Granitstaubes fegen über die sonnenglühenden Prairien, und jeder Lutzug bringt dichte Staubwolken ins Coupé; die Fenster dürfen daher meist nicht geöffnet werden, und so steigt die Temperatur mitunder auf die wonnige Höhe von 126° F. (52° C.). Der Amerikaner mit seinem stark ausgeprägten nationalen Selbstbewutzsein schaut natürlich mit mitleidigem Achselzucken auf unfre Bahneinrichtungen herunter! Rümend muß übrigens unsern Verhältnissen gegenüber hervorgehoben werden, daß die Fahrpreise drüben sehr viel niedriger sind, und daß zudem das Gepäck in der Regel frei ist. Allein trotzdem ging unser Urteil einstimmig dahin, daß man bei uns ganz bedeutend angenehmer und selbstverständlich weit sicherer reist, als in Amerika. Wie ost haben wir uns aus diesen prunkvollen Marterkästen heraus nach unsern einsachen, praktischen Coupés geseht!

„Wir kamen nun, die Atchison, Topeka und Sta. Fé Railroad benutzend, nach der ganz kleinen Station Flagstaff, dem Ausgangspunkte zum Besuche des Grand Canon, das meiner Meinung nach zu den allersten Sehenswürdigkeiten der Union und überhaupt zu den staunenerregendsten Naturwundern auf Erden zählt.

„Was zunächst den Namen Canon anbelangt, so ist er spanischen Ursprungs und bedeutet Felschlucht. Zahlreiche Thäler in New Mexico, Colorado und Arizona zeigen Reigung zur Canonbildung. Diese seltsamen Einschnitte mit steil abfallenden, wenig gegliederten Nändern sind oft mehrere tausend Meter in festes Gestein eingegraben. Am großartigsten und bis ins äußerste Extrem entwickelt tritt uns jedoch das Canon des Rio Colorado in Arizona vor Augen. Es besteht aus einem hunderte von Meilen langen, im sogenannten Grand Canon 10 bis 18 Kilometer breiten System von senkrechten Schluchten, in welchen tief unten der Colorado, ost nur als schmaler roter Faden sichtbar, dahinströmt. • • • “

Zeppelin briefly goes through some of the history of exploration of the canyon, and continues—

„Die tour zum Canon ist zeimlich umständlich und erfordert zum mindesten drei Tage. Merkwürdigerweise hat es der spekulative Sinn der Amerikaner noch nicht zuwege gebracht, den Canonbesuch durch Bau einer Zweigbahn von Flagstaff aus zu erleichtern und zu fördern. Die Reisenden müssen also einen großen vierspännigen Omnibus (Stage-Coach) benutzen, der dreimal in der Woche die 65 Meilen lange Strecke in zwölf Stunden fährt und jeden übernächsten Tag nach Flagstaff zurückkehrt. Der dazwischen liegende Tag dient zur höchst strapaziösen Besichtigung des Canon. Wegen dieser Schwierigkeiten wird das Grand Canon bedauerlicherweise nur sehr schwach besucht — 1892 z. B. von nur 149 Personen — un gehört daher von all den berühmten Punkten Nordamerikas zu den am wenigsten bekannten. Dazu kommt noch, daß die südliche Pacificbahn von La Junta (Col.) nach Los Angeles (Cal.) relativ wenig benutzt wird, die meisten touristen fahren

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

von Denver respektive La Junta über Salt Lake city zur Besichtigung der Mormonstadt und dann direkt nach San Francisco.

“Da unsre Gesellschaft, wo es uns gerade beliebte, zu jagen beabsichtigte, von Hotels daher unabhängig sein mußte, so hatten wir uns schon in Chicago mit allem Erfordersichen, wie Zelten, Schaffäcken, Sattelzeug u. f. w., ausgerüstet. Am Canon wollten wir nun zum erstenmal kampieren und freuten uns schon lange auf dreises frische, freie Leben. Wir kauften Kochgeschirr und Proviant ein und mieteten uns einen Wagen, auf dem Gepäck und zwei Teilnehmer Unterkunft fanden, während die andern ritten. Der Weg zum Canon ist recht gut, die Landschaft aber ohne Reiz und Interesse. Halbwegs liegt die kleine Cider-station [sic], wo freundliche Landskute uns eine ordentliche Mahlzeit vorfetzeten. Zimmer zum Uebernachten gibt es aber hier nicht, und andererseits waren wir zu bequem, wegen der einen nacht unfre wohlverpackten Zelte aufzuspannen; wir krochen also wie handwerksburschen in einen Heutadel und schliesen prächtig. Den nächten Morgen sehnten zwei Reitpferde, virgeblich suchte sie unser Kutscher weit in der Umgegend. Zweifellos lag hier eine Gaunerei von seiten des Stag-Coach-Besitzers vor, der natürlich wütend war, daß ihm der fette Bissen von acht Passagieren von einem Privatfuhrmann weggeschnappt wurde, und sich nun diesem gegenüber damit rächte, daß er die beiden Pferde durch irgend einen freudlichen Helfershelfer in die Berge jagen oder gar strehlen ließ. Bei den Indiangern gilt Pferdeditbstahl als schwerstes Verbrechen und wird einsach mit Erscheißen bestraft. Hatten wir den Kerl erwischt, so wäre ihm eine allerdings leichtere Strafe, aber immerhin eine sehr fühlbare Art von Lynchjuftiz nicht erspart geblieben. Die zwei ihrer Pferde beraubten Reiter fanden im Wagen zur Not noch Platz. Die große Hitze und der in der ganzen Gegend herrschende Wassermangel fetzten uns bedeutend zu, wir priesen uns glücklich, abends endlich diese zweitägige, mühsame tour hinter uns zu haben.

“Die Straße endet in der Nähe des Canon bei Hance's Camp, einem mitten im Walde gelegenen, aus etlichen zwölf gedielten und sehr komfortabel eigerichteten Zelten bestehenden Lager zur Aufnahme von Canonbesuchern. Dicht dabei schlugen auch wir unsre beiden Zelte auf und richteten uns gemütlich ein. Herr Hance wollte die Sache allerdings nicht recht gefallen, als wir aber nachher alle zu Tisch bei ihm erschienen und Esel für den nächsten Morgen bestellten — Pferde sind für die Canontour nicht zu gebrauchen—, da war er bedeutend milder gestimmt. Wir dursten sogar unfre Pferde umsonste bei ihm tränken lassen, eine autzerordenliche Konzession, denn das Wasser ist auch hier ein sehr wertvoller Artikel und wird in einer Sisterne stets unter Berschluß gehalten. Daß am Canon der Bau eines Hotels geplant sei, wie Bädeker sagt, ist bis jetzt wenigstens durchaus nicht der Fall.

“Den folgenden Tag, 20. Juli, zogen wir denn, mit Proviant für zwei Tage versehen, hoch zu Esel ab zur Besichtigung des Canon. Der Ritt bauerte aber nur fünfzehn Minuten. Am Rande der Riesenschlucht angelkommen, wurden die Esel durch Zurufe und Steinwürfe der Führer hinabgetrieben, wir folgten auf beschwerlichem Felsfade langsam nach. Nach wenigen Schritten sieht man bereits die hochanstehenden roten und gelben Felsen der gegenüberliegenden Canonwand. Die höchsten Spitzen einzelner Felsentürme glühen schon im rosigen Glanze der aufsteigenden Sonne, während die unermeßliche Tiefe vor uns erst allmählich vom Widerschein durchleuchtet wird. Der Abstieg in das Canon ist überwältigend. Dasselbe ist in ein System fast vollkommen horizontaler Schichten, an 2000 Meter tief eigeschnitten; von oben bis unten läßt sich diese wunderare Schichtung an den senkrechten Felsen beobachten, ähnlich wie auf Helgoland. Überall erblicken wir Steilabstürze von wahrhaft unglaublicher mannigfaltigkeit und mächtigen Dimensionen; turmhoch streben die Wände empor, nur hie und da unterbricht ein schmaler Grasstreifen, auf dem eine stolze Aloe ihren übermannshohen Blütenstiel erhebt, die kahlen Schroffen. Im übrigen ist das Canongebiet ausgedört und öde, nur in der Tiefe gedihen an den spärlichen Wasserläufen, die dem Colorado zufließen, Weiden und Aspen, Juniperus und duftender Salbei. Bäume erblickt man nirgends. Vom Hauptcanon, in das wir hinabsteigen, zweigen kleinere Schluchten mit ebenfalls scharfer Terraffung ab, die alle das Bild des Haputcanon wiederholen. Die Fernsicht auf die ganze Konfiguration dieser zahlreichen Erdspalten, auf dieses Chaos von Felspartien der eigentümlichsten Formen defremdet und entzückt uns. Allenthalben ragen vorspringende Felsen, einzelstehende Steinpfeiler mit ausgeprägter Schichtung und aufgesetzten Spitzkegeln in die Lüft. Diese seltsamen Bildungen zeigen oft höchst merkwürdige Regelmäßigkeit.

“Die formation, in welcher wir uns besinden, ist der Jura, und zwar herrscht die unterste Schicht deselben, der Buntsandstein, bei weitem vor; sodann treten Kalksteine, Schiefer und Mergel auf, welche in starken Bändern

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

oder schwachen Adern die rote Felsmasse durchfetzen; auch ältere Gesteine, wie Gneis und Granit, kommen streckenweise vor.

„Sehr auffallend sind die prachtvollen Farben, welche die Canonwände auszeichnen, alle Farben vom lebhaftesten Rot bis zu den zartesten Abtönungen von Gelb und Orange sind hier vereinigt. Je nachdem ein Teil in grellem Sonnenlicht oder tiefem Schlagschatten liegt, ist das Farbenbild ein völlig verändertes. Gerade dieser zauberhafte Wechsel von Licht und Schatten prägt dieser glühenden Landschaft ihren originellen Stempel auf. Die Farben leuchten förmlich, sie phosphoreszieren so intensiv, als ob die hohen Felswände in Flammen aufgehen wollten. Neben dieser außergewöhnlichen, für das ganze Canon überaus charakteristischen Farbenpracht sind es besonders auch die durch ihre Dünne und Trockenheit bedingte Durchsichtigkeit und eigentümliche Beschaffenheit der Atmosphäre, die magische Beleuchtung dieser toten Natur, welche ergreisend auf den Beschauer wirken.

„Nach zweistündigen Marsch haben wir die Sohle der Riesenschlucht erreicht, ruhen und lunschen bei einer kleinen Unterkunsthütte und beseigen dann wieder die Esel. Bald erweitert sich das Canon, bald treten die Gebirgsmauern eng zusammen, seitliche Schluchten öffnen sich, oft nur schmale Spalten, aber von unendlicher Höhe. Unsre Eselchen bewähren sich vortrefflich, klug und vorsichtig suchen sie Schritt für Schritt den besten Weg aus. Der Reiter muß sein Tier ruhig gehen lassen und braucht es nicht zu lenken; es würde ihn dies auch nichts nutzen, denn der Esel thut ja doch, was er will! Unterwegs wird in der sogenannten Kathedrale (Temple of Sett) einen Augenblick gehalten, man zeigt uns ein altes Indianergrab. Nach fünfvierteltündigem Ritt steigen wir ab und müssen die letzte Strecke bis zum Colorado zu Fuß gehen. Diese Wanderung, obwohl nur dreieinhalb Stunden hin und zurück, ist außerordentlich beschwerlich, zudem brannte die Sonne mit intensiver Kraft senkrecht auf unsre Schädel herneider. Um uns Mut einzuflößen, erzählte uns der Führer, daß er im vergangenen Jahre mit siebzehn Ladies dieselbe Tour gemacht habe; da konnten sich die German tourists doch nicht lumpen lassen! Und wahrlich, man wird überreichlich belohnt für alle ausgestandenen Qualen, denn gerade der letzte Teil des Grand Canon ist der Glanzpunkt dieser gewaltigen Schöpfung, die ihresgleichen auf Erden sucht. Der Pfad zieht sich durch ein enges, vielgewundenes Canon, das an Schmalheit mehr und mehr zunimmt; seine fenkrechten Wände rücken an manchen Stellen bis zwei Meter aneinander, so daß man zu zweien kaum nebeneinander gehen kann. Beim Anblick dieser zu schwindelnder Höhe aufragenden Steinmassen, die einen zu erbrücken drohen, kann man sich eines gewissen unbehaglichen, beklemmenden Gefühles nicht erwehren. Wie klein und nichtig kommt sich doch der Mensch einer derartigen Gigantennatur gegenüber vor! Im Vergleich mit solchen Thalaushöhlungen erscheinen die Klammern der Alpen geradezu winzig. Jeder Maßstab zur Beurteilung dieser kolossalen Dimensionen fehlt, wir können uns also keinen rechten Begriff von der Höhe der uns einschließenden Felsgebirge machen; man schätzt dieselbe auf 2000 Meter.

„Auf unserm Marsch haben wir mehrere Hindernisse zu überwinden, wir müssen uns verschiedenemal an Strickleitern zehn bis zwölf Meter hinablassen, mitunter fehlen die Leitern und nur der Strick bleibt übrig, an dem man in die Tiese rutscht. Die Sache ist übrigens gar nicht so ungefährlich, man darf sich schon ordentlich festhalten, um nicht rascher als erwünscht unten anzukommen. Wir sind nun dem ersehnten Ziele nahe, ohne es zu merken, erst bei der letzten Viegung des Canon vernimmt man das Nauschen des Flusses und steht dann plötzlich am Colorado, dessen trübe Fluten unter lautem Brüllen durch die Felsen jagen, in die er tief sein Bett gegraben. Das Canon, das wir durchwanderten, endet hier und mündet rechtwinkelig in das enge Felsenthal des Flusses, der an dieser Stelle kaum achtzig Schritt breit ist; jäh und schroff steigen seine Ufer beiderseits empor. Weder links noch rechts läßt sich der Lauf des Colorado lange verfolgen, sein Bett ist ebenso gewunden wie die andern Canons. Es ist ein erhabenes, ernstes Bild, eine wildromantische Scenerie, die uns hier vor Augen tritt und mit stiller Bewunderung erfüllt. Die typische Canonbildung scheint hier aufgehört zu haben, die Felsen tragen einen andern Charakter, sind mehr zerrissen und zerklüftet, das ganze Aussehen der Gegend ist ein völlig verändertes. Nach allgemeiner Sitte der Canonbesucher nahmen wir ein Bad, obwohl die schmutzigen Wellen des Flusses nicht dazu einluden; aber nach dem beispiellos heißen Marsch war uns dies gleichgültig. Von einer Erfrischung konnte leider keine Rede sein, das Wasser war ganz warm, also auch trotz brennenden Durstes kaum zu genießen, zudem hatten wir den leichtfinn begangenen, keinen Proviant mit uns zu nehmen.

„Hungrig und durstig verließen wir denn diese herrliche Gegend und traten den mühsamen Rückweg an; halbtot gelangten wir zu unsern Eseln. Auf dem Heimritt entzückte uns die abendliche Beleuchtung, die mächtigen Gebirgstöcke erschienen wie mit flüssigem Gold überzogen, ihre Spitzen und Zacken hoben sich in

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

wunderbarer Schärfe vom klaren Horizont ab und erluchten in unglaublichem Kolorit unter den Strahlen der finkenden Sonne. An der erwähnten Hütte angekommen, bereiteten wir uns rasch eine Mahlzeit und brachten hier unter freiem Himmel im Anblick des strahlenden Firmaments die Nacht zu.

“Ist das Canongebiet verhältnismäßig pflanzenarm, so macht sich der Mangel an organischem Leben noch in höherem Grad bei der Fauna bemerkbar. Säugetiere kommen nur sehr vereinzelt vor, Schlangen trifft man öfters an; wir schossen eine graugrüne, etwa einen Meter lange, viereckige Schlange, und unser Kutscher erlegte mit dem Revolver eine kleine Klapperschlange mit vier bis sechs Klapperringen. Am häufigsten sind natürlich Vögel; ich beobachtete mehrere Raubvögel, einige Spechte und sehr viele Wildtauben, Blauhäher und Kolibris, welche beiden letzten Arten überhaupt zu den verbreitetsten Nordamerikas gehören. Ganz besonders gilt das von den Kolibris, deren entzückender Anblick uns überall erfreut, in den Städten und auf dem Lande, in den Prairien, im Urwalde und hoch in den Bergen. Nur eine einzige Species kommt hier vor, diese aber sogar bis nach Canada hinauf. — • • • ”

Zeppelin takes some time to explain the weathering processes that created the canyon, before ending—

“Tief ergriffen von der zauberhaften Pracht des Gesehenen erklimmen wir den Pfad, um zu unserm Lager zurückzukehren. Die Amerikaner übertreiben gern, doch müssen wir ihnen darin völlig beistimmen, wenn sie vom Grand Canon sagen: „Nowhere in human experience can its like be found!“ (Nirgends, so weit die menschliche Erfahrung reicht, wird feinesgleichen gefunden!)“ [quoting Higgins (1892)].

(translation)

‘A small circle of eight gentlemen, among whom I was, belonged to the thousands of travelers who went to America in 1892. We were exceedingly curious and anxious to see with our own eyes what was truth or fiction of all the incredible things that American and other papers had proclaimed about the Chicago Exposition!

‘Although the “Fair” was the driving force for us, it was primarily the common interests of hunting that brought us together, as well as the desire to see the United States and its energetic inhabitants who, through tireless work within the century, created a new world and to get to know of it from their own perspectives.

‘We spent almost six months on the journey, looking at the main sights of the Union and stayed here, now there, for a longer or shorter time. I completely ignore [here] the “White City” on Lake Michigan; you’ve heard and read so much about Chicago and its exhibition that this topic is almost “over” for you. Rather, the purpose of my publications should be to describe to the readers of this magazine some natural images from the West, from areas that are not yet as well known and visited as the country’s center with its monotonous megacities, and therefore perhaps of some interest. Some of our hunting parties will also be described here later. • • •

‘The endless drives through the prairie are by no means among the greatest comforts. How naïve is the happy European child’s belief that American train journeys are the ultimate in comfort! Anyone who, like us, has been lucky enough to travel more than 16,000 miles on American railways is not only absolutely clear that these Pullman cars and other palace cars, which are certainly wonderful to look at, are extremely uncomfortable in practical use, but also that one in America, at least in the West, usually moves much more slowly than here. The average speed of ordinary trains is about 33 kilometers per hour, in Germany 45. Speeds like that of the Berlin-Cologne or Hamburg trains with 70 and more kilometers are only reached on the eastern railways and in some cases are probably exceeded. Time is wasted by excessively long stays at stations and also when passing bridges of dubious character, with a train officer first examining the bridge briefly to see whether the train can go over it without too much danger. Aside from all sorts of annoyances on the part of the staff, we suffered endlessly from the heat, clouds of coarse granite dust sweeping across the sun-scorching prairie, and every draft brings dense clouds of dust into the carriage; the windows are therefore mostly not to be opened, and so the temperature sometimes rises to the blissful height of 126° F. (52° C.). The Americans, with their strong national self-confidence, of course look down at our railway facilities with a pitying shrug! Incidentally, it must be pointed out that, given our circumstances, the fares are much lower over there and that luggage is usually free. Nevertheless, our judgment was unanimous that one travels much more comfortably and, of course, far more safely here than in America. How often have we longed for our simple, practical carriages while on these magnificent torment boxes!

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

'Using the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fe Railroad, we came to the very small Flagstaff station, the starting point for visiting the Grand Canyon, which, in my opinion, is one of the most amazing sights in the Union and one of the most astonishing natural wonders on earth.

'First of all, the name Canyon is of Spanish origin and means gorge. Numerous valleys in New Mexico, Colorado, and Arizona show a tendency towards canyon formation. These strange indentations with steep, little articulated edges are often dug several thousand meters into solid rock. The Canyon of the Rio Colorado in Arizona, however, is at its grandest and developed to the utmost extreme. It consists of a system of vertical gorges hundreds of miles long and 10 to 18 kilometers wide in the so-called Grand Canyon, into which flows the Colorado deep below, visible only as a narrow red thread to the east. • • • '

Zeppelin briefly goes through some of the history of exploration of the canyon, and continues—

'The tour to the canyon is awkward and requires at least three days. Strangely enough, the speculative spirit of the Americans has not yet succeeded in facilitating and encouraging visits to the Canyon by building a branch line from Flagstaff. The travelers therefore have to use a large four-horse omnibus (stage coach) that travels the 65-mile route in twelve hours three times a week and returns to Flagstaff every day after the next. The day in between is used for the extremely strenuous inspection of the canyon. Unfortunately, because of these difficulties, the Grand Canyon is rarely visited—e.g. in 1892 only 149 individuals—and is therefore one of the least known of all the famous points in North America. In addition, the Southern Pacific Railway from La Junta (Col.) to Los Angeles (Cal.) is relatively little used; most tourists travel from Denver or La Junta via Salt Lake City to visit the Mormon City and then directly to San Francisco.

'Since our company intended to hunt wherever we liked, and therefore had to be independent of hotels, we had already equipped ourselves in Chicago with everything necessary, such as tents, sheepskins, saddlery, etc. We wanted to camp at the canyon for the first time and had been looking forward to three fresh, free lives for a long time. We bought cooking utensils and provisions and hired a carriage, on which luggage and two participants found shelter while the others rode [on animals]. The way to the canyon is quite good, but the landscape lacks charm and interest. Halfway there is the small Cider station [sic, Cedar Ranch], where friendly country people prepared a decent meal for us. But there are no rooms for overnight stays here, and on the other hand we were too lazy to put up our well-packed tents one night; so we crept like young craftsmen into a hay barn and slept splendidly. Two riding horses were missing the next morning, presumably our coachman was looking for them far in the area. There was no doubt of swindling on the part of the stage coach owner, who was naturally furious at having the fat morsels of eight passengers snatched from him by a private carter, and now retaliated by having the two horses driven away by friendly accomplices into the mountains or even let them stray. Among the Indians, horse theft is considered the most serious crime and is simply punished with shooting. If we had caught the fellow, he would have been sentenced to a lesser degree, but still a very severe form of lynching. The two riders, who were robbed of their horses, found room in the carriage as necessary. The great heat and the lack of water in the whole area hit us hard; we praised ourselves lucky to finally have this two-day, arduous tour behind us in the evening.

'The road ends near the canyon at Hance's Camp, a camp in the middle of the forest, consisting of twelve boarded and very comfortably furnished tents for the reception of visitors to the canyon. We also pitched our two tents close by and settled in comfortably. Mr. Hance didn't like the matter very much, but when we all came to dinner afterwards and ordered donkeys for the next morning—horses aren't good for the Canyon tour—they are in a much milder mood. He even allowed our horses to be watered for free at his place, an extraordinary concession, because water is a very valuable article here too and is always kept under reserve in a cistern. That at the Canyon the building of a hotel is planned, as Baedeker says, is at least not the case up to now.

'The following day, July 20th, provided with provisions for two days, we went up on donkeys to inspect the canyon. But the ride lasted only fifteen minutes. Arriving at the edge of the gigantic gorge, the donkeys were driven down by the shouts and stones thrown by the guides; we followed slowly on a difficult rocky path. After a few steps you can already see the high red and yellow rocks of the opposite canyon wall. The highest peaks of individual rock towers are already glowing in the rosy glow of the rising sun, while the immeasurable depth before us is only gradually being illuminated by the reflection. The descent into the canyon is overwhelming. It

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

is cut into a system of almost perfectly horizontal strata, 2000 meters deep. This wondrous layering can be observed from top to bottom on the vertical rocks, similar to Helgoland [an archipelago in the North Sea]. Everywhere we see cliffs of truly unbelievable variety and mighty dimensions; the walls rise towering. Only here and there is a narrow strip of grass, on which a proud aloe raises its flower stalk taller than a man, amidst the rugged bald ones. Elsewhere the canyon country is parched and desolate; only below thrive, on the scanty streams that flow into the Colorado, willows and aspen, junipers and more fragrant sage. Trees are nowhere to be seen. From the main canyon, into which we descend, smaller gorges branch off, also with sharp terracing, all of which repeat the image of the main canyon. The distant view of the whole configuration of these numerous chasms, of this chaos of rock formations of the most peculiar forms, alienates and delights us. Everywhere protruding rocks, isolated stone pillars with pronounced layers and attached pointed cones, rise into the air. These strange formations often show the most remarkable regularity.

'The formation in which we find ourselves is the Jura, and the lowest layer of the same, the Buntsandstein, predominates by far; then limestone, slate and marl appear, which tear through the red mass of rock in strong bands or weak veins; older rocks, such as gneiss and granite, also occur in places.' [In referring to "Buntsandstein" Zeppelin recalls the Bunter sandstone, a geological formation in Europe.]

'Very striking are the splendid colors which characterize the walls of the canyon. All colors from the liveliest red to the most delicate tints of yellow and orange are here united. Depending on whether a part is in bright sunlight or in deep shadow, the coloring is completely different. It is precisely this enchanting alternation of light and shadow that gives this glowing landscape its stamp of originality. The colors literally glow phosphorescently, so intensely as if the high rock faces were about to burst into flames. In addition to this extraordinary blaze of color, which is extremely characteristic of the whole canyon, it is also the transparency and the peculiar quality of the atmosphere caused by its thinness and dryness, the magical illumination of this quiet nature, which have a moving effect on the viewer.

'After a two-hour march we have reached the bottom of the giant gorge, rest, and have lunch at a small shelter and then get on the donkeys again. Sometimes the canyon widens, sometimes the mountain walls come together closely; side gorges open up, often only narrow crevasses, but of infinite height. Our little donkeys prove themselves excellently, cleverly and carefully they choose the best way step by step. The rider must let his animal walk calmly and need not steer it; it wouldn't do him any good either, because the donkey does what he wants after all! On the way we stop for a moment in the so-called Cathedral (Temple of Sett), we are shown an old Indian grave. After five quarters of an hour's ride we dismount and have to walk the last stretch to the Colorado. This hike, although only three and a half hours there and back, is extremely difficult, and the sun beat down with intense force perpendicularly on our skulls. To give us courage, the guide told us that he had done the same tour last year with seventeen ladies; since the German tourists could not lose face! And truly, one will be amply rewarded for all the torments endured, because the last part of the Grand Canyon is the highlight of this mighty creation, which is unparalleled on earth. The path runs through a narrow, tortuous canyon, which grows more and more narrow; in some places its walls are up to two meters apart, so that two people can hardly walk side by side. At the sight of these dizzying masses of stone, which threaten to overwhelm you, you cannot help feeling a certain uneasy, oppressive feeling. How small and insignificant does man feel in the face of such a gigantic nature! In comparison with such valley hollows, the gorges of the Alps appear downright tiny. There is no yardstick for judging these colossal dimensions, so we cannot form a correct idea of the height of the rocky mountains enclosing us; it is estimated at 2000 meters.

'On our march we have to overcome several obstacles. We have to lower ourselves several times on rope ladders ten to twelve meters; sometimes the ladders are missing and only the rope remains, on which one slips into the pit. Incidentally, the thing is not at all without danger; you can hold on tight so that you don't get down there faster than you would like. We are now near the longed-for goal without noticing it; only at the last sweeping of the canyon do we hear the murmur of the river and then we suddenly find ourselves at the Colorado, whose murky waters roar through the rocks in which they have dug its bed. The canyon through which we traversed ends here, and flows at right angles into the narrow rocky valley of the river, which at this point is scarcely eighty paces wide; its banks rise abruptly and abruptly on both sides. The course of the Colorado cannot be followed for long, either to the left or to the right; its bed is just as tortuous as the other canyons. It is a

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

sublime, serious picture, a wildly romantic scene that comes before our eyes and fills us with quiet admiration. The typical formation of the canyon seems to have stopped here; the rocks have a different character, are more fissured and jagged, the whole appearance of the area is completely different. As was the custom of Canyon visitors, we bathed, although the dirty red waves of the river did not invite it; but after the unprecedentedly hot march we didn't care. Unfortunately, there was no question of refreshment; the water was very warm, so it was hardly enjoyable despite burning thirst, and we had also made the foolish mistake of not taking any provisions with us.

'Hungry and thirsty we left this beautiful region and began the arduous journey back; half dead we got to our donkeys. On the ride home we were enchanted by the evening light, the mighty massifs appeared as if they were covered with liquid gold, their peaks and pinnacles stood out in wonderful sharpness against the clear horizon and glowed in unbelievable color under the rays of the setting sun. Arriving at the aforementioned hut, we quickly prepared a meal and spent our dinner here in the open air, with a view of the radiant firmament.

'If the Canyon area is relatively sparse in plant life, the lack of organic life is even more noticeable in the fauna. [Note that he reflects on the region, not just the canyon.] Mammals are very isolated, snakes are often encountered; we shot a grey-green, square snake about three feet long, and our driver shot a small rattlesnake with four or six rattle rings with his revolver. Of course, the most common are birds; I observed several birds of prey, some woodpeckers, and a great many wild pigeons, blue jays, and hummingbirds, the last two species being among the most common in North America. This is especially true of the hummingbirds, whose delightful sight delights us everywhere, in the cities and in the country, on the prairie, in the jungle, and high in the mountains. Only a single species occurs here, but this even up to Canada. — '

Zeppelin takes some time to explain the weathering processes that created the canyon, before ending—

'Deeply moved by the magical splendor of what we saw, we climb the path to return to our camp. Americans like to exaggerate, but we have to agree with them when they say of the Grand Canon: "Nowhere in human experience can its like be found!" [quoting Higgins (1892)].

1896

Barrett, Frank N.

383 1896 The ubiquitous tin can. American Kitchen Magazine, 5(2) (May): 53-60.

The tin cans of the canyon are the highlight. "Years ago, when the writer camped at noon in the great Coconino forest of Arizona, in a region without a house, and where the land was unsurveyed, the first object he saw was the ubiquitous tin can. And when 4,000 to 5,000 feet within the jaws of the Grand Canon of the Colorado, the camp fire was started, the tin can, bearing well-known names, immediately put the memory in touch with home and familiar scenes." (ENTIRE NOTE) Compare Barrett (1909).

Cross, Roselle Theodore

384 1896 Notes of long service in Colorado. XV.—Vacation excursions. The Home Missionary, 69(6) (October): 289-298.

In 1884 (as determined by the note below*), having obtained free passes for travel on the "Santa Fé road", also noted as the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad, the author, who was a minister from York, Nebraska, and one or more unnamed ministerial companions, went to see the Grand Canyon at Peach Springs. Written in the third person, it is otherwise a personal account. The article includes a photograph of "A Typical Section of Grand Cañon" that does not depict the Grand Canyon of Arizona. The entire Grand Canyon account follows below.

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

* Cross elaborated on the circumstances leading to this trip, and indicated the year, in a reprinting of his adventures, My Mountains (The Stratford Co., Boston, 1921). Cross (1921) greatly expands on the story and writes it in the first person.

"At one o'clock, Tuesday morning, they were at Peach Springs, Arizona, 466 miles west of Albuquerque. They had sent ahead for a team to be ready to take them to the Cañon, twenty-three miles north. After a hasty cup of coffee they were on the buckboard behind two good horses. 'Give me my revolver,' said the driver; 'there are hard characters round town, and if they know that I am going out with passengers at this time of night they may hold us up.' The road lay down Peach Spring Cañon, now dry, but showing evidence of fearful torrents in the past. When day broke the rocky walls were rising above them several thousand feet on either side. They reached the Grand Cañon at six A.M., and had four hours to stay. Time was too precious to waste in eating breakfast. Snatching a biscuit from their lunch, they at once climbed a hill some 1,500 feet high, reaching the top in twenty five minutes. Then they turned, and looked and looked and looked. They had seen many wonderful mountain views, but this view eclipsed them all. They looked far down on the turbid Colorado, seemingly a narrow sluggish stream, but really a swiftly rushing torrent, the drainage of 300,000 square miles, and of many lofty mountain ranges, whose deep snows were fast disappearing under the summer sun. At that point the river was about 250 feet wide and 200 feet deep, and was then some sixty feet above low-water mark. Back of them rose the Haystack, 3,900 feet high; back of that was Sunset Peak, 6,000 feet high. Across the river, as part of the cañon wall, Solomon's Temple, stupendous and grand with its majestic natural architecture, rose 6,000 feet above the water. Mount Emma, Tower of Babel, and other cliffs were about the same height. They could look up and down the river for miles and could see on both sides about twenty miles of those marble walls stupendous in size and height, yet wondrously beautiful, and they then remembered that the cañon was 300 miles or more in length, and that in some places the rocks were 8,000 feet high. Then they thought of the wonderful feat of Major Powell, who in 1869, and again in 1871, descended its whole length in a boat.

"Time was precious. They looked fast and hard, but they closed their eyes long enough to have a season of prayer on what seemed to them holy ground. Very precious was their communing with God in the midst of his wonderful handiwork. They then went some two miles up Diamond Cañon, which is tributary to the Grand Cañon. There is no cañon in Colorado that equals it in sheer depth. At one point the black igneous rocks were only twelve feet apart at the bottom, yet they rose almost perpendicularly nearly 2,700 feet, or 900 feet higher than the rocks in the Royal Gorge of the Arkansas. Years before an adventurer had 'salted' a part of this cañon with $40,000 worth of diamonds, and thus started the great Arizona diamond excitement. Hence the name of the cañon. Ten o'clock came too soon, and they started back in the intense heat of an Arizona midsummer day. Most mercilessly did the sun beat down into the cañon. There were 'great rocks' and a 'weary land,' but no 'shadow.' The road was sandy, stony, dusty, and often very steep. It was nine miles to water, a stagnant spring open to the sun and full of insects; then ten miles to more water. After they had ascended 400 feet to the railroad, and after six o'clock P.M., the thermometer stood at 102 degrees in the shade."

Dugard, M. [Dugard, Marie]

- 385      1896      La société Américaine : mœurs et caractère—la famille—rôle de la femme—écoles et universités.
Paris: Librairie Hachette et Cie., 320 pp. [In French.]
(transl. 'American society: mores and character—the family—role of women—schools and universities.')

An 1893 tour of America includes a visit to Grand Canyon at Hance's. See in Chapter 7 ("A Travers l'Ouest") (transl. 'Through the West'), pp. 106-109. The account in its entirety (ellipses are part of the quotation):

"25 août. Campement sous les sapins, au bord du Cañon, que nous contemplons du sommet d'un roc qui le surplombe. Aucune parole n'en pourrait exprimer la grandeur sauvage: une entaille de la terre, brusquement déchirée jusqu'à l'horizon sur une longueur de cent quatre-vingts milles, ouverture remuée de gouffres d'où se lèvent à perte de vue des entassements de pics, de crêtes, d'aiguilles, de flèches, de granits béants, véritable chaos qui évoque l'idée des anciens cataclysmes. L'imagination américaine n'a rien exagéré en les baptisant le «Titan des abîmes».

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

"Nous nous y aventurons le matin avec des mulets, monture presque inutile dans ces crevasses; sous le soleil qui se réverbère en miroitements de feu aux murailles de granit rouge hautes de huit cents mètres, on descend des éboulements de rocs, s'apuyant aux sapins qui poussent aux fentes, traversant des éclaircies de yuccas et d'aloés, des excavations creusées par les eaux, suivant le lit des torrents, franchissant à l'aide de cordages les blocs qui les obstruent et leurs chutes le long des parois lisses, et à deux milles de profondeur on arrive au Colorado, vaste fleuve dont les eaux larges de plus de deux cents pieds, rouges et grossières d'argiles entraînées dans leur cours, roulent avec un fracas entre des remparts de granit et disparaissent torrentueuses, terribles et attirantes comme l'inconnu.

"On remonte. La gorge qui, sous la lumière de midi, n'était qu'un embrasement, fraichit et se colore de la féerie du soir; le soleil tombant sur les murailles rouges pose à leur sommet des pourpres vives et, descendant les pentes de l'abîme en reflets qui se dégradent, met des rayures de diamant aux angles des cristaux, des tons cuivrés aux coulées des quartz, des points d'or aux lamelles des micas, des traînées jaunes aux nervures des agaves, baigne de rose le dos des petits lézards qui sautent sur les rochers à notre passage, et ces couleurs toujours changeantes se pénètrent et se fondent en teintes irréelles, tandis que, des herbes tièdes encore dont nous foulons les fleurs, s'élève avec un parfum sauvage une évaporation irisée qui se mêle aux derniers rayons et les éteint lentement en des brumes violettes.... Nous nous arrêtons à une clairière, près d'un ruisseau où l'ombre est douce; le guide prépare le campement de nuit, allume des branchages, fait griller des viandes sur les tisons et étend nos couvertures sous les cotonniers. C'est une heure délicieuse. A ces profondeurs, on n'entend que le bruit mouillé de l'eau, la sourde pulsation de la vie végétale, par fois la chute d'une pierre que détache le pied d'un mulet et dont le roulement se répercute d'abîme en abîme à travers la gorge solitaire ou un tintement de clochettes, en haut, dans le lointain. La lune, qui se lève à l'orient, verse sa fantaisie sur le calme du soir, prêtant aux granits des formes imaginaires, emplissant l'espace de son jour bleuâtre qui glisse jusqu'au creux des rochers, et, dans cette nuit claire du Cañon, à des centaines de milles de toute ville et de toute route, sous l'être factice que la vie d'Europe vous a fait, on sent se réveiller les instincts primitifs, et, endormi dans l'herbe sous les étoiles, on rêve d'une vie nomade dans les verdure et le silence, affranchi des civilisations....

"Le lendemain à la remontée, après avoir suivi sur les parois les traces des cliff-dwellers, Indiens qui jadis se creusaient leurs habitations dans ces roches, et rencontré le Major Powell, l'énergique explorateur qui le premier, en dépit des rapides et des sauvages, réussit à descendre le Colorado, comme le vieil Hance, un pionnier qui habite ici depuis huit ans, nous arrêta à sa cabane pour nous montrer des martres tuées la nuit et nous dire son existence, l'été sous les sapins, l'hiver au fond des gorges, dans les clairières toujours vertes parfumées de senteurs sauvages, nous nous sommes surpris à envier ces vies d'indépendance dans la libre nature."

(translation)

"August 25. Camp under the pines, at the edge of the Cañon, which we contemplate from the top of a rock which overhangs it. No words could express its savage grandeur: a gash in the earth, suddenly torn to the horizon over a length of one hundred and eighty miles, an opening stirred by chasms from which rise as far as the eye can see. heaps of peaks, crests, needles, arrows, gaping granite, real chaos that evokes the idea of ancient cataclysms. The American imagination has not exaggerated anything in baptizing them the "Titan of the abysses".

"We venture there in the morning with mules, an almost useless mount in these crevices; under the sun which reverberates in shimmering fire on the walls of red granite eight hundred meters high, one descends rockslides, leaning on the fir trees which grow in the cracks, crossing clearings of yuccas and aloes, excavations dug by the waters, following the bed of the torrents, crossing with the help of ropes the blocks which obstruct them and their falls along the smooth walls, and at two miles in depth one arrives at the Colorado, a vast river whose waters more than two hundred feet wide, red and swollen with clay carried along in their course, roll with a crash between ramparts of granite and disappear, torrential, terrible and attractive like the unknown.

"We go back. The gorge which, under the light of noon, was only a conflagration, cools and is colored with the magic of the evening; the sun falling on the red walls lays bright purples on their summits and, descending the slopes of the abyss in reflections which deteriorate, lays diamond stripes on the angles of the crystals, copper tones on the flows of the quartz, points of gold in the lamellae of the micas, yellow streaks in the veins of the agaves, bathes in pink the backs of the little lizards which jump on the rocks as we pass, and these ever-changing colors penetrate and merge into unreal tints, while that, from the still lukewarm grass whose flowers we tread on, rises with a wild perfume an iridescent evaporation which mingles with the last rays and slowly extinguishes them in violet mists.... We stop at a clearing, near a stream where the shade is soft; the guide prepares the night camp, lights branches, grills meat on the embers and spreads our blankets under the cotton trees. It is a delightful hour. At these depths, one hears only the wet sound of water, the dull pulsation of vegetable life, sometimes the fall of a stone which is loosened by the foot of a mule and whose rolling echoes from abyss to abyss through the lonely gorge or a ringing of bells, above, in the distance. The moon, which rises in the east, pours its fantasy over the calm of the evening, lending imaginary shapes to the granites, filling the space with its bluish light which slides to the hollow of the rocks, and, in this night clear of the Cañon, hundreds of miles from any city and any road, under the artificial being that life in Europe has made you, one feels the primitive instincts waking up, and, asleep in the grass under the stars, one dreams of a nomadic life in greenery and silence, freed from civilizations....

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

'The next day on the ascent, after having followed on the walls the traces of the cliff-dwellers, Indians who formerly dug their dwellings in these rocks, and met Major Powell, the energetic explorer who was the first, despite the rapids and savages, to succeed in descending the Colorado, like old Hance, a pioneer who has lived here for eight years, stopped us at his cabin to show us martens killed at night and tell us of his existence, in summer under the fir trees, the winter at the bottom of the gorges, in the evergreen clearings perfumed with wild scents, we found ourselves envying these lives of independence in the freedom of nature.'

James, George Wharton

- 386 1896 The H. M. M. B. A. in California. Pasadena, California: G. Wharton James, 338 pp. + [16] pp. advertisements. [Heavy boards in pebbled maroon cloth with gilt ornamental title and designs; gilt and green floral, textured end papers; all edges gilt.]

Hotel Men's Mutual Benefit Association. Grand Canyon, see pp. 27, 75, 77-78, 175-180. (The California excursions did not visit Grand Canyon. James's writings on the canyon in this title are mostly from work in preparation for his later In and Around the Grand Canyon, 1900.)

Miles, Nelson A.

- 387 1896 Personal recollections of observations of General Nelson A. Miles, embracing a brief view of the Civil War : or, From New England to the Golden Gate and the story of his Indian campaigns with comments on the exploration, development, and progress of our great western empire. Chicago and New York: Werner Co., 591 pp. [Reprinted by Da Capo Press (New York, 1969), and University of Nebraska Press (Lincoln, 1992).]

See p. 442: "The Grand Cañon of the Colorado is one of the wonders of nature, the duplicate of which can nowhere be found. This tremendous gorge, from one thousand to seven thousand feet in depth, cuts its way through the solid rock for more than four hundred miles, and though its beauty is of a dark and gloomy character, it is superbly grand. Standing beside its rushing waters it gives one a strange sensation to realize he his over a mile below the crust of the earth." (ENTIRE NOTE)

Tupper, Edith Sessions

- 388 1896 In the Grand Cañon of the Colorado. Frank Leslie's Popular Monthly, 41(6) (June): 677-684.

The author's visit to Hance's is recounted. She includes a good rendition of some of John's tales, though they are omitted here as being beyond the scope of Tupper's personal impressions.

". . . comparatively few tourists and scientists have yet penetrated the Arizona wilderness to gaze appalled on the most stupendous rent known in the earth's surface. The trouble is that so small a number of people know about it. Those who have heard and read of it are prone to confuse it with other grand cañons. 'Oh, yes, I have been to the Grand Cañon,' the writer has repeatedly heard tourists say, but on pressing the subject, has discovered that some one of the minor cañons of Colorado was meant.

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

"There is in the latter State a very beautiful and magnificent cañon—the Cañon of the Grand River; this is the one oftenest confounded with the Grand Cañon of the Colorado. The similarity of names easily accounts for the mistake. The Royal Gorge, in Colorado, is sometimes called the Grand Cañon of the Arkansas. This, too, often trades upon the majesty of the other. But, though both these cañons are superb and awe inspiring, beside the Grand Cañon they become mere hollows among the hills. So, too, with the Yosemite and the Yellowstone. See all these wonders first, for after the Grand Cañon, everything is dwarfed. Into its awful depths the Alps might be thrust; the Yosemite could be tucked away in one of its side pockets; twenty Yellowstones could be lost in its rocky recesses, and Niagara Falls would become merely a trickling cascade.

"Remote, well-nigh inaccessible, it lies—a thing apart from all the world, waiting, waiting for the homage of the universe. It has waited in its awful sublimity and its lonely beauty for thousands of years. Now the world is slowly waking up to the fact of its presence. Across miles of desert, through blinding sand storms, down the aisles of vast virgin forests, the adventurous world is creeping to tremble, wonder and worship before its awful shrine. • • •

"It was a glorious July morning when the writer left the Pullman Sleeper on the Santa Fé route at Flagstaff, Arizona. Flagstaff is a typical frontier town, rough and tumble in atmosphere, architecturally ugly, filled with cowboys and lumbermen. Its main street is lined with saloons and faro rooms and crowded with toughs and drunken men. It is a town to leave as quickly as possible, and, therefore, we were not slow in making our arrangements to get away to the cañon. The manager of the stage line is an accommodating man and will send tourists on at almost any hour of the day or night.

"Fortunate, indeed, was the writer to have the box seat with Robert Ferguson, driver. Ferguson is a brawny Scotch-American, who drives a stage in summer and spends the winters mining in the cañon. He was a pack outfitter in Salt Lake City when Powell was getting ready to start on his expedition, and had the honor of fitting out a pack train for the explorers. Ferguson is on intimate terms with the cañon and knows its every feature and mood. He laid out a trail known as the 'Bright Angel Trail,' and can tell you more about the mysteries of the cañon than all the guide books in creation. In the caressing tones of one who loves his subject, he will describe its glories on a moonlit night, or the white beauty of its rim after the snow falls, or how it slowly exhibits its charms through the silver mists that rise after a thunder storm, when pinnacle after pinnacle and dome after dome gleam through the lifting, floating haze. He enlivens the long, tedious ride by exciting tales of adventure, of road agents, of encounters with Apaches, so that the eleven hours' ride goes by very well indeed. • • •

"The stage goes thundering down a hill and draws up before a log cabin surrounded by a dozen or more tents. In front of the cabin, on a wooden bench, waits a sturdy man of about fifty, whose tawny hair and beard are liberally sprinkled with gray. He wears a suit of brown velveteen and a great flapping sombrero. He rises and comes forward, cordially smiling and doffing the sombrero; and the stage-driver says, with a great flourish of his whip: 'Ladies and gentlemen, allow me to present to you Captain John Hance, who has lived here for the last twelve years, and who knows more about the cañon than any man living.' Later, the driver takes you one side and confidentially informs you that 'Hance hain't no right to the title of captain, but as it pleases him and don't hurt nobody, why let it pass.'

"All the way from Albuquerque you have heard of John Hance. You have read about him in all the guide-books you have bought. People whom you meet tell you about the flapjacks he will cook for you at the cañon camp. You constantly hear references to 'Hance's trail,' 'Hance's new trail,' 'Hance's old trail,' 'Hance's Peak,' and 'Hance's cabin,' until you wonder if John Hance owns the Grand Cañon of the Colorado River. When you get to Flagstaff the air is still filled with confused murmurs of Hance. You come to have a sort of 'See-Hance-and-die' feeling, and are a little uncertain whether you have come thousands of miles to see the Grand Cañon or John Hance, of Arizona."

Tupper here renders a few of Hance's classic accounts of life at the canyon. She had, though, been goaded earlier (needlessly so) into getting Hance to start up: ("Whether it is from this lonely, desolate existence that Hance has contracted a habit of imagining vain things, I cannot say, but, certainly, Munchausen and Eli Perkins must needs hang their heads before this celebrated and accomplished Arizona story-teller. If the Lord loveth a

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

cheerful fakir, he must be very well satisfied with John Hance. I was warned before I left Flagstaff: "Hance will tell you some awful stiff yarns, but he sure and get him to tell you about his horse that jumped into the cañon.")

"After having been presented to this King of the Cañon, you register in the log cabin, which is a combination hotel-office and storehouse for tinned meats and vegetables, hams and bacon. Then you are shown to your tent, which is a most comfortable affair. The wooden floors are covered with Navajo blankets for rugs, the iron bedsteads have excellent mattresses and plenty of clean furnishings.

"The bell is ringing for supper in the dining tent, down there in the hollow close under the hill, but you cannot eat until you have looked upon the scene which you have crossed a continent to behold. Just back of the camp rises a lofty hill, covered with a dense growth of pines. Up this hill you trudge, and as you reach the summit, suddenly, without any premonition, you stand on the brink of a vast underworld. Before you yawns the bottomless pit.

"The sensation is at first absolutely terrifying. Many people faint at the sight, others weep, a few pray. • • • " She goes on about distances, rocks, colors, the air, and the Havasupai. Then, a trip into the canyon.

"The descent into the cañon is a feat only to be undertaken by those who possess great power of endurance and the steadiest of nerves. The Hance trail, which is the one most in use, begins about a mile from the camp and affords a superb view from every turn of its many windings. It is a great event when a party leaves the camp for the descent. The guide himself is an imposing figure as he leads the way. The tourists follow, some on foot, others on horseback, while the pack animals bring up the rear, laden with blankets and provisions. Everyone who is not going down comes out to shout a farewell and good luck. The dogs bark, the Chinese cook waves a towel, and the cortège slowly disappears through the pines. For the first two or three miles the descent is frightful, being an almost perpendicular pitch. When the First Level is reached more easy travel is assured. The First Level, by the way, is two thousand five hundred feet below the rim. Here again figures mean nothing. Comparing once more, the rock tower above the First Level five times as high as the spires of St. Patrick's Cathedral, or eight times the height of Liberty statue. And this is less than one half the descent. The trail goes on down an expanding gorge filled with shrubs and numerous wild flowers. The reds in the Cyclopean walls above you fade into a gloomy brown as the gorge narrows and shuts you in. But the climax of the intense and awful solemnity of the scene is not reached until you enter the cavern-like notches formed by the Archæan—the black rock, striped and swirled and painted with red and white. Down, down you drop until a tempestuous torrent, black as the fabled Styx, and foaming and seething like the whirlpool rapids of Niagara, is leaping and roaring at your feet.

"Look up now! Rising above you are mountain walls, inky-black in the shadow; distant towers which the far off sun is gilding; red and yellow terraces and peaks cleaving the sapphire sky. The glorious sight is like a glimpse of the Celestial City, while here, at your feet, lie regions infernal. Thus the grand cañon everywhere, a combination of heaven and hell.

"And when the moon rises and looks over these stupendous walls and sends her silver shafts down into every crevice of these cavernous depths, lo! a marvelous transformation is beheld. By her magic wand the caverns become chambers carved by the fairies, stored, heaped and piled with glittering gems. Airy castles gleam above your head in the soft, mellow moonlight. Columns, façades, domes and turrets are touched with silver and stand out like spectres in the darkness. Wrapped in your blanket you lie, a silent witness of the sublime enchantment, a mute spectator of this midnight transformation scene. Sunset, moonlight, or sunrise in the cañon, it matters not what may be the hour, the spell is ever new, ever potent and enthralling, the witchery of the place possesses you, the majesty overwhelms you. Everyone confesses to this influence. There is no escaping or defying it. If you are near it you must perforce go again and again to gaze upon it. When far away, its sublimity, its glory, its light and shade follow you, and stir and rouse your fancy and imagination. Again you climb the hill behind the camp; again, through the purple and golden mists of the dying day, you look down upon that incomparable spectacle. Drunken with coloring, dizzy with distances, once more your senses swoon. Height and depth appal and terrify; hue and tint of earth and air and sky exalt you. One instant you are crushed

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

by your insignificance; the next, your soul mounts on the couriers of the air, and you are transported to the Gates of Paradise.”

[Tupper’s article is immediately followed by “Lines Written in a Colorado Cañon”, by Walt Whitman, a poor choice of the editors that flies in the face of Tupper’s opening statement about “other” Grand Canyons and how they do not compare. This is in fact Whitman’s “Spirit That Form’d This Scene. Written in Platte Cañon, Colorado.”—copied from his Leaves of Grass (David McKay, Philadelphia, 1891-1892, p. 368).]

Warren, Henry White

389 1896 The Grand Canyon of the Colorado River. The Friend (Philadelphia), 70 (“Seventh-day, Twelfth month 5, 1896” [Saturday, December 5]) (20): 154-155.

Item signed “Bishop Warren”, credited to Christian Advocate. A joyfully personal, and rather geological, rendition of a visit to Grand Canyon, probably at Hance’s, one without directly mentioning the sublimity of rim views, or the terrors of trail traveling, and omitting the expectant architectural recitations.

“Before me lies a thin bit of red rock, rippled as delicately as a woman’s hair, bearing marks of raindrops that came from the south. It was once soft clay. • • •

For some while the author sets a geological stage of how these things came to be, for him to see.

“I go down with most reverent awe and pick the little ripple-rain-marked leaf out of its place in the book of nature, a veritable table of stone written by the finger of God, and bring it up and lay it alongside of one formed, eons after, at the top. They be brothers both, formed by the same forces and for the same end.

“Standing by this stupendous work of nature day after day, I try to stretch my mind to some large computation of the work done. A whole day is taken to go down the gorge to the river. It takes seven miles of zigzag trail, sometimes frightfully steep, along shelves not over two feet wide, under rock thousands of feet above and going down thousands of feet below, to get down that perpendicular mile. It was an immense day’s work.

“The day was full of perceptions of the grandeur of vast rock masses never before suggested, except by the mighty mass of the Matterhorn seen close by from its Hörnli shoulder.

“There was the river—a regular freight train, running day and night, the track unincumbered with returning cars (they were returned by the elevated road of the upper air)—burdened with dissolved rock and earth. A slip into this river scarcely seemed to wet the foot; it seemed rather to coat it thickly with mud rescued from its plunge toward the sea. What unimaginable amounts the larger river must have carried in uncounted ages! In the short time the Mississippi has been at work it has built out the land at its mouth one hundred miles into the Gulf.

“In the side cañon down which we worked our sublime and toilsome way it was easy to see the work done. Sometimes the fierce torrent would pile the bottom of a side cañon with every variety of stone, from the wall a mile high, into one tremendous heap of conglomerate. The next rush of waters would tear a channel through this and pour millions of tons into the main river. For years Boston toiled, in feeble imitation of Milton’s angels, to bring the Milton Hills into the back Bay and South Boston Flats. Boston made more land than the city originally contained, but it did not move a teaspoonful compared with these excavations.

“The section traversed that day seemed while we were in it like a mighty chasm, a world half rent asunder, full of vast sublimities, but the next day, seen from the rim as a part of the mighty whole, it appeared comparatively little. One gets new meanings of the words almighty, eternity, infinity, in the presence of things done that seem to require them all. • • • Any great scene in nature is like the woman you fall in love with at first sight for some pose of head, queenly carriage, auroral flush of color, penetrative music of voice, or a glance of soul through its illumined windows. You do not know much about her, but in long years of heroic endurance of trials, in the great dignity of motherhood, in the unspeakable comfortings that are scarcely short of godlike, and in the supernal, ineffable beauty and loveliness that cover it all, you find a richness and worth of which the most ardent lover never dreamed. The first sight of the cañon often brings strong men to their knees in awe and adoration. The gorge at Niagara is one hundred and fifty feet deep; it is far short of this, which is six thousand

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

six hundred and forty. Great is the first impression, but in the longer and closer acquaintance every sense of beauty is flooded to the utmost.

"The next morning I was out before 'jocund day stood tiptoe on the breezy mountain tops.' [Shakespeare, Romeo and Juliet, III, v]. I have seen many sunrises in this world and one other: I have watched the moon slowly rolling its deep valleys for weeks into its morning sunlight. I knew what to expect. But nature always surpasses expectations. The sinuosities of the rim sent back their various colors. A hundred domes and spires, wind sculptured and water sculptured, reached up like Memnon to catch the first light of the sun, and seemed to me to break out into Memnonian music. As the world rolled the steady light penetrated deeper, shadows diminished, light spaces broadened and multiplied, till it seemed as if a new creation were veritably going forward and a new 'Let there be light' had been uttered. I had seen it for the first time the night before in the mellow light of a nearly full moon, but the sunlight really seemed to make, in respect to breadth, depth, and definiteness, a new creation.

"One peculiar effect I never noticed elsewhere. It is well known that the blue sky is not blue and there is no sky. Blue is the color of the atmosphere, and when seen in the miles deep overhead, or condensed in a jar, it shows its own true color. So, looking into this inconceivable cañon, the true color came out most beautifully. There was a background of red and yellowish rocks. These made the cold blue blush with warm color. The sapphire was backed with sardonyx, and the bluish white of the chalcedony was half pellucid to the gold chrysolite behind it. God was laying the foundation of his perfect city there, and the light of it seemed fit for the redeemed to walk in, and to have been made by the luminousness of Him who is light.

"One great purpose of this world is its use as significant symbol and hint of the world to come. The communication of ideas and feelings there is not by slow, clumsy speech, often misunderstood, originally made to express low physical wants, but it is by charade, panorama, parable, and music rolling like the voice of many waters in a storm. The greatest things and relations of earth are as hintful of greater things as a bit of float ore in the plains is suggestive of boundless mines in the upper hills. So the joy of finding one lost lamb in the wilderness tells of the joy of finding and saving a human soul. One should never go to any of God's great wonders to see sights, but to live life; to read in them the figures, symbols, and types of the more wonderful things in the new heavens and the new earth.

"The old Hebrew prophets and poets saw God everywhere in nature. The floods clap their hands and the hills are joyful together before the Lord. • • • "

1897

Anonymous

390 1897 Prof. Brewer's lecture. A very interesting description of western mountains. The Papyrus (Taft's School, Watertown, Connecticut), 3(9) (March 17): 1.

William H. Brewer, Professor of Agriculture, Sheffield Scientific School. "In closing, Prof. Brewer very vividly depicted the Grand Cañon of the Colorado, which is over a mile deep and is the most sublime and stupendous piece of scenery in the world. The Professor said that after seeing this the magnificent falls of Niagara appeared childish and tame compared with it." (ENTIRE NOTE)

Bickmore, Albert S.

391 1897 American Museum of Natural History. Report of Professor Albert S. Bickmore. In: State of New York : Department of Public Instruction, Forty-third Annual Report of the State Superintendent for the school year ending July 31, 1896 : transmitted to the Legislature March 30, 1897. Albany and New York: Wynkoop Hallenbeck Crawford Co., State Printers, pp. 279-297.

See p. 292, note of a photography visit to Grand Canyon.

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

Canfield, James H.

392 1897 Annual report. Ohio State University, Board of Trustees, 27th Annual Report, pp. 32-45.

See under "The New Chapel", p. 36: "A course of weekly lectures was carried during the winter term, by the Faculty; closing with two by Col. Stanton, the explorer of the Grand Canon." (ENTIRE NOTE) Robert Brewster Stanton.

Fromholz, Hugo

393 1897 An den Küsten des Pacific. Reisebriefe von Hugo Fromholz. Berlin: Druck von August Hoffmann, 160 pp. [In German.]

(transl. 'On the shores of the Pacific. Travel letters from Hugo Fromholz')

Correspondence from an 1895 trip. See "Grand Canon des Colorado. (23.-26. September.)" (pp. 90-98); written in El Paso, September 28. Departing from Flagstaff, most of the entry pertains to a ride to the canyon at Hance's, with a partial descent to the river, and digresses into a discussion of American Indians before proceeding on his journey toward El Paso. Only the portion pertaining to his canyon stay is reproduced here, though it omits the ride from Flagstaff to the canyon and his recitation of the canyon's dimensions and physical features and the Colorado River's canyons in general.

"Um 7 Uhr Morgens des 23. September verließ ich bei wolkigem Himmel und angenehmer Kühle Flagstaff [sic] in einem oben bedeckten, an den Seiten offenen Wagen, völlig gleich den stage coaches zum Yosemite und im Yellowstone-Park; zwei muntere Rößlein von der nicht großen aber kräftigen Zucht der unweit nordöstlich siedelnden Navajo- (spr. Návaho) Indianer machten dem Kutscher zu schaffen, der sich als ein recht gebildeter Jowa - Mann erwies und mit dem gut plaudern war. • • •

"Um 7½ Uhr Abends hielt ich in einer Thalmulde mitten in hochstämmigem Walde vor einer Blockhütte, aus der mir helles Licht entgegenstrahlte und der Wirt des Camp freundlich bewillkommend entgegtrat.

"Neben der Hütte, die als Vorratsraum und Salon (mit Kamin!) dient, liegt das Zeltlager, aus etwa zwölf verschieden großen Schlafzelten und einem Speisezelt bestehend; alle sind gedielt und mit vortrefflichen breiten Betten sowie Waschgerät und Stuhl versehen und sauber gehalten. Nachdem ich in einem solchen mich vom Reisestaub gesäubert, nahm ich noch ein spätes Effen ein, das mir die freundliche Frau und zwei muntere Töchter des Wirtes auftrugen; aber es wollte nach der doch anstrengenden, wenn auch nicht sehr staubigen Fahrt von zwölf Stunden nicht recht munden. Desto besser that dies aber eine Flasche Milwaukee-Bier, das im kühlen Quell gelagert eine wundervolle Frische und so trefflichen Geschmack zeigte, wie ich ihn in Amerika selten gefunden, wo man eben das Bier übermäßig eisig genießt und so den Geschmack verdirbt. Nachdem die Partie in den Canon hinunter für den nächsten Morgen mit Mr. Hance besprochen worden, welcher Führer und Maultiere zu diesem Zwecke zu mäßigen Preisen (5 Dollars für den guide, 3½ für das mule) stellt, ging ich zur Ruhe und schlief trotz der empfindlichen Nachtkühle (5° R.) unter den warmen Decken des Bettes prächtig.

"Früh vor 6 Uhr war ich auf und sah mit Freude, daß die Bewölkung des vorigen Tages einem glänzenden klaren Himmelblau Platz gemacht; dann gabs ein eiliges Frühstück und um 7 Uhr ritt ich mit dem Führer ab, der für mich schweren Mann vorsichtshalber noch ein zweites Mule (ohne daß ich dafür zahlte!) mitleitete, das Butterbrote, Wein und Wasser trug. Nach 10 Minuten aus dem Hochwald kommend sah ich vor mir ein Holzhaus auf einem Hügel im Buschwald und daneben eine Pferdeherde, Hance's Sommerheim. Auf des Führers Rat ritt ich dicht heran an das Haus, und hier wurde mir, trotzdem ich darauf vorbereitet war, eine Ueberraschung von solch überwältigender Größe, daß die Sprache zu schwach ist, sie wiederzugeben: ich stand auf dem obersten Rande des Grand Canon des Colorado.

"Im hellen Glanze der Morgensonne strahlend lag die gewaltige Schlucht vor mir, bald goldig, bald rosa, bald purpurn glühten die nackten Felshäupter und Riffe vor mir, noch dunkel und in duftiges Blau und Violett gehüllt zeichneten sich zu meinen Füßen die tiefen Schluchten und Riffe dazwischen ab! Kein Laut ringsum; Einsamkeit, Größe, Majestät überall! Verständig und taktvoll hatte der Führer sich ferngehalten, um den überwältigenden Eindruck ganz auswirken zu lassen, erst nach einigen Minuten kam er näher, „Nicht wahr, das ist einzig?" Selbst dieser rauhe Bursche fühlte die Macht solchen Bildes! Einzig, das ist das rechte Wort! • • •

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

„Erst ging es noch ein Weilchen durch Buschwald von Wachholder, Chininstrauch, Kiefern und soap plant (eine kleine Aloëart) darunter in nordöstlicher Richtung, bis die Ostseite jenes Sattels erreicht war, an dem, und später an dem Ayers Peak, sich der neue Weg hinabzieht, um dann unter ihm hin in ziemlich gleicher Höhe bis unterhalb des Point Moran zu führen und dann in eine enge Schlucht hinabzulaufen, die bis an den Fluß führt. An ein Hinabreiten, wie es leichtere Reisende thun, war für mich schweren Mann nicht zu denken, also stieg ich wie der Führer am Beginn des Abstiegs vom Mule und folgte zu Fuß als letzter, um den etwaigen Versuch der Mule, umzukehren und durchzubrennen zu verhindern. Der Weg ist neu, noch nicht viel benutzt, steil und streckenweis nicht ungefährlich, sodaß ich bei der Schwäche meines linken Fußknöchels sehr auf den Weg achten mußte. An eine Umschau war deshalb nicht viel zu denken, nur wenn ich stillstand, um die viel langsamer als ich hinabkletternden Mule, besonders den schalkhaften ‚Jimmy‘, anzutreiben, konnte ich die sich ändernden Felsbildungen betrachten und die malerischen Blicke in die Tiefe bewundern.

„Zuerst war es gelbgrauer übereinandergetürmter Kalkstein, dann folgten in ganz dünnen Schichten gelagerter gelber Kalkschiefer, weiter hinab rosenroter massiger Sandstein, darunter tieferer Kalkstein, bis am Ende meines Abstieges wir in ein sonderbares Gemisch von rotem und grauem Gestein kamen. Mehr als eine Stunde stieg ich an der Steilwand im Zickzack abwärts zwischen Geröll und Busch, dann wurde eine kleine Fläche erreicht und nun in enger Schlucht unter dem sich jetzt als mächtigen Felskoloß darstellenden Ayers Peak die Kletterei fortgesetzt, bis an der Ausmündung derselben in eine Weitung der Pfad sich nach rechts der Felswand des oberen Randes zuwendet und längs dieser bergab bergauf bis zur Grenze des Buschwuchses hinabführt.

„Als mir um 10½ Uhr dort bei einer vorspringenden Klippe der Führer sagte, hier beginne ein weiterer sehr steiler und fortan aussichtsloser Weg, der noch 3 Stunden bis zum Fluß erfordere, entschloß ich mich, hier zu rasten und nicht weiter zu gehen. Die Mule wurden also angebunden, der Führer und ich brachten das Frühstück auf jene Klippe und lagerten uns im Schatten eines Busches. Ein schöner Ueberblick über die tieferen Schluchten bis zum mehrmals sichtbaren Fluß und auf die gewaltigen roten Wände hinter mir bot sich von diesem Punkte, den ich nach mir Big Germans Cliff nannte, als dem schwersten Manne, der bisher den Abstieg in den Canon, wenn auch nur bis hierher, unternommen. Hance hat mir zugesagt, daß er den Namen erhalten wolle für den durch zwei Felsnadeln vor der eigentlichen Klippe leicht erkennbaren Felsvorsprung.

„Bis Mittag lagerte ich dort, völlig zufrieden mit dem Erreichten und Geschauten, frühstückte und schrieb einige Postkarten heimwärts, dann wurde der Rückweg im Sattel angetreten, und mußte ‚Miß Black‘, die bisher ganz frei mitgegangen war, zuerst für die weniger steile Partie bis zu jener Sattelfläche heran. Lehrreich war mir dabei die Aehnlichkeit der Denkweise zwischen Mensch und Tier beider Geschlechter, die ich hier bemerkte. Während nämlich ‚Miß Black‘, sobald eine steile Stelle kam, ganz nach weiblicher Art mit einem plötzlichen Entschluß hinaufsprang, ja sprang, um dann athemlos stehen zu bleiben, stieg Mr. ‚Jimmy‘, den ich für den zweiten Teil des Aufstiegs nahm, in überlegter, ganz männlicher Weise langsam und ohne sich außer Athem zu bringen die Steilen hinan, jede kleine Ebenheit aber zu einem kleinen Halt benutzend und fortwährend mit zurückgelegtem Kopfe die noch zurückzulegende Höhe abschätzend. Ein prächtiger Bursche, dieser ‚Jimmy‘, der stärkste und klügste der ganzen Herde, aber ein unverbesserlicher Durchbrenner, wenn ohne Aufsicht. Tout comme chez nous — hommes!

„Um 2 Uhr war der obere Rand wieder erreicht und durch den jetzt recht stickigen Wald um 2½ der Camp; in meinem sonnendurchwärmten und doch luftigen Zelt genoß ich erst ein Luftbad mit innerlichem Bierzusatz und dann ein köstliches Schlummerstündchen. Wie wenig wissen doch die kleidungsüberladenen Nordländer, welche Wonne es ist, nach einer körperlichen Anstrengung den Körper, sobald er trocken geworden, ohne Hülle der frischen warmen Luft auszusetzen! Gegen 5 Uhr stieg ich gleich hinter dem in einer windgeschützten Mulde liegenden Camp den Abfall des Canonrandes etwa 200 m weit hinan und befand mich dann sofort auf einer etwas vorspringenden Felsklippe, die einen gerade zu Sonnen-Untergang außerordentlich günstigen Ausblick gewährt. Vor mir zog sich jene Schlucht westlich vom massigen Ayers Peak hinunter, in der der alte Hance trail (-pfad) zu seiner weit unten sichtbaren Winterhütte und weiter hinabzieht, zur Linken stieg eine ähnliche zerklüftete Felsmasse empor, über die Schlucht weg öffnete sich ein weiter Ausblick in den westlichen Canon, während über den erwähnten Sattel zum Ayers Peak sich ein beschränkterer auf den östlichen Canon bot.

„Mit nicht ermüdendem Interesse suchte mein Auge die schon bekannten Formen der Hauptfelsen und -schluchten, die sich hier oft ganz anders darstellten als von der Tiefe aus; aber was besonders das Bild

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

dieses Abends unauslöschlich in meinem Erinnern haften lassen wird als das vielleicht schönste, das ich je genossen, das war die Farbenpracht des Canon im Lichte der sinkenden Sonne. Jetzt zeigte er noch mehr als im Morgenlichte, welche geradezu überirdische Farbenabstufungen die bunten Felsmassen annehmen können. Mattes Gelb, Rosa und Ziegelrot sind ja die Farben der oberen Gesteinschichten, aber wie leuchteten sie hier purpurn auf, wo die schrägen Sonnenstrahlen ihre phantastischen Bildungen beschienen!

„Fast wie losgelöst von den schon im blauen, ja veilchenfarbenen Dunkel liegenden Bergmassen glänzten schier gespenstisch sonderbar gestaltete, langsam mit dem Beschattetwerden sich verändernde Felstöpfe tief im Thal auf, um mit dem Schwinden des Sonnenlichtes in Dunkel und Unsichtbarkeit zu versinken. Immer tiefer, immer duftiger wurden die Schatten in den Thälern und Schluchten, langsam sant das Tagesgestirn hinab und die noch dünne Mondsichel stieg höher, um nach kurzer Zeit mit mildem Lichte dem unsagbar großartigen Bilde neuen Farbenreiz und geheimnißvolle Beleuchtung zu spenden. Einzig, unvergeßlich, was ich hier in einsamen Stunden sah!

„Eine laute Gesellschaft soeben mit dem Wagen anlangender Amerikaner scheuchte mich fort von dem wunderbaren Punkte, die natürlich gleich Echo schießen mußten und damit den Hauptreiz des wundervollen Bildes, die ungeheure Stille, zerstörten. Die geradezu kindische Lust der Amerikaner am Feueranmachen raubte mir frühzeitig den Schlaf; hatte da mein Zeltnachbar es ganz früh morgens kalt im Zelt gefunden und ganz einfach zwischen unseren beiden Zelten ein Feuer angemacht, dessen Schwelgeruch und Knacken mich denn auch um 4½ Uhr in Schrecken erwachen und trotz der nur + 5° R. eilig zum Zelt rauslaufen ließ, um den Grund zu ermitteln. Wenn schon keine Gefahr vorhanden war, zeigte sich doch der Rauch lästig, und ich konnte nicht wieder einschlafen. Meine Beschwerde beim Frühstück begriff der Mann einfach nicht; ihm hatte das Feuer behagt und und ihm eingebildete Wärme gespendet; ob ich dadurch belästigt worden, war ihm — schnuppe. Free country!

„Nachdem die nicht angenehme Gesellschaft zum Canon abgeritten war, machte ich mich zu Fuß auf den Weg zum besten Aussichtspunkt an der Kante, Point Moran. Bald hinter Hance's Haus zweigt der Pfad sich rechts von dem zum Canon ab und führt gut erkennbar in nordöstlicher Richtung in etwa ¾ Stunden an den Canonrand und dann in weiterer ¼ Stunde zum Point Moran. Verblüfft blieb ich aus dem Gebüsch hervortretend stehen, so eigenartig war das Bild vor mir. Auf dem gewaltigen Hintergrunde des Canons, der im hellsten und doch duftigen Sonnenlichte vor mir lag, zeichnete sich ein Felsturm ab, der kaum 15 m entfernt von dem anscheinenden Absturz vor mir emporstieg; Mauerreste und ein paar Bäumchen krönen seine Oberfläche.

„Ueber den Rand vor mir blickend sah ich, daß ein schmaler Grat die Felsklippe mit dem Rand verbindet und daß ein Steig hinüberführt, der unter dem Rande des Absturzes beginnt; an allen Seiten gähnt dann aber ein tausende von Fuß tiefer, jäher Abgrund. Da ich schwindelfrei bin, auch mich die kleine Kletterei lockte, stieg ich auf ganz gut begehbarer Stelle zwischen Gestein zu dem Steig hinab, über den Sattel hinüber zur Klippe und an dieser an einer Stelle, wo frühere Besucher Steine zur Hülfe aufeinandergepackt, zur Fläche empor. Auch Freund ‚Typ‘ ward mit Hülfe seines langen Tragriemens hinab- und hinauf-geseilt, so daß er das gerade von hier besonders eindrucksvolle Bild des Canons in sich aufnehmen konnte. Der Blick ist hier namentlich gegen Nordosten unbeschränkt; an vier Stellen zeigen sich die Windungen des braunen Colorado in recht breiten baumgrünen Thälern, in weiter Ferne steigt wie eine flache blaue Halbkugel der Peak Navajo auf, unmittelbar zu meinen Füßen unter dem entseßlichen Absturz lag Big Germans Cliff.

„Mit immer neuem Interesse blickt man auf die großartige Welt, die der nimmer rastenden Kraft nagenden Wassers seit undenkbaren Zeiten ihr Entstehen verdankt; dann aber wendet man sich auch gern den kleinen Resten zu, die Menschenkunst an dieser weltentrückten Stelle zurückgelassen. Die ganze unregelmäßige Fläche des Felsens, vielleicht 100 qm betragend, war einst mit einer Maner aus ganz regelmäßig behauenen Steinen umzogen, zwischen denen Mörtel jetzt nicht mehr feststellbar ist. Zwei etwa 3:8 m große viereckige Häuser waren an diese Mauer angebaut, wie die noch bis zu 1 m hohen Steinlagen beweisen; Topfscherben finden sich manchmal. Der Absturz des Felsens nach dem schmalen Grate sieht aus, als ob er künstlich noch steiler abgesprengt worden wäre.“

(translation)

‘At 7 o'clock in the morning of September 23, under a cloudy sky and a pleasant coolness, I left Flagstaff in a covered, open-sided carriage, just like the stage coaches to Yosemite and Yellowstone Park; two lively little

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

horses from the not large but strong breed of the Navajo (pron. Návaho) Indians who live not far to the northeast gave the coachman a hard time, who turned out to be a well-educated Iowa man and with whom it was easy to chat. • • •

“At 7:30 p.m. I stopped in a hollow in the middle of a tall forest in front of a log cabin from which bright light shone and the innkeeper of the camp greeted me in a friendly manner.

‘Next to the hut, which serves as a pantry and living room (with a fireplace!), is the tent camp, consisting of about twelve sleeping tents of different sizes and a dining tent; all are boarded and provided with excellent wide beds, wash-basins and chairs, and are kept clean. After I had cleaned myself of the travel dust in one of these, I took a late meal, which the friendly wife and two lively daughters of the innkeeper brought to me; but after the exhausting, if not very dusty, journey of twelve hours, it didn't really taste good. But a bottle of Milwaukee beer, stored in a cool spring, did all the better, showing a wonderful freshness and such an excellent taste as I seldom found in America, where the beer is enjoyed overly icy and thus spoils the taste. After discussing the descent down the canyon for the next morning with Mr. Hance, who provides guides and mules for the purpose at moderate prices ($5 for the guide, 3½ for the mule), I went to bed and slept in spite of the sensitive night chill (5° R.) under the warm bed blankets.’ [The temperature, about 44° F, was given in the Réaumur scale, which places the freezing and boiling points of water at 0 and 80 degrees, respectively.]

‘I was up before 6 a.m. and saw with joy that the clouds of the previous day were giving way to a brilliant, clear blue sky; then there was a hurried breakfast and at 7 o'clock I rode off with the guide, who, as a precaution for me, a heavy man, also led a second mule (without my paying for it!) carrying sandwiches, wine and water. After 10 minutes coming out of the high forest I saw before me a wooden house on a hill in the scrub forest and next to it a horse corral, Hance's summer home. On the guide's advice I rode close to the house, and here, although I had been prepared, I was met with a surprise of such overwhelming magnitude that language is too weak to describe it: I stood on the uppermost edge of the Grand Canyon of the Colorado.

‘The mighty gorge lay in front of me, radiant in the bright brilliance of the morning sun, the bare rock heads and reefs glowed in front of me now golden, now pink, now purple, while the deep gorges and ridges in between were still dark and wrapped in fragrant blue and violet at my feet! No sound; solitude, grandeur, majesty everywhere! The guide, intelligently and tactfully, kept his distance to let the overwhelming impression fully sink in, only after a few minutes he approached, “Isn't it unique?” Even this rough fellow felt the power of such an image! Unique, that's the right word! • • •

‘At first it [the trail] went down for a while through a scrubby forest of juniper, quinine, pine and soap plant (a small species of aloe) in a northeasterly direction, until the steep side of the saddle was reached, along which, and later along Ayers Peak, the new path descends, then going under it at much the same level to below Point Moran, and then running down into a narrow gorge which leads to the river. Riding down as lighter travelers do was out of the question for me, a heavy man, so like the guide I dismounted from the mule at the beginning of the descent and followed on foot last, to prevent any attempt by the mule to turn back and run away. The path is new, not much used, steep and sometimes not without danger, so that I had to be very careful with the weakness of my left ankle. So, there was not much to think about looking around, only when I stood still to urge the much slower descending mules, especially the mischievous “Jimmy”, could I watch the changing rock formations and admire the picturesque views below.

‘First there was yellow-grey limestone stacked on top of one another, then followed in very thin layers yellow calcareous slate, further down rose-red, massive sandstone, underneath deep red limestone, until at the end of my descent we came to a strange mixture of red and gray rock. For more than an hour I zigzagged down the steep face between scree and bush, then a small area was reached and the climbing continued in a narrow gorge under Ayers Peak, which now presents itself as a mighty colossus of rock, until it opens out into a widening the path turns right towards the cliff of the upper rim and descends along it uphill to the limit of the bush growth.

‘When at 10:30 the guide told me at a jutting cliff there that another very steep and henceforth hopeless path began here, which still required 3 hours to reach the river, I decided to rest here and not go any further. So the mules were tied up, the guide and I took breakfast to that cliff and encamped under the shade of a bush. A beautiful view over the deeper gorges to the river, which can be seen in several places from this point, and the mighty red walls behind me I named Big German's Cliff after myself, as the heaviest man who has so far

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

undertaken the descent into the canyon, albeit only up to here. Hance has promised me that he wants to get that name for the rocky outcrop, easily recognizable by two pinnacles in front of the actual cliff.

I camped there until noon, completely satisfied with what I had achieved and seen, had breakfast and wrote a few postcards home, then the way back was started in the saddle, and "Miss Black", who had hitherto walked along quite freely, had to go up on saddle first for the less steep section. The similarity in the way of thinking between man and animal of both sexes, which I noticed here, was instructive to me. For while "Miss Black", as soon as a steep part came, ran up it with a sudden determination, quite in the manner of a woman, and even jumped, and then stood breathless, Mr. "Jimmy", for the second part of the ascent, climbed slowly and without getting out of breath up the steep inclines in a considered, quite manly way, using every little levelness for a small halt and continually estimating the height still to be covered with his head back. A fine fellow, this "Jimmy", the strongest and brightest of the herd, but an incorrigible runaway when left unattended. Tout comme chez nous — hommes! [In French, "Just like with us—men!"]

At 2 o'clock the rim was reached again and through the now quite stifling forest arrived in camp at 2:30. In my sun-drenched and yet airy tent I first enjoyed an air bath with an internal beer supplement and then a delicious little nap. How little do the northerners, overloaded with clothing, know the bliss of exposing the body, uncovered, to the fresh, warm air as soon as it has dried after physical exertion! At about 5 o'clock I climbed the slope of the canyon about 200 m behind the camp, which was situated in a wind-protected hollow, and then found myself immediately on a somewhat projecting cliff, which afforded an exceptionally favorable view, especially at sunset. Ahead the gorge ran west of massive Ayers Peak, down which the old Hance trail descends to its winter hut visible far below and beyond. To the left rose a similarly jagged mass of rock, across the gorge opened a wider, single view into the western canyon, while over the aforementioned saddle to Ayers Peak there was a more limited view of the eastern canyon.

With never tiring interest, my eye sought the familiar shapes of the main rocks and gorges, which often presented themselves quite differently here than from the depths; but what will leave the picture of that evening indelibly stuck in my memory as perhaps the most beautiful thing I have ever enjoyed was the blaze of color of the Canyon in the light of the sinking sun. Now it showed even more than in the morning light what almost unearthly gradations of color the colored rock masses can take on. Dull yellow, pink, and brick-red are the colors of the upper layers of rock, but how purple they glowed here, where the slanting rays of the sun shone on their fantastic formations!

Almost as if detached from the mountain masses, which were already lying in the blue, even violet-colored darkness, almost eerily strangely shaped potholes, slowly changing with the shadowing, shone deep in the valley, only to sink into darkness and invisibility with the fading sunlight. The shadows in the valleys and ravines became ever deeper, ever more fragrant, the day star slowly descended and the still thin crescent moon rose higher, only to give the unspeakably magnificent picture new colors and mysterious illumination with a mild light after a short time. Unique, unforgettable what I saw here in lonely hours!

A loud company of Americans who had just arrived in their wagon drove me away from the wonderful spots; they of course immediately had to shout an echo and thereby destroy the main attraction of the wonderful picture, the tremendous silence. The almost childish love of the Americans for lighting fires robbed me of sleep early on; my tent neighbor had found it cold in the tent very early in the morning and simply lit a fire between our two tents, whose smoldering smell and crackling woke me up in terror at 4:30 a.m. and despite it being only +5° R. rushed out of the tent to find out why. If there was no danger, the smoke was annoying and I couldn't go back to sleep. The man simply didn't understand my complaint at breakfast; the fire had pleased him and given him imaginary warmth; if I had been bothered by him — sniff. Free country! [the last two words in English].

After the unpleasant company rode off to the canyon, I set off on foot to the best viewpoint on the ridge, Point Moran. Soon after Hance's house the path branches off to the right of the canyon and clearly heads northeast, in about  $\frac{3}{4}$  hours to the rim of the canyon and then in another  $\frac{1}{4}$  hour to Point Moran. Stunned, I stopped walking out of the bushes, the picture in front of me was so strange. Against the mighty background of the canyon, which lay before me in the brightest yet fragrant sunlight, loomed a rocky tower rising scarcely 15 meters from the apparent cliff before me; the remains of a wall, and a few trees crown its surface.

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

'Looking over the lip before me, I saw that a narrow ridge joins the cliff to the lip, and that a climb leads over it, beginning below the lip of the fall; but on all sides there yawns a sheer abyss thousands of feet deep. Since I am not afraid of heights and the little climb tempted me, I climbed down to the path between rocks at a very accessible point, over the saddle, over to the cliff, and at this point, at a point where previous visitors stacked stones as a guide to the surface. Friend "Typ" was also roped down and up with the help of his long carrying strap, so that he could take in the particularly impressive picture of the canyon from here. The view here is unrestricted, especially to the northeast; in four places the meanderings of the brown Colorado show themselves in fairly wide tree-green valleys, in the far distance Navajo Peak rises like a flat blue hemisphere, and directly at my feet under the terrible drop is Big German's Cliff.

'With ever renewed interest one gazes at the magnificent world that owes its existence to the never-ending force of gnawing water from time immemorial; but then one also likes to turn to the small remnants that human art left behind at this otherworldly place. The whole irregular surface of the rock, amounting to perhaps 100 square meters, was once surrounded by a pattern of quite regularly hewn stones, between which mortar is no longer discernible. Two approximately 3:8 m square houses were attached to this wall, as evidenced by layers of stone up to 1 m high; pot shards are sometimes found. Fallen rocks beyond the narrow ridge look as if they had been artificially blown off.'

Hall, Sharlot M.

- 394 1897 How I saw the Grand Canon of the Colorado at Midnight. Travel, 2 (September): 724-727.
[This item has not been located thus far; but see Hall (1907).]

Pattee, C. R.

- 395 1897 Flagstaff and the Grand Canyon. Land of Sunshine, 7 (August): 124-135.

Principally a commerce booster for Flagstaff, before setting out for the canyon.

"Among the many marvelous things in the physical world, the Grand Cañon is sui generis [Latin, 'of its own kind']; there is nothing like it in all the earth. The 72 mile trip by stage, from Flagstaff to the cañon, is made in a day, and is worth all it costs. • • •

"The last twenty miles to the cañon is on a gentle up-grade, but on nearing the cañon the tourist, with nervous expectation, is rushed on a down-grade into the little vale among the pines where, with gentlemanly treatment and at reasonable rates, he is to camp. Having secured quarters, his first and irresistible impulse is to rush up the short slope to the rim of the cañon at Observation Point where he gets his first view of the vast chasm. As he looks across to Point Sublime, 13 miles away, and down into the yawning depths below him, every pre-conceived notion of it is swept away, and he is overwhelmed by emotions as strange and indescribable as the scene before him. The setting sun is burnishing with silver, gold and amethyst, the many colored battlements, castles, towers and domes which the erosion of ages has formed so perfectly that they seem the product of design. Spellbound he lingers until the sunset tints fade from the sky, and the cañon fills up with darker and darker purple which deepens into indigo, until the rising moon transforms the whole into a more ghostly scene. • • •

"But no one has done the cañon until he has descended into its depths, bathed in the rushing waters of the Colorado, and inverted his view from the bottom upward to the dizzy heights around and above him.

"Of the three trails which lead to the bottom, the new Hance Trail is the shortest and most popular. By this trail it is five miles to the river, but, thanks to that indispensable worthy, the mule, the trip is made with comfort and safety. Nevertheless, the descent and return must be experienced to be appreciated.

"The builder of this trail is as unique and unaccountable as the cañon itself, in which he has lived so long that he has become a part of it. The visitor who does not make the acquaintance of Capt. John Hance has failed to know the one living curiosity of that region.

"How long this unique character (who claims that he won't tell the truth if he can help it) has fellowed with the cañon no one but himself knows, but he delights in fortifying the courage of those who hesitate to make the

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

descent, with the information that his grandmother when 80 years of age packed all the water the washings over the same trail, from the river to the rim. • • •

"But the biggest liar on earth can not catch up with the Grand Cañon."

1898

Anonymous

396

1898 Into the Grand Cañon. Land of Sunshine, 9(3) (August): 145-149.

Five days were spent at Hance's at the Grand Canyon.

"One of the pleasantest and most profitable parties that ever crossed the Mojave desert was the teachers' excursion arranged by the Santa Fé Pacific Railroad, and 'personally conducted' by Prof. Emory E. Smith, which left San Francisco June 6th. The roster was as follows: David Starr Jordan, President of Stanford University [see also Jordan (1898, 1922)]; Mrs. Jordan; Dr. J. C. Branner, professor of geology at Stanford [see also Branner (1898)], Milnor Roberts and W. Q. Wright, two of his students; Theodore H. Hittell of San Francisco, the historian of California; Miss Catherine Hittell, his daughter; Dr. C. L. Goddard, of the Affiliated Colleges, San Francisco, with his wife and son; E.W. Ehrhorn, the entomologist; Dr. F. R. Ledyard, San José; F. W. Stephenson, J. N. Suydam, Misses Mary Alexander, Ella Kirkman and Florence Gordon, of San Francisco; Chas. F. Lummis and Turbesé Lummis. • • •

"The beautiful 70-mile stage-ride from Flagstaff to the Cañon, on Wilbur F. Thurber's excellent six-horse stages and with that clever Jehu himself at the lines 'sending them,' is always a pleasant memory, with its changing views of the San Francisco peaks, its windings through probably the most beautiful grove of white columned quaking aspens in the United States, its leagues through the parklike pine forest which is one of the largest in America, its vistas among volcanic cones and across broad openings to the Painted Desert. It is a good road, an excellent dinner awaits the traveler at Cedar Ranch; and in the fall of evening the coaches roll down the hill to the piney glade where the Cañon Hotel snuggles in its charming hollow. The hotel is also managed by Mr. Thurber, and the accommodations are surprisingly good. No one need be deterred from visiting the world's greatest wonder by fear of discomfort. On the contrary, every arrangement of the camp will be remembered with pleasure.

"A hundred yards up an easy slope to the north, and in the gathering twilight we stand on the 'rim,' looking wistfully down into the shadowy vastness of the greatest and most awesome gash on the earth's surface—the Grand Cañon of the Colorado.

"It would be vain to try to describe that wonder here. The ablest pens have tried—and tried in vain—to portray it. It is one of the scenes from which eloquence turns away abashed—there are no words which can make one realize the Grand Cañon. • • • One must see it all—and even then it takes time to realize."

"The five days at the Cañon we filled with wonderful memories. The party explored the Rim for miles east and west; to castellate Moran's point, where Thos. Moran painted his masterpiece; to the giant promontory of Bissell's Point, whence is probably the most diagrammatic view to be had in this reach of the Cañon; and west to Berry's admirable log hotel and good trail.

Although the title indicates "into" the canyon, all that was written about this was "We also went down the Cañon to the river, by the new Hance trail, the best ever constructed in all Arizona." and "Bathing in the frigid Colorado" (no further mention).

". . . the time was all too short for all of us. And as the stages rolled out in the fresh morning, there was many a regretful backward glance for a last glimpse of a spot not one of the part will ever forget. There is no other nation on earth in which a Grand Cañon of the Colorado would not be more visited than it is in the United States. Probably the time will come when the Americans who know enough to go and see it will number more than a few score a year."

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

- 397 1898 In the Canon of Colorado [sic]. New York Observer, 76(45) (November 10): 607.
"Miss Worstell will give a stereopticon lecture this evening at the Waldorf-Astoria, on the Canon of the Colorado."
(ENTIRE ITEM)

- 398 1898 Prof. James lectures on the Grand Canon. In: New York [SECTION]. New York Observer, 76(46) (November 17): 640.

Notice of George Wharton James lecture to be held at the Calvary Methodist Episcopal Church.

Branner, John C.

- 399 1898 A geologist's impression. Land of Sunshine, 9(3) (August): 149-152.

"However deeply a geologist may be impressed by the Grand Cañon, he does not feel at liberty to indulge in any exclamation points, or to undertake to say anything about it that has not already been well said by men who have a vast deal more than a holiday's acquaintance with it."

Less geological than general, only offering a few remarks on the publications by Powell and Dutton. The latter half of the article discusses geological features of the area about the San Francisco Peaks.

Carter, Oscar C. S.

- 400 1898 A summer visit to Arizona. Friends' Intelligencer (Philadelphia), 55(29) (July 16): 508-510. ("Notes of a lecture by Prof. O. C. S. Carter, of the Boys' High School, Philadelphia. Furnished the Intelligencer by George B. Cock, Stenographer.")

Regarding a visit in 1897. Includes remarks on his visit to the "Moqui Indians" (Hopi) from "Flagstone" (Flagstaff), but mentions only generally his visit to Grand Canyon, with comparisons to the canyons of Yellowstone and the Arkansas River, which he admits are unrealistically confused with Arizona's canyon.

"The most interesting wonder in Arizona, aside from the Indians, is the Grand Canyon."

Despite having visited the canyon, this is the extent of his own impressions of it. Thereafter he offers a recap of "Captain" Powell's expedition on the Green and Colorado Rivers.

Hill, Marion

- 401 1898 A lesson in reporting. The Editor (Highland Falls, New York), 8(5) (November): 392-395.

An exercise in the recording of facts, based on an encounter with John Hance.

Jordan, David Starr

- 402 1898 Red-letter days. Land of Sunshine 9(3) (August): 124-126.

The Grand Canyon is lazy. "Two or three impressions standing out above the rest of them may be set forth in words. First, the cañon of the Colorado. Not its grandeur and beauty, its weird magnificence, its sublime supremacy; all the world knows this. But it impressed me not the less through its infinite laziness. While the rest of the earth's crust has been making history and scenery with all the great earth-moulding forces steadily at work, this corner of the world for ten thousand centuries and more has rested in the sun. While mountains were folding and continents taking form, this land of patience lay beneath a warm and shallow sea, the extension of the present Gulf of California. For centuries untold its sands piled up layer on layer. When at last the uplift of the Sierras changed the sands to dry land, then the forces of erosion began and the sands were torn away as sleepily as they had been deposited before. A mile or two in vertical depth had been stripped away from the whole surface, leaving only flat-topped buttes here and there to testify to the depth of the ancient strata. The flinty limestones half way down interposed their resistance. The swift river from the glacial mountains which had done this work narrowed its bounds and applied itself more strictly to its business. Cutting at last through the flinty stone, it made quick work of the shales beneath it, and dropping swiftly from level to level, it is now at

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

work on the granite core of the earth at the bottom. Even in this it has made fair progress, but the river has done all this alone. No ice, nor frost, nor earthquake, nor volcanic force has left its mark on the cañon. Ice would have made a lake of it. Frosts would have changed its cliffs to slopes. Earthquakes would have crumbled its walls, and volcanoes would have smeared them with lava. But none of these forces came to mar or help. In the simplest, easiest and laziest fashion rocks were deposited in the first place. In the simplest, easiest and laziest fashion they have been torn up again, and a view from the cañon rim almost anywhere shows at a glance how it was all done." (ENTIRE NOTE)

Muir, John

403 1898 The wild parks and forest reservations of the West. Atlantic Monthly, 81(483) (January): 15-28.

See pp. 27-28:

"The Grand Cañon Reserve of Arizona, of nearly two million acres, or the most interesting part of it, as well as the Rainier region, should be made into a national park, on account of their supreme grandeur and beauty. Setting out from Flagstaff, a station on the Atchison, Topeka, and Santa Fé Railroad, on the way to the cañon you pass through beautiful forests of yellow pine,—like those of the Black Hills, but more extensive,—and curious dwarf forests of nut pine and juniper, the spaces between the miniature trees planted with many interesting species of eriogonum, yucca, and cactus. After riding or walking seventy-five miles through these pleasure-grounds, the San Francisco and other mountains, abounding in flowery parklike openings and smooth shallow valleys with long vistas which in fineness of finish and arrangement suggest the work of a consummate landscape artist, watching you all the way, you come to the most tremendous cañon in the world. It is abruptly countersunk in the forest plateau, so that you see nothing of it until you are suddenly stopped on its brink, with its immeasurable wealth of divinely colored and sculptured buildings before you and beneath you. No matter how far you have wandered hitherto, or how many famous gorges and valleys you have seen, this one, the Grand Cañon of the Colorado, will seem as novel to you, as unearthly in the color and grandeur and quantity of its architecture, as if you had found it after death, on some other star; so incomparably lovely and grand and supreme is it above all the other cañons in our fire-moulded, earthquake-shaken, rain-washed, wave-washed, river and glacier sculptured world. It is about six thousand feet deep where you first see it, and from rim to rim ten to fifteen miles wide. Instead of being dependent for interest upon waterfalls, depth, wall sculpture, and beauty of parklike floor, like most other great cañons, it has no waterfalls in sight, and no appreciable floor spaces. The big river has just room enough to flow and roar obscurely, here and there groping its way as best it can, like a weary, murmuring, overladen traveler trying to escape from the tremendous, bewildering labyrinthic abyss, while its roar serves only to deepen the silence. Instead of being filled with air, the vast space between the walls is crowded with Nature's grandest buildings,—a sublime city of them, painted in every color, and adorned with richly fretted cornice and battlement spire and tower in endless variety of style and architecture. Every architectural invention of man has been anticipated, and far more, in this grandest of God's terrestrial cities." (ENTIRE NOTE)

404 1898 A natural wonder. The most tremendous canyon in the world. Western Journal of Education (San Francisco), New Series, 3 (Old Series, 43) (4) (April): 21.

Without by-line but editor's introductory sentence includes Muir's name, and credit is given to "Atlantic Monthly" (see above).]

Peet, Stephen D.

405 1898 The Grand Canyon of the Colorado. American Antiquarian and Oriental Journal, 20 (March): frontispiece, 114-117.

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

Prudden, T. Mitchell

406 1898 Under the spell of the Grand Cañon. Harper's New Monthly Magazine, 97(579) (August): 377-392.

A mounted trip from southwestern Colorado, taking some 12 pages of text to reach the Kaibab and the North Rim; and then it all dashes by.

"However pleasant it may be, after the hot weeks of strenuous travel in the open, to loiter under the pines and among the glades in the heart of the Kaibab, you cannot long resist those hazy glimpses caught here and there between the trees into far blue depths upon which shadowy outlines of temples and minarets, and nameless dreamy masses in soft rich colors, float and gleam. However deep in the forest or cozy beside your camp fire at the edge of one of those matchless glades, the spell of the great abyss hovers about you and lures you to its side. You ride for a day and crawl over upon a great peninsula of rock—Powell's Plateau, they name it—which looms above the heart of this under-world, and revel in the vision. It was from this commanding point that Thomas Moran caught the inspiration of color and of space which is translated upon his great canvas hanging in the Capitol at Washington. You ride and camp and ride again out and out for miles to the last rock pillar which stands poised on Point Sublime, and linger hour after hour in the thrall of a waking dream.

"Then away you go again—for it makes you restless, this mighty thing of transcendent beauty—and after many miles reach a towering promontory around which the river makes a great curve as it emerges from the Marble Cañon and sweeps into the vast chambered space below. This is the vantage-ground, locally known as Greenland Point, infrequently visited by parties of the nearest Mormon villages for a view of the Grand Cañon. Two projecting cliffs upon this point are known to the geologists as Cape Royal and Cape Final.

"When Major Powell and his men came floating down the river they seemed a little remorseful for the mood in which the Dirty Devil had been named, and as they reached the mouth of a gorgeous side cañon a few miles below our Greenland Point, whence issues a sparkling brook, they were inspired to call it the Bright Angel. It was at a little spring close under the edge of the summit ledges in which this happily christened streamlet finds its source that we lingered longest in camp, loath to relinquish the shelter of the noble forest and lose the glimpses of wonderland down through the glowing corridor of cliffs and towers which the Bright Angel has fashioned in its mad rush to the bosom of the Colorado. But there are hundreds of hot miles between us and home, and so at last, after some days of forest wandering, we turn our faces toward the eastern façade of the Kaibab, heading for Lee's Ferry."

Prudden does reflect shortly later on the attempts by other authors to describe the Grand Canyon, summoning dreams, the Orient, Babylon, and so on. He comes to terms, that "one may be glad if he can win the conviction that in a world so strenuous with obvious duties and conscientious impulses no man has got to describe the Grand Cañon.

"But if you would really know the cañon you must not hasten away. • • •

"But you will not win your way to the inmost spirit of the place unless you spend a night alone down in those awesome chambers—as far out of the world as you can get, it seems, and still hold the link intact."

Saxlehner, Kálmántol

407 1898 Utazás Alaszkába. Földrajzi Közlemények (Magyar Földrajzi Társaság, Budapest) (Société Hongroise de Géographie, Bulletin), 26(7) (October): 231-250. [In Hungarian.]
(transl. 'Travel to Alaska')

En route across the United States, the author stops to see the Grand Canyon at Hance's, following the eastern route around the San Francisco Peaks. The entire account of his visit is as follows:

"Flagstaffban a gyomrommal volt egy kis bajom; valószínűleg a víz következtében, s három napot kellett ezen kis incidens következtében a szobában töltenem. Miután kihevertem bajomat, negyedik napon felültünk a vándor szekérre s reggel 7-kor indultunk a Grand-Cannon felé. Az út Flagstafftól (ca. 20 mérföld távolságig) szép erdőkön vezet keresztül, de később mindinkább kopár lesz, míg végre a „Painted-Desert” vagy „festett sivatag” szélére ér. Mielőtt a sivatagba beindultunk volna, kis pihenőt tartottunk, mely alatt a négy lovat négy

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

őszvérrel cserélték ki, mi pedig rövid ebédet fogyasztottunk el. Egy órai pihenés után megkezdtük a kocsizást a sivatagon át, melyen homokon és cactuson kívül más nem látható. Víz egy csöpp sincsen. Egy kis szélvihar is keletkezett útközben, mely óriási porfelhőket hajtott végig a pusztán s a szaharai szamum-ra emlékeztetett. Délután fél öt óra tájban értünk ki a desertből és ismét erdős vidékre jutottunk, mely minél tovább haladtunk kocsink, mindinkább szebb lett, míg végre beértünk az éserdőbe, melyben csupa büszke öreg fák állanak.

„Este fél 7-kor érkezünk útasunk végpontjára a „Heinzfarmhoz“ [sic]. Itt egy öreg vadász lakik kis fabódében, mely körül több vászon sátor van felállítva. Ezekben szoktak a turisták meghálni. Minket is csakhamar egy sátorba vitt az öreg bácsi, hol arcunkról a sok port lemostuk. Mind ezen sátrak a rengeteg erdőben állanak, melyből az eget is alig lehet látni. Azonnal kérdezősködtünk, hogy merre látható a Grand-Cannon s azon hitben voltunk, hogy e helyről még messze kell gyalogolnunk. Annál nagyobb volt csodálkozásunk, midőn az öreg bácsi az erdőnek egyik dombosabb részére mutatván, mondva, hogy csak menjünk oda fel s majd eleget fogunk látni. Valóban, alig tettünk száz lépést, egy sziklahoz értünk, melyre felmászva, lábaink előtt láttuk a rengeteg földhasadást, mely 150 mértöld hosszú, 12 mértöld széles és 6000 láb mély! Leírni ezt nagyon nehéz, fényképezni nem lehet, a festészet pedig nem képes ezt a hatalmas impressiót reprodukálni, melyet ezen természeti tünemény az emberi szemre és agyra gyakorol. Ezen óriás völgy mindkét oldalfala száz meg száz vízszintes rétegből áll. A legelső rétegtől kezdve fel a mai kor fekete termőföldéig. Minden rétegnek más, más színe van. Fehér, veres, rózsás, zöld, fekete, barna, kék, mind-mind váltakoznak. Este a nap lementével alkalmával gyönyörű volt a látvány. Másnap reggel napfelkelte előtt ismét kimentünk a Cannon szélére s ott maradtunk az elindulás órájáig. A Cannonban csak kevés növényzet van. Valószínűleg az árnyékos hely, a kevés oda leható napsugár és a sok kőtörmelék az oka ennek. Lent a völgy fenekén a Coloradó folyó szalad végig s dacára hogy ez 300 láb széles, csak pataknak látszik. Másnap reggel 7-kor indultunk vissza Flagstaff felé, hova este 8 orakor érkezünk meg.”

(translation)

‘In Flagstaff, I had a little trouble with my stomach; probably due to the water, and I had to spend three days in the room due to this small incident. After I got out of my trouble, on the fourth day we sat on the wagon and headed for the Grand Canyon at 7 in the morning. The road leads through beautiful woods from Flagstaff (about 20 miles away), but later becomes more and more barren until it finally reaches the edge of the “Painted-Desert” [written in English] or “festett sivatag” [meaning “Painted Desert” in Hungarian]. Before we headed into the desert, we had a little rest, during which the four horses were replaced with four mules, and we had a short lunch. After an hour of rest, we started driving through the desert with nothing but sand and cactus visible. Not a drop of water. There was also a small windstorm along the way, which drove huge clouds of dust all over the plain and reminded me of a Sahara sandstorm. At about half past five in the afternoon we got out of the desert and again we got to the wooded countryside, which became more and more beautiful as our wagon progressed, until we finally got into woods which are full of proud old trees.

‘We arrived at the “Heinz farm” [Hance Camp] at the end of our trip at half past seven in the evening. We washed off a lot of dust. All these tents stand in the abundance of woods from which the sky is barely visible. We immediately asked where the Grand Canyon was visible and we were in the belief that we still had to walk far from this place. We were more amazed when the old man pointed to a hilly part of the forest, saying that just go up there and we will see enough. Indeed, we had barely taken a hundred steps when we reached a rock on which, climbing, we saw at our feet a plethora of fissures that were 150 meters long, 12 miles wide, and 6,000 feet deep! It is very difficult to describe this, impossible to photograph, and painting cannot reproduce the immense impression that this natural phenomenon exerts on the human eye and brain. Both sides of this giant valley consist of hundreds and hundreds of horizontal layers. From the lowest layer to the black farmland of today. Each layer has a different color. White, red, rose, green, black, brown, blue, all alternating. The view was beautiful as the sun went down in the evening. The next morning before sunrise we went out to the edge of the Canyon again and stayed there until the hour of departure. There is little vegetation in the Canyon. Probably the few shady places, sunshine, and a lot of stone debris is the reason for this. Down at the bottom of the valley the Colorado River runs along and despite it being 300 feet wide, it just looks like a stream. The next morning we left for Flagstaff at 7 a.m., where we arrived at 8 p.m.’

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

Stoddard, John L.

- 408 1898 John L. Stoddard's lectures. Volume Ten. Boston: Balch Brothers Co., and Chicago: George L. Shuman and Co., 304 + 58 pp. [Numerous later printings through 1912 by Balch Brothers Co. (Boson). Published also by George L. Shuman and Co. (Chicago and Boston, 1914, 1925 (also later printings), with the 1925 printing also noting copyright renewed 1926, by Stoddard. (This title is now in the public domain.))]

See "The Grand Cañon of the Colorado", pp. 103-204, although the trip to the canyon itself, a wagon ride from Flagstaff to Hance's, does not begin until p. 168. While the illustrated lecture is regional in perspective, it focuses of course on this visit to Grand Canyon. Most of the Grand Canyon portion of the lecture is reprinted here, in as much as it is by one of the master lecturers of the day, a globe-trotting showman who not only saw it without dwelling on the looming shadows of the Santa Fe Railway that were well on the way, but also had experienced for himself (and wrote about, and lectured about) all the majestic places to which he compares the canyon's features. He may not have been entirely original in so doing (after all, it was Clarence E. Dutton who ascribed many of the romantic names to the canyon's monuments, though only by reputation), but he was one of those certainly most qualified to make such ongoing—and in every way personal—observations. One may note, too, that Stoddard seems to be one of the select few who suggests that a trip into the canyon is not necessarily the best way to appreciate all that the chasm offers to a person's feelings for the place. And while the transcript below lacks the wonderful photographs that accompany it in the volume (and which Stoddard's audiences saw at his lectures), one wanders and wonders with him.

"One glorious September morning, leaving our train at Flagstaff, we started in stage-coaches for a drive of sixty-five miles to the Grand Cañon. I had looked forward to this drive with some misgiving, dreading the heat of the sun, and the dust and sand which I had supposed we should encounter; but to my astonishment and delight it was a thoroughly enjoyable experience. It was only eleven hours in duration, and not only was most of the route level, but two-thirds of it lay through a section of beautifully rolling land, diversified with open glades and thousands upon thousands of tall pines and cedars entirely free from undergrowth. • • •

"The principal object of one of the members of our party, in making the journey described in these pages, was to determine the advisability of building a railroad from Flagstaff to the Cañon. Whether this will be done eventually is not, however, a matter of vital interest to travelers, since the country traversed can easily be made an almost ideal coaching-route; and with good stages, frequent relays of horses, and a well-appointed lunch-station, a journey thus accomplished would be preferable to a trip by rail.

"Night had already come when we arrived at our destination, known as Hance's Camp, near the border of the Cañon. As we drove up to it, the situation seemed enchanting in its peace and beauty; for it is located in a grove of noble pines, through which the moon that night looked down in full-orbed splendor, paving the turf with inlaid ebony and silver, and laying a mantle of white velvet on the tents in which we were to sleep. Hance's log cabin serves as a kitchen and dining-room for travelers, and a few guests can even find lodging there; but, until a hotel is built, the principal dormitories must be the tents, which are provided with wooden floors and furnished with tables, chairs, and comfortable beds. This kind of accommodation, however, although excellent for travelers in robust health, is not sufficiently luxurious to attract many tourists. The evident necessity of the place is a commodious, well-kept inn, situated a few hundred feet to the rear of Hance's Camp, on the very edge of the Cañon. If such a hotel, built on a spot commanding the incomparable view, were properly advertised and well-managed, I firmly believe that thousands of people would come here every year, on their way to or from the Pacific coast—not wishing or expecting it to be a place of fashion, but seeking it as a point where, close beside a park of pines, seven thousand feet above the level of the sea, one of the greatest marvels of the world can be enjoyed, in all the different phases it presents at morning, noon, and night, in sunshine, moonlight, and in storm.

"Early the next morning I eagerly climbed the little knoll at the foot of which our tents were located, for I well knew that from its summit I should see the Cañon. Many grand objects in the world are heralded by sound: the solemn music of Niagara, the roar of active geysers in the Yellowstone, the intermittent thunder of the sea upon a rocky coast, are all distinguishable at some distance; but over the Grand Cañon of the Colorado broods a solemn silence. No warning voice proclaims its close proximity; no partial view prepares us for its awful presence. We walk a few steps through the pine trees from the camp and suddenly find ourselves upon the

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

Cañon's edge. Just before reaching it, I halted for a moment, as has always been my wont when approaching for the first time any natural or historic object that I have longed for years to look upon. Around me rose the stately pines; behind me was a simple stretch of rolling woodland; nothing betrayed the nearness of one of the greatest wonders of the world. Could it be possible that I was to be disappointed? At last I hurried through the intervening space, gave a quick look, and almost reeled. The globe itself seemed to have suddenly yawned asunder, leaving me trembling on the hither brink of two dis severed hemispheres. Vast as the bed of a vanished ocean, deep as Mount Washington, riven from its apex to its base, the grandest cañon on our planet lay glittering below me in the sunlight like a submerged continent, drowned by an ocean that had ebbed away. At my very feet, so near that I could have leaped at once into eternity, the earth was cleft to a depth of six thousand six hundred feet—not by a narrow gorge, like other cañons, but by an awful gulf within whose cavernous immensity the forests of the Adirondacks would appear like jackstraws, the Hudson Palisades would be an insignificant stratum, Niagara would be indiscernible, and cities could be tossed like pebbles.

"As brain grew steadier and vision clearer, I saw, directly opposite, the other side of the Cañon thirteen miles away. It was a mountain wall, a mile in height, extending to the right and left as far as the eye could reach; and since the cliff upon which I was standing was its counterpart, it seemed to me as if these parallel banks were once the shore-lines of a vanished sea. Between them lay a vast, incomparable void, two hundred miles in length, presenting an unbroken panorama to the east and west until the gaze could follow it no farther. Try to conceive what these dimensions mean by realizing that a strip of the State of Massachusetts, thirteen miles in width, and reaching from Boston to Albany, could be laid as a covering over this Cañon, from one end to the other; and that if the entire range of the White Mountains were flung into it, the monstrous pit would still remain comparatively empty! Even now it is by no means without contents; for, as I gazed with awe and wonder into its colossal area, I seemed to be looking down upon a colored relief-map of the mountain systems of the continent. It is not strictly one cañon, but a labyrinth of cañons, in many of which the whole Yosemite could be packed away and lost. Thus one of them, the Marble Cañon, is of itself more than three thousand feet deep and sixty-six miles long. In every direction I beheld below me a tangled skein of mountain ranges, thousands of feet in height, which the Grand Cañon's walls enclosed, as if it were a huge sarcophagus, holding the skeleton of an infant world. It is evident, therefore, that all the other cañons of our globe are, in comparison with this, what pygmies are to a giant, and that the name Grand Cañon, which is often used to designate some relatively insignificant ravine, should be in truth applied only to the stupendous earth-gulf of Arizona.

"At length, I began to try to separate and identify some of these formations. Directly in the foreground, a savage looking mountain reared its splintered head from the abyss, and stood defiantly confronting me, six thousand feet above the Cañon's floor. Though practically inaccessible to the average tourist, this has been climbed, and is named Mount Ayer, after Mrs. Edward Ayer, the first woman who ever descended into the Cañon to the river's edge. Beyond this, other mountains rise from the gulf, many of which resemble the Step Pyramid at Sakhara, one of the oldest of the royal sepulchres beside the Nile. But so immeasurably vaster are the pyramids of this Cañon than any work of man, that had the tombs of the Pharaohs been placed beside them, I could not have discovered them without a field-glass. Some of these grand constructions stand alone, while others are in pairs; and many of them resemble Oriental temples, buttressed with terraces a mile or two in length, and approached by steps a hundred feet in height. Around these, too, are many smaller mountainous formations, crude and unfinished in appearance, like shrines commenced and then abandoned by the Cañon's Architect. Most of us are but children of a larger growth, and love to interpret Nature, as if she reared her mountains, painted her sunsets, cut her cañons, and poured forth her cataracts solely for our instruction and enjoyment. So, when we gaze on forms like these, shaped like gigantic temples, obelisks, and altars fashioned by man's hands, we try to see behind them something personal, and even name them after Hindu, Grecian, and Egyptian gods, as if those deities made them their abodes. Thus, one of these shrines was called by the artist, Thomas Moran, the Temple of Set; three others are dedicated respectively to S[h]iva, Vishnu, and Vulcan; while on the apex of a mighty altar, still unnamed, a twisted rock-formation, several hundred feet in height, suggests a flame, eternally preserved by unseen hands, ascending to an unknown god. It is difficult to realize the magnitude of these objects, so deceptive are distances and dimensions in the transparent atmosphere of Arizona. Siva's Temple, for example, stands upon a platform four or five miles square, from which rise domes and pinnacles a thousand feet in height. Some of their summits call to mind immense sarcophagi of jasper or of

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

porphyry, as if they were the burial-places of dead deities, and the Grand Cañon a Necropolis for pagan gods. Yet, though the greater part of the population of the world could be assembled here, one sees no worshipers, save an occasional devotee of Nature, standing on the Cañon's rim, lost in astonishment and hushed in awe. These temples were, however, never intended for a human priesthood. A man beside them is a pygmy. His voice here would be little more effective than the chirping of an insect. The God-appointed celebrant, in the cathedrals of this Cañon, must be Nature. Her voice alone can rouse the echoes of these mountains into deafening peals of thunder. Her metaphors are drawn from an experience of ages. Her prayers are silent, rapturous communings with the Infinite. Her hymns of praise are the glad songs of birds; her requiems are the moanings of the pines; her symphonies the solemn roaring of the winds. 'Sermons in stone' [Shakespeare] abound at every turn; and if, as the poet has affirmed, 'An undevout astronomer is mad,' [Edward Young] with still more truth can it be said that those are blind who in this wonderful environment look not 'through Nature up to Nature's God.' [Alexander Pope]. These wrecks of Tempest and of Time are fingerposts that point the thoughts of mortals to eternal heights; and we find cause for hope in the fact that, even in a place like this, Man is superior to Nature; for he interprets it, he finds in it the thoughts of God, and reads them after Him." [Perhaps the modern reader is not as commonly schooled as were the interested readers of the nineteenth century. Stoddard's references to great literature are on the fly; presumably many among his audiences immediately appreciated the allusions.]

"The coloring of the Grand Cañon is no less extraordinary than its forms. Nature has saved this chasm from being a terrific scene of desolation by glorifying all that it contains. Wall after wall, turret after turret, and mountain range after mountain range, belted with tinted strata, succeed one another here like billows petrified in glowing colors. These hues are not as brilliant and astonishing in their variety as are the colors of the Yellowstone Cañon, but their subdued and sombre tones are perfectly suited to the awe-inspiring place which they adorn. The prominent tints are yellow, red, maroon, and a dull purple, as if the glory of unnumbered sunsets, fading from these rugged cliffs, had been in part imprisoned here. • • •

"To stand upon the edge of this stupendous gorge, as it receives its earliest greeting from the god of day, is to enjoy in a moment compensation for long years of ordinary uneventful life. When I beheld the scene, a little before daybreak, a lake of soft, white clouds was floating round the summits of the Cañon mountains, hiding the huge crevasse beneath, as a light coverlet of snow conceals a chasm in an Alpine glacier. I looked with awe upon this misty curtain of the morn, for it appeared to me symbolic of the grander curtain of the past which shuts out from our view the awful struggles of the elements enacted here when the grand gulf was being formed. At length, however, as the light increased, this thin, diaphanous covering was mysteriously withdrawn, and when the sun's disk rose above the horizon, the huge façades of the temples which looked eastward grew immediately rosy with the dawn; westward, projecting cliffs sketched on the opposite sides of the ravines, in dark blue silhouettes, the evanescent forms of castles, battlements, and turrets from which some shreds of white mist waved like banners of capitulation; stupendous moats beneath them were still black with shadow; while clouds filled many of the minor cañons, like vapors rising from enormous caldrons. Gradually, as the solar couriers forced a passage into the narrow gullies, and drove the remnant of night's army from its hiding-places, innumerable shades of purple, yellow, red, and brown appeared, varying according to the composition of the mountains, and the enormous void was gradually filled to the brim with a luminous haze, which one could fancy was the smoke of incense from its countless altars. A similar, and even more impressive, scene is visible here in the late afternoon, when all the western battlements in their turn grow resplendent, while the eastern walls submit to an eclipse; till, finally, a gray pall drops upon the lingering bloom of day, the pageant fades, the huge sarcophagi are mantled in their shrouds, the gorgeous colors which have blazed so sumptuously through the day grow pale and vanish, the altar fires turn to ashes, the mighty temples draw their veils and seem deserted by both gods and men, and the stupendous panorama awaits, beneath the canopy of night, the glory of another dawn.

"It was my memorable privilege to see, one afternoon, a thunder storm below me here. A monstrous cloud-wall, like a huge gray veil, came traveling up the Cañon, and we could watch the lightning strike the buttes and domes ten or twelve miles away, while the loud peals of thunder, broken by crags and multiplied by echoes, rolled toward us through the darkening gulf at steadily decreasing intervals. Sometimes two flashes at a time ran quivering through the air and launched their bolts upon the mountain shrines, as though their altars, having been erected for idolatrous worship, were doomed to be annihilated. Occasionally, through an opening in the clouds, the sun would suddenly light up the summit of a mountain, or flash a path of gold through a ravine; and I shall never forget the curious sensation of seeing far beneath me bright sunshine in one cañon and a violent storm in another. At last, a rainbow cast its radiant bridge across the entire space, and we beheld the tempest disappear like a troop of cavalry in a cloud of dust beneath that iridescent arch, beyond whose curving spectrum all the temples stood forth, still intact in their sublimity.

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

"At certain points along the Cañon, promontories jut out into the abyss, like headlands which in former times projected into an ocean that has disappeared. Hence, riding along the brink, as one may do for miles, we looked repeatedly into many lateral fissures, from fifteen hundred to three thousand feet in depth. All these, however, like gigantic fingers, pointed downward to the centre of the Cañon, where, five miles away, and at a level more than six thousand feet below the brink on which we stood, extended a long, glittering trail. This, where the sunlight struck it, gleamed like an outstretched band of gold. It was the sinuous Colorado, yellow as the Tiber.

"One day of our stay here was devoted to making the descent to this river. It is an undertaking compared with which the crossing of the Gemmi on a mule is child's play. Fortunately, however, the arduous trip is not absolutely necessary for an appreciation of the immensity and grandeur of the scenery. On the contrary, one gains a really better idea of these by riding along the brink, and looking down at various points on the sublime expanse. Nevertheless, a descent into the Cañon is essential for a proper estimate of its details, and one can never realize the enormity of certain cliffs and the extent of certain valleys, till he has crawled like a maimed insect at their base and looked thence upward to the narrowed sky. Yet such an investigation of the Cañon is, after all, merely like going down from a balloon into a great city to examine one of its myriad streets, since any gorge we may select for our descending path is but a tiny section of a labyrinth. That which is unique and incomparable here is the view from the brink; and when the promised hotel is built upon the border of the Cañon, visitors will be content to remain for days at their windows or on the piazzas, feasting their souls upon a scene always sublime and sometimes terrible.

"Nevertheless, desirous of exploring a specimen of these chasms (as we often select for minute examination a single painting out of an entire picture gallery) we made the descent to the Colorado by means of a crooked scratch upon a mountain side, which one might fancy had been blazed by a zigzag flash of lightning. As it requires four hours to wriggle down this path, and an equal amount of time to wriggle up, I spent the greater part of a day on what a comrade humorously styled the 'quarter-deck of a mule.' A square, legitimate seat in the saddle was usually impossible, so steep was the incline; and hence, when going down, I braced my feet and lay back on the haunches of the beast, and, in coming up, had to lean forward and clutch the pommel, to keep from sliding off, as a human avalanche, on the head of the next in line. In many places, however, riding was impossible, and we were compelled to scramble over the rocks on foot. The effect of hours of this exercise on muscles unaccustomed to such surprises may be imagined; yet, owing to the wonderfully restorative air of Arizona, the next day after this, the severest physical exertion I had ever known, I did not feel the slightest bad result, and was as fresh as ever. That there is an element of danger in this trip cannot be doubted. At times the little trail, on which two mules could not possibly have passed each other, skirts a precipice where the least misstep would hurl the traveler to destruction; and every turn of the zigzag path is so sharp that first the head and then the tail of the mule inevitably projects above the abyss, and wigwags to the mule below. Moreover, though not a vestige of a parapet consoles the dizzy rider, in several places the animal simply puts its feet together and toboggans down the smooth face of a slanting rock, bringing up at the bottom with a jerk that makes the tourist see a large variety of constellations, and even causes his beast to belch forth an involuntary roar of disenchantment, or else to try to pulverize his immediate successor. In such a place as this Nature seems pitiless and cruel; and one is impressed with the reflection that a million lives might be crushed out in any section of this maze of gorges and not a feature of it would be changed. There is, however, a fascination in gambling with danger, when a desirable prize is to be gained. The stake we risk may be our lives, yet, when the chances are in our favor, we often love to match excitement against the possibility of death; and even at the end, when we are safe, a sigh sometimes escapes us, as when the curtain falls on an absorbing play.

"As we descended, it grew warmer, not only from the greater elevation of the sun at noon, but from the fact that this sudden drop of six thousand feet we had passed through several zones of temperature. Snow, for example, may be covering the summits of the mountains in midwinter, while at the bottom of the Cañon are

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

summer warmth and vernal flowers. When, after two or three hours of continuous descent, we looked back at our starting-point, it seemed incredible that we had ever stood upon the pinnacles that towered so far above us, and were apparently piercing the slowly moving clouds. The effect was that of looking up from the bottom of a gigantic well. Instinctively I asked myself if I should ever return to that distant upper world, and it gave me a memorable realization of my individual insignificance to stand in such a sunken solitude, and realize that the fissure I was exploring was only a single loop in a vast network of ravines, which, if extended in a straight line, would make a cañon seven hundred miles in length. It was with relief that we reached, at last, the terminus of the lateral ravine we had been following and at the very bottom of the Cañon rested on the bank of the Colorado. The river is a little freer here than elsewhere in its tortuous course, and for some hundred feet is less compressed by the grim granite cliffs which, usually, rise in smooth black walls hundreds of feet in almost vertical height, and for two hundred miles retain in their embrace the restless, foaming flood that has no other avenue of escape.

• • • ”

[Stoddard pauses for several pages to allow his audience to honor John Wesley Powell and his fellow explorers on the Colorado in 1869; then to honor the powers of nature in forming the Grand Canyon in the first place.]

“On my last evening in the pine tree camp I left my tent and walked alone to the edge of the Grand Cañon. The night was white with the splendor of the moon. A shimmering lake of silvery vapor rolled its noiseless tide against the mountains, and laved the terraces of the Hindu shrines. The lunar radiance, falling into such profundity, was powerless to reveal the plexus of subordinate cañons, and even the temples glimmered through the upper air like wraiths of the huge forms which they reveal by day. Advancing cautiously to an isolated point upon the brink, I lay upon my face, and peered down into the spectral void. No voice of man, nor cry of bird, nor roar of beast resounded through those awful corridors of silence. Even thought had no existence in that sunken realm of chaos. I felt as if I were the sole survivor of the deluge. Only the melancholy murmur of the wind ascended from that sepulchre of centuries. It seemed the requiem for a vanished world.”

Warren, Henry White

- 409 1898 Among the forces. New York: Eaton and Mains; and Cincinnati, Ohio: Jennings and Pye, 197 pp.
From Warren (1896).

1899

Anonymous

- 410 1899 The Grand Cañon cavern. In: Woods, G. K. (compiler), Personal impressions of the Grand Cañon of the Colorado River near Flagstaff, Arizona, as seen through nearly two thousand eyes, and written in the private visitors' book of the world-famous guide Capt. John Hance, guide, story-teller, and path-finder. San Francisco: Whitaker and Ray Co., for G. K. Woods, Flagstaff, A. T., pp. 149-152.
From Coconino Sun (Flagstaff). About the caves of Horseshoe Mesa.
- 411 1899 The Grand Cañon. In: Woods, G. K. (compiler), Personal impressions of the Grand Cañon of the Colorado River near Flagstaff, Arizona, as seen through nearly two thousand eyes, and written in the private visitors' book of the world-famous guide Capt. John Hance, guide, story-teller, and path-finder. San Francisco: Whitaker and Ray Co., for G. K. Woods, Flagstaff, A. T., p. 161.
- 412 1899 The Grand Canyon of the Colorado. Catholic World, 70(417) (December): 305-320. [A mixture of prose and verse, with illustrations. Mostly about a trip to Hance's, beginning en route.
“Just at 12 o'clock to the dot the heavy stagecoach with its trailer drew up at the Cedar Ranch for dinner. There were five of us, and we were dust-begrimed and hungry. We had been jostled about in the stage since seven in the morning, and had left thirty-five miles of dusty road behind us. We were on our way to see the

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

greatest gorge in the whole country, the Grand Cañon of the Colorado. Dixon the driver, a small-sized, wiry 'Arizona Kicker,' with a great broad-brimmed, white sombrero, makes the seventy-three miles from Flagstaff on the Santa Fe route to the rim of the cañon every day with four relays of horses; and so well does he know his road that he hauls up at the relay stations almost with the exactness of a railroad train on schedule time. • • • Around the rough board cabin on the hill-side there was gathered a motley crowd that had evidently been regaling the inner man, for they were busy chewing wooden toothpicks. At first we thought they might be a kind of civilized Indians [sic]. They were all red enough to be classed with the red man, and some of the women were in short skirts with what at first sight seemed to be blankets thrown over their shoulders, and they all had dangling from their belts what appeared on close inspection to be not a wicked tomahawk but an innocent-looking hammer. We learned later that it was Professor [Rollin D.] Salisbury, of the Chicago University, and a party of geological students out on a nature-study expedition. They had wisely selected Arizona, for probably nowhere in the wide world is so much of the stratified interior of the earth's crust exposed to view. • • •

"A little incident occurred which, because it varied the monotony of the staging, may be worthy of record. [Compare this to a recollection by Bartlett (1901), on a different trip.] As we passed the old Supai trail which led from the Indian villages out on the northern plains to the pueblos of the Supai tribe, some miles down the river, a lone horseman approached us. As we saw him coming, and especially when we noticed the glittering revolvers fastened to the pommel of the saddle, and the angry-looking gun slung from his shoulder, visions of 'hold-ups' flitted across our mind, and one of the party was preparing to slip his pocket-book and his jewelry into his boots, and another was wearing his mildest and sweetest smile in order to charm the road agent and so soften his fierce demeanor should he demand the 'hands up.' But it was all useless. With a slight but commanding gesture he stopped the stage, and when we were expecting the word to deliver up all the treasure, in the blandest of tones he merely asked if we had seen a stray horse on the road over which we came. Though we began to breathe freely, it was a great disappointment all round that his intentions were so pacific. • • •

"With such thoughts as these we bowled along with little or no apprehension that anything heroic in the way of natural scenery was even within hundreds of miles of us. We passed down into a little dell, then up a sylvan slope with grass and belated wild flowers carpeting the ground, and then along a level stretch of road, until the thought impressed itself on our minds that there must be some mistake about it all. Finally, not a little fatigued with the long riding and with appetites sharpened by fresh air, we reached the group of tents surrounding a log cabin where we were to put up for the night. The cañon itself was just beyond. We wanted to get a glimpse of it anyhow before darkness set in. It was but a step below the enclosure. We hastened down to the edge of the precipice, and there below us, wrapped in a mystical haze, was that immense under-world of crag and ravine and palisade and chasm, stretching away as far as the eye could reach and down precipice after precipice until it would almost seem that we had come to the jumping-off place of creation. I do not think I shall ever forget that first glimpse of this wonder of wonders. It seemed perfectly unreal. I was borne back through the ages to primeval chaos when the earth was void and empty and darkness was on the face of the deep. Here was another world about to be born. It seemed to be the dwelling place of eternal forces sporting in everlasting confusion. Though usually accounted to have very strong nerves, yet involuntarily I found myself grasping at something to give support, and finally I settled down to the ground to assure myself that the bit of earth I still clung to was solid enough to hold me. I seemed to be a figure in one of those tremendous creations of Doré, magnified a million diameters, where all is weird and infinite, where distances have lost all sense of relation, and where thousands of angels seem floating down from untold heights. The time and circumstance of my first view of the cañon, they told me, were unusually favorable. The mantle of night was just settling down on the earth. The gloaming lent a spectral aspect to the whole perspective. Away down in the channel of the river, six thousand feet below, was profound blackness, and above and beyond it the perspective took on a sense of vagueness: here a black chasm, and out from its blackness, apparently floating in mid-air, a huge mountain, and away in the beyond could be faintly distinguished crags and peaks like giant Titans sporting in the darkness. The impression created was as if one were suddenly transported to the highest Alps in the darkness, and a flash of lightning for the moment revealed precipices and towering peaks on all sides. Soon the settling darkness shut it out entirely from view. There was nothing left but to go back to the tent and dream over it all or prepare for a closer study of the chasm on the morrow.

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

"The programme for the next day was a ride on horseback to Bissell's Point, nine miles away. Bissell's is the highest point of the plateau which makes one rim of the cañon and affords by all odds the best panoramic view of the entire country. The next morning, bright and sunny, came all too soon to one whose joints had been stiffened by the jolting stage-ride of the previous day, but when it comes bright and sunny there is very little chance for prolonged sleep in a tent. By eight we were in the saddle and on the trail to Bissel's, with all day before us to study, to wonder at, and to be impressed by the changing views that are afforded by a nine miles' ride along the edge.

"Daylight revealed the cañon in all its wondrous majesty." [The writer proceeds to wonder at the revelation: architectural marvels from around the world, in colors and tints cast from the sun.]

"••• For countless centuries all this magnificence and sublimity has been upreared, and for whom? For unnumbered ages this wonderful panorama has been literally wasting all its beauty on the desert air, and there has been no intelligent creature to admire it. 'What is man that thou art mindful of him.' [Psalm 8:4] •••"

[Here the writer lapses to quoting a verse, but which is actually about Niagara Falls. He acknowledges neither Niagara nor the author, Lydia Huntley Sigourney, whose poem is even titled "Niagara"; he simply affixes it to the canyon. And then, another Niagara verse, again avoiding an acknowledgment of the falls, or of A. S. Ridgely.]

"I could not help thinking what a fitting place this cañon would be for the great drama of the Day of Judgment. It is often a puzzle to one to realize how all the nations of the earth may be gathered in the valley of Josaphat. Of course to God all things are possible, but here in this cañon is a theatre high enough, wide enough, and deep enough to accommodate every one of the children of Adam. Just beyond, on the ridge of Ayre's Peak, is a throne in some sense fitted for the Almighty, with a commanding view of the whole cañon, and below it and about it are the lesser peaks, seemingly fashioned for the prophets, and the popes, and the great servants of God. As in the vision of the prophet, one can see the resurrected hosts gathered about on the right and on the left. The majesty of the surroundings is in keeping with the solemnity of the moment, and the profound silence of the chasm seems to invite the thunder tones of the great Judge. The vast and open expanse affords an easy solution for the great manifestation of hearts. Each one may stand out in that mighty arena and be seen by all the world, and the opening heavens may easily reveal a pathway to eternal bliss for the elect. It is such scenes as are presented by this magnificent manifestation of God's handiwork that stir the depths of one's religious nature, and deep speaketh unto deep in no uncertain tones. There have been visitors to the cañon who have seen in it all only the subject of trivial comment, who have risen to nothing higher than a desire to write their names on the rocks, or who have found their greatest pleasure in listening to and recording the fables of John Hance; but they are mere sight-seers, whose highest vanity is to tickle the retina of their eye or to climb where others have not been. But, •••" [and he finishes with yet another usurped Niagara stanza].

Coolbrith, Ina H.

413 1899 In the Grand Cañon. In: Marble, Annie Russell (ed.), Nature pictures by American poets. New York: The Macmillan Co., and London: Macmillan and Co., Ltd., p. 16.

Reprints Coolbrith (1892).

Detroit Photographic Company

414 1899 Catalogue F. Scenic, architectural and marine views published in Aäc, silver, platinum and special hand colored prints, by the Detroit Photographic Company, scenic and art publishers, Detroit, Mich., U.S.A. Detroit: Detroit Photographic Co., 237 pp.

Grand Canyon, see in "Part I. 'Aäc Photographs' of Scenery and Architecture", p. 1; "Part II. Plain and Hand Colored Photographs of Scenery and Architecture", pp. 136-137.

Fitz-Mac [MacCarthy, Fitz-James]

415 1899 The world is cleft. The biggest hole in the ground in existence—Nature ploughed a giant furrow. In: Woods, G. K. (compiler), Personal impressions of the Grand Cañon of the Colorado River near

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

Flagstaff, Arizona, as seen through nearly two thousand eyes, and written in the private visitors' book of the world-famous guide Capt. John Hance, guide, story-teller, and path-finder. San Francisco: Whitaker and Ray Co., for G. K. Woods, Flagstaff, A. T., pp. 137-140, 143-146.

Credited to the Rocky Mountain News (Denver), without date. It is uncertain (here) whether that printing pre- or post-dated Fitz-Mac (1895). The theme throughout, in excruciating detail, is the inability to give words to the Grand Canyon.

". . . such safe and well-authorized exclamations as 'Magnificent!' 'Grand!' 'Sublime!' have only a remote and altogether inadequate relation to the emotions that will be stirred within you by the appalling grandeurs of this stupendous chasm. • • •

"And if you do utter them, they will sound, even to your own ears, petty and almost meaningless—unless, indeed, you be one of those inexorable egotists whose sturdy self-complacency no emotion can subordinate, in which case, of course, anything you could say would seem to yourself to dignify the occasion and the scene. • • • [big breath]

"But your rash conclusiveness has betrayed you, O shallow chatterer, into denying the power of Nature to surprise, to astonish, to amaze, to thrill, to overawe, to subdue and reduce, to silence your puerile, self-deceiving, exclamatory egotism by the tragic anguish of devastation immeasurable and the bewildering mystery of splendors unique, resistless, and overwhelming here presented. • • •

"Hither to this point, long ago came Thomas Moran, the painter, and painted for the people of the United States that great scene [Chasm of the Colorado] which hangs in the capitol, and which, no doubt, has damaged his reputation with many people who regard it as a hysterical exaggeration, a sort of beautiful chromatic nightmare. But Moran's reputation will be utterly ruined with such people when they see the grand chasm for themselves, and learn what broad concessions he made to the public incredulity regarding the scene. • • •

"You cannot paint a silence, nor a sound, nor an odor, nor an emotion, nor a sob. If you are skillful, you may suggest them to the imagination by some symbol understood, and Moran's fine picture does this admirably. • • •

"Sir, or madam, whichever your sex may be, you are no doubt a perfectly respectable and worthy person, but to me, at this time and in this place, you are, with your gabbling, inquisitive tongue and your note-book, an insufferable bore. • • •

"It is the deepest, the most stupendous, the most appalling, the most mystically beautiful, the most sublimely pathetic—in a word, the most moving and irresistible tragedy I have ever beheld or ever expect to, and I wish you would leave me to enjoy my own impressions. As you are unable to share them, I beg that you will be so good as not to interrupt them with questions in mensuration and kindergarten geology."

James, George Wharton

416 1899 An enthusiastic description. In: Woods, G. K. (compiler), Personal impressions of the Grand Cañon of the Colorado River near Flagstaff, Arizona, as seen through nearly two thousand eyes, and written in the private visitors' book of the world-famous guide Capt. John Hance, guide, story-teller, and path-finder. San Francisco: Whitaker and Ray Co., for G. K. Woods, Flagstaff, A. T., pp. 155-157.

"The Grand Cañon! God's stupendous masterpiece on earth! • • • I return to it constantly . . . and ever and always do I find in it new treasures of sublime grandeur, new glories of stupendous carving, new entrancements of gorgeous coloring, all declaring in their own unmistakable language,—'The hand that made us is Divine.'"

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

Monroe, Harriet

417 1899 The Grand Cañon of the Colorado. Atlantic Monthly, 84(506) (December): 816-821.

The poet and essayist opens her trip to Hance's with a verse:

The earth grew bold with longing
And called the high gods down:
Yea, though ye dwell in heaven and hell,
I challenge their renown.
Abodes as fair I build ye
As heaven's rich courts of pearl,
And chasms dire where floods like fire
Ravage and roar and whirl.
Come, for my soul is weary
Of time and death and change;
Eternity doth summon me,—
With mightier worlds I range.
Come, for my vision's glory
Awaits your songs and wings;
Here on my breast I bid ye rest
From starry wanderings.

"The sun-browed miner who sat opposite me in the dusty stage talked of our goal to shorten the long hours of the journey, and of the travelers who had preceded us over that lonely trail to the edge of the Grand Cañon of the Colorado River. 'Yes, I have been in and out of the cañon for twenty years,' he said, 'and I have n't begun to understand it yet. The Lord knows, perhaps, why he gave it to us; I never felt big enough to ask.' And he told the story of a young English preacher whom he once picked up near the end of the road; who, too poor to pay stage fares, was walking to the cañon; who, after two days and nights in the thirsty wastes, his canteen empty and only a few biscuits left in his pouch, was trudging bravely on, with blistered feet and aching body, because he 'must see' the mighty miracle beyond. • • •

"And we, we could not believe that the forest would not go on forever, even when vistas of purple began to open through the trees, even when the log-cabin hotel welcomed us to our goal.

"It was like sudden death,—our passing round the corner to the other side of that primitive inn; for in a moment we stood at the end of the world, at the brink of the kingdoms of peace and pain. The gorgeous purples of sunset fell into darkness and rose into light over mansions colossal beyond the needs of our puny unwinged race. Terrific abysses yawned and darkened; magical heights glowed with iridescent fire. The earth lay stricken to the heart, her masks and draperies torn away, confessing her eternal passion to the absolving sun. And even as we watched and hearkened, the pitiful night lent deep shadows to cover her majesty and hide its awful secrets from the curious stars.

"In the morning, when I went out to verify the vision, to compass earth's revelation of her soul, the sun fell to the very heart of the mystery, even from the depths rose a thrill of joy. It was morning; I had slept and eaten; the fatigue and dust of the long journey no longer oppressed me; my courage rose to meet the greatness of the world. The benevolent landlady told of a trail which led to Point Lookout, a mile and a half away, beneath whose cliffs the old deserted inn lay in a hollow. I set out with two companions of the stage, who were armed with cameras and possessed of modern ideas. They pleaded for improvements: built [sic] a railroad from Flagstaff to the rim, a summer hotel on one of those frowning cliffs; yes, even a funicular railway down to the hidden river, and pumping works which should entice its waters up the steep slope to the thirsty beasts and travelers whose drink must now be hauled from the halfway house, forty miles away. But I rose up and defended the wilderness; rejoiced in the dusty stage ride, in the rough cabin that rose so fitly from the clearing, in the vast unviolated solitudes,—in all these proofs that one of the glories of earth was still undesecrated by the chatter of facile tourists; that here we must still propitiate nature with sacrifices, pay her with toil, prove the temper of our souls before assailing her immensities. And when my companions accused me of selfishness, opened the hidden wonder to all the world, and made it the common property of literature and art, the theme of all men's praise,

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

even like Mont Blanc and the Colosseum and Niagara, my tongue had no words of defense to utter, but my heart rejoiced the more that I had arrived before all these.

"We wandered along the quietest sylvan path, which led us up and down little ravines and dales, always under the shade of tall pines, always over the brown carpet of their needles. Now and then a sudden chasm would lift a corner of the veil, and we would wonder how we dared go on. Yet on and on we went,—a mile and a half, two miles, three,—and still no deserted cabin under slanting cliffs. My companions recalled the landlady's words, were sure that we had missed the road, and resolved to go back and find it; so I urged them to the search, and promised to rest and follow. But when I had rested the trail allured me; surely it was too clear to lead me wrong. I would explore it yet a little. I walked on,—five minutes, ten,—and there below me lay the hollow and the cabin. I passed it, the little silent lodge, with rough-hewn seats under the broad eaves of its porch, its doors hospitably unlatched, its rooms still rudely furnished; but all dusty, voiceless, forsaken. I climbed the steep slope to the rocks, crawled half prostrate to the barest and highest, and lay there on the edge of the void, the only living thing in some unvisited world."

Monroe ventures onward, with poets, prophets, and pyramids coursing from her pen, pausing to acknowledge the "Prince of builders".

"••• I do not know how one could live long on the rim of that abyss of glory, on the brink of sensations too violent for the heart of man. I looked with wonder at the guides and innkeepers, the miners and carriers, for whom the utmost magnificence of earth is the mere background of daily living. Does it crush or inspire? ••• The days of my wanderings along the edge of the chasm were too few to reconcile my littleness with its immensity. To the end it effaced me. I found comfort in the forests, whose gentle and comprehensible beauty restored me to our human life."

She pens tragedies along the "Styx-like river" at the canyon's bottom; and she digresses, "From mountain tops one looks across greater distances, and sees range after range lifting snowy peaks into the blue. The ocean reaches out into boundless apace, and the ebb and flow of its waters have the beauty of rhythmic motion and exquisitely varied color. And in the rush of mighty cataracts are power and splendor and majestic peace. Yet for grandeur appalling and unearthly, for ineffable, impossible beauty, the cañon transcends all these."

Munk, J. A. [Munk, Joseph Amasa]

418 1899 Canyon echoes. California Medical Journal (California Medical College, San Francisco), 20(9) (September): 247-253.

Munk employs the spellings "canyon" and "canon" both.

"Flagstaff is a convenient station on the Santa Fe Railroad for reaching the Grand Canyon of the Colorado River in Arizona. ••• The trip from Flagstaff to the canyon by public conveyance is made by Thurber's stage line." Includes details about the "summer" and "winter" roads from Flagstaff to Grand View at Grand Canyon. (But see an updated version in Munk, 1905, following the construction of the rail line to the canyon, and which compares Bright Angel and Grand View.)

"Thurber's Camp, as the home station is called, is in a pine swale just below the rim of the canyon. If the stage be on time, as it usually is, the tourist can get a glimpse of the canyon by daylight on the same evening of his arrival.

"Seeing the canyon for the first time does not necessarily produce the startling or lachrymose effects described by emotional writers, but the sight never disappoints, and always leaves a deep and lasting impression.

"As wonderful as the great canyon appears, it is formed in such harmonious proportions the sight does not offend the senses. But as everything is on such a grand scale, and the eye not being accustomed to such a scene, it is impossible to measure the dimensions correctly or note every detail of form and color at a glance. To comprehend it all requires time to re-educate the senses and become familiar with the new order of things; but even a cursory view will always remain the event of a lifetime in the experience of the average mortal."

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

Munk passes through some of the usual facts about and descriptions of the canyon, but includes the unique observation, "The myriads of horizontal lines which mark the different strata of rocks in the cliffs have the appearance of a maze of telephone wires strung through the canyon."

"A leisurely ride on horseback along the rim of the canon, from Thurber's Camp [Hance's] to Bissell's Point [Comanche Point], which is seven miles up the river and back, is easily made in a day. It presents a parorama [sic] of magnificent views, which change with almost kaleidoscopic rapidity and effect as one advances from point to point; but the grandest view of all is from Bissell's Point. • • • Many of the prominent buttes have been named after objects which they are supposed to resemble, and the resemblance is not always purely imaginary, but is sometimes startlingly real.

"A second day spent in riding an equal distance down the river to Berry's Hotel and Grand View Point and back is another delightful experience." Takes note of the trails at "Berry's Hotel" and "Thurber's Camp" [Grandview and Hance Trails, respectively], but focuses on the latter, and devotes several pages to Hance's tales and his idea of the origin of the canyon.

Munk concludes the article with remarks on other Arizona canyons.

Tarr, Ralph S.

419 1899 The Grand Cañon of the Colorado. The Independent (New York), 51 (March 23): 824-827.

A very general article about the canyon and how one may get to it. Includes a few more personal observations:

"As the result of a great deal of hard work a trail has been kept open by Mr. Hance, so that the visitors may make the journey to the bottom of the cañon, which is well worth doing, for, notwithstanding the fact that one is strongly impressed with the immensity of the cut made by the river even when looking into it from above, it is true that one must go down to the river side in order to fully grasp this. One must see the immense cliffs frowning down upon him from the hight [sic] of a mile, and must see what have appeared from above to be tiny hills grow in size until they become veritable mountains, in order fully to realize what it is that he has been looking at. After this one should make another visit to the rim of the cañon so as to see again, with enlarged powers of appreciation, the region through which he traveled the day before.

"The journey to the bottom of the cañon requires about a day; and, altho most of it is easily done upon mule back, the average traveler finds himself tired at the day's end."

420 1899 The Grand Canon of the Colorado. Scientific American Supplement, 48(1228) (July 15): 19691-19692.

Reprinted from The Independent (see above).

Wasson, J. Curtis

421 1899 The Grand Cañon of the Colorado River. In: Woods, G. K. (compiler), Personal impressions of the Grand Cañon of the Colorado River near Flagstaff, Arizona, as seen through nearly two thousand eyes, and written in the private visitors' book of the world-famous guide Capt. John Hance, guide, story-teller, and path-finder. San Francisco: Whitaker and Ray Co., for G. K. Woods, Flagstaff, A. T., pp. 23-25.

422 1899 The stalactite caves of the Grand Cañon. In: Woods, G. K. (compiler), Personal impressions of the Grand Cañon of the Colorado River near Flagstaff, Arizona, as seen through nearly two thousand eyes, and written in the private visitors' book of the world-famous guide Capt. John Hance, guide, story-teller, and path-finder. San Francisco: Whitaker and Ray Co., for G. K. Woods, Flagstaff, A. T., pp. 133-134.

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

Wetmore, Helen Cody

- 423 1899 Last of the great scouts : the life story of Col. William F. Cody, "Buffalo Bill" as told by his sister Helen Cody Wetmore. Chicago: Duluth Press Publishing Co., 296 pp. [Also published in translations and in modern reprintings.]

See p. 270, note of the Cody party's historic trip to Grand Canyon in 1892, quoted here for its general description of the trip from Flagstaff, which then has bare mention of the canyon.

"At Flagstaff, Arizona, the train was discarded for the saddle and the buckboard. And now Will felt himself quite in his element; it was a never-failing pleasure to him to guide a large party of guests over plain and mountain. From long experience he knew how to make ample provision for their comfort. There were a number of wagons filled with supplies, three buckboards, three ambulances, and a drove of ponies. Those who wished to ride horseback could do so; if they grew tired of a bucking broncho, opportunity for rest awaited them in ambulance or buckboard. The French chef found his occupation gone when it was a question of cooking over a camp-fire: so he spent his time picking himself up when dislodged by his broncho. The daintiness of his menu was not a correct gauge for the daintiness of his language on these numerous occasions.

"Through the Grand Cañon of the Colorado Will led the party, and the dwellers of the Old World beheld some of the rugged magnificence of the New. Across rushing rivers, through quiet valleys, and over lofty mountains they proceeded, pausing on the borders of peaceful lakes, or looking over dizzy precipices into yawning chasms."
(ENTIRE NOTE)

Woods, G. K. [Woods, George K.]

- 424 1899 (COLLECTOR, COMPILER) Personal impressions of the Grand Cañon of the Colorado River near Flagstaff, Arizona, as seen through nearly two thousand eyes, and written in the private visitors' book of the world-famous guide Capt. John Hance, guide, story-teller, and path-finder. San Francisco: Whitaker and Ray Co., for G. K. Woods, Flagstaff, Arizona Territory, 164 pp. [Cover title: Personal impressions of the Grand Cañon of the Colorado. Photographic illustration pages are not numbered but continue the pagination of the book uninterrupted. There is evidence for there being two states: edges gilt and edges not gilt. The cover ornamentation stamping may be gilt or black. No evidence is thus far had as to which state may have been first.]

This small volume includes, in addition to simple signatures entered in the visitors' book, dozens of separately authored comments. However, there are frequent instances where the names, transcribed from handwriting, are misspelled; a great distraction, even so far as John Wesley Powell's name was not recognized and was misspelled as "Powers". Powell had accompanied a group from the 5th International Geological Congress trip to Grand Canyon in September 1891, having met them in Flagstaff. (See also remarks accompanying Stainier, 1893, herein.) Woods includes in his volume, on pages preceding and appended to the pages transcribed from the visitors' book, several essays and poems by various people, all relating either to the canyon or sights near to Flagstaff; those that are pertinent to this bibliography are cited above (under 1899). A few of the visitors' remarks (below) lapse into poetry as well.

Because this quoted and annotated bibliography is meant to record as much as possible of personal impressions and experiences, what follows below, at length in the order written in the visitors' book, are only those entries that have substantive comments. The whole set as published run the gamut from gushing (though not particularly effusive) to droll and mundane; only those that are in some measure reflective are repeated here. Many comments (mostly overlooked) sound as if they simply parrot advertising blurbs that attracted the visitors to the canyon in the first place.

There are many honorable mentions of Captain Hance himself, which is as it should be; experiencing Hance became as much a part of the Grand Canyon experience as edging up to and dropping into the canyon. There are many entries in the book that are only signatures, and their thoughts are long lost to us.

In the transcriptions that follow, bear in mind that Woods' copied names may be misspelled. I add corrections for those I know to be in error. All punctuation is as printed.

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

- "April 20, 1891. J. M. Simpson, The world hath many sights for the tourist and recreation seeker to look upon, but none therein contained, begin to compare with the Grand Cañon of the Colorado River, as seen seventy miles north of Flagstaff, Arizona."
- "May 20, 1891. Mrs. Geo. T. Dornliff, Illinois. I can cheerfully say that this, the Grand Cañon of the Colorado River, is the grandest sight of my life—as I noticed in this little book of Capt. John Hance, a great many people say indescribable. I can say nothing more. It is beyond reason to think of describing it in any way. A grand sight of this kind and so few people know of it. By accident I formed the acquaintance of two ladies en route to the Grand Cañon. I joined them. We have enjoyed our trip; the stage ride from Flagstaff to the Grand Cañon is grand. Good horses, competent and accommodating drivers. I have seen the Yosemite, have visited California several different times, in fact seen all the principal points of interest in the United States, but the most wonderful, awe-inspiring piece of Nature's own work is this, the Grand Cañon of the Colorado River."
- "Robert Grawshay, London, England. Arrived May 23; left 24, 1891; and very sorry to have so little time."
- "May 25, 1891. Herman D. Oleson, Sweden. I travel thousands of miles every year, and think I have seen all the sights of the world. I have been traveling for the past ten years. The Grand Cañon of the Colorado River is the most wonderful piece of work I have ever seen. Myself and Capt. John Hance have been going for two days. Into the cañon the first day, the rim the second. The most beautiful view I think is from Moran Point. Let me advise all to take one of the Captain's horses in going to the river. Thanking the good people at this hotel and Capt. Hance, I bid you all good-by."
- "O. J. Hodge, Virginia Shedd Hodge, Cleveland, Ohio. Arrived May 27; departed May 29, 1891. We have seen the Yosemite, the Yellowstone, Mt. Hood, Mt. Blanc, and traveled through Alaska, but never saw anything so grand, so sublime, and so marvelous as the Grand Cañon of the Colorado River from this point. God bless our friend John Hance!"
- "June 1, 1891. Mrs. D. Roberts, New York. My trip has been a pleasant one to the Grand Cañon. The cañon itself is beautiful. The immensity and grandeur of this cañon cannot be appreciated unless you see it. No one has any idea of its greatness till once you stand on the rim and look down upon this wonderful piece of Nature's own work."
- "June 10, 1891. Mr. J. C. Streeter, Boston. Nature's own work is most beautiful. I can scarcely believe my own eyes. I can say nothing. The Grand Cañon is here. Come and see it for yourself. You cannot be disappointed. So far beyond my expectations. Captain John Hance is here, too. He will interest you if the cañon does n't."
- "D. T. McDougale, U. S., Botanist, La Fayette, Ind." [Although this is but a signature, it records a historic visit by the noted botanist, Daniel Trembly MacDougal, who then was just 26 years old.]
- "Lewis D. Boucher, Sherbrook, P. Q., Canada." [This is a historically interesting signature, that of Louis Boucher, who himself became a Grand Canyon fixture at the turn of the last century; a walk-on part, really, compared to John Hance's acting lead.]
- "Over the falls at midnight. The lost, strayed, or stolen party. Arrived on July 21, 1891; left on July 24, 1891. L. H. Wright, Philadelphia, Pa. Mary Kelam, Los Angeles, Cal. Arletta Brode, Buda, Ill. Laura Hoxworth, Flagstaff, Arizona. Irene Hoxworth, Flagstaff, Arizona. S. N. Peck, Phoenix, Arizona. E. A. Sliker, Cincinnati, O. Chaperoned by Mrs. J. F. Daggs, Flagstaff, Arizona. Oh, what fun at the last falls! Ask any of the party about it."
- "August 16, 1891. W. F. Hull. First entered the cañon June 22, 1884; June 26, 1884, commenced surveying road from cañon to Cedar Ranch, in company with Silas Ruggles and John Hance. First visit to the cañon in February, 1880. I. O. O. F., K. of P., F. A. M." [This notes William F. Hull, a Grand Canyon pioneer, whose still-standing cabin was built ca. 1890. He signs with notation of membership in fraternal organizations: International Order of Odd Fellows; Knights of Pythias; Free and Accepted Masons.]
- "August 17, 1891. Geo. R. Decamp. This is the greatest sight on earth. I have seen almost everything in the way of cañons, but this beats them all. You will have to see it; no one can tell you about it."
- "August 21, 1891. Mr. and Mrs. G. T. Hayes. We have enjoyed our trip. It is worth seeing. Wish we could stay a week. The grandest sight of our lives."

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

"August 31, 1891. Eugene Harlow, From Johnnie Bull's Islands. Visited the cañon and all trails, in company with Captain Hance. Very grand, and I think I shall show my good sense not trying to descend this unique cañon of the earth."

[At this point appear the signers who accompanied the Grand Canyon branch trip from the Rocky Mountain excursion of the 5th International Geological Congress, September 26, 1891, including "J. W. Powers, Washington, D. C." [sic], who is of course John Wesley Powell (who met the group in Flagstaff). See more of this visit, and comments on the visitors' book, with Stainier (1893) herein. But, astonishingly, there seems to be no record at all from Powell or any one else about his impressions or activities during this trip, his only visit to the South Rim.]

"September 1891. E. R. Herman, California. By all means visit the Grand Cañon of the Colorado River, in Arizona. See Hance, too."

"October 5, 1891. G. E. Tuttle. Talk about holes in the ground,—well, this is one of them. I have been in the cañon today. Don't intend to go in any more. I am completely out of anything to say. Come and see it for yourselves. No one can tell you about it. I have seen the world, but had not seen nearly all of it, until I saw this cañon. Farewell, Captain; am coming again. Will bring a party with me next time. Thanks for your kindness, etc."

"October 13, 1891. O. S. Garner, Massachusetts. Of all the sights in the world this is the greatest sight I ever have seen. Words cannot tell the grandeur, beauty, immensity, and sublimity of this wonderful production of Nature's own work. I would advise all tourists to visit this cañon. You cannot be disappointed. The beautiful forests we travel through going to the cañon is worth the trip alone. I am coming again to stop here for a month. I have visited many places, but this beats them all. Good-by. O. S. G."

"April 9, 1892. First of the season. Horace C. Hovey, Middletown, Conn. Intended to come last fall with Geological Congress, but am contented to open the ball for 1892, 'Mente et Malleo,' as special correspondent of Scientific American. Went down Hance trail with Mr. [Louis] Boucher, and stayed over night, returning next day; enjoyed it immensely. Found the trail in excellent order, and made the trip comfortably." [Hovey immediately thereafter published in Scientific American some remarks on his trip to the canyon; see Hovey (1892).]

"April 9, 1892. John J. Trilton New Mexico. Arrived here all O. K. Went up to the rim of cañon; was far beyond my expectations. Of all the grand sights in the world this is one of them. I have visited in Europe, Alaska, have seen the Yellowstone, all the different places in California, but nothing comes up to this. No one could tell you of it. No language could ever tell you the grandeur, the beauty, the immensity of this wonderful cañon. I would like to have all my friends here at this hour to view this, Nature's own work, with me. Farewell, Captain; I hope to see you again."

"June 28, 1892. Geo. Marshall, Syracuse, N. Y. I arrived at Flagstaff on the 25th of June, 1892, from Syracuse, N. Y., and started on the 26th of June for the Grand Cañon of the Colorado by stage line. After riding all day through some of the largest forests of pines, and the most beautiful valleys that I have ever seen, I arrived at the cañon just when the sun was setting. On the morning of June 27th, myself and several others were guided over the trail and into the cañon by Captain John Hance. After winding around here and there over the trail for several miles, we reached the river, which is a grand sight. After resting an hour, and a plunge in the river, we started for the rim, arriving about dusk. I have traveled over the United States, have seen about all the sights, but I have never seen such a wonderful and marvelous piece of nature's own work as this, the Grand Cañon of the Colorado River."

"July 9, 1892. Mrs. John Z. T. Varmer. I have never witnessed anything like this. It scares me to even try to look down into it. My God, I am afraid the whole country will fall into this great hole in the ground."

[At this point appear several signers of a "Botanical and Entomological party", including C. H. Tyler Townsend, whose work at the canyon on this visit would yield interesting and new specimens of insects and plants. They arrived on their own, as part of their work in Arizona. None of them offered any comments in the visitors' book. See Townsend (1893) in this bibliography for his detailed account of the trip to and stay at the canyon.]

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

- "July 12, 1892. Gertrude B. Stevens. This is a warm place. I fainted when I saw this awful looking cañon. I never wanted a drink so bad in my life. Captain, I won't forget you for bringing me the oyster-can full of water. Good-by."
- "Mrs. John T. Charmer. The grandest, the most wonderful, the greatest sight on earth. I can never forget it. Visit the Grand Cañon of the Colorado River."
- "July, 1892. Henry B. Thorn. Hurrah for the Cañon and John Hance."
- "July 14, 1892. Henry R. Wade. By Joe! this cañon takes the whole shooting-match."
- "July 15, 1892. Mrs. G. P. Peters. I have visited the whole world. I travel nine months in the year. I have never seen anything so grand as a sunset view of the Grand Cañon of the Colorado River."
- "Mary Smith. Our crowd, ladies and all, made trip from cabin to river, back to cabin and up to head of trail in one day. According to Mr. Hance, beating the record made by ladies."
- "July 22, 1892. M. T. Warden. This is the spot of all spots on earth. I would like to locate on this spot for about a year."
- "August 4, 1892. Chas. B. Barker, The Grand Cañon is the most wonderful thing I ever looked at. Surely worth seeing."
- "August 25, 1892. J. J. Taylor and wife, El Paso, Texas. Went to the river and back; too tired to write any more."
- "September 7, 1892. Wm. H. Alley and wife, Chicago. Visited Moran Point and Grand View Point; went down Hance Trail to river. All should be visited, if strength and time permits."
- "September 12, 1892. I. G. C. Lee, B. V. T. Lieut. Col. [Bvt. Lt. Col.] U. S. Army. Los Angeles, Cal. The grandeur of the views of this day must surely leave a life-long impression. They repay for all the fatigue. I predict that this cañon will become one of the most noted and visited spots of our country. It should be made a great national park."
- "September 13, 1892. Col. Frank Hull, Jr., New York. After having visited all the noted places in both Europe and America, I have seen nothing to compare with the sublimity of the Grand Cañon. I should advise all Americans to see the most splendid sight of their own country before going abroad. I spent several days fishing in the cañon, and caught many large salmon [pikeminnows]. I also looked at several of the rich mines, and found to my utter amazement that they were laden with valuable treasures. It will only be a short time until these mines will be opened up and the ore exported to all parts of the world."
- "September 15, 1892. Jessie and Chas. Everette, This cañon is simply immense—too big to look at."
- "September 30, 1892. Mr. and Mrs. E. L. Holmes, The grandest, the greatest, the most wonderful sight in the world. No one can tell the immensity of this grand cañon."
- "October 30, 1892. James W. Upson, Mrs. Lillian B. Upson, Baldwinville, N. Y. This party all went to the river without a guide. They rated it very grand, and all that has been claimed. However, if future parties of camping ladies intend going down, would advise them to employ the guide, and go prepared for roughing it. The ladies should wear very short wide skirts, and have Hance's burros to help them up from the cabin."
- "November 14, 1892. W. F. Cody (Buffalo Bill), Geo. P. Everhart, Chicago, Ill. James T. Wells, Salt Lake City. Allison Nailor, Washington, D. C. Frank D. Baldwin, John M. Burke, U.S. Army. H. S. Boal, North Platte, Neb. Wm. D. Dowd, Flagstaff, A. T. R. H. Haslam, Chicago Ill. Pipe Heidsieck. E. C. Bradford, Denver, Colo. W. Henry Mackinnon, England. W. H. Broach, North Platte, Neb. Daniel Seegmiller, Merritt S. Ingrahm, Washington, D. C. Buffalo Bill Expedition to Grand Canon of Colorado. Universal comment is that it is too sublime for expression, too wonderful to behold, without awe, and beyond all power of mortal description."

[The "God and Hance" association here is one of the more widely reproduced Grand Canyon quotations; this is the source. The appended remarks are those of the compiler, Woods (square brackets thus).] "January 25, 1893. Wm. O. O'Neill, God made the cañon, John Hance the trails. Without the other, neither would be complete. [The above name, Wm. O. O'Neill (better known in Arizona as 'Buckey' O'Neill), who has written his name in this private visitors' book, was killed while defending his country, between the hours of

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

10 and 11 A.M., July 1, 1898, near Santiago de Cuba. He was made Captain of Troop A, 1st U. S. Volunteer Cavalry, and was making ready for the charge on San Juan Hill, Santiago de Cuba, when he was struck by a Mauser bullet and killed. Captain O'Neill was carried from the front about two hundred yards back from where he fell, on what is known as 'Bloody Ford,' on San Juan Creek, and buried by Chaplain Brown, Corporal C. C. Jackson (of Flagstaff, Arizona), Privates Robt. Wren, Teddy Burke, and — Vansicklin.] [O'Neill was later reinterred in Arlington National Cemetery. He lies not far from John Wesley Powell. —E.E.S.]

"May 17, 1893. B. W. Clowd, Woodbury, N. J. Arrived May 16th; descended part way into cañon; met Mr. John Hance and Mr. Arnott returning. Ascended with them, and had a pleasant conversation for an hour in Mr. Hance's cottage. Exchanged a five dollar gold piece for an English sovereign at a point where man never before passed money."

"May 20, 1893. C. Wallis. Having visited the principal points of interest in Europe, as well as in America, I would say that I have seen nothing like the Grand Cañon of the Colorado for grandeur and for its unique views."

"June 2, 1893. Henry T. Finck and wife. Doubtless the most unique sight in the world, and the greatest possible surprise is to walk up from these tents to the edge of the cañon to realize the full depth of the cañon. The visitor should look at it from the rim on the point just this side of Point Bissell. The morning light is best from that position, while from the station the best hours are 4 to 7 P.M." [See also Finck (1893).]

"July 14, 1893. J. A. Leonard, Youngstown, Ohio. The Grand Cañon,—a great gulf of pale blue transparent ether in which is submerged unspeakable sublimity and indescribable beauty."

"September, 1893. Mattison W. Chase, Ogdensburg, New York. Nature's masterpiece is what I call the Grand Cañon of the Colorado. Why Americans will go to Europe and around the world, where they can see nothing to equal it, before they have looked upon this marvelous spectacle in their own land, I cannot imagine. On September 12th I made the trip, with guide, from the rim down Hance trail to the river, and returned, in eleven hours; but I would advise any one else of average strength and endurance to take the usual two days for the trip."

"October 10, 1893. J. Edward Blavel, Alameda, Cal. The World's Fair at Chicago is the greatest wonder of the age. The Grand Cañon of the Colorado the greatest wonder of all ages."

"October 26, 1893. L. de Buygenon, Liege, Belgique. After having visited the Yellowstone Park, seen Oregon State and Washington State, Cascade Range, Mt. Tacoma, Mt. Bather, Mt. Shasta, and Sierra Nevada Mountains, California, and the lovely Yosemite Valley, I declare I did not see in America a scenery more or as strikingly wonderful and impressive and sublime as the Grand Cañon of the Colorado. In Europe, I do not remember I have ever seen anything by which I have been impressed except, perhaps, by the splendid White Mount at Chamoise, when I saw it for the first time fifteen years ago."

"November 25, 1893. Left New York City, November 15th, en route to California, but my suspicion of the grandeur of the country compelled me to stop off at Flagstaff. The time of the year for a trip to the cañon was anything but safe, considering the lateness of the year, cold weather, and idea of being snowed in, but, nevertheless, our trip was without events of any mention until the night of our arrival at Captain John Hance's, when a terrific snow-storm set in. It lasted until morning. The wind at the present time is blowing a gale, and how we will find it on our return is a question. Must trust to Providence for a safe return. The kind hospitality shown us by Captain John Hance will never be forgotten. During this writing we are all sitting around the fire. To compare the grandeur of this cañon is beyond my power. I can hardly believe my eyes, and must say every one that goes sight-seeing should never forget the Grand Cañon of the Colorado. Sincerely yours, E. T. Pahmenberg, New York."

"April 6, 1894. Thos. Boynton, F. S. A. [Fellow of the Society of Antiquaries] Bridlington Quay, England. Indescribably grand."

"May 5, 1894. William G. DeWitt, New York City. One of the greatest wonders of the cañon is the cliff called 'Hance's Leap,' not generally known. The mountain-sheep got away and crossed the Colorado. Uncle John will give all the details, as he is the sole survivor in these parts."

"June 1, 1894. Mrs. Sumner Babcock, Sumner Babcock. Arrived June 1st at Moran's Point; Sunset, June 2d; June 3d, down the Grand Cañon to the river, by the way of Red Cañon and Lauras Gorge. Time from river

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

to rim, three and a half hours. No language can describe the grandeur of the trip. June 5th, en route to the Yosemite Valley and Yellowstone Park."

"June 4, 1894. Sam Hubbard, Jr., San Francisco, Cal.

Where Alph, the sacred river, ran through caverns measureless to man,
Down to a sunless sea,
Take the wild imagination of Coleridge,
Take the wonderful masterpieces of Dorè [sic],
Yet, neither poet nor painter has ever conceived this sublime reality."

"August 9, 1894. P. B. McCabe, Phoenix, A. T. Words are inadequate to describe the sublimity of a sunset view of the Grand Cañon of the Colorado, and should be counted among the Seven Wonders of the World."

"November 16, 1894. J. H. Stevenson. My only regret is that John Hance and I can't make a longer stop at the boss ditch of the world."

"March 19, 1895. R. K. Willis, Lewis Centre, Delaware Co., Ohio. I wish to say that I have seen a good deal of this great and beautiful land of ours, and calling on the great God that made all these beautiful sights, I wish to say that right here on the ranch owned by John Hance is the greatest sight in the world, and I want all my friends on earth to come and enjoy the sights and his open heart and hospitality."

"April 30, 1895. W. West Durant, New York. It is presumption to attempt to express in mere words the impression made upon one by the Grand Cañon of the Colorado, even after viewing it more than once. It must be seen to be understood and even in part appreciated."

"April 30, 1895. L. N. Stott, Stottville, N. M. The only part of the cañon I feel I have seen is Mr. Hance's trail. Any one who does not take the trip down into the cañon misses the grandest part of that little part, which you can see in three days' time."

"May 20, 1895. Clarence M. Smith, 54 Wall St., N. Y. The Grand Cañon is simply sublime. A trip should be made down Captain Hance's trail to the river, but the traveler must keep his helm hard-a-port. My personal experience in a jaunt to the river and returning in one day, bids me quote virgil's description of a visit to Hades, of which he says, Facilis Averno descensus est; Sed reddere. (That's the rub.)" [Latin, 'The descent is easy in the springtime; but to pay [but now one pays].']

"May 31, 1895. Miss Whitlock, Mrs. Whitlock. You may talk of this and that point and view, but give us the Hance Point, with shifting clouds and sun playing at hide-and-seek over Santa Fé Temple."

"Grand Cañon, June 5, 1895. Mrs. Mary E. Hart, M. D., Los Angeles. There is a certain malady, commonly termed 'big head,' with which a large number of otherwise healthy people are afflicted. Prescription: Stand upon the brink of the Grand Cañon, gaze down, and still further down, into its awful depths, and realize for the first time your own utter insignificance."

"June 9, 1895. W. B. Thomas, Los Angeles. I have seen what is without doubt the grandest natural wonder in the world, the Grand Cañon of the Colorado, and I have also seen enough to convince me that no man or woman should attempt to make the trip to the river a-foot. If you can't go on a horse, don't go."

"June 9, 1895. T. S. Van Dyke, Los Angeles, Cal. All it is said to be, and the trail one of the safest I have ever seen." [A stealthy visit by the author Theodore Strong Van Dyke.]

"June 14, 1895. Effie B. Griffith, Rushville, Ill. My first horseback ride or any stage. I took the cañon trip on Captain Hance's horse Dick, and am alive to tell the tale. I can never forget what I have seen."

"Grand Cañon, June 16, 1895. Harry T. Cory, C. E., Columbia, Mo. Yesterday I went with Captain Hance to the river. It certainly was the experience of my life. One really has never seen the cañon until he has gone down the trail to the river. After that trip he will certainly agree with me that the cañon is the most awful, horrible thing ever conceived of, and for heaven's sake don't go alone nor walk. To save money by walking, or going alone, is the worst way of saving money I can conceive of. If you do save money (falsely, so called,) just read this when you get back, and remember that I told you so."

"July 29, H. H. Prugh, Carrie M. Prugh, Dayton, Ohio. This is our fourth day here. Have been down the new trail with John Hance, and made various excursions along the rim. We feel that we have only commenced

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

to realize the unspeakable sublimity of the cañon, and hope to come again when the railroad is built from Flagstaff."

"Grand Cañon, August 19, 1895. G. A. Neeff. We have enjoyed everything, the faces, the characters, the meals, this book; last, but not least, ah! the cañon. We have seen its faces, oh, so varied, somber, smiling, meditatingly, growling, ecstatic. To have seen the faces of the mountains and the depths is to have studied the thousand characters, and yet but to catch an inkling of its true worth. It is a book, this cañon is, to the poetic soul, and with such convivial spirit about these venerable trees and kind, smiling faces at the camp, it is one of the most restful places imaginable. The cañon itself is a picture of eternal rest. May the time soon come when many will enjoy the beauties of these God-given festivities."

"August 21, 1895. Chas. A. Baley, Oakland, Cal. Wm. C. Vaughan, Chicago, Ill. We made this day the ascent of Ayer's Peak. A flag was placed on the northern peak, one on the southern, and a monument reared on the middle one. Ayer's Peak occupies a central position in the Grand Cañon, from which are revealed such a touch of immensity and grandeur as to produce an indellible [sic] impression."

"August 22, 1895. Caroline Hadley (Aged nine years). We have been to Moran Point, and we would like to go to the river, but I do not think we can. I think it is very, very deep, and grand, and that it must have taken a very long time to make it. I would like to stay here forever, it is so beautiful."

"August 30, I. T. Whittemore, Florence, Arizona. The longings of my heart have been gratified. My anticipations and expectations more than realized. I look in wonder, love, and admiration at this mightiest of God's created works, but never have I felt so small, and God so great, as while standing, awe-struck and overwhelmed, as in gazing on this, the greatest of all earthly wonders. I cannot leave, however, without leaving my testimony of respect for the man who made the trail, and made it possible for all sight-seers to see the cañon from crest to base. All honor to friend John Hance."

"Grand Cañon, August 31, 1895. Edith Mansfield. Doubtless, God might have made something more wonderful or more magnificent, but, doubtless, he never did. America for Americans. I am glad to add my meed, respect, and admiration for the enterprise and determination which made the trail possible."

"August 31, 1895. Marian Scott Franklin. A vision of what God has prepared for us in the New Jerusalem."

"September 20, 1895. Hugo Fromholz, Berlin, Germany. Visited the cañon, went only half way down the trail, but was fully satisfied of that. Point Moran pleased me best." [See also Fromholz (1897).]

"September 25, W. E. Pedrick, Denver, Colo. On the trail to the river, about half an hour's march from a point opposite Point Moran to the right of the trail among cedars, and about one hundred yards distant from the trail, rises a projecting rock, upon whose side I noticed to-day what appeared from the trail upon the face of the rock to be some kind of reptile, coiled in circles, over a space about four feet long. I had no time to visit it to-day, and hope some geological student will make a close examination, and hope a classification may be arrived at."

"October 1, Fred J. Madden, Clinton, Iowa. Edith M. Tolfree, Gertrude Tolfree, Flagstaff, Arizona. Porter Fleming, Phoenix, A. T. Chas. S. Flemming, Stanford University. Grand Cañon survey party. We all expect to see the Grand Cañon from the windows of a palace-car next year. 'Dude,' the jack-rabbit policedog, kept us in game."

"October 1, Will B. Hunter, Chicago."

Wonderful cañon,
Child of the seas,
No man knows thy history,
None can solve thy mystery;
God-given glimpse of eternity
To weak humanity."

"Friday, October 25, 1895. Chas. P. Bond, Boston, Mass., and Waltham, Mass. A single day has given me only a glimpse of this marvelous creation of Nature. That glimpse has, however, been a revelation to me. I have seen all the wonders of the New World that command the admiration of man, but I regard this Grand Cañon of the Colorado River as the grandest of them all. One of God's masterpieces, its grandeur, its marvelous

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

groupings of Nature's pinnacles, and its vast extent, is beyond the grasp of human intellect to comprehend, and beyond the power of human language to accurately picture. No pen or pencil can portray its awful grandeur. It is a kaleidoscope of Nature's greatest beauties, furnishing new surprises and new wonders from every point of view. It well deserves a place in the galaxy of the great wonders of the world; climate, country, people, and surroundings, all combine, to make this Grand Cañon of the Colorado River one of the ideal spots on the American Continent. A place where one must always love to come, and from which he goes with much reluctance. It is a place where man must feel, if he never felt it before, the existence of a Creator, in whose presence he is as nothing, and whose ways are past understanding."

"April 29, 1896. Harry Firve, Albuquerque, N. H. I have been here two days, and never had so much fun since I had the measles."

"May 12, 1896. J. M. Cassin, Santa Rosa, Cal. If to see the Grand Cañon for a day or two is so great a pleasure, what must it be to view it daily for years? John Hance alone can tell."

"May 12, 1896. Arthur L. Sholl, General Office, P. R. R., Philadelphia, Pa. I made the trip over the new trail between the hours of 8 A.M. and 5 P.M., spending an hour at the river. The most magnificent walk of my life; but I wish to say to others who may wish to walk, take our respected friend's advice,—a word to the wise is sufficient."

"June 19, 1896.—9 p.m. Chas. Wm. Sirch, Milwaukee, Wis. Left morning 23d of June 1896.

IMPRESSION I.

After the drive, a view, a
Sight of the Cañon grandé,
Regrets of the wearisome drive
To this corner of the land;
The scene I admit is rugged,
But should I seek the course,
When around me are beautiful mountains,
Already I feel remorse,
'T is not half so big as I expected.
Oh thoroughly I despise
The travelers who exaggerate,
Especially as to size.

IMPRESSION II.

A supper, well-served and hot,
Quite cures a man of the blues,
A sleep in a cool, sweet cot
Full many regrets subdues.
A breakfast, two burros, a guide,
A descent from the cañon's rim,
I cared not to explore the cañon,
But just to be company to him,
My friend, the Professor, from Kansas.
Afoot I descend the trail.

IMPRESSION III.

At eight we are found well-started;
At ten we did not fail
To drink at the old stone cabin;
At eleven the ladders descend;
At twelve we have reached the river,
Down at the cañon's end.

IMPRESSION IV.

A rest and a plunge in the river,
And experience in quicksand.

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

We felt of the current in places,
    'T would most take off one's hand;
At three we prepared for the ascent;
    Scaled falls by ladders and ropes;
I had walked seven miles to the river,
    But returning was most beyond hopes.

IMPRESSION V.

I can solve most difficult problems
    Theorems obscure can pass,
But I frankly acknowledge in high arts
    Is vastly superior the ass.

IMPRESSION VI.

On I struggled, e'er seeking the higher;
    Anon I stopped in fright.
An inch to the left, an inch to the right,
    And this page I'd not indite.
To appreciate, Oh traveler,
    This cañon's awful height,
You must ascend without burro,
    With your own strong brawn and might;
For where there is no unit of measure
    To calculate the size,
To man the extent of the labor
    Will atone for the failure of eyes.

IMPRESSION VII.

'Carpe diem,' and do not fail
    To visit Moran's view,
For though quite weary grows the trail,
    The grandeur will ne'er be forgotten by you.

IMPRESSION VIII.

Beautiful was the trip we made
    Down Cameron's trail and through the caves.
Impressions of stratas and stalagmites will cling to my memory, and more I crave."

[Note that "Impression VIII" seems to be a mention of the Grandview Trail, which is also misidentified as "Cameron's Trail", in turn perhaps confused with the Bright Angel Trail.]

"June 19, 1896. J. Curtis Wasson, A. B. Flagstaff, Arizona. Came to Grand Cañon Hotel; got out of stage; walked over to rim of cañon; looked out, and Oh!!! June 20th, went down Hance's trail to river, took a bath in river, and returned. June 21st, went to Moran's Point. June 22d, went down Cameron's trail [Grandview Trail, perhaps confused with Bright Angel Trail]; visited mines, and explored three caves.

Chasm of the Creator,
    Handiwork of His hand,
And of His works none greater
    Is found in all the land.

Great, massive, awful abyss,
    Delving Pluto's artifice,
To keep his realm obscure within,
    From upper worlds of wayward men.

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

And to our host and hostess kind,
And daughters fairest of mankind,
Who added to our joy,
We, friend Sirch and I
Now say good-by,
And hail our stage, ahoy!

May heaven's pleasure,
Without measure,
E'er your way betide,
That others coming,
In the gloaming,
May e'er in you confide."

"August 12, 1896. Wm. Stowe Dervol, University of Arizona, Tucson, Arizona. It is a chasm to afford a place wherein the soul may seek repose, and which may prompt the deepest emotions to great activity, and lift man above himself."

"November 28, 1896. Magnus C. Myer, Chicago, Ill. Many a land has seen my eyes, many a mountain crossed my foot, but never seen such wonderful creations as this, the Grand Cañon of the Colorado."

"May 5, 1897. James Pringle, Edinburgh, Scotland. Since leaving my native land of Scotland I have traveled upwards of thirty thousand miles, over three fourths of this globe, but have nowhere seen so awe-inspiring a sight as the Grand Cañon of the Colorado River, said to be unequalled in the world. I believe no artist has yet been born who can adequately portray it, nor any word-painter can do justice to so majestic a theme. It is, to my mind, a humbling sight, and the main lesson it teaches us is the littleness of man. What is man, that thou art mindful of him?" [Psalm 8:4]

"Aldace F. Walker. A. T. & S. F. R. R. Endorsement guaranteed." [General reflection, or railway's promise?]

"May 21, 1897. Mrss. E. L. Reynolds, South Bend, Ind. What are the pyramids of Egypt, works of man, compared to the works of the Almighty."

"May 24, 1897. James H. McClintock, Phoenix, Arizona. In his way, Hance is as great as the cañon."

"May 25, 1897. John A. Beckwith, Oakland, Cal. If Dickens had only been John Hance, what a book he could have written. As for the cañon, it is undoubtedly the most wonderful thing of its kind on this earth. The crater of Kilauea, in violent action, is possibly the more impressive of the two."

"May 31, 1897. Kansas Tourists.

We hope when next
We visit the cañons,
To find John and
Peck dearer companions.

May she put on a dress,
To cover her pants,
And change her name
To Mrs. John Hance.

May they be supplied
With plenty of bedding,
When we all come to dance,
At the Hance-Peck wedding.

John, if ever inclined
To go on a tippie,
Just go to the cañon,
And behold Peck's nipple."

"May 31, 1897. J. P. Campbell, Ashland, Kans. Next to the Grand Cañon, Captain John Hance and his trail are two of the greatest wonders of the world. The half was never told."

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

"June 7, 1897. M. C. Campbell, Wichita, Kans. El Cañon Grande" de la Colorado is, in my judgment, one of the greatest wonders of the world. Captain Hance, the modern path-finder, well deserving the title."

"June 11, 1897. R. W. Dana. Delighted with everything, even the mules."

"June 13, 1897. P. E. Kipp. Marvelous are Thy works, and that my soul knoweth right well."

"June 18, 1897. Walter Q. Bentley, 200 Randolph St., Chicago, Ill. While memory holds a seat in this distracted orb shall I forget the impression made by this short acquaintance with the greatest of all natural wonders. It is a great pleasure to be able to vouch for Captain John Hance, as guide and friend, without whom tourists would be deprived of the most impressive part of their visit, a trip down the trail to the river. After a trip down the trail and back yesterday, and a visit to Points Moran and Bissell to-day, under the Hance guidance, would certainly urge every visitor to avail himself of Mr. Hance's trail, thereby assuring to himself the very best condition for getting the most value out of his visit."

"June 14 to July 1, 1897. Amelia B. Hollenback, Brooklyn, N. Y. Thank Captain Hance and the cañon for the happiest two weeks any one ever spent."

"June 14 to July 1, 1897. Josephine W. Hollenback, Brooklyn, N. Y. Our expectations for years have been fully and more than happily realized during the last two weeks. To Captain John Hance we are deeply indebted for his untiring courtesy and kindness, which have helped to make our visit at the Grand Cañon all that it has been to us."

"July 2, 1897. T. C. Poling, Quincy, Ill. Any one who comes to the Grand Cañon, and fails to meet Captain John Hance, will miss half the show. I can certify that he can tell the truth, though it is claimed by his friends that he is not exactly like the Rev. Geo. W. in that particular, as he can do the other thing when necessary to make a story sound right. Long live Captain Hance."

"July 7, 1897. W. A. Hall, Whitewater, Wis. For the Lord is a Great God. In His hand are the deep places of the earth. Psalms, xcv:3, 4."

"July 7, 1897. Mr. and Mrs. F. A. Pattee, Los Angeles, Cal. Had an out-of-sight time. Words fail to express our delight and satisfaction with all we have seen."

"July 7, 1897. F. A. Pattee. My Dear Captain: You may build trails into it, up it, and around it; you may ever take a few more of those celebrated horseback-jumps over its crest, but you can never catch up with it. Yours, in the world where they lie still some day."

"July 29, 1897. H. V. Scandrett, Spearville, Kan. There are few subjects too large for a Kansan to tackle, but to express myself on this wonderful masterpiece is to me the exception that proves the rule. Am afraid I shall not be able to tell my friends anything about it, without endangering my standing for truthfulness."

"August 7, 1897. David W. Fahs. Great and marvelous are Thy works, O Lord. In wisdom hast Thou made them all."

"Jas. S. Nies, Brooklyn, N. Y.

Full many a song and dance I 've heard,
Upon the vaudeville stage,
But none can beat the yarns you'll get
From Capt. John Hance, I wage.

The woman fat, between the rocks,
By giant-powder saved
The mare who jumped two thousand feet,
And other dangers braved.

But to appreciate him best,
Just hear him for yourself,
And let him guide you o'er the trail.
And don't you spare yourself."

"September 14, 1897. Marguerite Shonts. Pleased with everything, even Captain John Hance." [Compare June 11, 1897.]

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

"September 25, 1897. E. W. Boyd, Pittsburg, Pa. Persons visiting the Grand Cañon, without taking the trail to the river, have failed to see the beauty of the place. The trail is perfectly safe. I rode from top to bottom. Enjoyed it hugely. As to John Hance, he is very gentlemanly, but a curiosity of the rarest type."

"September 29, 1897. J. D. Croissant, Washington, D. C. I cheerfully record my name in this book as among those who fully appreciate the grandeur of this great cañon. I have stood upon the brink, and looked down into the mouth of seething Vesuvius; have looked down upon Switzerland's charming lakes from Regi; have climbed to the top of Mt. Washington and Pike's Peak, and have just come from a week's stay in charming Yosemite, and I freely record my opinion that there is nothing on earth that will ever compete with this Grand Cañon. Captain John Hance, our faithful guide, is quite as unique in his way as the cañon itself."

"September 29, 1897. DeWitt Clinton Croissant, Washington, D. C. Everything surpasses what it has been cracked up to be; only be sure when ordering a lunch to have them put in an extra sandwich. Captain Hance, with all his lies, is a most trustworthy individual."

"September 29, 1897. David Forbes, New York City, N. Y. Glorious, laborious. Glad I went. Thankful it's over. Special thanks to Captain Hance. Splendid guide, in spite of his economy of the truth."

"October 12, 1897. Annie J. Garlide. Oh my! Oh my! Oh my! The half was never told. Good luck to Captain Hance and all the good people at the Grand Cañon Hotel."

"Anna M. Fleming, F. S. Hafford, Mary L. White, Mary McGill, Stanly Windes, C. Ruth Opdyke, Prescott, A. T.

She strode along with a manly stroke,
Till the puckering string of her bloomers broke."

[Anonymous, undated]

"THE CAÑON.

Born in an earthquake's shock,
And carved by the roaring flood,
Ye mighty piles of rock,
Great handiwork of God."

"April 25, 1898. J. M. Simpson, Flagstaff, Arizona. Crossed the river below rapids, at foot of Hance's trail, April 27th. Very rough, and high water; 26th, down trail; 27th, across river; 28th, up; 29th, Cameron & Berry mine; 30th, at hotel; May 1st, returned home." [Apparently one of the various miners stopped at Hance's hotel.]

"May 3, 1898. Edwin O. Stanard, Jr. Went around the rim in a snow-storm. May 4th, started down to the river. Snow and rain all day. Roughest passage Captain Hance ever made (so he says). Weather cleared several times during the day. Trip greatly enjoyed. Would do it again in similar weather, if necessary. Better in a snow-storm than not at all. Time to river, two hours and thirty minutes; back, three hours and thirty minutes."

"Caroline Carpenter, Mass.

To take a ride with Capt. Hance,
On his dead-level trail,
Is sure to fill one's soul with joy,
Whatever else may fail."

"July 5, 1898. C. D. Stewart. Four of us left hotel at 5:30 A.M., and went to the river and back on foot. We were five hours descending. Coming back, two of us got up before dark; one was brought up on a horse at 9:30, and one stayed all night in the cañon. The moral of this is that one must be a mountaineer in experience and in perfect form for tramping, if he will walk down to the river and back the same day. The heat is intense and overpowering on the lower levels, because the rocks are bare of foliage, and when they become heated by the sun the trail is like a baker's oven. By all means go to the river. The experience alone is worth the trip; but take a horse, or mule even, if you do not take a guide. The trail is as good a mountain trail as is often found, and the Captain's stock are well-selected animals, and are good ones, as one of the four mentioned above."

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

"July 5, 1898. Shurley C. Walker, San Francisco, Cal. I enjoyed the experience immensely, more on account of its success as a pedestrian trip than because I reached the river. Result, fifteen hours' work, one gallon water, gain in muscle, loss in flesh, plenty of experience. Hoping to be indorsed by all the other three companions, I remain, Yours."

"July 6, 1898. Edward N. Butt. I have had much experience in mountain-climbing, and German professors also do much good work in that way, but I shall never forget the forlorn appearance of Herr Dr. —, Professor of Geography, who, when our party were descending to the river to-day, we discovered lying on the ground, in the shade of a tree, at 9 A.M., about an hour down from the rim. He had then been two hours in the great gulf of the Grand Cañon; was utterly exhausted, and had been without food or water for many long, weary hours. Moral. Do not attempt to descend or ascend the Grand Cañon on foot, but take one of Captain Hance's mules."

"July 5, 1898. Robert L. Stephenson, San Francisco, Cal. Our pleasures here have been enhanced by chivalrous, daring, entertaining, and ever-obliging Captain Hance. Hence, it gives us pleasure second only to that of viewing the cañon, to attest to his faithful, careful, and vigilant guidance at all times and to all places."

"July 30, 1898. Eva Estella Martin. Our party took in what is called the 'rim view' yesterday. No words can in any way describe it. There are hundreds and hundreds of cañons and great ducal palaces put into one great, vast cañon. After all is said the trip is made very much pleasanter by the companionship of Captain Hance. Some one really ought to write a book all about the Captain."

"July 30, 1898. Emma and Geo. F. Harrington, Crown King, Ariz. Had the author of the creation viewed this majestic scene what wonderful symphonies would have been composed by this Master of Choral Composition. The marvelous work, behold, amazed, comes to one's mind constantly while viewing the Grand Cañon. I shall not attempt to describe the sight, but shall urge my friends to go and see for themselves, and the guidance and companionship of Captain Hance is invaluable. No visitor of the Grand Cañon can afford to make the mistake of failing to appreciate his rugged humor and great kindness of heart."

July 30, 1898. Bell Martin, Webster, Westmoreland Co., Pa. We stood and gazed on the Grand Cañon with feelings of reverence and awe, and involuntarily exclaimed, 'How marvelous are Thy works, Oh Lord! In wisdom hast Thou made them all.' [paraphrasing Psalms 104:24]. Our trip around the rim, under the careful guidance of Captain John Hance, was most delightful, but words fail when one attempts to describe it."

"August 26, 1898. Chester P. Dorland, Los Angeles, Cal. Captain John Hance, a genius, a philosopher, and a poet, the possessor of a fund of information vastly important, if true. He laughs with the giddy, yawns to the gullible, talks sense to the sedate, and is a most excellent judge of scenery, human nature, and pie. To see the cañon only, and not to see Captain John Hance, is to miss half the show."

"September 13, 1898. James Smith, Flagstaff, Arizona. It is unfortunate that the words grand, sublime, and awful have been so overworked. These words, which otherwise might have been useful in expressing one's thoughts of the Grand Cañon, John Hance, etc., have so lost their meaning that English fails to express my thoughts. All that I can do is to say that this, the Grand Cañon of the Colorado River, is the grandest sight on earth."

"October 1, 1898. R. and E. E. F. Skeel.

Farewell to the gorge,
And to Captain John Hance,
Whose mendacious inventions outdo all romance.
With his fibs he can charm, with his yarns he enchants;
And as if these great gifts to still further enhance,
With a bolster he is going to learn how to dance.
Oh may we return, by some rare, happy chance,
To this spot, and be welcomed by Captain John Hance."

"Frank C. Reid. The Grand Cañon is an expression of God's mightiest thought, and is not transferable into terms of human speech, one of the things 'not possible to be uttered.'"

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

"Annette P. Ward. Since seeing that great wonder, the Grand Cañon, I never hear a bit of beautiful, soul-stirring music but that the cañon rises before my inner vision. Listening to the exquisite strains of harmony, I gaze into that indescribable beauty of coloring which enwraps those awful, weird, mysterious depths, and like a soft accompaniment to the music, I hear the sighing of the pines; and the harmony of the music and the harmony of the enchanting beauties of the scene are blended into one perfect whole, a veritable feast for the memory."

1900

Anonymous

- 425 1900 [Burton Holmes lecture.] The Argonaut (San Francisco), 47 (August 6): 10
"The subject of the next Burton Holmes lecture at the Columbia Theatre on Thursday afternoon, August 9th, and Sunday evening, August 12th, will be 'The Grand Cañon of Arizona,' illustrated with beautiful pictures of one of America's most marvelous scenic wonders." (ENTIRE ITEM)
- 426 1900 [Announcement for lectures in the Leeds Photographic Society.] The British Journal of Photography, 47(2108) (September 28): 621.
Notes a presentation: "Mr. Tempest Anderson, M.D., B.Sc., F.G.S., will give an illustrated account of 'The Grand Cañon of the Colorado.'" (ENTIRE NOTE) Precise date of lecture not determined from this notice, though sometime between late January and mid-March.
- 427 1900 Public lecture. The Dartmouth (Dartmouth College), 22(11) (November 30): 194.
"Next Tuesday evening at Wilder hall, in the large lecture room, Mr. Henry G. Peabody, Dartmouth 1876, will lecture upon 'Arizona and The Grand Canon.' Mr. Peabody is probably the most expert photographer of nature in the United States. He has been employed by many of the leading railroads of the country. Recently he has patented a process for producing colored photographs. By this method he has succeeded in getting views of the rarest beauty. The time of the lecture will be announce later." (ENTIRE ITEM)
- 428 1900 Mr. Peabody's lecture. The Dartmouth, 22(12) (December 7): 209.
"The stereopticon lecture delivered by Mr. H. G. Peabody '76, of Boston, last Tuesday evening in Wilder hall, was one of the most interesting ever given in Hanover. The subject was Arizona and the Grand Canon. Mr. Peabody started his lecture from Rollins Chapel, a beautiful view of which was warmly applauded, and guided his audience through the West, describing and illustrating the mode of life of the Pueblo Indians, and the wonders of Arizona and the Grand Canon. The beauty and selection of the slides could scarcely be improved, and the lecture was so enlivened by anecdotes and interesting descriptions that the attention of the audience was intense throughout. Despite the stormy weather, the room was filled to more than its seating capacity." (ENTIRE ITEM)
- 429 1900 Glories of the Grand Canyon. Eloquenty and vividly depicted by Nat M. Brigham. gives a masterly lecture. His friends were greatly pleased at his initial appearances as a public speaker in this city. Deseret News, (December 19): 2 [issue pagination].
- 430 1900 Grand Canyon of Arizona. Nat M. Brigham delivers his interesting panoramic lecture. Deseret News, (December 20): 7 [issue pagination].
- 431 1900 January 19th, 1899. "The Grand Canon of the Colorado of the West," By Mr. C. T. Whitmell, M.A., B.Sc. In: Papers Read Before the Leeds Geological Association, Session 1898-99 [SECTION]. Leeds Geological Association, Transactions, Part 12 (1898-99/1899-1900): 10-11.

Synopsis of a general presentation given by Charles T. Whitmell.

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

Brigham, Nat Maynard [Brigham, Nathaniel Maynard]

- 432 1900 Nat Maynard Brigham. From: Record of the Class, 1895-1900. In: Harvard College. Class of 1880. Secretary's report, no. VI. June, 1900. [No imprint], pp. 20-21.

"Am travelling passenger agent for Santa Fé Railway Company, living in Pasadena, with headquarters in Los Angeles. Last year had charge of grand cañon business for Santa Fé, at Flagstaff, Ariz. Shall be at Williams, Ariz., with same duties this summer. • • • March 15 made my debut as a public lecturer; subject, 'Grand Cañon of Arizona.' Next fall shall go east, with following repertoires: (1) 'Grand Cañon of Arizona;' . . . ."

Coolbrith, Ina H.

- 433 1900 American poets of to-day: Ina Coolbrith. Current Literature, 28(1) (April): frontispiece, 16-17.
Selected poems, with an unsigned editorial introduction. See "In the Grand Canon", p. 17, which reprints Coolbrith (1892).

James, George Wharton

- 434 1900 In and around the Grand Canyon: The Grand Canyon of the Colorado River in Arizona. Boston: Little, Brown, and Co., "Pasadena edition" (limited), 341 pp. [Farquhar (1953, p. 44) cites, "500 numbered copies signed by the author, large paper, half leather binding." Also noted as three-quarter morocco, marbled boards with matching end papers.]
- 435 1900 In and around the Grand Canyon: The Grand Canyon of the Colorado River in Arizona. Boston: Little, Brown, and Co., 341 pp. [Trade ed. Reprinted 1901, 1903, 1905, 1907, 1908, 1911, 1913.]
- 436 1900 Two men in a marble trap. Wide World Magazine (London), 5(27) (June): 277-283.
Travel into Havasu Canyon.

Jesup, Morris K.

- 437 1900 Thirty-first annual report. American Museum of Natural History, [31st annual report, for 1899], pp. 9-33.
See "Department of Public Instruction"; specifically, "Columbia University Course", which notes (p. 29) five lectures by George Wharton James relating to the Grand Canyon and vicinity, December 2, 9, 16, 23, 30, 1899.

Moody, Charles Amadon

- 438 1900 To the cañon by rail. "The Santa Fé & Grand Cañon R. R. is now prepared to handle passengers from Williams to the Grand Cañon of the Colorado." Land of Sunshine, 13(1) (June): 28-37. [Item signed "C. A. M."]
Grand Canyon Railway. (In 1900 the rail line still had not reached the rim of the canyon, with a stage connection from end of track.)

Morton, Frederick W.

- 439 1900 Thomas Moran, painter-etcher. Brush and Pencil, 7(1) (October): 1-16.

Peabody, Henry G.

- 440 1900 Glimpses of the Grand Canyon of Arizona. Kansas City, Missouri: Fred Harvey, 4 pp., 35 plates.

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

Thayer, Frank S.

- 441 NO DATE Glimpses of the Grand Cañon of the Colorado. Denver: Frank S. Thayer, 15 color plates, string-tied. ("Reproduced by Special Permission from Original Copyright Photographs by Oliver Lippincott, Los Angeles. Water Color Effects by J.P. Robertson, Denver. Plates and Color Press Work By The Williamson-Haffner Eng. Co., Denver. Frank S. Thayer. Publisher, Denver." [title leaf, thus.] [1900.]

Stylized pictorial cover portrays an undefined canyon river scene, perhaps not even Grand Canyon. Each illustration in the volume is faced by a heavy tissue-paper interleaf, affixed, on which a legend is printed and a verse from fine literature. Includes two non-Grand Canyon views: "Flagstaff and Grand Cañon Stage and San Francisco Mountains", and "Cliff Dweller's Ruins, Walnut Cañon, Near Flagstaff". "The last two pictures in this book are from the brush of Mr. J. P. Robertson, of Denver." (Publisher's Note [leaf 1]). The Robertson pictures are: "The Roaring Torrent" and "'Good Night'—Grand Cañon". Also variants?; see for example, Thayer (1905).

"Bibliography of Books, Government Reports, and Magazine Articles on Grand Canyon National Park", in U.S. National Park Service Annual Report for Fiscal Year ended June 30, 1919 (p. 344), indicates copyright 1900. Date corroborated from The Publishers' Weekly, as collated in The American Catalog, 1900-1904 (Office of the Publishers' Weekly, New York, 1905), p. 90, where the title is listed with titles from 1900 and with date in square brackets, "[1900]", thus, with the following description: "Fifteen views of the Grand Cañon reproduced by trichromatic color photography, a new process which resembles water color in effect." Original price $2.50. The volume (with credit only to the photographers) is also listed in Book News, 19 (December 1900): 219.

Wiegand, Karl H. von

- 442 1900 Lost in the Grand Canyon of the Colorado. Wide World Magazine (London), 5(28) (July): 431-437.

The article recounts the efforts to search for William F. Russell of Syracuse, Nebraska, one member of a party who went to the Grand Canyon to examine mining properties, who drowned while attempting to cross the Colorado River that was then in flood. "In their outfit they had a small canvas folding-boat, with which they intended to cross to the other side. Why the foolish men should have tried to cross the swollen river, racing at a fearful speed between the narrow walls of granite, and surging from wall to wall with a crashing roar that well-nigh deafened them—and that in such a boat—is hard, indeed, to understand." William Wallace Bass, John Waltenburg, and R. M. Bleak conducted a search; and this illustrated article is an account of that search by land, which did not succeed in finding Russell. It also includes notes of past experiences in crossing the river by these men.

Williamson, M. Burton (Mrs.)

- 443 1900 A visit to the Grand Canyon. Historical Society of Southern California, Annual Publication, 4(3): 200-205. [Volume cover title: Annual Publication of the Historical Society of Southern California and Pioneer Register, Los Angeles, 1899. Published by the Society, Los Angeles, Cal. 1900.]

Recounting a trip in 1895 to Hance's. She is not consistent about spelling Grand Canyon with a capital "C", nor Colorado River with an "R"; and she rarely capitalizes the genus names of those random plants to which she erratically, parenthetically affixes their scientific names.

"We are told that the shrill whistle of the engine and the bustle of railroad cars will soon penetrate the Coconino forest that leads to the Grand Canyon of the Colorado River. Anything that hints at a 'timetable' is entirely out of place in the presence of this solemn, silent and magnificent exhibition of the prodigality of time. And after the railroad we shall expect to find trolly [sic] cars running up and down the canyon, claiming the distinction of running down the steepest grade of any electric road in the world, and air-line bridges spanning the distance from one dome or spur of granite to another. The railroad indicates progress, yet does it not seem a desecration, an insult to centuries of solitude? • • •

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

"On a day in June in 1895, a large party of Californians started from Flagstaff for the canyon. We occupied three large stages, some of the party being outside with the driver. A stage ride that occupies something like twelve or thirteen hours, may seem a tedious journey, but such did not prove the case. • • •

"At nine o'clock as a lower grade was reached the Hotel with its many lights suddenly appeared. The hotel comprised a group of white tents, seventeen in number, including one long dining tent and one little log cabin where we all stopped to register, formed a romantic picture nestled in a little pine covered glen between the hills. Below these hills, not more than three hundred feet away was the Grand Canyon.

"After eating our dinner, the guide, with a lantern to light the way through the pine trees, took us up one of the cliffs to take a view by moonlight of one of the smaller canyons into which this immense canyon is subdivided. After a walk of two or three moments the small pine covered hill was ascended and we stood upon the brink of the canyon. The Grand canyon was a surprise in every way. Instead of entering a stupendous gorge and gazing upward we were above and the canyon was below. We enjoyed the glimpse by moonlight and rose early the following morning to get a better view by daylight. We were surprised to find that the pine trees grow so close to the brink that their cones fall into the abyss below. And as you stand on the edge of the rim and look down you see a deep gorge below that is so near one is in danger of falling into it. And stretching from thirteen to eighteen miles across, you see a panorama of jasper cities, a series of gorges and mountain ranges of solid rock. Each naked mountain has a different peak or summit, no two alike. The mountains themselves are individual in their shape. The prevailing color of the Grand canyon is red, a bright rose red, vermilion [sic] red, Indian red and varying shades of pink. But as the eyes become more accustomed to the color effect, green, gray and other colors are visible. The sublimity of the Grand canyon cannot be felt at the first sight; it increases with every view of it, new forms present themselves. The mind is not prepared to appreciate the infinite variety at first, it is too colossal. Its immensity is felt immediately, but the grandeur of these jasper cities grows more majestic as the mind becomes accustomed to the unfamiliar vision. We know that in order to appreciate the best music the ear must be trained to distinguish musical harmonies, the rhythm appeals to us naturally, but the soul of music comes to us through musical training as well as natural endowment. The eye must be educated in order to appreciate art in its highest sense. I was reminded of this when viewing the canyon. Each view of it only enhanced my admiration of it. This proved that the limitations of sight and color perception had prevented a full appreciation of this stupendous system of gorges. As I have said there are solid rocks elevated into spurs, domes and buttes with here a sharp pinnacle, there a broad amphitheater, a castle not far away and varying forms in every direction. • • • "

After a brief paragraph to remind the reader of the powers of erosion, the author continues without saying that it is the next day.

"As we looked down one of the deep gorges the river looked only like a roily brook about six feet across. Now we began to realize the depth of the gorge that walls the river. Although the Colorado river is about a mile and a quarter below the rim of the canyon it is necessary, in order to reach it, to go down a trail of over seven miles in length.

"At an altitude of seven thousand feet the descent down the trail appears no small undertaking. Only a small proportion of those who go to the Grand canyon [sic] ever make the descent. Visitors usually content themselves with walking around the rim of the canyon. Of our party of 23 who started down only 12 made the descent to the river and ten of these were gentlemen. On the third day of our arrival we made the descent down the trail.

"After an early breakfast our party started, first taking a walk through the pine woods across beds of blue lupines in full bloom and all met at the log cabin of Hance, the guide, who was waiting at the rim of the canyon with his mules saddled for the journey. Besides the mounted travelers there were foot passengers. As the old trail, near the guide's cabin, had been abandoned a ride around part of the rim was necessary before the descent was made, then single file, mules, men and women began the downward journey, for none were mounted at first, as the zigzag trail was too steep to go down otherwise than on foot. At a signal from the guide the mules are mounted. On the way the precipitous trail is dotted here and there with flowers. The shallow soil on the hard, red sandstone is sufficient for the scarlet lobelia, painted cup (Castilleja), blue flax (linum), and other red, blue, purple and yellow flowers. Out on rocky ledges the ever present prickly pear cactus (opuntia) and the bright scarlet flowers of the mamillaria cactus are seen.

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

"For almost a mile down the trail the view of this part of the Kaibab plateau is indescribably rich in color effect. There is still the predominance of pink and vermillion [sic] red. With every curve downward of the serpentine trail the view is changed. We are filled with reverential awe as we see before us the work of a thousand centuries of physical energy exhibited in the dynamic power of stream and rain erosion.

"As the defile is now made from one mountain side to another the scene narrows, the broad vistas of rocky ranges are hidden by stupendous mountains of granite that rise abruptly on either side. Down, down the rocky gorge our eyes try to scan below until the brain grows dizzy at the depth visible.

" 'Do you see,' says the guide, 'those little green bushes at the foot of that gorge on the left?' 'They are cottonwood trees three feet in diameter. I know for I have been there.' No wonder we can hardly keep our seat on the saddle as we scan the distance below us.

"And now the zigzag trail gives place to long circling trails that outline the base of one mountain after another. The foot travelers are nowhere visible, only the riders are seen following each other in single file deeper and deeper down the mountain road.

"The river is nearing, we hear its roar and the splashing of the water-falls.

"And now the Colorado river is before us.

"To one accustomed to the Father of Waters, the Colorado river appears but a narrow stream. It is not red, but muddy enough to compare favorably with the Missouri in its muddiest passages. The thought of navigators going down the stream through the canyon makes one tremble, for it is so rocky, so turbulent, so shut in by one canyon after another that the wonder grows how anyone could navigate its waters and live to tell the tale.

"Juniper and mesquite (prosopsis rubescens) trees, the kind our guide calls 'cat's claws'—because this species of mesquite has sharp thorns on it—plenty of hot sand, a deserted looking tent belonging to the guide, a wooden bench, two hungry looking cats, these are the local surroundings at the foot of the trail by the river. Above and around us are the mountains.

"We wash our hands in the Colorado river, bathe our faces, collect a few pebbles from the shore, and all repair to such shade as the juniper trees afford us, near the old tent. We sit on the bench and try to eat a luncheon prepared for us at the hotel at the rim of the canyon. It may be we are not hungry, only thirsty, for the water from the river is more acceptable than the luncheon, consisting as it does of bread, ham spread with mustard, hard boiled eggs and olives. We feed some of it to the cats.

"The journey down has been a continued pleasure, a picnic, but the journey back again was for the most part a labored effort. The high altitude caused a shortness of breath, a rapid beating of the heart and aching of the limbs whenever some steep ascent made it necessary to dismount from the mules and climb the trail. Sometimes when riding, Stephen, the gray mule, would forage for food, sage brush (artemisia) and bunch grass, in the most hazardous parts of the incline trail, often as he turned a sharp corner down and out would go his head, but where his hind feet could find a resting place no one could tell, fear suggested that it might be at the bottom of the canyon, but the sure-footed beast never lost the beat of the trail.

"Each traveler had filled his bottle with water at the river and the guide had filled his canteen, but hollow bottomed wine bottles can contain but a small supply of water, and many of our party realized as never before what thirst was. At five o'clock in the afternoon the last rider had gained the summit, having been below the rim of the canyon since half-past eight o'clock in the morning."

So the story ends abruptly, thus.

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

1901

Anonymous

444 1901 [Brief note on a lecture to the Appalachian Mountain Club by Arthur K. Peck, "The Grand Canyon of Arizona."] Appalachia, 9(3/4): 405.

445 1901 [Painters' trip to Grand Canyon.] In: Art Notes [SECTION]. The World Review (Chicago), 1(12) (May 25): 365.

"Three distinguished American painters, George Inness, George McCord and Thomas Moran, have started on a unique trip for fresh painting material. They are to be gone a month in exploration of the Grand Canyon of the Colorado, that unsurpassed wonderland of America. They can hardly fail of finding what, in the artist's peculiar vocabulary, is called 'big stuff.'"

446 1901 Field Columbian Museum sixteenth free lecture course, Autumn, 1901. In: Personal and Scientific News [SECTION]. American Geologist, 28(5) (November): 333.

"Oct. 12, Through the Arizona Cañon and Yosemite to the Glaciers and Alaska, Dr. Edward Burton McDowell, Chicago" (ENTIRE NOTE)

447 1901 Board of Education free lectures. In: Report of the President. American Museum of Natural History, 32nd Annual Report (1900), pp. 26-27.

Listed: "Apr. 10.—The Grand Canyon of the Colorado. Mr. G. Wharton James."; "Apr. 17.—The Wonderful Cataract Cañon Home. Mr. G. Wharton James." (p. 26)

Anderson, Tempest

448 1901 The Grand Cañon of the Colorado River. The Alpine Journal (Alpine Club, London), 20 (May) (152): 360-368. ("Read before the Alpine Club, February 12, 1901.")

Excursion to Grand Canyon with William Morris Davis.

Bartlett, D. L., Jr.

449 1901 An Arizona "hold-up." The Jersey Bulletin and Dairy Farming (Indianapolis, Indiana), 20(8) (February 20): 151.

Recounts a stage ride from Flagstaff to Grand Canyon and return; driver identified as "Thurber", who is J. Wilbur Thurber, proprietor of the Grand Canyon Stage Line.

"Needless to say it was a hard trip—not to be undertaken by invalids—but very interesting and enjoyable for those who can endure it.

"The 'Grand Canon hotel' consists of a log cabin and some tents; they are on the brink of the most tremendous chasm on the surface of the globe . . . . I will not attempt a description. We spent two days and three nights along its ragged edge, with the great Coconino forest around us and no white settlement nearer than the railroad. It was impossible to avoid a feeling of oppressive loneliness that came over us at night. What if the Apache Indians should come upon us from their reservation some forty miles away! The handful of people at the 'hotel' could have offered no resistance." There were stories of hold-ups on the road, too, and this article builds up to this. While returning to Flagstaff they encountered two horsemen, who the passengers believed would hold them up; but the men were only looking for "a poor little Jersey cow", which shortly later they spied.

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

Brooks, Fred Emerson

- 450 1901 Old Ace and other poems. Boston and Chicago: Forbes and Co., 208 pp. [This imprint also reprinted 1914.]

See "The Grand Canyon of the Colorado", p. 167. Reprinting of Brooks (1894).

Buckley, James M.

- 451 1901 Editorial letter. South-"Westward Ho!" The Christian Advocate (New York), 76(37) (September 12): 6-7; (38) (September 19): 7-8; (41) (October 10): 7-8; (42) (October 17): 7-8; (45) (November 7): 7-8 (issues are paginated concurrently for the volume; the corresponding pages are: 1446-1447, 1487-1488, 1607-1608, 1647-1648, 1767-1768).

Serialized letters are signed "J.M.B."; written during rail travel to the Epworth League Convention in San Francisco. See in the September 19 issue, "The Grand Canyon of the Colorado".

"Formerly it was an arduous trip to the Grand Cañon, which was then reached by stage route sixty-five miles from Flagstaff, and until recently it required twenty-four hours to go from Williams to the Grand Cañon. Today from the latter place there is a railroad fifty-five miles long, leaving only ten miles of staging to be done. ••• It is proposed to extend the railroad to the cañon, the grading being already nearly completed. [Ironically, the first train arrived at Grand Canyon just two days prior to the publication date of this issue of the Christian Advocate.] ••• At the head of the Bright Angel Trail is a hotel plainly furnished and cleanly kept. As he approaches one would suppose it an ordinary farmhouse, and could not imagine what an amazing view would be granted him from the very door.

"It is impossible, without seeing it, to imagine the Grand Cañon, however vivid or detailed the description; and that which one sees he does not need to imagine. •••

"The Grand Cañon lies wholly in the northern part of Arizona. From the north it can be reached only by weeks, if not months, of travel, and then only by special expedition.

"From the Bright Angel Hotel one beholds an intricate system of cañons, which the river at the bottom, nearly six thousand feet below. The channel has been correctly described as resembling a rather insignificant trench. All sense of perspective, cultivated on the plains or in ordinary mountain regions, is useless here. The only way to apprehend fully the proportions of the cañon is to descend to the river. •••

"I have heard persons express an estimate of the Grand Cañon as compared with the Yosemite and the Yellowstone. But comparison is impossible; for there is nothing in the Yosemite which resembles the Yellowstone Park, and nothing in the Grand Cañon may be likened unto Yosemite. To me the Yosemite remains the most impressive in the trinity of wonders. Those stupendous domes, the awful half-dome, El Capitan—these proclaim might, permanence, sublimity. Its marvelous falls infuse the scene with a mingled strength and gentleness, and Mirror Lake reflects the heavens and the mountains in a strangely beautiful combination. The Yellowstone is fascinatingly weird, and at points becomes appalling; the Grand Cañon is a prodigy of nature, worth crossing the Pacific or the Atlantic to behold. The three wonders are, respectively, unique; the world has nothing to compare with or to surpose them.

"During the two days that I was at the cañon I walked along the rim about sixteen miles, getting every possible view, but did not descend the cañon; that was to have been the work of the next day." However, Buckley was then distracted by news that a great fire in Williams had destroyed most of the town, including the "fireproof hotel" where his travel trunk was stored. In Williams, a porter informed him that the hotel had been saved; his trunk was waiting for him.

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

Campbell, William Carey

- 452 NO DATE A Colorado Colonel and other sketches. Topeka, Kansas: Crane and Co., 402 pp. [Library of Congress gives date as 1901.]

Volume is principally fiction. See non-fiction item (although perhaps partly novelized), "At the Bright Angel Trail" (pp. 389-399).

Charles Ahrhart [firm]

- 453 1901 Official catalogue and guide book to the Pan-American Exposition : with maps of exposition and illustrations, Buffalo, N. Y., U. S. A. May 1st to Nov. 1st, 1901. Buffalo, New York: Charles Ahrhart, 176 pp.

See under "Agriculture Building", p. 125, list of exhibitors: "Atcheson, Topeka & Santa Fe R. R., Chicago, Ill. Diorama of the Grand Canon of Arizona. Gallery, west end." (ENTIRE NOTE) See p. 124 for floor plan of Agricultural Building. Not illustrated.

Fountain, Paul

- 454 1901 The great deserts and forests of North America. London, New York, and Bombay: Longmans, Green, and Co., 295 pp.

Grand Canyon, see pp. 277-286. Largely the impresions of a naturalist, with a few of the usual descriptions of the canyon's forms, and his own idea (though not outlandish, and bypassed here) of how the canyon was formed.

"Standing on the edge of the valley and looking across the opposite line of cliffs, the sight is first attracted by the extraordinary and fantastic shapes assumed by the rocks. These forms have been compared to distant views of cities, castles, and cathedral spires. All these may easily be imagined; but to my view the scene rather repreented an elaborate filigree of rock-work—very beautiful and very wonderful. And then the magnitude of the scene! that baffles all description, as does the coloration. It happened to be near sundown when I obtained my first view of the Colorado Valley, and no better moment could have been chosen had I fixed the time beforehand. • • • When, however, I approached nearer the edge of the cliff on which I stood and looked downwards I felt like one in a dream. The multitude of wonders beneath me was positively dazing. Let the reader be the most imaginative man breathing, and let him fancy the wildest shapes and forms that rock can take, he will utterly fail to picture in his mind the wonderful figures here standing rampant."

More wildly, the author seems to encourage a trailless descent into the canyon, but finishes up a bit more wisely—

"There is no great difficulty in descending into the valley from the first line of cliffs. The rocks are so broken, jagged, and weather-worn that a bold climber can find dozens of tolerably easy descents. Of course care and discretion are necessary. It is only necessary to say that the cliffs seem nowhere to stand less than 4000 feet above the valley to prove that; and in most places they rise very abruptly. The descent of the actual gorge to the water of the river, though only about one thousand feet, is a far more dangerous and ticklish business. Still the plucky traveller will not search long before he finds a practicable path to the depths below. It is when you have reached this lower depth that you begin to feel what a terrible prison you would be in should you fail to find your way out again. Travellers at the present day can avoid . . . dangers and difficulties, for not only are there hotels at the principal points of interest for his accommodation, but the descents from the cliffs to the valleys below have in many places been "improved" to facilitate his movements and render them safer, so that even ladies now descend with the aid of an alpenstock; and special rough dresses may be hired for the protection of the clothes of the adventurous. In the contest between danger and the dollar, the dollar has won . . ."

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

Holmes, Burton

- 455 1901 The Burton Holmes lectures : with illustrations from photographs by the author. Volume Six. Battle Creek, Michigan: The Little-Preston Co., Limited.

Volume includes: "The Yellowstone National Park", "The Grand Cañon of Arizona", and "Moki Land". Of course this is the definitive lecture of the day, at great length and enthusiasm.

Hough, Emerson

- 456 1901 Chicago and the West [SECTION]. Forest and Stream, 56(3) (January 19): 50-51.

See p. 51, notice of Santa Fe Railway exhibition of "a 75-foot reproduction in model form of the Grand Cañon" by artist H. G. Maratta, to be displayed at the Sportsmen's Exposition in Chicago.

- 457 1901 Chicago and the West [SECTION]. Forest and Stream, 56(4) (January 26): 68-69.

"Mr. H. G. Maratta, the well-known Chicago artist, started this week for the Grand Cañon of the Colorado to make studies for the purpose of putting up a big model of this cañon on the main floor of the sportsmen's exposition which is to be held in Chicago this coming month. Mr. Maratta has already made a small model of the cañon, and it gives the best idea of that tremendous spectacle which has ever been offered in artistic form." (ENTIRE NOTE)

- 458 1901 Chicago and the West [SECTION]. Forest and Stream, 56(7) (February 16): 127-128.

See p. 128, under "Chicago Sportsmen's Exposition": "Mr. Maratta is well advanced with his work on the panorama of the Grand Cañon of the Colorado." (ENTIRE NOTE)

- 459 1901 The Chicago Sportsmen's Show. In: Chicago and the West [SECTION]. Forest and Stream, 56(10) (March 9): 186-187.

"Mr. Maratta personally executed for the Santa Fe Railroad the beautiful panorama of the Grand Cañon of the Colorado, which is one of the most brilliant and stirring attractions of the exposition."

"Beyond . . . rises the approach to Maratta's Grand Cañon. I cannot describe this panorama, but it is worth going some distance to witness. The illusion is perfect. The opening of the proscenium is about thirty feet, but there is no sense of distance possible. One sees the whole cañon and feels it is really 30 miles across. The light is superb. This is as sterling and artistic an attraction as has ever been seen in any city and under any proposition whatever." (ENTIRE NOTES)

James, George Wharton

- 460 1901 Down the Topocobya Trail. Wide World Magazine (London), 7(37) (April): 75-79.

Adventures in Havasu Canyon.

"Few places or people have interested me more than the Havasupai Indians who dwell in Cataract Canyon, one of the tributaries of the Grand Canyon of the Colorado River—the most stupendous waterway of the world.

"No nation on earth has a more grand and picturesque national home. The stream of the Blue-water (Havasupai) is so lined with willows—flourishing, healthy, and vigorous—which present so striking a contrast to the red of the Canyon walls, as immediately to suggest the poetic name applied to them by Lieutenant Frank H. Cushing, 'the Nation of the Willows.' [See Cushing (1882).]

"When he visited them the Indians assured him there were but two methods of entrance and exit to their Canyon home, viz., by the trails known as the Wallapai and the Moki. The existence of other trails was a national secret, yet, when I was taken to them nearly a dozen years ago, it was down a third trail, the Topocobya. Since then I have been guided by various of my Indian brothers to eight or ten other trails, all of them so cunningly

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

engineered and the approaches to them so marvellously hidden, that it would take more than an ordinary expert to find them.

"And what trails they are, to be sure! Even the Moki and Wallapai trails and the later-discovered Topocobya are dreadful for a city-bred man to contemplate. For the most part they are mere scratches on the face of perpendicular cliffs, a thousand or more feet high; 'scarey' sliding shelves, too, where a misstep of horse or man means a fall of several hundred feet. Or, again, solid stone stairways 10ft., 20ft., or 50ft. high, overlooking yawning abysses which make one faint with dread. And yet, all of these are so skilfully constructed as to command the highest admiration for the Indian engineers. Up and down these awful places they fearlessly ride. And up and down them we must walk, or slip, or slide, leading our horses or letting them go on ahead, our provisions and bedding packed on the backs of the patient, sturdy, plucky, and wise little burros, or donkeys—for there are no hotels or restaurants in Havasu Canyon. The sandy soil of the Canyon provides our beds and 'canned' goods the staple of our diet, helped out with corn, peaches, squash-melons, and the like got from the Indians if we arrive at the right season. •••

"And what excitement we have had going down the trails, in the daytime and at night—packs twisting; burros and mules kicking and obstreperous; women screaming; and Indians apparently calmly and indifferently looking on, but all the while chuckling and secretly laughing whenever your attention was called elsewhere!

"And what terror I had once when caught at the foot of that trail late in the day. Night's black pall was just falling over us—two ladies and three men. I had to send the two men on to the spring where we had cachéd provisions on our way down, and thus was left alone with the ladies—my daughter and a Mrs. Long.

"The only place I was seriously afraid of was where the trail in its ascent ran south to a certain point under a majestic cliff several hundred feet high, then turned east and ascended by three very awkward steps to a higher level, and, finally, turned back to the north. The horror of it was that, at the base of the stone stairway, there was a short piece of sliding talus and then a drop down into the deepest depths. Hence, should a horse miss his footing on the steps he and his rider would probably be precipitated into that awful abyss and dashed to pieces on the rocks beneath.

"When I thought of this place I was given the choice of the two horns of a dilemma. It was this way: Should I warn the ladies and thus make them afraid, or should I let them go on unsuspectingly and risk that dreadful stairway? I knew that if they had forethought enough to give the horses their heads and allow them to travel in their own way there would be little, if any, danger. But would they do it? I told them to let their bridles hang loose and determined to risk it. By this time it was dark—horribly dark. The great cliffs on each side and before us cast shadows that were appalling in their blackness. I could not see more than the barest suggestion of my horse's head. My daughter followed me and Mrs. Long brought up the rear. Slowly we approached the dangerous place. As I rode on that lower shelf I could literally feel that yawning blackness on my right. Step by step we approached the wall of dense darkness before us. Then the turn to the left was made; I counted one, two, three, and the steps were mounted and my horse and I safely on the shelf above. Twenty more paces, and I was where the trailed widened out, waiting for my daughter. Breathlessly I followed her horse's movements, and my excited imagination seemed to see the animal's steps one after another as he safely made the ascent, and when she halted by my side I breathed a fervent, even though inaudible, 'Thank God!' Now we both waited for Mrs. Long. I could hear the deep breathing of her horse, and wondered whether she would let the bridle hang.

"Step by step they approached the wall. Up one step, on the second, fore-feet on the third. Then—horror of horrors!—the animal's feet slipped on the treacherous rocks and down he fell. A groan from Mrs. Long told me that she had fallen from his back. Where and how? Would he roll over and kill her? Would she, in some semi-insensibility, fall of the steps into that yawning blackness? And with a new terror at my heart I waited to hear the sound I dreaded above all others to hear. To my intense relief, however, I heard instead a deep sigh.

"But I had not been idly waiting during this time. The moment the horse fell I sprang from my horse and, handing the bridle to my daughter, bade her remain there while I returned to help Mrs. Long.

"In the meantime new fears suggested themselves. What was the horse doing? Stumbling to his feet? Would he tread on her? When he reached the upper shelf would he stand still? Would he run over me or force me off the trail? He settled all these questions by nearly doing the latter as he dashed by me, where, striking the horses

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

ahead, he scared them, and all three wildly dashed up the trail for the top, leaving my poor daughter dazed and helpless where they rushed by her.

"I found Mrs. Long on the steps, her body in the safest position she could possibly have fallen into. Her feet were on the lowest step and her head on the top one. Lifting her in my arms I carried her to my daughter, where she soon recovered from her swoon, and, finding no bones broken, we slowly and by short stages wended our laborious way to the head of the trail, where the ladies said they would remain while I went in search of the runaway horses. It was slow work. Mrs. Long was so shaken and bruised that she could take only a few steps at a time, and to accomplish these she had to be sustained. It was with a deep sigh of relief that my thankfulness was expressed when we reached the top of the trail. But even now our difficulties were by no means over. Our waggon, with all our camp equipments, was over two miles away, and it was pitch dark. The horses that my comrades Nellis and Symons were bringing were heavily laden, and we had no saddle. Even had there been one, Mrs. Long was incapable in her present condition of sitting upon a horse alone. We were, indeed, in a serious plight! I felt I must follow the horses, as without them we could not get back to the railroad, and yet I felt it was brutal to leave my timid and shrinking daughter with a possibly seriously injured woman alone in the darkness, and in a locality where the wild howls of coyotes and other night animals were constantly heard. I could only do what I thought was best, and then the brave women, without a word of selfish murmur or complaint, both urged me to follow the horses, while they promised to sit content on the rocks and await the coming of the men. With a prayer for their protection I plodded along in the darkness, running where I knew the trail was reasonably safe, and crawling in one or two places where the memories of former rides along sides of yawning chasms made me somewhat uncomfortable.

"Occasionally I stood and listened, ready to return if the ladies called for me, and hoping also that I might hear the horses. Soon I was satisfied that they were not far ahead, and after a while I heard them stop for a little, when I knew that they had found grass. But the moment they heard me they were off again, and a half dozen or more attempts to steal upon them soon satisfied me that it was a hopeless task to endeavour to catch them unless I climbed up the steep sides of the canyon. For even though we were out of the steepest part we were still in a place where the talus on either side was precipitous than I cared to venture in the night-time. So, relinquishing the chase, I returned to the ladies. It was not long before Symons and Nellis also appeared. And then began our work, in the dark, over the longest, dreariest, and most discouraging two miles of trail it has ever been my misfortune to travel. Those two miles stretched out interminably. The darkness got blacker, as if completely to bury us from the sight of Heaven. And it did, indeed, seem as if we were forsaken of all the good powers of the universe. I was the only one who knew anything about the trail, so I wearily plodded ahead, feeling for the narrow-trodden path with my feet, and occasionally lighting a match to see that we were all right. My daughter followed, leading one of the horses, then came Symons, half carrying Mrs. Long, and the procession was closed by Nellis and the other horse. It seemed to me the hours lengthened into weeks of darkness before we reached the waggon. With what joy we gained the crest of the short but steep hill on which our waggon stood few can understand. A fire was soon lit, provisions cooked, and around the camp-fire we ate and drank all we needed. Though completely unnerved by her fall and quite wearied but we were now assured that Mrs. Long had received no serious injury, and this made our hearts light. But, oh! how weary we all were! Almost too weary, even after our refreshing meal and stimulating coffee, to stretch out our blankets and crawl in between them.

"But poor Nellis! Even this enjoyment was denied him. Throwing a saddle over one of the horses, he followed the three that had escaped, and we were quite willing to be awakened out of our sound repose by his return just before dawn with the truant animals. Two days later we were at the railroad and on our way to visit Acoma, the city of cliffs, and in the excitement of the strange scenes there witnessed the adventures of Topocobyra Trail were almost forgotten."

Jones, Jenkin Lloyd

461 1901 Jess : bits of wayside gospel. New York: The Macmillan Co., and London: Macmillan and Co., Ltd., 312 [313] pp.

See p. 141: "The Grand Cañon of Colorado [sic] is coarse and cheap work accomplished by the prentice hand of Nature, compared to the chiselled beauty of a Mater Dolorosa, a mother of grief." (ENTIRE NOTE)

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

Maratta, Hardesty G.

- 462 1901 Scenic structure. Specification forming part of Letters Patent No. 678,012, dated July 9, 1901. Application filed August 10, 1900. Serial No. 28,460. (No model.) U.S. Patent Office, 3 pp.

Patent for "a new and useful Improvement in Scenic Structures". "This invention relates to an improved scenic structure for more completely giving pictorial representations of objects—as, for example, landscapes . . . ." "The scene (usually a landscape) is painted upon the background . . . and upon the wings, according to the nature of the view. If this part of the work be done artistically, the effect is very pleasing to the eye, and an accurate impression of the natural scene can be conveyed even in cases when an ordinary drawing or flat picture does not succeed. This is notably true of such views as the Grand Cañon of the Colorado, where it is extremely difficult by ordinary means to give a correct impression of the vastness of the scene coupled with the descent of the ground before the eye, and which can be very successfully done by this means." (ENTIRE NOTE)]

Miller, E. M.

- 463 1901 A snow blizzard at the Grand Canyon. American Amateur Photographer, 13(11) (November): 499-505.

A long and engaging narrative of a photographer in the canyon. Includes five photos, only one of which shows snow.

"At sunset our stage drove up to the Bright Angel Hotel, at the very edge of the Grand Canyon of the Colorado. . . .

"Standing on the rim at sunset, seeing the canyon for the first time, with expectations keyed to the topmost notch by what I had heard, I was disappointed only by the very imperfect idea I had formed. I realized in a moment the futility of any camera picture, any word description, or any painting, in adequately conveying an impression of the Grand Canyon. . . .

[The next day] "That evening Mr. Charles A. Bailey, of San Francisco, a member of the California Sierra Club, arrived at the hotel. He was desirous of camping out down in the canyon a few days. I desired just such an experience, and we soon had a journey arranged for the following morning. Our outfits consisted of blankets rolled up like a strip of carpet, with provisions and cooking utensils in the center. A rope was tied around each end. These bundles weighed about thirty pounds, and were carried over the shoulders. In addition, I had my camera and plate holders.

"We started at 9 A. M. The day was cloudy and threatened snow and rain . That did not worry us much, as during a storm several days before but an inch of snow had fallen. The trail passed down at an easy grade through the wooded portion of the rim. The snow had melted in places and made the trail icy. But the 'snow rim' extended down only about a thousand feet. The easy grade did not last long; we soon came to the 'real thing.' Here the trail might be described as a winding stair without steps, doubling, back under it self in a zigzag manner, with an occasional long incline winding around a projecting cliff. At one place the trail was blasted out of the side of a precipice. Half way down it turned abruptly back under itself. Steps were formed by logs placed crosswise several yards apart, fastened down and filled in with more or less pulverized stone. The turning point was a little icy, and exceedingly dangerous. We called this the Giant's Stair Way. Half way down we passed the blacksmith shop. This consists of an anvil and a few tools under a rock. . . .

[Deep in the canyon at a natural rock shelter the author observes] ". . . from below, looking up, the canyon loses its identity; one dimly takes in the great perpendicular heights, tier after tier of straight-walled cliffs. . . .

[Much farther down they encountered miners building a trail, and after making camp] "I walked down this canyon until I came to the newly made trail, followed it a mile, and came to where the men were working. Unfortunately I did not bring my camera from camp, and thus missed getting a unique picture of the trail builders in their dangerous position. . . .

"At two o'clock in the morning, not being able to sleep, I got out from under the rock to take a moonlight stroll in the canyon, when behold! The cliffs were white with snow, and it lay on the mesa not over half a mile

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

above us. A misting rain (melted snow) was falling in our canyon, and cold blasts of wind suggested visions of a blizzard upon the rim. The prospect of getting snowbound in that terribly isolated canyon was entirely too realistic, and we decided to start out at once. We could reach the Willows [Indian Garden] by morning, and the climb out from that point through snow drifts would be a hard day's work. To await until morning at our camp would make the climb out that day impossible; so we packed up our blankets and started. Enough light from the moon penetrated the clouds to render the trail barely visible. • • •

"The first few miles were easy, as the snow was not deep. Then we got up into deeper snow, and into a snowstorm. Mr. Bailey walked very slowly and rested frequently. He had been in such places before; I hadn't. Every minute the snow was getting deeper above us, and the climb harder. I thought we ought to make better time and rest after we got out. He declared he was taking the 'winning gait.' After it was all over I had very much more respect for the 'winning gait,' but in the face of that storm, every gust of which brought down fresh clouds of snow, the 'winning gait' did not suit me. I wished to get out as soon as possible. I worried Mr. Bailey and his 'winning gait' worried me, and we finally decided each to take his own pace. I knew if we both got snowbound on the trail we could expect no help, as the people at the hotel were expecting us to stay several days in the canyon, but if one got out it would be an easy matter to get help to the other. So, without feeling I was deserting, I started at a more rapid pace. That was very slow, as every foot of distance represented half a foot of rise. In an hour I was far above Mr. Bailey. Occasionally I could see him leisurely climbing the narrow trail, a mere speck on the white snow.

"Coming to a rather steep grade I abandoned my blankets; at another steep grade I left my camera. I became thoroughly exhausted during the last mile, and began to think I would never get out, but I was nearer the top than I thought. All at once the rim trees loomed up, dim, dark forms, in the drifting snow. A very welcome sight they were. A regular snow blizzard greeted me as I emerged from the last stretch of trail; and half dead and covered with frozen snow I tumbled into the hotel cabin. A dozen miners and hotel men encircled the huge cabin stove, enjoying its radiating heat. I suppose I gave out an exciting story of getting lost or stranded on the trail; I do not remember just what I did say. At any rate, three men started down the trail to give Mr. Bailey assistance (which he did not need), and I gave them ten dollars to bring out my camera.

"The next day, Sunday, we were blizzard-bound at the Bright Angel Hotel. But plenty to eat, plenty of dry fuel and good beds certainly had more elements of safety and comfort than the uncertainties of the Grand Canyon."

Miller, Joaquin

464

1901 A new wonder of the world. Overland Monthly, New Series, 37(3) (March): 786-790.

This item includes Miller's peculiar rendition of the origin of the Grand Canyon, but is overlooked here in favor of the colors of his prose. (You have to like red.)

"It is old, old, this Grande Canyon [sic], and yet so new it seems almost to smell of paint, red paint, pink, scarlet.

"There is scarce a canyon to be found, great or small, for days of travel round about but has ruins of ancient battlements hanging from its cliffs; and we pillage these, when accessible to the approach of the seeker, for curios for tourists, much as the tombs and temples of the Nile have been pillaged. But I must not wander too far from the grand canyon of color, Colorado.

"I first looked down into this then comparatively inaccessible wonder world of color in the early seventies, when a party of us were trying to learn something of the Moqui (pronounced Moke-i) Indians said at that time to be worshippers of the rattlesnake. We approached the precipitous red sides from the south, where the narrow granite gorge of the smaller river is more narrow, yet almost as deep, and is comparatively colorless as I remember it. Yet the absence of sunlight in its fearful and narrow depths may have much to do with the absence of color. We were fortunate enough to find a storm raging at sudden intervals at our feet, in the greater canyon, fifteen miles wide, perhaps, and more than half a mile deep. The interrupted battles of the elements roared far below us, and all the time, as far as eye could reach, the white clouds curled, drifted, drooped, died then arose again.

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

"We were covered with the dust of the descent, our horses suffered from heat and thirst, and we could not share our scant supply of water, yet far down yonder a mighty river thundered through its granite walls and the wide open red lips above the gurgling throat of granite drank a deluge from broken cloud-bursts at our feet. The thunder, at intervals, was fearfully impressive. We felt, at one time, that the temples, towers, and battlements of red which burst here and there above the thunder clouds must be crumpled to dust, so terrible was the tumult. The lightning almost continually wrote the autograph of God on and through the clouds at our feet. But when the clouds would part and pass for a time and stillness and sunlight come again, all would be as before.

"The one most startling yet most pleasing thing, as Grande Canyon bursts upon you, or rather, as you burst upon it, and look down, is the sympathetic symmetry, let me say the homogeneity [sic] of it all. Putting aside the soft, flesh-and-blood color, you cannot help a sudden and glowing heart-beat at the human fashioning of it all.

"The heat is oppressive, away down deep. Despite the roaring river, the water is warm, and the color of the Nile. But all life is absent from it. Spending a night here, to get the soft moonlight, as if in some cathedral fashioned when 'there were giants in the land,' [Genesis 6:4] I found the heat and silence fearful. • • •

"And now a little, pretty, pathetic fact, a touch of tenderness, humanity. All the red colors of the flower-kind in Christendom, and they are many, seem to come here and look down from the dusty brick [sic] of the canyon, with this riotous yet most orderly world of red. The scarlet cactus, the Indian pink, the Painter's brush, the red currant, indeed, about a dozen bits, dots and dashes of red that I cannot name, look down, away yonder, into that mighty arena of red, as if surely a part of it all; as one life may be a part of the Infinite.

"Color is king here. Take the grandest, sublimest thing the world has ever seen, fashion it as if the master minds from the 'beginning' had wrought here, paint it as only the masters of old could paint, and you have El Cañon Grande del Colorado."

Muir, John

- 465 1901 Our national parks. Boston: Houghton Mifflin Co., 382 pp.
Grand Canyon, see pp. 34-36. Reprinted from Muir (1898). Numerous later reprintings and imprints.

Sill, Louise Morgan

- 466 1901 The Canyon of the Colorado. Harper's Weekly, 45 (May 4) (2315): 465.

Behold the realm where Colorado flows!
Here countless centuries have wrought their will
In forms majestic with impellent skill;
Cathedrals reared their naves from this repose,
With pomp of giant pinnacle where glows
The sunset; and a stream, that scarce might fill
An emperor's chalice, carved its way until
The sculptures of a million years uprose.
And from the imbedded silence of this stone—
Strange hieroglyphic tomb of time's decay—
The river's voice forever stronger grown,
A sunlit spirit in its shadowing clay,
Sings to the soul, that makes impatient moan
And speeds it blithely on unto the open day.

Tupper, Edith Sessions

- 467 1901 In the Crand [sic] Canyon of the Colorado. The Christian Work, 71 (November 14): 707-711.
Reprints Tupper (1896).

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

1902

Anonymous

- 468 1902 A wonder of the world. Grand Canyon of Arizona vividly described by Mr. Nat M. Brigham. Deseret News, (February 10): 2 [issue pagination].

Summary of lecture.

- 469 1902 Millville Friends' School. Friends' Intelligencer (Philadelphia), 59(14) ("Fourth Month 5" [April 5]): 219.

"Professor P. P. Phillips, of the University of Pennsylvania, gave a very entertaining and instructive lecture at Millville, Pa., on the evening of the 29th instant, in the interest of the Friends' school. His lecture was presented in the form of a journey through the lands of the Cliff-Dwellers and the Pueblo Indians, the picturesque regions of the Grand Canon of the Colorado and Scenic Divide. His recital of experiences in the various places created added interest in the views presented." (ENTIRE ITEM) "Scenic Divide" = Grand Scenic Divide, Grand Canyon.

- 470 1902 N. W. D. A. at Monterey. Paint, Oil and Drug Review (Chicago), 34(16) (October 15): 18.

National Wholesale Druggists' Association convention. "One day [en route] was spent in the Grand Canon of Arizona, the sight of which was new to many of the 95 members of the party." (ENTIRE NOTE)

- 471 1902 The tour of the American Climatological Association. American Climatological Association, Transactions, 18: xxxiii-lliii.

Grand Canyon, see pp. xxxiv-xxxvii.

- 472 1902 Lecture courses. In: Field Columbian Museum, Annual Report of the Director to the Board of Trustees for the year 1901-1902. Field Columbian Museum, Publication 70, Report Series 2(2): 86-87.

See p. 86, "Oct. 12.—'Through the Arizona Cañon and Yosemite to the Glaciers of Alaska' (Illustrated). Dr. Edward Burton McDowell, Chicago." (ENTIRE ITEM)

- 473 1902 [Lecture notice.] Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, Year Book, 14 (for 1901-1902): 125.

"Dec. 12 [1901].—Lecture by Mr. Henry G. Peabody, of Boston, on 'Arizona and the Grand Cañon of the Colorado,' illustrated by colored lantern photographs taken by the lecturer." (ENTIRE NOTE)

- 474 1902 City Board of Education free lectures. Winter and spring courses. In: Report of the President. American Museum of Natural History, 33rd Annual Report (1901), pp. 38-39.

"January 22.—Across the Grand Canyon to Point Sublime. G. Wharton James." (p. 38)

Art Club of Philadelphia

- 475 1902 Eleventh annual exhibition of water colors and pastels : catalogue of exhibition : from March 3d to March 30th, 1902. Philadelphia: Art Club of Philadelphia.

See p. 10; "On the Bright Angel Trail, Grand Canon of Arizona. Thomas Moran." (listing only).

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

B., R. B.

- 476 1902 [Letter.] In: Martin (Mr.), The Conversation Corner [SECTION]. The Congregationalist and Christian World, 87(42) (October 18): 556.

Section continues the "Children's Vacation Letters" feature begun in the October 11 issue. R.B.B. writes from Nordhoff, California, about an Easter vacation trip to Grand Canyon, staying at Bright Angel Hotel, and a hike down Bright Angel Trail. Includes a photo of the hotel. The letter is in its entirety:

"Dear Mr. Martin: I am attending a boarding school in Southern California, and made a trip in the Easter vacation to the Grand Cañon of the Colorado in Arizona, twenty-four hours ride from Los Angeles. It is sixty miles from the Santa Fé road to the rim of the cañon, where a comfortable log hotel is situated, 7,000 feet in altitude. From this 'Bright Angel Hotel,' we went down the 'Bright Angel Trail,' which leads to the bottom of the cañon. As I was unable to get a saddle horse I went on foot. The way at first was quite dangerous, as the trail was covered with snow and ice. In many places a slip would have thrown one over the edge.

"When we got below the ice and snow it was easier. After descending 'Jacob's Ladder,' a steep place in the trail where the horses have to go down steps, we came out on a broad, level plateau four miles wide. Crossing that we were at the top of a perpendicular wall of rock, 3,000 [sic] feet high, and overlooking the Colorado River, which was so far below us that it looked like a silver thread. Numerous branch cañons ran into the big cañon at different points, and the entire scene was wonderful. We lunched at the brink, and then I, being on foot, did not go further, but climbed back to the hotel, which I reached a little before sunset.

"It was a beautiful sight to see the sun set from the piazza of the Bright Angel. We could see the cañon for a stretch of thirty miles, and at the hotel it is thirteen miles to the top of the opposite side, but the air is so clear it seems but a short distance. The walls are of many kinds of rock and of many colors. The commonest is the red sandstone, and as the sun slowly sank below the horizon and the shadows slowly covered the whole scene with a beautiful twilight, the impression was very wonderful."

Blackledge, Ralph

- 477 1902 What my school life is like. In: February St. Nicholas League [SECTION]. St. Nicholas, 29(4) (February): 373.

The writer is 9 years of age.

"My school life has not been like that of most nine-year-old boys. I am not always well, and cannot go to school as my younger sister can. But my papa and mama and other relatives spend much of their time telling me of great men and women who have helped make the world better and wiser, and of wonderful countries, and take me on splendid trips that I may see and learn in that way; and as I remember well, I do not think I am behind other boys my age.

"••• I could not study this last year at all, but I took a good trip, and learned ever so much." [He remarks on the petrified forest and the cliff dwellings near Flagstaff.]

"Then the Grand Cañon. Just think; the river has worn a great crack in the rocky earth thirteen miles wide and six [sic] miles from the top to where the river now is! And the rocky sides of the cañon are in all the tints of the rainbow."

Botsford, C. B.

- 478 1902 The Grand Canyon of the Colorado River. Our Paper (Massachusetts Reformatory, Concord Junction), 18(35) (August 30): 556.

Credited to Boston Transcript.

A mighty anthem to our God,
A grand and holy psalm,
To weary burdened hearts a rest,
To wounded spirits balm.

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

Apart from worldly strife and care,
Apart from fear and sin,
What deep emotions swell and rise,
Make sacred joy within.

Serenity is here enthroned
In calm and lustrous light,
And worship bows in grateful awe,
As in God's holy sight.
A canticle in radiant form,
A lofty hymn of praise,
Te Deum, Gloria in one,
The Mystic Choirs upraise.

Triumphant, glad, Magnificat
That mother nature brings,
While sun and moon and stars rejoice,
Sublime devotion sings.
A vivid symphony in stone,
Of weird, majestic theme,
Whose mosque-like tones and lofty notes,
As crystal fountains gleam.

What notes profounds [sic] to arias arise,
And fill the azure sky,
What strains sublime in echo swell,
Come floating from on high.
A growing wonder and delight,
Whose triumphs never cloy,
On earth for mortals to abide
A never-ending joy.

The mystic choirs at close of day
The evening service hymn,
While souls devout in worship bow,
Along the templed rim!
Sweet messages of love divine
From spaces infinite
Pulse on the mellowed sun-set rays,
Bid all the world good-night.

Boyden, Frank L.

479 1902 (ED., COMPILER) Popular American composers. New York: Herbert H. Taylor, 158 pp.

See "J. S. Ramey", p. 25 and portrait. (James S. Ramey of Salida, Colorado.) "Grand Canyon March" is listed under instrumental works. No details.

Brigham, Nat Maynard [Brigham, Nathaniel Maynard]

480 1902 The witchery of it all. In: The Grand Canyon of Arizona : being a book of words from many pens, about the Grand Canyon of the Colorado River in Arizona. [Chicago]: Santa Fe, Passenger Department, pp. 83-84. [Volume later printings 1906, 1909.]

With editorial introduction; extracts from "his deservedly popular lecture on the Grand Canyon". The usual panoply of God, temples, and colors. "The infinite hush of it all! The mirage of the City Celestial!"

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

Brown, Charles Reynolds

- 481 1902 The life complete. In: Wagner, Harr (ed.), Notable speeches by notable speakers of the greater West. San Francisco: Whitaker and Ray Co., Inc., pp. 270-280. ("Delivered as the baccalaureate address at Stanford University, commencement week, June, 1899.")

Section titled, "Rev. Charles Reynolds Brown", with biographical sketch, p. 270. See p. 274, "[God] called upon men . . . to cast their eyes along the solemn chasms of the Cañon of the Colorado! These are some of God's tributes to our sense of beauty." (ENTIRE NOTE)

Carter, Frank

- 482 1902 The Grand Cañon of Arizona. McGill University Magazine (Montreal), 1(2) (April): 218-230.

"Before attempting to give an impression of the general character of the cañon and its effect on the observer, it will be well to pause and grapple with our old friend the anxious enquirer. 'Stay a moment,' he seems to say; 'I am in Montreal, not in Arizona. Let us begin at the beginning. Where is this cañon of yours precisely? How does one get there? How can one feed and sleep, if haply one does reach the desired haven? How much (to interpose a sordid query) will it cost?' Let us endeavour to answer these enquiries as precisely as may be.

Carter, it seems, has been the only writer who offers a description of the transfer from train to stage, before the tracks had been completed to the canyon.

"When he has travelled for about two days, spinning over the dull fertility of Kansas, winding up and down among the mountains and forests of New Mexico, ploughing a dusty path over the arid plateau of Arizona, he will at length reach a town of no importance named Williams, where, by the way, a really good hotel is much needed. He will wait here till it pleases the gods to send him on towards his destination; as there is only one train a day each way (such at least was the arrangement last autumn), and this can never quite make up its mind from week to week when it means to run, there is an interval of uncertain duration. When the present writer visited the cañon the railway was not quite completed. Out in the forest (the greater part of the journey between Williams and the cañon is through the beautiful Coconino woods), we were shot out down a dusty embankment on to an equally dusty road where we found a 'stage' awaiting us; three very crowded seats, an awning skilfully designed to take off one's hat and jam it over one's eyes in alternate jolts, a succession of lumps, stumps and bumps innumerable, and dust, dust, dust, the prevailing sensation of life,—these formed for eight miles the Purgatorio of our approach. Now the traveller can, with less amusement but considerably more comfort, go all the way in the train. Just before reaching the terminus, just below the hotel, he will catch a mere glimpse, a momentary vision through the trees, of a distant cliff line in pale soft red, which will startle him into 'There it is,' before he is conscious of speaking."

His remarks about the canyon are barely more than descriptions that avoid much in the line of effusive embellishments that might be expected (were they as delightfully crafted as when his hat was removed!) although from out of the blue comes this bit of historical trivia gone wrong: "Let us now return in spirit from these dim spaces of the [geological] past to the present day and the 'Bright Angel' Hotel, the name whereof is due to an Indian legend that an Angel would some day, appear as the deliverer of the tribe, in a chasm opposite on the northern side."

Fairly, he does report towers, temples, and Titans, where at Rowe's Point he surveys and draws from the traveller's literature: "It is said (and the present writer can well believe it) to be the one spot where the expectant sight-seer is never disappointed; the most hardened apostle of the doctrine of nil admirari [Latin, 'no wonder'] is startled and awed into reverential delight. No words and no pictures can give any real idea of the scene. If we turn to the west, we find ourselves in presence of a view of the same general character, yet infinitely different—equally awful, equally beautiful, equally indescribable."

Even the sunset does not draw our writer to the enthusiasms that other writers expect the reader to join with them. Carter's view is peculiarly flatter: "To wait at Rowe's Point till sunset is to see all the beauty and magnificence of the cañon glorified by the glow of evening. The colour grows softer and more unearthly than ever; an ethereal, translucent red like nothing else in the world. The lengthening shadows show up in vivid

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

perspective the contours of the cliffs. The black gorge below grows gloomier each moment. We stay and watch the shadows rise higher and higher up the walls and buttresses, till only the very pinnacles and the white limestone beneath the rim are still brilliant against the growing darkness. At last these, too, are shrouded in night, and only the vague gloom of the abyss is left."

The ride down Bright Angel Trail is described with similar flatness, although the writer points out what no other has done, at least in this simple observation: "An apparently trivial path, starting a yard or two west of the hotel, soon turns abruptly down, and one finds oneself zigzagging down an almost vertical slope. The guide goes first and shows one the way, a superfluous aid when the only alternatives are the track and instant destruction." He does insert all the other descriptions—even by 1902 already worn out by other writers—about the behavior of mules (and their charges) and the condition of the trail, about dismounting at the tough parts, and so on—on to the Colorado River.

"A mile or two of up and down, scrambling on horseback over grassy slopes, and we reach a point under the shade of a great white rock; here we halt for lunch; then, leaving our horses, we proceed to climb down into a subsidiary cañon. It is not a climb in the climber's sense; any mountaineer would walk down it with a camera in one hand and a glass full of champagne in the other; but it is a fairly searching scramble for a few hundreds of feet, none the less. We reach a stream bed and have only to follow this (it is not at all steep) down to the river. At last we are standing on the edge of the Colorado; we look back along the line of the canon down which we have just come and see far above us [a cairn] on the very rim; it is the only part of the south rim visible. In front of us runs the brown river, turbid and swift. We realize vividly the nature of Powell's amazing feat in coming down it in boats. The sense of awful loneliness is overpowering; the towering black cliffs, the distant glimpses of the red of the upper walls, the sarids along the stream, all seem to suggest that we are the only inhabitants left of some strange old world. At last we are reminded that the summit must be reached by daylight, and we start reluctantly back. • • • As the reader will have inferred, the route to the river by this trail is far less exciting than when the tourist descended the 'Old Hance Trail' and had to be let down by ropes over precipices for some hundreds of feet of Archaean rock. We feel we have made acquaintance with the Grand Cañon in its immensity; a climb down and up which has taken the whole day does help one to realize the vastness of scale of this greatest of chasms."

So he returns and concludes the lecture.

"At last comes a time when we must leave the wonder and mystery of it all behind us, and return to the workaday world. What are our main impressions? What do we carry away with us? If we were asked to sum up in a phrase the scenic effect, its clearness, its unreality, its marvellous brilliancy and softness of colour, we should call it a sunset in stone. But the feelings are more impressed than the eye. A sense of awe, almost of terror, at the majesty of it all, overpowers the beholder. And yet with this the beauty, the glamour of such ethereal splendour, takes us captive and uplifts the heart. Indeed no fitter word can be found for the feelings, as one gazes into those depths, than the ancient sacred phrase of reverence 'Sursun Corda' [Latin, 'Lift up your hearts', the opening of the Eucharistic Prayer of Christian liturgies]. Buttresses, cliffs, pinnacles, form a monumental temple chiselled out by God's own water; the history of the remotest past is also the marvel and glory of to-day.

"And so memory turns her back on the greatest wonder of the world."

Caughey, Frank

483 1902 [Remark in "Comments" section.] In: The Grand Canyon of Arizona : being a book of words from many pens, about the Grand Canyon of the Colorado River in Arizona. [Chicago]: Santa Fe, Passenger Department, p. 115. [Volume later printings 1906, 1909.]

"When the great chasm opened before me I caught my breath and murmured, 'My God, there it is!'"

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

Conrard, Harrison

484

1902 The Grand Canyon. Catholic World, 75 (July) (448): 486-491.

Includes a paragraph introduction reproduced from Catholic World, December 1899 (see under Anonymus), and illustrations from various sources.

God said:

"Earth, child of My will,
That spinnest the web of Time
And weavest therefrom the warp and the woof of Life,
A city I would have for thee,
With a place and throne of infinite splendor,
Whither shall come, when ended thy long toil-plodding,
I and my hosts and my legions
To judge of thy fabric.

"Time I have made thy master—
Time who sheareth the flocks for the web wherefrom thou spinnest and weavest—
And him I commission My architect,
Who, with his servants, the artisan-elements,
Out of thy noblest matter,
Thy granite and onyx and bronze,
Thy gold and thy silver,
Shall build the city,
The throne and the palace,
For the ultimate coming
Of thy King and thy Master Eternal."

Saying, He dreamed.
Time, stealing up to the gates of Eternity,
Saw not within,
But near,
Of the dream caught from beyond
An atom-breath,
Saw an atom-gleam,
Heard an atom-measure.
Then, from God's Otherland turning,
Straight into the earth he whirled,
And all about him the artisan-elements calling,
Bade them to hew and to carve and to build.
Counting each punctual moment with patient precision,
Through the ages of eons they hewed and they carved and they builded—
Time and his servants—
Slow working
Out of chaos of matter
The design of the city,
The throne and the palace,
Caught in an atom-breath
An atom-ray,
An atom-sound
From an Infinite Dream.
Vast temples of onyx and gold,
Vast courts of bronze and of silver,
Vast palaces many,
Embrasures, battlements, ramparts,
Minarets, pinnacles, towers,
And walls of enduring granite,

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

In the midst the Throne of the King,
They hewed and they carved and they builded,
Till out of their toil came the Wonderful City,
Vast as empire.

Then rested
Time and his servants,
The artisan-elements.
God saw and smiled;
And over the City Mysterious,
The City of Glory,
From His countenance fell
A miracle of light and of mists,
Of color and glow,
And He said:
"It is well!"

Denison, T. S.

485      1902      The Old Schoolhouse and other poems and conceits in verse. Chicago: T. S. Denison, 128 pp.

See "The Grand Cañon of the Colorado. White City Club, Oct. 14, 1902.", pp. 76-77:

Amazing, measureless immensity!
As if some errant planet, in its flight,
Had torn the vitals of our mundane sphere
And left her wounded in her nakedness,
That puling man through æons yet to come
Might look and feel the Universal Might.
A turbid thread, the Colorado winds
Below, past mountains, in those shudd'ring depths,
Which rear their stony, silent heads aloft
In futile effort to o'ertop that brink—
Great giants that do but impede the sweep
Of that fell cleft where all the cumb'ring dead
Of all the world might find a sepulture.
On either side the desert-plain sweeps up;
And lo! 'tis cut as if by Parca's shears,
In envy of Earth's fructifying breast.
And trembling morals, riveted in awe,
Gaze down upon the many-colored crags,
Where blend the spectrum tints of variant light.
And shadows mingle, an ethereal veil,
As e'en its purpling mantle slowly folds
Around to let the gazer have surcease,
Lest awe should work him some uncanny spell.

Ewing, Henry P.

486      1902      Cataract Canyon, Arizona. In: The Grand Canyon of Arizona : being a book of words from many pens, about the Grand Canyon of the Colorado River in Arizona. [Chicago]: Santa Fe, Passenger Department, pp. 102-105. [Volume later printings 1906, 1909.]

Havasu Canyon.

"Nothing can equal or surpass the vastness of the Grand Canyon of Arizona, but for a beauty and sublimity peculiar to itself the subordinate Cataract Canyon stands alone. • • •

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

"The journey should only be taken by those accustomed to roughing it, as at the best some fatigue may be expected, although ladies have recently made the trip without much inconvenience."

Fitz-Mac [MacCarthy, Fitz-James]

- 487 1902 A rhapsody by "Fitz-Mac". In: The Grand Canyon of Arizona : being a book of words from many pens, about the Grand Canyon of the Colorado River in Arizona. [Chicago]: Santa Fe, Passenger Department. Chicago: Passenger Department, Santa Fe Railroad, pp. 91-96.

Toned down from Fitz-Mac (1895, 1899).

Garland, Hamlin

- 488 1902 The Grand Canyon at night. In: The Grand Canyon of Arizona : being a book of words from many pens, about the Grand Canyon of the Colorado River in Arizona. [Chicago]: Santa Fe, Passenger Department, pp. 61-62. [Volume later printings 1906, 1909.]

"But to know it, to feel its majesty, one should camp in the bottom and watch the sunset and the moonrise while the river marches from its lair like an angry lion."

- 489 1902 John Hance: A study. In: The Grand Canyon of Arizona : being a book of words from many pens, about the Grand Canyon of the Colorado River in Arizona. [Chicago]: Santa Fe, Passenger Department, pp. 106-109. [Volume later printings 1906, 1909.]

"The canyon has a thousand moods when one comes to live with it. John has seen them all. • • •

"If he waits long enough, all the world will come to him. All the poets and scientists and geologists—all the people really worth knowing will come to see old John and his canyon, and I here say deliberately they are both worth while."

Gleed, Charles Sumner

- 490 1902 The canyon by dark and by day. In: The Grand Canyon of Arizona : being a book of words from many pens, about the Grand Canyon of the Colorado River in Arizona. [Chicago]: Santa Fe, Passenger Department, pp. 66-67. [Volume later printings 1906, 1909.]

Apparently a trip to Hance's, "long ago".

"My first arrival at the Grand Canyon of Arizona was at midnight. It was long ago and we went by stage—one of the worst stages ever. Many times we lost our way, and when night fell we had little hope of reaching the canyon until next day. But at midnight we blundered into camp and the consolations of supper and rest were soon ours. About one o'clock we crept out of the little valley • • •

"Slowly we crept up the slope, then over a narrow bridge of rock, and at last, obedient to the guide, put forth our hands. We found an edge, a declivity, an absolute end. We clutched vainly at black space."

In the daylight, though: "what pictures troop before us!" Gibraltar, St. Peter's and St. Paul's, Niagara, the Pyramids, the tower of Pisa, "the great parliament houses of the world", with the Alps, Adirondacks, and Sierras, not to forget undreamed creations of Dante and Homer. "Measures of time intrude and there is no fit ending for the reverie."

Harvard College, Class of 1877, Secretary

- 491 1902 Harvard College Class of 1877 Secretary's report. No. VI. Upon the twenty-fifth anniversary of graduation, 1902. Cambridge, Massachusetts: The Riverside Press.

See "Records of the Class of 1877"; specifically pp. 71-72, Thomas Morrison Sloane: "Upon his last trip to the Pacific coast, in 1901, he mentions as a particularly interesting feature a visit to the Grand Cañon of the Colorado

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

in Arizona, which he describes as a place not yet very commonly visited, but one of the wonders of the world. The scenery is grand, unusual, and extremely impressive." (ENTIRE NOTE) (p. 71).

Higgins, C. A. [Higgins, Charles A.]

- 492 1902 The titan of chasms. In: Titan of chasms : the Grand Canyon of Arizona. Chicago: The Santa Fe, Passenger Department, pp. 3-10. [Booklet later printings, 1904, 1908, 1916.]

Reprints Higgins (1892).

- 493 1902 The titan of chasms. In: The Grand Canyon of Arizona : being a book of words from many pens, about the Grand Canyon of the Colorado River in Arizona. [Chicago]: Santa Fe, Passenger Department, pp. 9-17. [Volume later printings 1906, 1909.]

The only operative annotation for this is that the booklet is the quintessential Santa Fe Railway publication about "its" Grand Canyon. The whole thing (and/or one of its later printings, which vary a bit) must be read through.

Hogaboom, Winfield C.

- 494 1902 To the Grand Canyon on an automobile. Los Angeles Herald Illustrated Magazine, (February 2): 18-20.

- 495 1902 All for want of gasolene. Automobile Topics Illustrated, 3(20) (March 1): 753-755.

Credited to "Winfield Hogaboom in Los Angeles Herald" (Los Angeles Herald Illustrated Magazine, February 2, 1902, pp. 18-20). This is the record of the first automobile trip to the Grand Canyon, at Grandview, made in a Toledo steam-powered car driven by Oliver Lippincott in January 1902. Hogaboom barely mentions the view of the canyon itself, but his story is quoted in its entirety here for the great historical presence this trip holds in the chronicles of Grand Canyon.

"It was our intention to show the entire population of Williams [sic], Arizona, that a trip to the Grand Canyon with modern means of locomotion was only a pleasant afternoon jaunt. As results will show, we omitted one essential precaution. It had been told us that gasolene could be bought at Flagstaff—and we believed it. Perhaps it was not very wise, either, to rely too implicitly in a vehicle which had never been run before over rough ground.

"The machine worked splendidly until we were out of sight of the assembled populace. We were thankful for that. But before we had covered the first ten miles it got to acting up, and our chauffeur said that the trailer was bearing down too hard on the hind axle. So we got off, unloaded the outfit from the trailer and fixed it in such a manner that it couldn't bear down too hard, and when we got through with that job and got the baggage and ourselves aboard again, darkness had fallen upon us.

"It was a cold night—cold for us thin-blooded Californians, at least—and we suffered some. After about two hours of this thing, Doyle, the guide, suggested a halt. This was a disappointment to all of us, for we had promised the people of Flagstaff that we would make the whole journey to the Grand Canyon that night and, what is more, we had really expected to do so. And to prove to them that we really expected to, we had made no provision for a stop at night, and had no eatables along.

"But it is one thing to say that you are going to run an automobile through a wild, uninhabited country at night, when the moon is off duty, and another thing to do it. After a short consultation we decided to stop. Right here our first streak of good luck came to us. Doyle reckoned that Muderbach's cabin was somewhere in the vicinity. We bunked with the cowboys on the floor of the cabin, and were up long before daylight and had breakfast. The automobile was frozen stiff. A long time was required to thaw it out, and a valuable portion of our supply of fuel was used. But we thought little of that, for were we not going to be at Berry's place at the Rim by 2 o'clock of that day at the latest?

"When we finally did get started that morning from the trail below the cabin we moved off splendidly. For ten miles or more we scooted through the forest like sliding down the chutes. It was a glorious morning and a glorious ride. We had just descended a small hill where the trail was rough with stones, and the driver had given

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

her more steam as we struck the level and good going again, when something popped, and instantly we were enveloped in a cloud of steam. Our water gauge had burst, and the valves had failed to work. We lost all our steam, and, I am afraid, our hope of heaven, right there.

"We had now used all the gasolene brought from Los Angeles, which had been contained in the two feed tanks under the seat, and were obliged to refill the tanks with oil purchased in Flagstaff, and alleged to be gasolene. When we started again it was plain to be seen that this fuel was not going to give the amount of heat required to keep up sufficient steam.

"We crawled along for several hours, making about three miles an hour. Then we decided to abandon the trailer with its load of baggage, water and alleged gasolene and attempt to make the canyon some time during the night. So everything not absolutely necessary was left right there, and all four of us piled onto the machine in a heap, and she started. She started well, and kept up a good rate of speed for a mile or more. Then, all at once, we heard a sharp, metallic click, and in another instant a harsh, rasping sound, and we knew that our sprocket chain had parted. An automobile always gets discouraged and quits when its sprocket chain parts.

"Three hours later the chain was mended. It was now nearly 12 o'clock at night. We were out on the open plain. The night was bitter cold, and the wind blew right up under our coat-tails. Doyle reckoned there was a bunch of cedar about four miles ahead where we could find shelter. After two hours more, with two walking ahead to discover the way, we pulled into the bunch of cedars which Doyle had reckoned was there.

"At daylight we were up and ready for breakfast. For breakfast we each had a look at the automobile and a smoke. No one of us said anything about being hungry or even thirsty. There was a little dirty ice in the bottom of the tank and we melted some of it, but it didn't taste good, so we took another smoke and let it go at that.

"The inspection of the automobile revealed the fact that there was just a little gasolene left in the tanks and a little water in the boiler. Doyle reckoned it was about eighteen miles to Berry's.

"We started the fire under the boilers and finally got up a little steam. Chauffeur Lippincott worried the automobile along for about two miles, and the rest of us walked. Finally at the end of two miles we were obliged to abandon the machine. Eighteen miles isn't such a long walk; but we were hungry and thirsty, and weak from lack of sleep and other things.

"At noon we sighted Skinner's cabin. On the cabin was a sign that set forth that it was six and one-eighth miles to the Grand Canyon. The man who put up that sign ought to be killed with a dull hatchet. Two members of the party, Chauffeur Lippincott and Journalist Chapman, were petered out. They could go no farther. Doyle and myself agreed to make the remaining distance to Berry's and send out a relief expedition. Earlier in the day Lippincott had stated positively that he would give $5 for a drink of water. By degrees he had raised the amount until it now stood at $500. Chapman had offered $50 for a ham sandwich with no takers, and Doyle reckoned that he would be willing to give more than that for a good steak, if he had it.

"Doyle's stomach wasn't acting right. It probably thought his throat had been cut, or something like that. The two of us had covered scarcely half a mile when he collapsed utterly and gave up the struggle. I left him there by the lava rocks, wrestling with his stomach and went on alone. After I had gone about eight miles I began to think of that sign on Skinner's cabin. 'Six and one-eighth miles to the Grand Canyon.' About four o'clock I had covered eighteen of that 'six and one-eighth miles.'

"An hour later I looked ahead. I could see a break in the trees. I was on the edge of a clearing of some kind, anyhow, and the terrible monotony and the awful silence of the forest were to be broken at last. With renewed energy I wobbled on, and came to a little hill, beyond the summit of which there were no trees. I had grown to hate trees.

"Slowly I crawled up the little hill and stood upon the crest. Then I saw why there were no trees beyond the hill. Beyond the hill was the grandest and most awe-inspiring sight in the world—the Grand Canyon of Arizona.

"Twenty minutes later I was at the Grand View Hotel, and landlord Berry was asking what I wanted.

"'All I want is water and food and the address of the man who put up that sign on Skinner's cabin,' I said modestly.

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

"That night about 8 o'clock the relief expedition, consisting of Landlord Berry and a four-horse team, returned to the hotel on the Rim, bringing Chauffeur Lippincott, Journalist Chapman and Guide Doyle, the sole survivors. At 9 o'clock we ate enough to have driven any landlord but Pete Berry into fits, and at 10 o'clock we retired.

"Next day Berry and I drove over to Bright Angel Hotel and telephoned for gasoline. The day after that the gasoline came.

"Saturday morning before daylight, Doyle, Chapman and myself drove over to Apez [Apex], 16 miles from Grand View, and took the train for home. Everyone of us regretted that we would be unable to make the return trip from the Grand Canyon to Flagstaff.

"Several days later Mr. Lippincott made the return trip from the Grand View Hotel to Flagstaff, 67 miles in seven hours.

"I am still searching for the man who put up that sign, 'Six and one-eighth miles to the Grand Canyon.'"

James, George Wharton

- 496        1902        North Rim of the Grand Canyon. Los Angeles Sunday Herald, (Illustrated Supplement), (October 26).

Jordan, David Starr

- 497        1902        The land of patience. In: The Grand Canyon of Arizona : being a book of words from many pens, about the Grand Canyon of the Colorado River in Arizona. [Chicago]: Santa Fe, Passenger Department, p. 88. [Volume later printings 1906, 1909.]

Reprints Jordan (1898).

Lummis, Charles F.

- 498        1902        The greatest thing in the world. In: Titan of chasms : the Grand Canyon of Arizona. Chicago: The Santa Fe, Passenger Department, pp. 23-32. [Volume reprintings 1904, 1905, 1908, 1916.]

The same title as that of Lummis (1895) but a revised and expanded text in the same vein.

"'The greatest thing in the world.' That is a large phrase and an overworked one, and hardened travelers do not take it lightly upon the tongue. Noticeably it is most glibly in use with those but lately, and for the first time, wandered beyond their native state or county, and as every province has its own local brag of biggest things, the too credulous tourist will find a superlative everywhere. And superlatives are unsafe without wide horizons of comparison.

"Yet in every sort there is, of course, somewhere 'the biggest thing in the world' of its kind. It is a good word, when spoken in season and not abused in careless ignorance. • • •

"At the head of the list stands the Grand Canyon of the Colorado; whether it is the 'greatest wonder of the world' depends a little on our definition of 'wonder.' Possibly it is no more wonderful than the fact that so tiny a fraction of the people who confess themselves the smartest in the world have ever seen it. As a people we dodder abroad to see scenery incomparably inferior.

"But beyond peradventure it is the greatest chasm in the world, and the most superb. Enough globe-trotters have seen it to establish that fact. Many have come cynically prepared to be disappointed; to find it overdrawn and really not so stupendous as something else. It is, after all, a hard test that so be-bragg'd a wonder must endure under the critical scrutiny of them that have seen the earth and the fullness thereof. But I never knew the most self-satisfied veteran traveler to be disappointed in the Grand Canyon, or to patronize it."

After reciting the litany of world geographical features that could be cast into the canyon, Lummis sums, "All this, which is literally true, is a mere trifle of what might be said in trying to fix a standard of comparison for the Grand Canyon. But I fancy there is no standard adjustable to the human mind. You may compare all you will—eloquently and from wide experience, and at last all similes fail. The Grand Canyon is just the Grand Canyon,

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

and that is all you can say. I never have seen anyone who was prepared for it. I never have seen anyone who could grasp it in a week's hard exploration; nor anyone, except some rare Philistine, who could even think he had grasped it. I have seen people rave over it; better people struck dumb with it, even strong men who cried over it; but I have never yet seen the man or woman that expected it. • • •

"It is sudden as a well. • • •

"It is like a dissection of the whole cosmogony."

At last, pandering to the Santa Fe Railway, publisher of the volume [but compare Lummis's perspectives in the next item, below], "That the canyon is not 'too hard' is perhaps sufficiently indicated by the fact that I have taken thither ladies and children and men in their seventies, when the easiest way to get there was by a 70-mile stage ride, and that at six years old my little girl walked all the way from rim to bottom of canyon and came back on a horse the same day, and was next morning ready to go on a long tramp along the rim."

499 1902 A week of wonders. III. Out West, 16 (January): 19-24. [Item signed "C. F. L."]

The writer apparently accompanied a visit by the president and vice-presidents of the Santa Fe Railway who were—a pity—examining the site for a large hotel at Grand Canyon.

"At this date I have no intention to add another to the failures that have been made in trying to describe the Greatest Thing in the World. The Grand Cañon of the Colorado has already been pecked at—how ineffectually, doubtless all of us know who have tried; at least, those who have tried many times. All one can say, after nearly a score of years' acquaintance, is: 'It is the biggest thing God ever did. Go look at it.' But it may be worth while to add to the innumerable list a few fresh pictures [photographs on pp. 20-23]—as incompetent as words are to grasp that incomparable chasm, that Geology-on-End, that Alphabetical Index of World-Building—and a few lines of cold information.

"The 'Santa Fé' railroad now runs (by a branch from Williams) clear to the Grand Cañon. There are a good many of us who deem this a pity; who think anyone too lazy to ride—or walk—sixty miles to see the crowning wonder of the world doesn't deserve to see it. But the Times hold over us; and we are willing to forgive the unearned sightseers—if only they will refrain from squealing, as they stand on the very brink of that Painted Abyss, 'Oh, ain't it pretty!' Them, we would conscientiously shove over the rim. • • •

"The natural call of the wayfaring Philistine had been for a hotel smack on the brink; and an artist had painted a 'plan' with the caravansary dominating the cañon. But he was too soon. It was recognized by the party that in the first place this would be an impudence—'You can't slap God Almighty in the face like that,' as was said in the discussion—and that the element of surprise, so potent in literature and art, should not be forgotten here; particularly after the lesson taught at the Cañon-point reached from Flagstaff. There the rough woodsman John Hance had feeling enough to put his camp in a beautiful hollow. You came on the stage and entered the hotel with hardly a hint that just beyond was Something different from the park-like pineries of the last dozen miles. And from the hotel you climbed a little slope for a hundred yards or so—and on a sudden, unforeseen as death tomorrow, the earth fell away before your feet and you were upon the very brink of the noblest scene in the world.

"Very much it will be at Bright Angel. From the railroad there is no hint of the cañon; and the hotel, instead of sniffing in the face of Eternity, will rest respectfully among the eloquent pines a little down the hollow. One cannot lie in bed and command the showman; nor sit on the veranda and expectorate into the gorge. Anyone who doesn't deem the cañon worth walking a few rods to see it—needn't see it." [Oh well.]

Miller, Joaquin

500 1902 A new wonder of the world. In: The Grand Canyon of Arizona : being a book of words from many pens, about the Grand Canyon of the Colorado River in Arizona. [Chicago]: Santa Fe, Passenger Department, pp. 58-60. [Volume later printings 1906, 1909.]

From Miller (1901).

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

Monroe, Harriet

- 501 1902 Its ineffable beauty. In: The Grand Canyon of Arizona : being a book of words from many pens, about the Grand Canyon of the Colorado River in Arizona. [Chicago]: Santa Fe, Passenger Department, pp. 54-57. [Volume later printings 1906, 1909.]

Follows Monroe (1899).

Moran, Thomas

- 502 1902 American art and American scenery. In: The Grand Canyon of Arizona : being a book of words from many pens, about the Grand Canyon of the Colorado River in Arizona. [Chicago]: Santa Fe, Passenger Department, pp. 85-87. [Volume later printings 1906, 1909.]

Muir, John

- 503 1902 The Grand Cañon of the Colorado. Century Illustrated Monthly Magazine, 65(1) (November): 2, 107-116.

Muir's first extensive remarks on the canyon.

"When I first heard of the Santa Fé trains running to the edge of the Grand Cañon of Arizona, I was troubled with thoughts of the disenchantment likely to follow. But last winter, when I saw those trains crawling along through the pines of the Cocanini Forest and close up to the brink of the chasm at Bright Angel, I was glad to discover that in the presence of such stupendous scenery they are nothing. The locomotives and trains are mere beetles and caterpillars, and the noise they make is as little disturbing as the hooting of an owl in the lonely woods.

"In a dry, hot, monotonous forested plateau, seemingly boundless, you come suddenly and without warning upon the abrupt edge of a gigantic sunken landscape of the wildest, most multitudinous features, and those features, sharp and angular, are made out of flat beds of limestone and sandstone forming a spiry, jagged, gloriously colored mountain-range countersunk in a level gray plain. It is a hard job to sketch it even in scrawniest outline; and try as I may, not in the least sparing myself I cannot tell the hundredth part of the wonders of its features—the side-cañons, gorges, alcoves, cloisters, and amphitheaters of vast sweep and depth, carved in its magnificent walls; the throng of great architectural rocks it contains resembling castles, cathedrals, temples, and palaces, towered and spired and painted, some of them nearly a mile high, yet beneath one's feet. All this, however, is less difficult than to give any idea of the impression of wild, primeval beauty and power one receives in merely gazing from its brink. The view down the gulf of color and over the rim of its wonderful wall, more than any other view I know, leads us to think of our earth as a star with stars swimming in light, every radiant spire pointing the way to the heavens. • • • "

One might hope that the likes of John Muir would embark on novel impressions, but instead he slips on the usual outerwear of natural and human architecture, all of them then lost when "tumbled into" the great canyon; even having to fall back on a quote of "a noted writer". And so it goes for a couple of pages, even harkening back to his more comfortable Sierras, though in all fairness to the canyon he declares it "nature's own capital city". But first, more architecture, again, before settling into more reflective prose.

"I have observed scenery-hunters of all sorts getting first views of yosemites, glaciers, White Mountain ranges, etc. Mixed with the enthusiasm which such scenery naturally excites, there is often weak gushing, and many splutter aloud like little waterfalls. Here, for a few moments at least, there is silence, and all are in dead earnest, as if awed and hushed by an earthquake—perhaps until the cook cries 'Breakfast!' or the stable-boy 'Horses are ready!' Then the poor unfortunates, slaves of regular habits, turn quickly away, gasping and muttering as if wondering where they had been and what had enchanted them."

He notes the roadways to places along the rim, but Muir finally arrives at the canyon:

"Instead of thus riding in dust with the crowd, more will be gained by going quietly afoot along the rim at different times of day and night, free to observe the vegetation, the fossils in the rocks, the seams beneath

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

overhanging ledges once inhabited by Indians, and to watch the stupendous scenery in the changing lights and shadows, clouds, showers, and storms. One need not go hunting the so-called 'points of interest.' The verge anywhere, everywhere, is a point of interest beyond one's wildest dreams. • • •

"But the colors, the living, rejoicing colors, chanting morning and evening in chorus to heaven! Whose brush or pencil, however lovingly inspired, can give us these? And if paint is of no effect, what hope lies in pen-work?"

He spins through sunset and sunrise breathlessly, then speaks of the daytime scenes—and storms!

"To every gulch and gorge on its favorite ground is given a passionate torrent, roaring, replying to the rejoicing lightning—stones, tons in weight, hurrying away as if frightened, showing something of the way Grand Cañon work is done. • • • Sometimes, as one sits gazing from a high, jutting promontory, the sky all clear, showing not the slightest wisp or penciling, a bright band of cumuli will appear suddenly, coming up the cañon in single file, as if tracing a well-known trail, passing in review, each in turn darting its lances and dropping its shower, making a row of little vertical rivers in the air above the big brown one. Others seem to grow from mere points, and fly high above the cañon, yet following its course for a long time, noiseless, as if hunting, then suddenly darting lightning at unseen marks, and hurrying on. Or they loiter here and there as if idle, like laborers out of work, waiting to be hired."

Muir visited the canyon in January hoping to see it in winter garb. All was dry, but a couple of days later he rejoiced:

"The first flakes and crystals began to fly about noon, sweeping straight up the middle of the cañon, and swirling in magnificent eddies along the sides. Gradually the hearty swarms closed their ranks, and all the cañon was lost in gray gloom except a short section of the wall and a few trees beside us, which looked glad with snow in their needles and about their feet as they leaned out over the gulf. Suddenly the storm opened with magical effect to the north over the cañon of Bright Angel Creek, inclosing a sunlit mass of the cañon architecture, spanned by great white concentric arches of cloud like the bows of a silvery aurora. Above these and a little back of them was a series of upboiling purple clouds, and high above all, in the background, a range of noble cumuli towered aloft like snow-laden mountains, their pure pearl bosses flooded with sunshine. The whole noble picture, calmly glowing, was framed in thick gray gloom, which soon closed over it; and the storm went on, opening and closing until night covered all. • • •

At a "jutting point about eighteen miles east of Bright Angel and one thousand feet higher", "Most tourists make out to be in a hurry even here; therefore their few days or hours would be best spent on the promontories nearest the hotel. Yet a surprising number go down the Bright Angel trail to the brink of the inner gloomy granite gorge overlooking the river. • • •

"By the Bright Angel trail the last fifteen hundred feet of the descent to the river has to be made afoot down the gorge of Indian Garden Creek. Most of the visitors do not like this part, and are content to stop at the end of the horse-trail and look down on the dull-brown flood from the edge of the Indian Garden Plateau. By the new Hance trail, excepting a few daringly steep spots, you can ride all the way to the river, where there is a good spacious camp-ground in a mesquit-grove [sic]."

In fact, it is not Bright Angel, but Hance's trail along which Muir dallies at length. Here the naturalist gives us a flora, fully bloomed from his pen, an appreciation of the growing things of the canyon, with pointed remarks on the cacti; then a couple of pages on American Indians who had lived [sic] here, and about the animals who too live in the canyon. He reflects, looking toward his comfortable mountains:

"Here at Hance's river-camp or a few miles above it brave Powell and his brave men passed their first night in the cañon on their adventurous voyage of discovery thirty-three years ago. They faced a thousand dangers, open or hidden, now in their boats gladly sliding down swift, smooth reaches, now rolled over and over in backcombing surges of rough, roaring cataracts, sucked under in eddies, swimming like beavers, tossed and beaten like castaway drift—stout-hearted, undaunted, doing their work through it all. After a month of this they floated smoothly out of the dark, gloomy, roaring abyss into light and safety two hundred miles below. As the flood rushes past us, heavy-laden with desert mud, we naturally think of its sources, its countless silvery branches outspread on thousands of snowy mountains along the crest of the continent, and the life of them, the beauty of them, their history and romance. • • •

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

"Our warm cañon camp is also a good place to give a thought to the glaciers which still exist at the heads of the highest tributaries. • • •

"Walking quietly about in the alleys and byways of the Grand Cañon City, we learn something of the way it was made; and all must admire effects so great from means apparently so simple: rain striking light hammer-blows or heavier in streams, with many rest Sundays; soft air and light, gentle sappers and miners, toiling forever; the big river sawing the plateau asunder, carrying away the eroded and ground waste, and exposing the edges of the strata to the weather; rain torrents sawing cross-streets and alleys, exposing the strata in the same way in hundreds of sections, the softer, less resisting beds weathering and receding faster, thus undermining the harder beds, which fall, not only in small weathered particles, but in heavy sheer-cleaving masses, assisted down from time to time by kindly earthquakes, rain torrents rushing the fallen material to the river, keeping the wall rocks constantly exposed. Thus the cañon grows wider and deeper. So also do the side-cañons and amphitheatres, while secondary gorges and cirques gradually isolate masses of the promontories, forming new buildings, all of which are being weathered and pulled and shaken down while being built, showing destruction and creation as one. We see the proudest temples and palaces in stateliest attitudes, wearing their sheets of detritus as royal robes, shedding off showers of red and yellow stones like trees in autumn shedding their leaves, going to dust like beautiful days to night, proclaiming as with the tongues of angels the natural beauty of death. • • • "

The whole of the region, he concludes, is "a grand geological library—a collection of stone books covering thousands of miles of shelving tier on tier conveniently arranged for the student. And with what wonderful scriptures are their pages filled—myriad forms of successive floras and faunas, lavishly illustrated with colored drawings, carrying us back into the midst of the life of a past infinitely remote. And as we go on and on, studying this old, old life in the light of the life beating warmly about us, we enrich and lengthen our own."

- 504 1902 Clouds in the Grand Canon. Friends' Intelligencer (Philadelphia), 59(45) ("Eleventh Month 8" [November 8]): 717-718.

Credited to "John Muir, in the Century." (see above).

[Nelson, Cleland Kinloch]

- 505 1902 Diary of the Bishop. In: Journal of the Eightieth Annual Convention of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the Diocese of Georgia, held at August, Georgia, May 14th, 15th and 16th, 1902. Together with the constitution and canons of the diocese. Macon, Georgia: Press of The J. W. Burke Co., pp. 66-75.

Item not signed, but the bishop's name is indicated on title-page verso. See p. 69 for October 1901: "26. At the Grand Canyon, Arizona. Celebrated the Holy Eucharist in the sitting-room of the hotel, with an attendance of twenty-four church people." (ENTIRE NOTE)

Patchell, W. T.

- 506 1902 The Grand Canon and its unspeakable grandeurs; Arizona's marvelous gorge, surpassing the Yellowstone and the Yosemite. The Congregationalist and Christian World, 87(40) (October): 475-477.

Pastor Patchell takes a while to get around to finding the spirit of the canyon.

"To reach the Grand Cañon of the Colorado one must leave the Sante Fé [sic] overland train at Williams, Ariz., and there take a 'stub' car which runs sixty miles to the rim. • • • "

Patchell takes time to describe the town and the time spent by passengers as they milled around. ". . . we look away to the north, for the spell is upon us and we are wondering if it is possible that after our long trip over plain and mountain, prairie and desert, there yet remains a climax to our experiences in that inconceivable gorge.

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

"Stationed at the Grand Cañon of the Colorado is a member of the United States Geological Survey, Mr. François E. Matthes, who is mapping the region. The other day, standing on the southern rim, he was looking across the cañon away over the Painted Desert, that land of color and mystery. His attention was drawn to a 'sand devil' forming. Slowly—for the distance was great—it built up toward the bright sky a colossal pillar of sand. He had just been taking measurements from the rim down into the gorge. He turned his instrument on the sand column and against the intersection it hung in the air more than 3,000 feet high. It was perhaps two or three hundred feet thick, its top flowering out wide and beautiful. In front of it a second one formed half its height, and these two prodigious Children of the Desert moved slowly across the weird and unknown land . . .

"One needs to know somewhat of these things in approaching the Grand Cañon; for all of the mysteries of Arizona this cañon is the greatest and most startling.

"The Bright Angel Hotel on the rim is worth while because of the men who are there. The Sante Fé Railroad is planning to build a beautiful hotel, with every modern convenience, but I suspect they will have a hotel man run it, and he will not be Martin Buggelu [sic, Buggeln], the proprietor of the Bright Angel, for he is not a hotel man. He is an Arizona pioneer; tall, straight as a poplar, reserved, calm, he is one of the men you would follow across the trackless wastes, believing that he would bring you safely through. And I cannot think that Captain Hance would sit in the office of a new hotel and relate his weird experiences. He has passed through many strange adventures, and if you are simple and sincere you may sit and listen, as with soft, drawling voice he relates his tales. • • •

"In the darkness I stood trying to pierce its depths. Thirty feet behind me stood the little hotel; lights were gleaming, voices sounding cheerily, but before me, beneath me, was a hopeless void, black, impenetrable; and I knew that another step would carry me down, down, to unfathomable depths. In the morning, under a searching light that penetrated and exposed every hidden thing, I saw it, and yet I knew I did not see it. I saw—thirteen miles away they said—the opposite wall, a cross section of the earth laid bare. It was absolutely devoid of vegetation and the strata lay exposed in fine horizontal lines, each clearly marked by its own rich color.

"I saw Bright Angel Creek breaking down into the lower gorge, and below me and fading away into the east a weltering chaos of upturned rock. Blind force had driven a plowshare a mile deep into the shuddering earth, and into the furrow had hurled indifferently a chain of naked mountains. These weird hills were decorated, not with trees and shrubs and flowers, but painted in broad buffs and browns and yellows and greens and flaming scarlet, and one knew not what to do with the strange impressions made. I was abashed, humiliated; again and again I turned away into the forest, for I had nothing in common with this. I had no apparatus mental or spiritual with which to grasp it.

"Each year when I leave my work to go into the mountains I suffer the dread fear of having lost the capacity to feel nature, but always, when my weariness has passed away and I have done adequate penance, she forgives my sin and washes away the stain. But she never abates one jot the punishment. Standing on Rowe's Point, a promontory which carries the rim far into the cañon and from which one may look up and down its length on either side, I was made to feel deeply my guilt. All about me voices were whispering; before me splendors unsurpassed were unfolding, and I but ears to hear and eyes to see. The view was appalling, unearthly; I felt neither its grandeur nor its shining pomp, but only nature, indifferently revealing all that which she so carefully hides at other times. It was the bare stone heart exposed, with the pitiful web of verdure, in which we so much rejoice, all carelessly torn aside. Here was reality and the ultimate fact. • • • "

The author languishes for a while on well-known mountains thrown into the gorge, and the geology of it all.

He looks toward "the black, terrible granite of the inner gorge. I can see from where I stand the sinuous line of that hidden chasm, and far in the distance the river, metallic and absolutely still, although they tell me that it rages and thunders in wrath."

He writes of the "stately tombs" of Vishnu, Brahma, and "Siva" (Shiva); and acknowledges "the Assyrian hosts of heaven, the hosts of Egypt, and pantheons of Greece and of Rome", all buried. "There on yonder blazing rock Prometheus hung in endless torture; through that black inner gorge Dante wandered sorrowing . . ."

Looking westward, "Instead of overwhelming rock I am looking to realms of light and glory, into a sea of purple haze, where deep shadows lie softly in the depths, where every butte and temple and promontory is

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

melted into cloudforms, while through the mist the glarinig colors now burn warm and tender. • • • It is a dream, a vision, a hope and a revelation of God . . . and the tears spring forth, for God himself has come to me at last and I am in my Father's house."

Peabody, Henry G.

- 507 1902 Glimpses of the Grand Canyon of Arizona. Kansas City, Missouri: Fred Harvey, 4 pp., 35 plates. [Variant 1: Two-color imprint of Grand Canyon on cover, gilt title. Variant 2: black-and-white photo laid on cover.]

Rouse, W. J.

- 508 1902 Bright Angel Trail. In: Picken, Lillian H. (compiler), The Crane fifth reader. Topeka, Kansas: Crane and Co., pp. 324-329.

This volume has been compiled for the instruction of school-age users in reading and for spoken articulation. Rouse's text is reproduced here in its entirety (omitting the sequential number of each paragraph).

"The beauties of Yosemite and the marvels of Yellowstone Park have been described and talked about by thousands of tourists who have visited them from year to year, but the Grand Canyon of the Colorado has been comparatively unknown.

"The Grand Canyon isn't a mere chasm. It is a series of tremendous chasms. Distances are bewildering. The nearest point of the north wall of the canyon in the clear sunlight looks to be about a mile away. It is twelve miles in an air line, at its nearest point. One is told that the depth is a mile and a third, or more than 7000 feet, but cannot realize it.

"The railroad, originally started to tap the rich mines eighteen miles from the canyon, was continued to within ten miles of the rim, where it stopped for some months. A dismounted freight car marks this point to-day, and from it started stage parties to Bright Angel trail, on the canyon's edge. Recently, however, the rails reached the terminus, and now passengers may leave transcontinental trains at Williams, and in three hours be comfortably installed in the oddest little frontier hotel in America, actually overlooking the Grand Canyon.

"I arrived at the canyon at 10 o'clock at night, and, of course, wanted to see the gorge at once. It was moonless, but starlight [sic]. There is a heavy white fence in front of the Bright Angel hotel, fairly on the verge of the chasm. I crept up to it cautiously, and with a creepy sensation I shook the fence to make sure that it was rigid. Then I peered over into the Stygian depths below. The sensation was almost appalling. I found myself pressing hard against the heavy fence, peering fiercely into the blackness, my ears buzzing in the oddest sort of way as I listened for some sound of something—anything, to come from the depths of that awful pit. My foot touched a stone, and I tossed it over. It never struck, or if it did, it was so far away that the sound never came back to me. I tried another, and sought to figure out mentally the shape and contour of those black walls, visible for only a few feet below the rim. But only silence came back from the second stone—such a silence as was overpowering, and I turned to the brightly lighted doorway of the hotel.

"Of all the impressions I gained during the visit, I remember most distinctly the experience of peering into the bottomless blackness. To the tourist who arrives there in the night, I say, see the blackness first; the brilliancy of the daylight scene will show you what you did not see, but after having viewed it in the sunlight, the lesson of the darkness can never come.

"And the next impression will be gained when the tourist enters the reception-room of the Bright Angel hotel, at night. Built entirely of huge pine logs, with rooms perhaps thirty feet or more square, a blazing fire of great pine-knots in the open hearth, the walls and floors completely covered with richly colored Navajo Indian rugs and decorated with every conceivable kind of Indian ornament, the place is the most hospitable looking room I ever entered. If one has that awful sense of utter insignificance that may be gained by one look into that terrible place just outside, the hotel will have an added charm never to be forgotten. The building was erected five years ago as a miner's camp, by the famous Bucky O'Neil [O'Neill], prospector, miner, sheriff, and Rough Rider, who gave his life for his flag at El Caney. Those great logs were lifted into place by his own hands, and

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

under that wide-caved roof Bucky O'Neil spent many a pleasant evening with his hardy companions, talking over their prospects of fortune when they should sell their valuable mines near the canyon, and when they should see a line of railroad built to its brim. For Bucky O'Neil was the instigator of the present railroad, and was one of the most active spirits in its promotion.

"In the hotel office when I arrived sat a group of tourists, listening to the entrancing stories of an old man, who sat near the big fire, speaking in slow, modulated tones, telling stories of adventure that covered a third of a century in the wilds of the West. He is old Captain John Hance, famous as a guide ever since the Grand Canyon has been visited by travelers, who prides himself upon the fact that in all the years of guiding he has never suffered an accident to befall one of his party. 'Uncle John' is a part of the Grand Canyon. To visit the canyon and not see him, would be to miss one of its rarest treats.

"With the first peep of dawn I looked out upon the awakening chasm from my window. The first rays of the morning sun were lighting up the northern rim, showing its rich colorings of red and blue and gold, while here and there, peeping up from beds of inky blackness, in the middle ground, were chalky pinnacles, based with brilliant red, and between them somber darkness in the chaotic mass of canyons where the light had not yet reached. The north wall of the canyon is 1200 feet higher than the south, and therefore lights up first, and as the dawn creeps down and down, still deeper and deeper into the vast depths of blackness, bringing out the roseate detail of the cliffs and pinnacles and canyon walls one after another, it is like the unfolding of a monster panorama. The little peaks of chalky rock with bases of red now develop into gigantic mountains miles in circumference, terraced from pinnacle to bottom as if by a master sculptor's hand. New peaks are pushing their pointed crests through the darkness thousands of feet farther down, and still the bottom of the frightful abyss is hidden. Suddenly the sun attains the level of the wall at O'Neil's Point, and a flood of light is turned into the canyon. Fleeting patches of white vapor chase one another from point to point, melting away into nothing as the warm rays penetrate the deeper gorges. In an hour the entire vast picture is opened up, and one stands in open-mouthed amazement at the view.

"The tourist should spend at least two full days at the canyon. Assuming that the first day be devoted to sightseeing from the rim, he will want to make two short drives. Of these the first is to O'Neil's Point, so named because Bucky O'Neil camped there and viewed the spectacle, times without number. This point looks to be about half a dozen blocks from the Bright Angel hotel. It is two and three-quarters miles. The bold promontory juts out into the canyon half a mile, and as the light is from beyond it, or toward the east in the forenoon, it is best to go there then.

"Thirty miles down the river the intricate system of canyons between the two inclosing walls stands out as boldly as the detail on a relief map. And for a still greater distance in the other direction the panorama unfolds itself, carrying the view far beyond the old Hance trail and Grand View Hotel, to a point where the canyon turns abruptly northward.

"The other trip along the rim is toward the west, from the hotel, to Rowe Point, distant three miles. This is undoubtedly the most favored spot from which to view the Grand Canyon. Thirty miles away, but appearing only two or three, is Point Sublime, where the Geological Survey has erected the only monument along the canyon walls. Powell Plateau, a flat-topped mountain perhaps twenty-five miles long and half as wide, rises from the bottom of the canyon which completely surrounds it. It is a mountain nearly 7000 feet high, every side of which is a sheer precipice. The Colorado river here shows itself,—a silvery streak at the bottom of a black gorge of granite, apparently not wider than an ordinary mill-race. It has been measured, however, and is known to be 300 feet wide, and the shimmering white is caused by immense boiling waves and whirlpools, that swirl through that chasm at a rate of twenty miles an hour.

"Before going down Bright Angel trail to the brink of the river gorge, let us make a few comparisons as to distances and heights. If all the cable inclines in Kansas City were linked in one, they would reach only to the bottom of the red strata above the granite gorge. If the Great Northern Hotel in Chicago were placed at the water's edge, twenty additional structures of the same height would only reach the level of the south rim; and if Niagara Falls were in the bottom of the river gorge, there would be room for forty-one more of them, if the upper one were on the level with the rim. If Washington monument, the tallest bit of masonry in the United States, were at the river-level, just ten more of those monuments would reach the lowest brink.

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

"Bright Angel trail is the only road to the bottom, from the hotel. There are but four places in the 220 miles of canyon, where one can ascend its walls. The trail has been built with great care and at vast expense, and is a zigzag road, comfortable for horses or pedestrians all the way, and wide enough to be perfectly safe. It leads to the middle mesa, upon which are the Indian gardens, and at the end of which, five miles in an air line from the hotel, is the brink of the river chasm, which itself is 1500 feet deep. A patch of several acres of green on this mesa looks like alfalfa. It is a willow grove, the trees of which average twenty feet in height. Old John Hance himself accompanies all parties to the bottom of the canyon. Ladies are provided with divided skirts for riding, and all ride astride. Sidesaddles are not permitted on the trail.

"I have seen almost all of the famed scenic resorts on the American continent, but, after having seen the Grand Canyon from its present point of view, there is nothing among them comparable to this greatest of scenic wonders, so vast, so appalling in its magnitude."

Sill, Louise Morgan

- 509 1902 [Verse in "Comments" section.] In: The Grand Canyon of Arizona : being a book of words from many pens, about the Grand Canyon of the Colorado River in Arizona. [Chicago]: Santa Fe, Passenger Department, p. 114. [Volume reprinted 1906, 1909.]

Credited to Harper's Weekly (see Sill, 1901).

Smith, Edwin Burritt

- 510 1902 As seen by a layman. In: The Grand Canyon of Arizona : being a book of words from many pens, about the Grand Canyon of the Colorado River in Arizona. [Chicago]: Santa Fe, Passenger Department. Chicago: Passenger Department, Santa Fe Railroad, pp. 63-65. [Volume reprinted 1906, 1909.]

An "average professional man", Smith is a "layman" by virtue of a first visit to the Grand Canyon. Unremarkably written with the clinical gaze and judicious bias of a lawyer from the East; more suited for a geography, really. The editor's introduction appears first.

"Mr. Edwin Burritt Smith is a prominent Chicago lawyer. He is also a close student of public affairs and by tongue and pen has made many notable contributions to the cause of civic advancement.

"On a hurried business trip to California he found time to stop and see the Grand Canyon, and now considers that too brief side tour the crowning feature of his trans-continental journey.

"His impressions of a first visit to the Grand Canyon may be termed those of the average professional man who goes there perhaps slightly incredulous, to determine at first hand if the reports about the canyon have any foundation in fact, and who comes away under a spell which is never broken.

"Here is Mr. Smith's report:

"FIRST IMPRESSIONS.

"The Grand Canyon is a tremendous chasm, an all but bottomless world of wonders. It is the experience of a lifetime to gaze from its rim into the depths below, to ride down a trail into it, to sleep on the ground within its walls beneath a sky of marvelous clearness. The world can never seem quite the same after such an experience.

"The first impression that comes to one who stands on the rim of earth's mightiest chasm after a long journey across the vast and weird tableland of northern Arizona, must ever remain his most glorious memory of natural scenery. The traveler, having journeyed many miles through a forest of pine and cedar, at last arrives at the brink of what at first seems to be the very edge of the world. If the point be a favorable one he has a glimpse of the Colorado river more than six thousand feet below rushing on its way to the Gulf of California. The first thought is of a vast channel of regular sides and awful depth, perhaps thrice as wide as deep. It is in fact about a mile and a quarter deep and some thirteen miles wide. It requires days of increasing familiarity obtained by excursions along its rim and into its depths to make one realize something of the magnificent distances of the Grand Canyon.

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

"COMPARED WITH YOSEMITE.

"Many have stood at Glacier Point, the edge of a sheer granite precipice three-fifths of a mile high, and gazed with admiration into the Yosemite Valley below. Across the tremendous chasm to the right is the towering Half Dome; to the left is the most beautiful of waterfalls; in the foreground beyond the Merced River lies Mirror Lake. The floor of the valley supports a noble forest; its vertical sides are of solid gray granite. One standing at this point can scarcely conceive of a chasm more vast or grandly beautiful. Yet the Yosemite, as an arm of the Grand Canyon, would be but a rent in the side of the upper canyon scarcely noticeable from the opposite rim.

"ITS COLORS.

"The majesty of the Grand Canyon is due to its vastness. Its glory lies in its color. Above, and to the very edge of the rim, is a growth of evergreen trees. Below this fringe of green are vertical walls of sparkling white, blue, pink and red sandstone. These are the faces of solid strata, some of them hundreds of feet in thickness, through which the main or upper canyon is cut. The sloping taluses between the successive strata bear trees and bushes. The dry bottom of the upper canyon, some thirty-five hundred feet below the rim, supports a stunted growth of sage, yucca, cactus and other desert plants. Thus, mingling with the brilliant colors of the vertical rock faces, are the dull greens and grays of the taluses and bottom of the upper canyon. A cross section of the upper canyon, disregarding the mountains, is somewhat like the cross section of an Indian canoe with its nearly vertical sides and curved bottom. The entire effect, under a brilliant sun in a perfectly clear atmosphere, is gloriously beautiful. The changing effects as the sun rises and sets linger in the memory. Beautiful and constantly changing gradations of light and shadow, strangely blending with the brilliant colors of the canyon, recur at every morning and evening hour. As the sun rises above, or sinks below, the horizon the entranced observer gazes into what seems a bottomless pit filled with a marvelous mixture of colors, dark below and light above.

"THE RIVER GORGE.

"Below the upper canyon, cut in its bottom in a line often as sharp and jagged as a lightning flash, is the river gorge in dark red granite. The gorge is so narrow and deep that the river is entirely invisible from most points on the rim of the canyon. The current of the river is so swift that from the brink of the gorge it looks in places like an irregular path of foam. Its constant roar is plainly heard by the awed observer from the rim of the gorge nearly two-fifths of a mile above.

"ITS MOUNTAINS.

"Nowhere else have mountains so splendid a setting. Some of them are more or less detached projections from the sides. Others rise independently from the very edge of the river gorge. They differ greatly in altitude. Some of the larger ones reach the level of the rim and have all the strata of the sides of the canyon. The tops of many are of brilliant red sandstone. In material and color they of course correspond with the sides of the canyon. For this reason, when the sun is high and the great chasm is flooded with light, the unfamiliar observer may look down upon stupendous forms more than a mile high and scarcely notice their presence in the mighty channel. Under such a light the mountains of the canyon blend into the wall beyond, itself a mountain a mile and a half high and over 200 miles long. As the visitor becomes acquainted, he gradually notes details; the mountains stand out from the wall beyond; the walls themselves grow less regular in outline; the vastness and color of the canyon become the splendid setting of a world of wonders; its mighty spaces furnish a field for new discoveries every hour. As the sun sinks and the shadows deepen, especially when the canyon lies under the light of a perfect moon, the vast pyramidal forms below seem to be mighty fortresses hushed in sleep, or vast ruins left by a giant race.

"A FINAL WORD.

"The Grand Canyon possesses a strange and awful fascination for those who have gazed into its mysterious depths. It has for every visitor the charm of a new discovery. All who see it once look forward to other visits. To the superstitious Indian the canyon is 'Bad Medicine.' To the white man it will ever be a glorious mystery. When all the earth has been explored, when the secrets of nature have been discovered, when the field of adventure has been narrowed to the utmost, the Grand Canyon will remain unspoiled by the touch of human hands, as awful in its unique grandeur as it is to-day."

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

Stevens, Thomas Wood

511 1902 A Grand Canyon bivouac. The Independent (New York), 54 (June 5) (2792): 1358-1365.

Some interesting notes regarding an early visit to the Bright Angel Hotel, and a refreshingly unguided trip to a night beside the river. Thoughtful, but a bit of cultural stereotyping dims it. Nicely illustrated.

"The Artist and I arrived at Bright Angel Hotel at night. Every one does that, for the single daily train from Williams, sixty-five miles to the south, also arrives at night. We tumbled out of the car and went into the Indian tapestried hotel office with the crowd. A few of the curious gazed into the black pit—seeing nothing but blackness—but the majority besieged the hotel clerk, yammering wildly for rooms. This was sheer American folly, for the tents, whereto a certain proportion must necessarily be consigned, are immeasurably better to sleep in. For tenting, give me the crisp Arizona night above all other weathers.

"Then came the brilliant dawn and El Cañon Grande del Colorado in the morning light; than which earth holds but one sublimer spectacle. To one who has never seen it the Canyon is utterly baffling; to familiar eyes it has other qualities; its expressions are as volatile as the sky's. Unalterable in outline it changes like the face of a friend. The Artist gazed awhile, and then we went to find Martin Buggeln and to borrow a floursack and blankets.

"Six months ago, Martin Buggeln wore a slouch hat, flannel shirt and high boots; he shaved every week and drove a stage; on busy days he went down the trail when a party large enough for two guides could be made up. Now he dresses in Eastern fashion, and bears himself as becomes the proprietor of Bright Angel; but the spirit of Arizona has not gone out of him. He gave us the flour-sack and the blankets—and even threw in a skillet, for luck.

"This is all the camp outfit you need for a couple of days in the Canyon; and for provisions we took some hard-tack, chocolate and certain materials which the English term 'tinned meats,' but which pass for 'canned grub' in Arizona.

"While the morning was still young we started down the trail. Little belated snow-drifts still hid themselves among the gnarled roots of the piñons and scattered spots of hoof-trodden mud along the path; but this part of the downward journey was easy and delightful. Infinite spring was in the air. The blue sky laughed openly and the mighty reaches of the Canyon basked in the white sun.

"Whenever we found a stretch of straight trail, or where the zig-zags were in plain view around several turns, we ran, the skillet, cans, camera and all our possessions dangling noisily about us. The Canyon may be awful, uncanny, overbearing; but the joy of spring comes into your blood there as elsewhere. No awe of nature can long deny mirth to a man. It is solely a human prerogative to forbid laughter.

"As we went down, the two tiny white spots by the patch of green in the Indian Garden grew larger. From the rim they were scarcely [sic] distinguishable. By the time we had reached the level of the battle ship—a great butte which the tourists at the hotel look down and wonder at—the spots were clearly tents and the green patch developed into a dense thicket of willows. In that willow grove is a spring of clear water, and the knowledge of it hastened our steps.

"We passed the level of the battle ship, whose rugged top is as high as the great belt of maroon sandstone in the Canyon wall; we passed the point where the turret showed above the further rim; as we went down still further it grew into a mighty peak against the sky. From the rim it is an humble butte for the ladies to admire; from below it is an implacable red mountain. All the way down the trail one's grasp of the Canyon's bigness grows in this wise. Cliffs become mountains; boulders, cliffs.

"At the spring we paused, and drank; interviewed Murray, who lives in the tents and keeps the lower part of the trail in good condition, and drank again. Then we filled a water-bottle and went on to the lower gorge. Just beyond the spring the trail divides, the horse track leading to the point above the river, where the majority of tourists take luncheon (and that is as far as they go toward the Colorado); and the other bending to the right across the mesa to turn suddenly and precipitously down to the granite chasm.

"The right hand trail we followed, losing it now and then, for it is not clearly marked where bare rock is to be crossed, and a little way below the spring we came to a long stretch of sandy road, shadowed by a sand-

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

stone cliff. This is the lowest point to which a horse can be ridden with safety. Across from this stretch, in the stratified side of a battlement, was a little square hole, seemingly large enough to put one's head into. 'Cliff dwellings,' cried the Artist ecstatically. We dropped our outfit and went for the battlement. It was a steep climb up a boulder-clad slope and afterward a threading to and fro among the leaves, but at the end we sat in the cliff dweller's parlor, which is not so big as an ordinary bathroom and marvelously hard to come at, but might serve in a pinch. We grew philosophic over the place. For no earthly habitation has in it such pathetic suggestion.

"Old castles of feudal crime may house their thrills and legends; but they had also their pageants and glories. For the cliff dweller there was no pageant, no heyday of triumph; only fear, want and toil; again and always—fear. In this impregnable cell, worn like a scar upon the cliff's dry breast, he lived; his children were born, clambered among the rocks—and died away, like his memory.

"The Artist made a sketch of the interior; the water-bottle being empty, we returned to our outfit and pursued the descent. From this point the trail into the granite gorge began. We left behind us the broad vision of the upper Canyon, with its league-long façades of woods and painted stone, its buttes and towers and Titan amphitheatres. Only one peak of the higher levels peered over the edge of the forbidding chasm.

"The path wound about the face of a stern granite wall. It was steep, narrow and strewn with loose boulders. They say a real mountaineer could descend it with an egg on a spoon in each hand. It may be true. As for us, we went circumspectly, and were not glad of our burdens.

"At the foot of the descent there is an open path beside a crystal stream; a level winding bottom to a trench that is chiseled a thousand feet deep in the eldest rock. The walls are seamed with black and red and white, full of the liquid scars of fire. But the brook wanders merrily through the willows and its gravelly banks are fair with flowers. A little further on another brook joins this, falling in a series of cascades from a great, smooth rent in the wall. This is Pipe Creek, and its waters start at the spring in the willows.

"We clambered up beside the falls as far as we could, but the polished bore of the creek's way allowed slight progress. The little cataracts leaping over the green mossy stone and pausing in deep pools of utter clearness held us long. Every one carries from childhood a love for the fascination of falling water.

"But presently we were beset with impatience to see the river—and with hunger. Each turn of the narrow gash wherein we walked seemed about to disclose the journey's end, but there were many turns before it came. A stretch of smooth, tawny water flows past the opening of Pipe Creek Canyon. Its banks are dark, towering rock, with little beaches of fine sand and polished boulders in the bends; and far above a single peak of creamy sandstone intercepts the clouds. Upstream and down, at the ends of the smooth water, are white angry rapids. This is the Colorado. Across the river another gash is cut, whose interlacing sides conceal a minor gorge similar to that by which we came.

"We sat on the warm sand and ate; afterward we swam in the river, returned to the sand and wore blankets the rest of the day. If any one questions the desirability of Indianhood, let him swim in that river and lounge on that beach in a blanket.

"Toward sunset we went back along Pipe Creek, gathered wood and made our camp on a flat, sandy spot. After wrestling with a can and pocket knife we ate supper. The camping place had evidently been occupied before, for beside the rock, where our fire was built, we found a book. As a testimonial to Arizona weather this book was a document of price; it had lain by the rock more than three years, by the date of an inscription on the fly-leaf, yet was unscarred and free from mold. It was called 'Lost in the Canyon,' and it narrated the thrilling adventures, of some boys—the Hero and others—while exploring the Canyon's depths. All this being set forth with unwearied ignorance by an author who had never been west of Indiana. This volume the Artist desired to sit up and read during the evening; under its soporific influence we soon fell asleep. [The book is probably Alfred R. Calhoun's young-reader fiction, Lost in the Cañon: The Story of Sam Willett's Adventures on the Great Colorado of the West (A. L. Burt and Co., New York, 1888).]

"The sun did not reach our camp until nearly ten o'clock, when the shadow from the southerneastern wall swung slowly across the floor of the gorge. Then the Artist gathered his sketching materials and we started for the rim. The way was as filled with interest as the descent; as many transcendent landscapes and good resting-

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

places; as many flowers and little stealthy lizards basking in the sun. But let me not dwell upon that upward climb.

"We reached the rim in time for the supremest sight of all; the marshaling of the shadows when the purple creeps up into the brilliant valley of light; 'the carnage of the sunset,' and the sinking of the last gilded peak into the pit of darkness."

Stoddard, John L.

- 512 1902 A gash in Nature's bared breast. In: The Grand Canyon of Arizona : being a book of words from many pens, about the Grand Canyon of the Colorado River in Arizona. [Chicago]: Santa Fe, Passenger Department, pp. 38-41. [Volume reprinted 1906, 1909.]

Apparently based on one of his great lectures (see Stoddard, 1898).

Swain, George F.

- 513 1902 [Essay.] From: The value of non-resident lectures on engineering subjects, a symposium. In: Fletcher, Robert, Woodward, Calvin M., and Waldo, Clarence A. (editorial committee), Society for the Promotion of Engineering Education, Proceedings of the Tenth Annual Meeting held in Pittsburg, Pa., June 27-28, 1902 : Volume X and index, Vols. I-X. New York: Engineering News Publishing Co., pp. 39-46.

Concludes with a list of "lectures before the Society of Arts" during the past year, which lists, "Arizona and the Grand Cañon of the Colorado." Mr. H. K. Burrison."

Warner, Charles Dudley

- 514 1902 On the brink of the Canyon. In: The Grand Canyon of Arizona : being a book of words from many pens, about the Grand Canyon of the Colorado River in Arizona. [Chicago]: Santa Fe, Passenger Department, pp. 89-90. [Volume reprinted 1906, 1909.]

Brief extracts from Warner (1891, 1892).

Wilson, H. H.

- 515 1902 A letter from Brother H. H. Wilson.  $\Delta\Sigma\Delta$  Δεσμός (Desmos) (Delta Sigma Delta, Indianapolis), 8(4) (August): 172-174.

Includes: "We left Prescott at 10 p. m., with the promise of the trainmen that we should reach the Grand Canyon of the Colorado in time to see the sun rise. The next morning I crawled out of my bunk at 4 o'clock, dressed and went back to the observation car, only to learn that we were still some two hours' run from the canyon. • • •"

"I will not attempt to describe the Grand Canyon, for it is far beyond my powers of description; in fact, I believe it to be beyond the powers of any one to describe it, or even to realize its grandeur and immensity, when he does see it. A number of the party went down the trail on the backs of mules and horses, but  $\Delta\Sigma\Delta$  was not represented. Of the four fraternity representatives on the train, there were no light-weights, and when the party returned from the trail and described the hardships of the trip we were all glad that we did not attempt it."
(ENTIRE NOTE)

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

1903

Anonymous

- 516 1903 Master plumbers in California. The Plumbers Trade Journal and Steam and Hot Water Fitters' Review, (July 1): 14, 16, 18.
- Photographic review of trips to and from the San Francisco convention via different routes. The running text refers to some of the photographs, but the photos are not necessarily on the same page, nor otherwise identified as the ones mentioned in the text. See "A Party of Chicagoans at the Grand Canon, Arizona" (a mounted trip in the canyon) and "In the Grand Canon, Arizona" (a party seated on the rim), p. 14; refer to text, p. 16.
- 517 1903 [Lecture.] In: Items Personal [SECTION]. The Standard (A Baptist Newspaper) (Chicago), 51(3) (September 19): 24 [also paginated consecutively for the volume, 72].
- "Rev. Herman J. Powell, pastor at Albuquerque, N. M. ••• gave his lecture on 'The Grand Canon of Arizona' at Creston, Iowa; Kalamazoo, Mich., and Joliet, Ill." (ENTIRE NOTE)
- 518 1903 [Lengthy account of visit to Grand Canyon, including a hike to the rim of the Inner Gorge.] In: Miscellaneous Items [SECTION]. American Bee Journal, 43(39) (September 24): 612-613.
- Part of a serialized article of a trip to the National Bee-Keepers' Convention in Los Angeles, August 18-20. See also Hasty (1904).
- 519 1903 Pasadena and homeward bound. In: Miscellaneous Items [SECTION]. American Bee Journal, 43(43) (October 22): cover, 676.
- Recollection of travel to and from the National Bee-Keepers' Convention in Los Angeles, August 18-20. Cover photo (for which all people are identified) is noted in text: ". . . we close with giving a picture of the [rail] car and its 'contents' as all appeared on Monday morning, Aug. 17, a few minutes before leaving Grand Canyon for Williams, on the main line of the Santa Fe railroad." See also Hasty (1904).
- 520 1903 [Record of meeting of May 18, 1903.] Academy of Science of St. Louis, Transactions, 13: xxxix.
- Includes notice of a lecture illustrated by lantern slides, by C. Barck, describing Grand Canyon's "first deliberate crossing" by "Mr. James" [presumably George Wharton James] and Barck, Bass Camp to Point Sublime.
- 521 1903 High standard of Utah art. Deseret News, (December 19): 63 [issue pagination].
- Includes illustration of "Grand Canyon of the Colorado. Harry Culmer's $300 Prize Picture Which is Now the Property of the State." See also Whitney (1904).

Allen, J. A.

- 522 1903 The California meeting of the American Ornithologists' Union. The Auk, 20(3) (July): 299-302.
- Regarding the eleven-day train trip from Chicago to San Francisco, "two days were allotted to a side trip from Williams, Arizona, to the Grand Cañon of the Colorado". (ENTIRE NOTE)

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

Baldwin, T. Stith

- 523 1903 Picture making for pleasure and profit : a complete illustrated hand-book on the modern practices of photography in all its various branches : for amateur and professional. Chicago: Frederick J. Drake and Co., 284 [286] pp.

See frontispiece, "Havasupai Indian Chief, Cataract Canyon, Arizona, on the Santa Fe. Photo by W. H. Simpson, Chicago."; and in the section on "Lighting and Composition" (pp. 70-72), Figure 36 (p. 70), "Grand Canon of Arizona. Negative by T. S. Baldwin.", with call-out relating to artistic design on p. 71.

Brooks, Benjamin

- 524 1903 The Southwest from a locomotive. (Illustrations by E. L. Blumenschein.) Scribner's Magazine, 34(4) (October): 427-438.

A little different. A cab ride through the Southwest, with a ride up to—the canyon! (which the illustrator Blumenschein draws). We join the writer in Williams:

"A half-day's run west of Flagstaff, down through well-timbered mountains and great white valleys clothed in snow, and I stopped again at a so-called town which is not a town, but a row of Chinese restaurants. Sixty miles north from here ran a branch line and at the end of it lay the Grand Cañon I had been hearing about all along the way.

"Branch lines in the West are often very quaint affairs. It was a funny, waddling little engine that came to carry us northward, and the engineer was a queer farmer-sort of a chap, who requested me, in a New England tone of voice, to ring the bell as we started away. I felt very much honored. He was a character, this engineer, and a man of experience. He had once dropped into San Francisco Bay, engine and all, at the western terminus of the road; once had an end-on collision with a load of hay, from under which he professed to have 'et his way out, while she was a-burnin'.' Now he had retired, with a wooden leg, to the seclusion of a branch line.

"'Ever been out to the Cañon before?' asked he.

"No, I never had. I had seen Switzerland, and the Canadian Rockies, which are better, and the Yosemite, which is better yet, but never the Grand Cañon.

"'Well, sir, when you get out there this afternoon, you'll see the—the damndest sight you ever saw in your life!' This was not lucid, but I tried to prepare my mind. He kept up a shouting conversation about it all the way across a gray monotonous desert, which might otherwise have gone by slowly; showed me the cliffs of the Cañon's north wall, while we were yet fifty miles away from them, and seemed as proud as if he owned the whole Cañon himself. It was certainly his own private 'exhibit' in a measure, for, though there are many ways to it by trail, and horseback, he was the only man that ever took passengers there by rail; and his little waddling locomotive, of all locomotives in the world, was the only one that ever looked into it.

"Finally, when the sun had gone low in the West, we puffed up out of a dry old rivercourse, sent a long whistle echoing away through the pines, and as we slowed up at the terminus, I caught one swift, vivid glimpse, through the green foliage, of an enormous pile of terraced cliff, as red as the red ball of the setting sun itself, and I understood in that instant how no man with eyes to see ever came upon it half expecting what he should behold.

"On the seventh day Pegasus was flying westward with me once more, rocking and rolling, and roaring down through the dry hills, till I thought each curve would be the last of us; but I was not looking at the dry hills, nor thinking of them. I had seen the Grand Cañon, and was seeing it still in my mind's eye, and mayhap always will in the future. I had seen it red as blood, and yellow as saffron in the afternoon light, with purple haze clinging to its gaunt flanks and deepening in its ravines. I had seen it under the full glare of the Arizona day, with its infinity of palisades, pinnacles, long terraces, great plateaus buttressed round with ancient ruins of the cliffs, frowning walls all drawn clear and plain before me, but intangible, unlearnable, and immeasurable still. And it had faded slowly away from me into the gray moonlight and become a mile-high vacant wall; then put itself together piece by piece again, as the red dawn crept into it. Then I had dropped down into it by a zig-zag trail

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

3,000 feet, which is only half way, and sat with my heels dangling over fearful bottomless places where the sun never comes, and looked back at the yellow heights, golden in the first morning sun above the shadows; and listened to the rocks falling, falling, with hollow echoes, as the night frost melted away. Hours and hours went in merely sitting very still and looking into it, trying to make the opposite brink look ten miles away, as it is; trying to imagine how the whole city of New York would look scattered along on its terraces, after one had succeeded in picking out its buildings with a telescope; trying to learn it, to be familiar with just one little span of it; thinking of the eons and eons the river took to fashion it, of the brave dare-devil who, with canoes and other dare-devils, first went through it to explore, knowing not how many Niagaras lay in his path, nor if, as the Indian legend said, the river ran sometimes under ground, nor anything about it, save the one fact that, once started, he could never turn back. And after all, though I have seen it and felt it (and no man could ever learn it) and will remember, still to tell it or describe it to another who has not seen is as impossible as though Pegasus and I had never reached it by a thousand miles. After all, my wooden-legged engineer had been as lucid as I or any other man could be when he'd characterized it in his one sentence."

Brown, Glenn

- 525 1903 History of the United States Capitol. Volume II. Washington, D.C.: U.S. Government Printing Office, pp. i-xi, 115-255, Plates 137-322. (U.S. 56th Congress, 1st Session, Senate Document 60, 1902.) [Spine title adds dates 1850-1900.]

Thomas Moran, "Chasm of the Colorado". See pp. 187, 188, and Plate 303 (not 304 as indicated on p. 187 and in index). [Volume I, not pertinent to this bibliography, is dated 1900.]

Dadant, C.-P.

- 526 1903 Lettre des États-Unis. Le Congrès américaine en Californie. Revue Internationale d'Apiculture (Nyon (Suisse)), 25(10) (October 31): 189-194. [In French.]
(transl. 'Letter from the United States. The American Congress in California.')

Notes that the apiculturists took advantage of a reduced train fare offered to "La Grand Armée" (i.e., Grand Army of the Republic) which also was meeting in California, but that the fare still was $50. Grand Canyon noted, in passing:

"On ne sera donc pas étonné d'apprendre que seulement une quarantaine de membres de l'Est avaient profité de l'occasion. Ils s'étaient concertés pour partir ensemble dans un seul wagon-lit, qui faisait le trajet entier avec un détour d'une journée passée au «Grand Canyon» du Colorado." (ENTIRE NOTE)

(transl.) 'We will therefore not be surprised to learn that only about forty members from the East took advantage of the opportunity. They had agreed to leave together in a single sleeping car, which made the entire trip with a one-day detour to the "Grand Canyon" of the Colorado.'

Dennis, Charles H.

- 527 1903 Events of the month. The World To-Day, 5(1) (July): 827-.

See "President's Tour Ended", pp. 838-841. Theodore Roosevelt's tour of the West; photos at Grand Canyon, pp. 839, 840.

Devins, John Bancroft

- 528 1903 The onward sweep of Presbyterianism—III. Opening days of the General Assembly at Los Angeles. New York Observer, 81(23) (June 4): 729-731.

"Dr. [Henry] van Dyke was at his best. He had been communing with nature in the Grand Canon of the Colorado, and was in perfect trim for the delivery of a sermon, which he admitted might have been preached at any time in any church. He closed his sermon, which was printed in The Observer of May 14, with a vivid description of

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

his day in the Canon and drew from it spiritual lessons which deepened the impression of the great throng that heard him." (ENTIRE NOTE)

The sermon, "Knowing and Doing: Joy and Power", by Henry van Dyke actually appears in the May 21 issue, pp. 661-664, but his closure regarding a day at Grand Canyon is not a part of that text as published.

- 529 1903 The onward sweep of Presbyterianism—XIV. In the Grand Canyon of the Colorado—Presbyterians spend the day in the Titan of Chasms. New York Observer, 81(34) (August 20): 233-234.

Takes the time to begin with a lingering description of a crowd of tourists, straight off the Pullman cars, at a Grand Canyon dawn. Mentions a ride to the river, without particular detail other than the usual precariousness and blisters; with the preamble, "'Headlight' was the horse selected for the 'big fellow,' as the guide unceremoniously termed the writer, thinking that he was out of hearing." The last half comprises quotations from John Wesley Powell and John L. Stoddard, and a stanza by Louisa Morgan Sill. Otherwise not terribly inspired.

Foy, John J.

- 530 1903 Master plumbers in California; the St. Louis delegations trip. The Plumbers Trade Journal and Steam and Hot Water Fitters' Review, (July 15): 72, 74, 76.

Grand Canyon visit en route homeward from San Francisco convention, see p. 76.

Fox, John

- 531 1903 Some trans-continental impressions. Bible Society Record, 48(7) (July): 103-106.

"The Santa Fe route to California has one capital advantage—the famous Arizona Cañon. • • • But its silent majesty and diverse beauty chiefly speak of the creative genius of the Almighty Builder, putting to shame man's puny art and architecture."

Gohier, Urbain

- 532 1903 Le peuple du XX<sup>e</sup> siècle aux États-Unis. Paris: Bibliothèque-Charpentier, 311 [313] pp. [In French.]
(transl. 'The people of the twentieth century in the United States')

Grand Canyon note regarding a guide's comment, p. 15:

"Et j'entends encore le guide du Grand Cañon annoncer pathétiquement: 'Nous allons faire une course horriblement dure!' pour une promenade telle qu'on en fait tous les jours quand on passe ses vacances en Suisse." (ENTIRE NOTE)

(transl.) 'And I can still hear the Grand Cañon guide pathetically announcing: 'We are going to have a horribly hard way!' for a walk such as we do every day when we spend our holidays in Switzerland.'

See also Chapter 19, "Le Grand Cañon.—Saint-Louis World's Fair[—] Washington. Boston. New-York[.]" p. 299 and following; Grand Canyon is on pp. 299-302.]

- 533 1903 The people of the twentieth century. The Independent (New York), 55 (January 29) (2826): 250-257.

See p. 255: "I can still hear the guide to the Grand Cañon pathetically announce: 'This is an awfully hard trip;' in regard to a walk which would be taken every day if you passed your vacation in Switzerland." (ENTIRE NOTE)

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

534 1903 American energy is a myth. The Booklovers Magazine, 1(3) (March): 330.
Credited to Urbain in The Independent (see above); concludes with the remark: "I can still hear the guide to the Grand Cañon pathetically announce: 'This is an awfully hard trip;' in regard to a walk which would be taken every day if you passed your vacation in Switzerland." (ENTIRE NOTE)

535 1903 As seen by a Frenchman; some criticisms of America that will at least bear thoughtful reading by Americans. New Century Path, 6(29) (May 31): 18-19.
From "The People of the Twentieth Century" (see above), but not quoted exactly: "I still hear the guide of the Grand Canyon announce pathetically, 'We are going to make a terribly rough trip,' such as we make every time we take a holiday in Switzerland." Item includes an editor's title and introductory paragraph.

Hart, Edward

536 1903 Dr. Hart's Death Valley trip. The Lafayette (Lafayette College, Easton, Pennsylvania), 29(16) (February 13): 131, (17) (February 20): 139-141.

Trip to Grand Canyon and descent to the river, see p. 139. "One is tempted to exaggerate."

Häyrén, Ernst

537 1903 Den geografiska studentekursionen 1902. Föredrag vid Geografiska föreningens möte den 15 april 1903. Geografiska Föreningens Tidskrift (Helsingfors), 15(2/3): 83-176, (4): 209-224, (5/6): 281-322. [In Swedish.]
(transl. 'The geographical student excursion 1902. Lecture at the Geographical Association's meeting on April 15, 1903.')

See "Arizona" (including Grand Canyon), pp. 174-175.

Hazard, Christopher G.

538 1903 A Presbyterian abroad. What he saw on a Raymond and Whitcomb train going to California. New York Observer, 81(23) (June 4): 732-733.

Raymond and Whitcomb Company, sponsored train car. See p. 732: "Morning found us at the Grand Canon of the Colorado. In this two hundred and fifty miles or more of chasms and heights Nature went mad, and after she had torn up and thrown about the foundations of the world, she fell asleep like a tired child, and left them there. It is creation with the bottom dragged out and the remains standing about as witnesses. Take all the castles and cathedrals in the world, all the towers and pinnacles, paint them in many colors, set them on promontories and in amphitheatres, let them occupy vast spaces; they would all be insignificant here. We saw it from many points above and below, and it was an ever-growing wonder; an abysmal, commanding, vast, various, painted chaos." (ENTIRE NOTE)

High, Helen E.

539 1903 [Letter.] In: The Letter-Box [SECTION]. St. Nicholas, 31(1) (November): 94.

Riding ponies to the Tonto Plateau; includes photograph of children and the ponies near the Inner Gorge. Her letter, written from Los Angeles, in its entirety:

"This vacation my brother Frederick and I, with my mother and father, took a trip to the Grand Cañon of the Arizona [sic].

"The cañon is a mile deep and about thirteen across, and the coloring of the rocks is beautiful.

"One morning, about nine o'clock, Fred and I, with our lunch and guide, started down the Bright Angel Trail on ponies.

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

"About half-past twelve we came to some tents among trees, which from the hotel at the top, look something like tombstones. After resting awhile we went on until we came to a large area of flat ground which is called the plateau. There we stopped to eat our lunch. We could see the river seven hundred feet beneath, and the top of the cañon nearly a mile above. The river, which is quite wide, looked like a small stream, and the seven hundred feet about fifty.

"I thought perhaps some of the children who read ST. NICHOLAS will some day take this trip, and they must not miss going down the trail.

"I inclose [sic] a picture of Fred and myself, taken on the plateau on the ponies 'Alex' and 'Tom.'"

Horn, Walther

- 540 1903 Briefe eines reisenden Entomologen. Deutsche Entomologische Zeitschrift, 1903(2) (August): 177-198. [In German.]
(transl. 'Letters from a traveling entomologist')

See p. 180, general notes regarding a brief visit to the Grand Canyon; this part is not entomological in content.

Inkersley, Arthur

- 541 1903 The Grand Canyon of Arizona. Overland Monthly, New Series, 41(6) (June): 423-432.

"While I cannot say that my knees trembled or my eyes filled with tears, or a choking sensation seized my throat, I can honestly say that nothing I had ever seen is even remotely like the Grand Canyon."

James, George Wharton

- 542 1903 The falls of Havasu Canyon. The Four-Track News (New York), 4(4) (April): 190-192.

This article is effectively only a description of the cascades of Havasu Creek, rather than offering any reflections.

[Johnson, F. Coit (Mr. and Mrs.); Bok, Edward (Mr. and Mrs.); Doubleday, Frank N. (Mr. and Mrs.); AND Doubleday, Dorothy]

- 543 1903 On the new Santa Fé Trail : the record of a journey to the land of sunshine by six and a half tenderfeet : written and illustrated by all of us together. New York and Philadelphia: "Privately printed and not published at all, because we are on vacation", 46 pp. [Printed together with, and with separately paginated pages inverted, Toward the Sunrise on "The Sunset". Authors listed on p. [iv], collectively as "The Hayseeds from the East".]

See p. 43: "I suppose something should be said here about Santa Barbara, but I feel an embarrassment to know how to begin, as the lady did at the Grand Canyon. She approached the edge of this terrific chasm . . . and began to adjust her puny camera in an agony of uncertainty whether to fix the focus at thirty-five feet or put the gauge up to a full one hundred."

No other remarks pertain to Grand Canyon. Also, this anecdote has been encountered elsewhere, posing even as a young girl's question to her mother, so its originality seems to be only in the retelling.

Lummis, Charles F.

- 544 1903 In the Lion's Den [COLUMN]. Out West, 18(6) (June): 751-756.

Commenting on President Theodore Roosevelt's recent speech at Grand Canyon:

"At the Grand Cañon, instead of using that masterpiece of the Almighty for a blackboard on which to chalk his own Smartness; instead of being stirred to tell How this makes Me feel; instead of soaring on the wings of a rhetorical Darius Green in an attempt to describe to his audience what they had eyes to see, and that which no man can begin to touch with words, he showed his awe and his feeling by not parading them; and by the straight,

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

sincere appeal that is first to strike a thoughtful man. He said: 'I want to ask you to do one thing in your own interest, and in the interest of the country. Leave the Cañon as it is. You cannot improve on it—not a bit. The ages have been at work on it, and man can only mar it. What you can do is to keep it for your children, and for your children's children, and for all who come after you, as one of the great sights which every American, if he can travel at all, should see. Keep the Grand Cañon as it is. Keep back houses and buildings and every other work of man from that awful brink. I am glad to learn that the railroad is to build its new hotel back among the trees. That is right. That is the way to treat these wonders.'" (ENTIRE NOTE)

Paden, William M.

- 545 1903 Straight to the Bright Angel amphitheater of the Grand Canyon. Deseret News, (August 29): 12 [issue pagination].

Text of lecture given in the First Presbyterian Church, regarding a visit to Grand Canyon and brief note of a descent into Bright Angel Canyon with President Woolley of the Kanab stake. Wooley is affiliated with a company to build a cable to cross the Colorado River, joining trails on both sides of the canyon.

Pocock, Roger

- 546 1903 A gap in the world; the Grand Canyon of the Colorado—600 miles long, twelve miles wide, and over a mile deep: its romantic history and unearthly beauty. Pearson's Magazine (New York), 15 (July): 46-49.

"The driver's whip cracked like a gunshot. 'Down the line, Ladies! Down the line!' The 'Ladies' were four mules at a gallop, the coach had swung through seventy miles of pine forest, and we poor tourists were mixed up into a sort of dust omelette; we were all muddled and sleepy, black night had fallen, and the trees seemed to come right at us out of the gloom.

"Then suddenly we saw the red afterglow shining through the very roots of the pines ahead, and we came to the edge of the world. As the driver said, pulling up: 'The bottom has dropped out.' So we looked over the brink of the Grand Canyon of the Colorado, the greatest chasm in America, the crowning wonder of the whole world. We looked down over the edge into fathomless empty space.

"One step more and one would fall, would keep on falling for a long time—minutes, perhaps, or hours, days, years, ages, for ever and ever. I had looked over cliffs before, but this was Eternity."

At dawn Pocock begins to effuse, seeing "blue mist" and lost mountains in the canyon, although, being British, this time he casts into it Ben Nevis and Snowdon. Then, a refreshing, British perspective: ". . . in the bar room of the Grand View Hotel I discerned hanging on pegs three pairs of green duck 'bloomers' and three pairs blue, on hire at twenty-five cents a day for the use of ladies riding down the Canyon. Girls who can face those garments without flinching deserve a cross for valour; and so far from the American girl being dismayed, there is authentic record of a fierce struggle for the use of these engines of war among four hundred Female Christian Endeavourers. By all the rules of the game, four hundred Female Christian Endeavourers into six bloomers won't go, and with these fearful odds the Battle of the Bloomers was victory for half-a-dozen heroines, where three hundred and ninety-four of the vanquished were trampled underfoot.

"For tourists in cloaks, goggles, and Kodaks, tender tourists grown under glass, the very change of climate is something to fear where the top of the cliff is as cool as Scotland, the bottom hotter than the Sahara Desert. . . ."

Then flow from Pocock's pen the splashes of dusky purple, scarlet, and so on, and a peculiar regression to ancient seas filled with "vast reptiles" and "other monsters", familiar perhaps to a British paleontologist but rather unfamiliar to the Grand Canyon; but there they are, imaginatively, along with some geological fantasies of the region. The Colorado's torrent ground through it all, anyway. Then there are the human interests of the canyon—"savages with bows and arrows, cowboys with gun and spur, tourists with goggles and sunshades, outlaws who live by robbery under arms; but for red hot romance the life of the miners beats all records."

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

He ends with the tale of “a cave in the canyon where the roof, the floor and the walls were of native gold”—alas, all lost.

- 547 1903 Una brecha en el planeta; el Gran Cañón del Colorado. La Nación (Suplemento Semanal Ilustrado) (Buenos Aires), 1(45) (July 9): [9]-[10]. [In Spanish.]

Translation of Pocock (1903, Pearson's Magazine).

Roosevelt, Theodore

- 548 1903 [Speech at Grand Canyon, May 6.]

See below for a comparison of two versions of the text of Roosevelt's often-quoted speech; the one in which (we are reminded again and again) he urged Americans to “keep it as it is”—for their “children's children”. This is reproduced from “I have come here to see the Grand Canyon . . .”, published with an introduction by Earle Spamer in The Ol' Pioneer (the journal of the Grand Canyon Historical Society), 8(7) (Summer 1997): 12-15. Therein it was shown, in parallel texts, that the “official” text varies from what seems to have been spoken on the spot, as transcribed by a reporter from the Flagstaff newspaper, Coconino Sun.

Spamer's introduction is as follows:

“We all have seen the 1911 Kolb Studio photograph of President Theodore Roosevelt, resplendent in vest and watch fob, astride a mule on Bright Angel Trail, our formal portrait of the conservational hero of the Grand Canyon. And we all have read, time and again, his admonition to the citizens of 1903 to preserve the Grand Canyon: ‘Leave it as it is.’ It is probably the one line most quoted by champions of the Canyon to this day. But there are a few little mysteries about the president's first visit, on Wednesday, May 6, 1903: how long did he stay, where did he give his speech—what did he say?

“The Coconino Sun on May 9th carried a full report of the president's visit, which shines a little light on just how brief was his trip to the Canyon; the same trip from which we have derived nearly a century's worth of inspiration about the protection and wise use of the Canyon. It was Roosevelt's first trip to Arizona, part of a nearly three-month excursion through the American West. According to the newspaper, he spent just 8-1/2 hours at the Canyon, a surprising harbinger of more ‘modern’ lengths of stay at the Canyon by tourists.

“Just after 4 a.m. on May 6th, President Roosevelt spirited through Flagstaff, asleep on his special train, headed for the Canyon up the new rail line from Williams. The train stopped for water, and an anxious crowd of hopeful greeters lined up, but to no avail. At 6 a.m., a five-car train left Flagstaff with 301 people in pursuit of the president.

“The president's time was totally used, so it is all the more amazing that he had the time to write the speech for which he has become so well known to Grand Canyon aficionados. He arrived at 9:30 a.m., went on a horseback trip, met the train from Flagstaff at 11:00, gave his speech, received some local honors and gifts, handed out high school diplomas, went on a rim excursion to Grandview Point, held a reception for his fellow Rough Riders at 5:30 p.m., and left promptly at 6:00 p.m.—all this according to the newspaper, that is. Even if one wonders whether Roosevelt didn't stay over until the next day, he didn't; on May 7th he gave speeches in Barstow and San Bernardino, California. [He also did not go down Bright Angel Trail on this trip, as is sometimes misstated.]

“Roosevelt lauded the indescribable scenery in his Canyon speech. He probably had written parts of it beforehand, but he did include some comments that are best interpreted as having been written after seeing the Canyon. The paper does not mention what time the speech was given, but it was apparently just after the arrival of the Flagstaff train. So, sometime between 9:30 and 11 a.m., during which time, remember, he had gone riding, he had the spin on his speech.

“It was partly a very personal speech, acknowledging [sic] his fellow Rough Riders who had turned out to meet him, and saluting Buckey O'Neill. He went far out of his way, too, in such a short presidential speech, to expound on the plight of the Native Americans. And an amazingly large crowd (for the time and place) turned out at the end of track to see and hear him. The Coconino Sun reported that ‘The President

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

held his reception at the Grand Canyon Hotel, from the balcony of which he addressed about eight hundred of as appreciative auditors as a public speaker ever confronted.’ There are two hotels with which we have to contend—Bright Angel Hotel and the Cameron Hotel. The old Red Horse Station had been moved by Ralph Cameron to the head of Bright Angel Trail around 1902, with the addition of a second story, which competed directly with Martin Buggeln’s Bright Angel Hotel. The Cameron Hotel apparently did not have a balcony, or for that matter even a porch, as seen in a photograph of it taken near the railroad.

“On the other hand, early pictures of Bright Angel show no porch on the second floor, but these are views from the Canyon side. Considering the first-floor porch roof line, a second-story doorway would be just a few feet high beneath the main roof. A photograph of the president, ostensibly taken during his speech, shows him on a full-height porch. A raised first-story porch, as viewed from the crowd below, might have been described as a ‘balcony,’ as the reporter had written it.

“The reporter’s use of the name ‘Grand Canyon Hotel’ could have been a mistake for a hotel of the same name in Williams, also owned by Martin Buggeln. But, in all probability, the Bright Angel Hotel was Roosevelt’s pulpit; after all, Buggeln operated the hotel with the cooperation of the Santa Fe Railroad, over whose tracks the president was travelling. It would have been politically incorrect (as we say today) to snub the host by catering to the Cameron Hotel.

“Fortunately, there is what seems to be a complete transcript of his Grand Canyon speech, taken down by a reporter from The Coconino Sun (who even went so far as to note all of the times the president was interrupted by applause). But the collected presidential addresses and state papers of Theodore Roosevelt record a rather different speech. We may assume that the “official,” written version of the speech had been filed away and later collated into the collected papers published in an undated (1905?) volume in New York. To compare the two versions makes for interesting reading, and a little insight into the dynamics of the Canyon’s favorite president. Some newspapers across the country also picked up the speech, but the transcriptions may be less reliable, having passed through more hands in order to appear in so many places. Instead, I rely only on the version in The Coconino Sun (presumably delivered by hand from the reporter) and the ‘official’ version to which probably many historians have referred as gospel. It is especially interesting to note that, whereas Roosevelt liberally ad-libbed throughout his speech, the part about leaving the Canyon ‘as it is’ is virtually identical between the two versions. Had Roosevelt just written that part? Or, did he want to be sure that a very clear, precise message came across? In a bit of irony, after Roosevelt had pleaded for the cessation of rimside construction, a short item appeared in The Coconino Sun next to the article about the president’s visit: ‘A New Hotel—To be Erected at the Head of the Grand Canyon Mine Trail.’ This was to be the Grand View Hotel. The article also noted that ‘the Santa Fe will go ahead with the building of its magnificent hotel there, to be managed by Mr. Harvey. The need of such a hotel is great, as travel to the Canyon has increased eight hundred per cent. in two years.’ It’s ironic, that today we idolize the history, but to Roosevelt it was encroaching growth looming in the calendar.”

The following three pages, interjected but reset herein, are the parallel texts of Roosevelt’s speech that appeared in The Ol’ Pioneer, reset here.

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

Theodore Roosevelt's Speech at Grand Canyon, May 6, 1903

[Text from the Coconino Sun (Flagstaff, Arizona), May 9, 1903, p. 1.]

Mr. Governor, and you my Fellow Citizens, My Fellow Americans, Men and Women of Arizona:

I am glad to be in Arizona today. It was from Arizona that so many gallant men came into the regiment which I had the honor to command. Arizona sent men who won glory on hard-fought fields, and men to whom came a glorious and an honorable death fighting for the flag of their country, and as long as I live it will be to me an inspiration to have served with Bucky [sic] O'Neill. (Applause.) I have met so many comrades whom I prize for whom I feel only respect and admiration, and I shall not particularize among them except to say that there is no one for whom I feel more of respect than for your governor. (Applause.) I remember when I first joined the regiment that all of us were new to one another, but as soon as I saw the colonel (he was then major) I made up my mind I could tie to him. (Cries of "Good!" Applause.)

It is a pleasure to be in Arizona. I have never been in it before. Arizona is one of the regions from which I expect most development through the wise action of the national congress in passing the irrigation act. (Applause.) The first and biggest experiment now in view under that act is the one that we are trying in Arizona. I look forward to the effects of irrigation partly as applied through the government, still more as applied by individuals, profiting by the example of the government and possibly by help from it—I look forward to the effects of irrigation as being of greater consequence to all this region of country in the next fifty years than any other movement whatsoever. I think that irrigation counts for more toward the achieving of the permanent good results for the community.

[Text from The Works of Theodore Roosevelt. Presidential Addresses and State Papers. Part One. P. F. Collier and Sons (New York, 1905?), pp. 369-370. "Executive Edition published with the permission of the President . . . ."

Mr. Governor, and you, my Fellow-Citizens:

I am glad to be in Arizona to-day. From Arizona many gallant men came into the regiment which I had the honor to command. Arizona sent men who won glory on fought fields [sic], and men to whom came a glorious and honorable death fighting for the flag of their country. As long as I live it will be to me an inspiration to have served with Bucky [sic] O'Neill. I have met so many comrades whom I prize, for whom I feel respect and admiration and affection, that I shall not particularize among them except to say that there is none for whom I feel all of respect and admiration more than for your Governor.

I have never been in Arizona before. It is one of the regions from which I expect most development through the wise action of the National Congress in passing the irrigation act. The first and biggest experiment now in view under that act is the one that we are trying in Arizona. I look forward to the effects of irrigation partly as applied by and through the government, still more as applied by individuals, and especially by associations of individuals, profiting by the example of the government, and possibly by help from it—I look forward to the effects of irrigation as being of greater consequence to all this region of country in the next fifty years than any other material movement whatsoever.

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

I shall not try to greet in particular the members of my regiment now. I shall see them at half past five in my car. I have come here to see the Grand Canyon of Arizona, because in that canyon Arizona has a natural wonder, which, so far as I know, is in kind absolutely unparalleled throughout the rest of the world. (Applause.) I shall not attempt to describe it, because I cannot. I could not choose words that would convey or that could convey to any outsider what that canyon is. I want you to ask you to do one thing in connection with it in your own interest and in the interest of the country—to keep this great wonder of nature as it now is. (Applause.) I was delighted to learn of the wisdom of the Santa Fe railroad people in deciding not to build their hotel on the brink of the canyon. I hope you will not have a building of any kind, not a summer cottage, a hotel or anything else to mar the wonderful grandeur, the sublimity, the loneliness and beauty of the canyon. Leave it as it is. man cannot improve on it; not a bit. The ages have been at work on it and man can only mar it. What you can do is to keep it for your children and your children's children and for all who come after you, as one of the great sights which every American, if he can travel at all, should see.

Keep the Grand Canyon of Arizona as it is. We have gotten past the stage, my fellow citizens, when we are to be pardoned if we simply treat any part of our country as something to be skinned for two or three years for the use of the present generation. Whether it is the forest, the water, the scenery, whatever it is, handle it so that your children's children will get the benefit of it. Handle it that way. If irrigation, apply it under circumstances that will make it of benefit, not to the speculators to get profit out of it for two or three years, but handle it so that it will be of use to the homemaker; to the man who comes to live here and to have his children stay after him. Keep the forests in the same way. Preserve them for that use, but use them so that they will not be squandered; will not be wasted; so that they will be of benefit to the Arizona of 1952 [sic] as well as the Arizona of 1903.

In the Grand Canyon, Arizona has a natural wonder which, so far as I know, is in kind absolutely unparalleled throughout the rest of the world. I want to ask you to do one thing in connection with it in your own interest and in the interest of the country—to keep this great wonder of nature as it is. I was delighted to learn of the wisdom of the Santa Fe railroad people in deciding not to build their hotel on the brink of the canyon. I hope that you will not have a building of any kind, not a summer cottage, a hotel, or anything else, to mar the wonderful grandeur, the sublimity, the great loneliness and beauty of the canyon. Leave it as it is. You can not improve on it. The ages have been at work on it, and man can only mar it. What you can do is to keep it for your children, your children's children, and for all who come after you, as one of the great sights which every American if he can travel at all should see.

[In this version, the paragraph continues without break.]

We have gotten past the stage, my fellow-citizens, when we are to be pardoned if we treat any part of our country as something to be skinned for two or three years for the use of the present generation, whether it is the forest, the water, the scenery. Whatever it is, handle it so that your children's children will get the benefit of it. If you deal with irrigation, apply it under circumstances that will make it of benefit, not to the specular who hopes to profit out of it for two or three years, but handle it so that it will be of use to the home-maker, to the man who comes to live here, and to have his children stay after him. Keep the forests the same way. Preserve the forests by use; preserve them for the ranchman and the stockman, for the people of the Territory, for the people of the region round about. Preserve them for that use, but use them so that they will not be squandered, that they will not be wasted, so that they will be of benefit to the Arizona of 1953 [sic] as well as the Arizona of 1903.

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

I want to say a word of welcome to the Indians here. In my regiment I had a good many Indians. They were good enough to fight and to die, and they are good enough to have me treat them exactly as square as any white man. There are a good many problems in connection with the Indians. You have got to save them from brutality, and I regret to say that at times we have to save them from the unregulated Eastern philanthropist., because in everything we have to remember that although perhaps the worst quality in which to approach any question is hardness of heart, I do not know that it does so much damaged as selfishness of head. All I ask is a square deal for every man. Give him a fair chance; do not let him wrong anyone, and do not let him be wronged. Help as far as you can, without hurting in helping him, for the only way to help a man in the end is to help a man to help himself. Never forget that you have to have two sets of qualities; the qualities that we include under the names of decency, honesty, morality, that make a man a descent husband, a good father, a good neighbor, fair and square in his dealings with all men, and in his dealings with the state: and then, furthermore, the qualities that have to be shown by every man who is to do this work in the world. Virtue is good, but the virtue that sits at home in its own parlor and talks about how bad the world is, never did anything and never will. I want to see the qualities that the men of '61 to '65 had, my comrades. You had to have a man patriotic in those days, but it did not make any difference how patriotic he was, if he did not fight he was no good. So it is with citizenship. I want to see the decency and then I want to see the hardy virtues; the virtues we speak of when we describe anyone as a good man. I am glad to see you today. I wish you well with all my heart. I know that your future will justify all the hopes we have. (Cheers and applause.)

---

To the Indians here I want to say a word of welcome. In my regiment I had a good many Indians. They were good enough to fight and to die, and they are good enough to have me treat them exactly as squarely as any white man. There are many problems in connection with them. We must save them from corruption and from brutality; and I regret to say that at times we must save them from unregulated Eastern philanthropy. All I ask is a square deal for every man. Give him a fair chance. Do not let him wrong any one, and do not let him be wronged. I believe in you. I am glad to see you. I wish you well with all my heart, and I know that your future will justify all the hopes we have.

---

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

- 549 1903 From the President's speeches. The third instalment of pertinent extracts from speeches delivered by Mr. Roosevelt on his western tour. Public Opinion, 34(20) (May 14): 618.

Includes an abridgement of Roosevelt's speech at Grand Canyon.

Root, A. I. [Root, Amos Ives]

- 550 1903 Our Homes [COLUMN]. Gleanings in Bee Culture, 31(18) (September 15): 810-811.

A. I. Root was a successful apiarist who, in his own magazine for bee-keepers, often freely expounded his Christian faith. This particular bit of correspondence pertains to a visit to Grand Canyon while en route to the convention of the National Bee-keepers' Association in Los Angeles; and Root, as an arranger of the train trip, focuses on the concerns of a canyon excursion on the Sabbath. In as much as this is a unique perspective of a Grand Canyon visit (in addition to being a record of an early venture), and as it is published in a less-visible serial, the entire item is reproduced here.

"In all thy ways acknowledge him, and he shall direct thy paths.—Prov. 3:6.

"As you have seen by the journals, our carload of bee-keepers started from Chicago on Wednesday evening, Aug. 12, and I believe it was not until after we started that I learned we would reach the Grand Canyon at 5 on Saturday evening, and would leave at 9:30 on Monday morning, so as to give the bee-keepers all Sunday to explore. When I asked how such an arrangement came to be made, nobody seemed to know. Probably the railroad company thought that that would be exactly what the bee-keepers would want. I could have told them better, and would have been glad to do so had I been consulted. As it was, perhaps I am as much at fault as any one, because I did not in time look out for such a state of affairs. I am glad to say our car of eighteen bee-keepers, men and women, were mostly professing Christians. We sang gospel hymns, and talked temperance, Sabbath observance, etc., almost as a carload of Endeavorers might have done; and some one remarked he had not seen one of our crowd in the smoking-car at all. This is a little remarkable, and perhaps it is owing to the fact that the editors of our bee-journals are 'clean men' right through.

"Well, there was much discussion as to what we ought to do under the circumstances about exploring the canyon on Sunday. Many inquired, a little anxiously, perhaps, what A. I. Root was going to do. Of course, they looked to Dr. Miller, Editor York and his good wife, and others, in much the same way; but as your humble servant has in years past been a little more vehement than the rest in denouncing Sunday excursions, it seemed to center somewhat on him. I am free to confess I was puzzled as to what I ought to do, or, if you choose, as to what God would have me do that Sabbath day. As all would be up early, we arranged for a morning service at six o'clock.

"Our train dropped us Saturday evening on the brink of that awful chasm; and every soul of us, as we gazed down, admitted the sight was worth all it cost, and was worthy of all that had been said about it. The human eye, unused to such vast depths, at first failed utterly to take it in. Our guide pointed out to us some white objects, part way down, and asked us to guess what they were. I said they looked like five-cent sacks of salt that some one had dropped. What I called a sack of salt was really a group of eight tents, or sleeping-rooms, belonging to the hotel below [Indian Garden]. Part way down on the trail they looked like Simplicity bee-hives painted white. These tents were 3100 feet straight down, three miles distant on a bee-line, and five miles along the trail.

"There were trips out along the rim, both ways; and if we thought best not to take the long trip down to the great river (a full mile straight down, and eight miles along the trail), we could take the side trip above. What would be the right and proper thing for a body of Christian people to do on that Sabbath day? I, like many of the rest, had looked forward to this trip almost all my life; and but few if any of us would ever see it again. I went part way down the trail Saturday night, and came up after dark. I was more and more fascinated with every step I took down; and as it was bright moonlight after midnight, I tried to get the manager of the horses to take me down by moonlight Monday morning, and get me back by train time. He flatly refused. I meditated walking down before breakfast, and back before train time; but I knew that, at my age, it would be more than I had any right to undertake. God knows I tell it truly when I say I decided to go away and not take the trip. I

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

had so decided at the morning service; but I concluded it was best not to say so to the rest. Mr. and Mrs. York, at this service, by their beautiful rendering of familiar hymns (assisted by Dr. Miller, of course), made it a most enjoyable meeting. I spoke on the text at the head of this paper, and was happy, even though I had decided to stay all day at the hotel, or near it. I think that God was pleased, if I may so express it, at my willingness to give up for his sake. Now, dear friends, do not think me visionary when I say I feel that, after thus giving up, he bade me go. I know I am approaching dangerous ground for a spiritual teacher to take, but I believe there is solid rock under my feet.

"Our service was over, and I went out near the brink. I had said to some I would advise avoiding hiring horses or setting anybody to work on Sunday, as far as possible, and a little crowd of bee-keepers was starting out on foot. Only one of our number rode a pony. I said, 'Why, boys, if you are going on foot, take off your coats, and, better, vests too. Do not carry an ounce more than you are obliged to. Then you have no canes. You must all get a stout light cane, and, above all, each one must carry a bottle of water. It is five miles over the hardest road you ever traveled before you can get a drop of water.'

"Now, it was right here that the Holy Spirit told me to go with these friends and be one of them; at least I felt so then, and I feel so now. I felt very sure that I could contribute to their comfort and happiness, and God gave me strength and endurance that day that made me praise him all day long. We sat down often, and took in the grandeur of that scene. We had confidential talks while we rested; and when we reached a beautiful spring, near the tents, we bathed, not only our dirty hands and faces, but our tired and sometimes sore feet.

"Now, lest I leave the impression that it may not be so very bad to plan a Sunday excursion, let me give you an incident. As we were washing in the brook we saw two men cutting wood to bring in to the hotel, on mules. As we sat at dinner in the tent, one of our party said:

"'I was never more astonished in my life than when I saw those men cutting wood, and drawing it in on Sunday.' The remark was made so loud the two men at another table heard it. I saw the face of one flush a little, and feared we should have a jangle there on Sunday. Soon his reply came, in an even and steady tone:

"'And I was never more astonished in my life than when I saw your crew coming down here on a "Sunday excursion." And after all the profession you fellows make, I should like to know who is most guilty. One of you has been kind enough to say we have given you a good dinner; but this dinner gave us a lot of work, and hard work too.'

"The man was right. I for one felt the justice and fairness of his rebuke, and I resolved then and there to take still more care not to be again entrapped in a Sunday excursion.

"We did not take the long trip down to the brink of the river, but followed a path to the edge of a precipice where we could see the yellow muddy waters of the Colorado River where it rushed between the rocks, for four or five miles, but it was 1000 feet or more below where we stood, and nearly straight down. It looked almost as if one could wade through it; but a man who had been down to the water's edge said it was too wide to throw a stone across it. We started from the tents about 2 p. m., to walk up the trail, and took it very leisurely, stopping often to sit down and gaze at the dizzy heights above us. The eye can take in the real distance above far better than in looking down. I do not know why this is so. In going up, a queer optical illusion confronted us almost constantly. The wall of rock in front seemed solid, without any possible opening; but when we marched right up to where it seemed the trail must enter a tunnel, an opening canyon gradually unfolded. One of our party said his heart was beating so hard he feared palpitation that had troubled him when a boy; and as he feared to be alone he asked me to slow up with him; and as I was pretty tired too we fell behind the rest. Well, when the first ones reached the hotel my friends were so anxious about me, mainly on account of my age, they sent a man with two saddle-horses after me. This cost $1.50, the usual price for bringing up one who gives out on the way. We planned in the morning to go on foot, so as to avoid hiring any one to work on Sunday. Some of the crowd earned their dinner, for this reason. I knew I should need a good square meal; and as the price was 75 cts. at either place, I reasoned it would be no worse to get it below. You see how it turned out. In spite of my planning, two men worked hard to get up my dinner, and a man and two horses came after me toward night. As it was, I appreciated seeing the strength of a horse take the place of my own; and I also keenly enjoyed watching the horse as he skillfully planted his feet in making the difficult passages, climbing rocky stairs, etc. I do not suppose a horse will ever fall if he has the full rein, and is allowed to decide for himself if it is possible for him to make the passage. A thousand feet or more straight down has no terrors for these trained mountain horses. All horses are shy of going where the footing is insecure; but when they can see and feel the solid rock under their feet, and when they can also see where other horses have gone before them, they soon bring into play their excellent judgment, or, perhaps I should say, 'horse sense.' Monday I felt so well and strong I walked part way down the trail again just for the fun of it; but Tuesday my muscles were so sore I could hardly walk until I had got limbered up; and I didn't get entirely over this soreness of the muscles for three or four days.

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

See also a parenthetical reminiscence with York (1919).

"Before the train left, we took a carriage drive to Rowe's Point, where the river is visible in three different places. At Sentinel Point the cliff is a full mile higher than the water in the river. A glass is a great aid in looking off these great elevations; but even with the glass, the human eye refuses, as it were, to recognize these vast distances. At the hotel we were told Rowe's Point was three miles distant. The books say it is 1¾ miles; and those of our party who went on foot thought it even less. You can make big wages going on foot. Quite a few ladies make the whole canyon on foot. We had a very pleasant talk with two who had made Yosemite, and were then making the eight-mile trail at Grand Canyon. These two women were alone and unattended.

"Grand Canyon is worthy of all that has been said about it; and I do not know that I ever heard of any one who felt disappointed when he came to see it.

"Now a concluding word in regard to our text. If we acknowledge God in all our ways he will direct our paths; but we can not, as a rule, lay out paths for others; and oftentimes we can not even lay out paths for ourselves. Furthermore, God often calls on us to tread unexpected paths."

[For another perspective of a Sabbath-related visit to the Grand Canyon, read the accounts of the disastrous day when 2,000 Methodists descended on the fledgling village in 1904 and were stuck there—see Davidson (1904) and Herben (1904).]

St. John, C. E.

551 1903 A secretary's journal. I. The Christian Register (Boston), (April 9): 433-435.

St. John just threw up his hands at Grand Canyon while en route to California. The entire note:

"The Grand Cañon was reached at sundown Tuesday, February 24. Of the day and a half spent on the brink and in the depths of the mightiest chasm on earth, this is not the place to write. Enough to say that whoever goes to California by the Santa Fé route without stopping to submit his mind to this spectacle has passed within an easy sixty miles of the one thing that is more worth seeing than any other object on this sphere. Fitting portal, these flaming, incalculable precipices, to the revelations which the Golden State contains for the visitor who after another day's journey awakes for the first time amid the verdure of the land whence summer never departs." (ENTIRE NOTE)

Sill, Louise Morgan

552 1903 The Canyon of the Colorado. New York Observer, 81 (February 5): 162.

Reprints Sill (1901).

553 1903 [Verse regarding the Colorado River in Grand Canyon.] In: Devins, John Bancroft, The onward sweep of Presbyterianism—XIV. In the Grand Canyon of the Colorado—Presbyterians spend the day in the Titan of Chasms. New York Observer, 81(34) (August 20): 234.

Extract credited to "Louisa (sic) Morgan Sill" in Harper's Weekly (i.e., Sill, 1901).

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

Smith, L. Eaton

554 1903 Flying visits to the City of Mexico and the Pacific coast. Liverpool, England: H. Young and Sons, 111 pp. [25 numbered copies only.]

See in [Part 2] of the volume, "The Pacific Coast" (a trip made in 1902), Chapter II, "The Grand Cañon" (pp. 97-111), with the canyon visit appearing on pp. 102-111. An interesting experience on the very cusp of rail travel through to the canyon; and a delightfully open set of impressions not usually offered.

"From Williams a branch line leads in three hours to the lip of the cañon, and a primitive hotel. On this line there is but one train a day, and in order to make a good connection we had had to come, not by the train de luxe, but by a more ordinary conveyance. The principal practical differences were that the pace was rather slower, the stops more frequent, and that as there was no dining-car we had to get out to snatch our meals. The eating-houses were, on the whole, well appointed and the food good. The drawback indeed was that they tried to give one too much in a limited time, and this, combined with the feeling inseparable to meals on a journey of must-eat-now-or-you-never-know-when-you-may-get-another-chance, would, I think, produce disastrous consequences if kept up all the way across the Continent.

"From Williams a ridiculous little train of two cars, with an old-fashioned wood-burning engine, took us off into the night. The engine made a great deal of bustle, and threw off a continual shower of sparks that would have done credit to any fifth of November. The hills were very steep, and there was a good deal of snow already, and more was falling, so that we had a little doubt if we could get through, and having got through, if we could get out of the wilderness again.

"The three hours in the overheated little car seemed to stretch out interminably, but at last, about ten o'clock, we stopped. There were a few lights to be seen, but no station. The principal notice to stop, in fact—for I need not say there were no signals or other such signs of over-elaboration—was the fact that the rails went no farther. We discovered in the morning that there was some pretence of a station, inasmuch as a sign-board, bearing the words "Grand Cañon," rose abruptly beside the line.

"In a moment lanterns appeared, and by their help and that of a great engine head-light fastened to a tree, we found our way up the newly made path in the snow to the hotel. There were about nine or ten inches of snow everywhere, and more to follow, and the night was black and misty. We passed some out-buildings and tents, used in the summer by excursionists, but now looking anything but inviting in their covering of snow, and then turning sharp to the right, came to the hotel. It was just as well to turn, because, though no sign of it could be seen on such a night, the mouth of the cañon, with a drop of 6000 feet, lay a few yards ahead in the straight path. This sounds more exciting than facts might bear out, as owing to trees near the lip, and the slope in the sides of the cañon, one could not have fallen more than a few hundred feet at the first intent.

"The hotel, which rejoiced in the name of Bright Angel Hotel after an old trail of that name, was originally a log cabin. This still remained, and looked picturesque and inviting, with a long fringe of icicles from the roof and a bright glow through the windows. It had added to itself various wooden buildings, more or less adjoining, so that twenty or thirty people could be put up. There were perhaps a dozen while we were there, including the ubiquitous German tourist.

"The interior was very inviting, but desperately overheated, a fact, however, we did not at first quarrel with. The bare logs of the walls were hung with gay Indian blankets, and more of these were on the floor. A small counter in one corner enclosed the office, and in the centre was a great wood-fed stove. On one side opened a similar room, intended more especially for ladies, with an open log fire, and on the other a more orthodox dining-room.

"Around the fire in easy chairs and attitudes were half-a-dozen men of the real frontiersman type, long in the leg and loose in the limb, with drooping moustaches and flapping slouch hats. Probably they all had revolvers, though I was disappointed in seeing no evidence of these. They were the guides for the cañon, and also the various porters and hangers-on of the hotel. One indeed was the proprietor, though he was identical in all respects with the rest, and neither claimed nor received any deference. When the train conductor came in carrying the tiny mailbag the circle was complete. If some of the men had rather a ferocious air their looks belied

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

them, for they were a very quiet lot of people, and quite ready to talk to the tenderfoot, on a basis of absolute equality only, I need hardly say.

"Some supper was obtained with difficulty, for in an American hotel, managed on the old-fashioned lines, the dining-room is only open for meals at stated hours, and when it shuts it shuts, and the late-comer must wait hungry till the next advertised meal hour. For this reason we had one morning at Bakersfield almost missed our early train, as the dining-room should not open till 6.30 A.M., and therefore every difficulty was raised by the kitchen department to serving breakfast at 6.15.

"We were put up in an annexe a few yards away. It was simply a passage with a row of little rooms on either side. The only method of heating these was by little wood stoves which seemed not to have been lighted for months, and as a result the cold was of unexampled clamminess and piercingness. However, the stoves were soon lighted and quickly made a small part of the rooms unbearably hot, and as the beds were good the cold was soon forgotten. Early next morning, while it was still dark, I was awakened by the inroad of a queer little man, who looked more like a monkey in a striped jersey, jabbering very broken English, but discovered it was only the Japanese servant to light the stove. When we got up the out-look was dismal. The whole place was shrouded in mist, and so far as seeing the cañon was concerned we might have been in Clapham. There at least we should have had more chance of getting away, as the only train away from the cañon left at 9 A.M. The question then was whether to stay on till the next day's train and risk being snowed up, which seemed by no means improbable and might involve my missing my boat at New York, or to reconcile ourselves to disappointment and depart at once while we had the chance.

"We decided we had better risk it and stay, so we played picquet in our rooms as the sitting-rooms were so cruelly hot, or tramped up and down the veranda. It was like being on the deck of a ship, waiting for the fog to lift so that we could get on.

"About one o'clock it stopped snowing and then the mists began to disperse, and we were well rewarded for our journey. The cañon lay before us, '260 miles long, 13 miles broad, 6000 feet deep, and painted like a flower,' as the railway guide had told us. These bald facts give at least some idea of its size, nor can I hope to give any description in the least adequate to the grandeur and impressiveness of the sight. The most evident thing about the cañon is that it is not a valley among hills, but a fissure in a great plateau, with smaller fissures running off at right angles like gigantic cracks in sun-baked clay. The sides were not perpendicular as I had expected, but sloped inwards in a series of steps formed by the different strata. Nor did they run in rigid straight lines, but rather in endless capricious curves like the edge of a wave flooding over a sandy beach.

"Bright Angel Hotel was at the head of a little side cañon, down which we looked, and from where we were the bottom of the great cañon seemed a broad flat plain; but really this was but a false bottom some 4500 feet below us, and the cañon fell another 1500 feet in a narrow precipitous gorge down which the river rushed, though from where we stood we could see only the narrow black line of the top of this gorge.

"There was then an enormous broad cañon with sloping sides, which ran back into countless bays and indentations, and in the flat bottom of this a deep narrow crack. From the lower plain rose in places fantastic conical hills, in which the horizontal strata appeared again as rings. These apparently had been left when the broad cañon was carved out. The view as the mist rolled away was very grand, headland after headland appearing through the clouds till almost the entire view was bare.

"They had assured us that though it was snowing with us it would not be snowing at the bottom of the cañon, and in fact they had sent many of their horses down to the lower plateau to escape the snow. We had of course accepted the natives' statements even if wondering, but when the mist rose we found they were confirmed, for the snow ceased at a clearly defined line half-way down to the plateau. The colour of the rocks did not come out well and they were nearly all one warm red, but this was to some extent compensated for by the snow, which lay in narrow white lines along all the steps in the cañon's sides and in rings round the little hills, thus greatly accentuating this very characteristic horizontal effect. The extreme clearness of the atmosphere made all the distances seem much less than they really were, and so made the first sight rather disappointing.

"The pine trees, which grew all about the hotel on the upper plateau, did not go more than a few hundred feet down the slope. It is quite possible to go on horseback down a trail to the lower level, and that is the usual

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

excursion, but owing to the snow it was impossible for us, so we had to content ourselves with a drive to another point of view. We went off in a light waggon with four horses. The horses had been for some days idly kicking their heels in the paddock, and so were in great spirits. We drove through a foot of snow down a twisting narrow path among the trees at a most exhilarating pace. The driver worked the brake with his foot, but the unusual thing was that it was not an ordinary foot-brake, but a tall lever like a hand-brake, though rather farther forward, so that he had to be rather gymnastic to get his foot up to it, but once in place he had a tremendous purchase. He told me he used to drive the coach up to the Grand Cañon before the railway was through, sometimes with two horses, sometimes four, sometimes six, according to the load. We drove two or three miles to Storey's Point, whence we could see more of the Grand Cañon itself, and also see right down to the muddy, rushing river. The whole view was indescribably magnificent.

"That night it snowed again, and when we left the next morning, the whole country was covered with fresh snow which shone dazzlingly under a bright sun. •••

"It had been indeed a flying visit, inasmuch as I had been seventeen nights away from New York and nine of them in the train, and naturally it was so short not from choice but from necessity. But I think it was quite worth the labour because of the interest of the oil-fields, a part of California little known, and because of the beauty of the Grand Cañon. The latter is now so accessible that people are beginning to visit it more and more. With the march of civilisation the picturesque Bright Angel Hotel is to give way to a large modern one, so that it is an added pleasure to have seen the cañon before all the local colour was wiped away, and possibly the wonderful landscape, which depends for part of its charm at least on its remoteness, vulgarised."

Stratton, Deane

- 555 1903 The Arizona "Dreibund". The Shield (Theta Delta Chi, Ithaca, New York), 19(4) (December): 357-358.

Letter, with introductory paragraph by the editor. Includes:

". . . took the train once more, . . . I going on to Williams, thence to the Grand Cañon. That wonder quite beggars comparison and description! I simply stood and looked, with my mouth open.

"Next day I rode down the trail from the rim to the river—a trip of 7 miles each way and a drop of about 6000 feet. It's a right nice trip, for by rubbing one leg hard against the cliff, and letting the other hang over a half mile drop the horse finds the trail comfortably wide: while he turns corners on a ten cent piece at an angle which allows one to kick his nose while braiding his tail." (ENTIRE NOTE)

Stroehlin, Ernest [Stroehlin, Ernest]

- 556 1903 Aux États-Unis : impressions de nature et souvenirs historiques : conférence faite le 26 février 1903 à l'Athénée pour la Séance Annuelle de la Société des Arts. Genève: Henry Kundig, 47 pp. [In French.]

(transl. 'In the United States: impressions of nature and historical memories: lecture given on February 26, 1903 at the Athénée for the Annual Session of the Société des Arts')

Text of a lecture about the speaker's visit to the U.S. In discussing the Grand Canyon of the Yellowstone, Stroehlin points to the grander canyon of the Colorado River, first describing its grand dimensions and gigantic forms, then:

"L'érosion et d'autres agents, atmosphériques ou géologiques, ont si puissamment travaillé les masses, que, loin de rester uniformément verticales, elles ont subi de formidables entailles et se dressent comme autant de piliers et de tours gigantesques, séparées entre elles par des cirques latéraux et différant par la configuration architecturale des assises, comme par l'escarpement plus ou moins vertigineux des pentes. Le voyageur assiste véritablement à un spectacle titanesque et voit, selon le vers fameux de la mythologie grecque, Pélion s'entasser sur Ossa.

"Votre émotion est d'autant plus vive que rien ne vous avait préparé à une apparition aussi grandiose. Vous sortez d'épaisses forêts qu'un chariot, vierge de tout ressort, a franchies en une série de bonds aussi brusques

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

que pénibles pour vos membres endoloris, vous arrivez devant un mechant hôtel ou plutôt devant un groupe de cabanes indiennes; où vous ne pouvez vous attendre qu'à la plus rudimentaire hospitalité, vous traversez une salle basse et tout à coup vous vous trouvez face à face avec cette suite imposante de Babels, qui se dessinent fièrement sur le ciel bleu.

"L'aspect change avec chaque nouveau détour du fleuve, à mesure que vous gagnez un autre promontoire. La coloration, elle aussi, se transforme avec chaque heure du jour et varie du jaune paille au rouge sombre. Il faudrait le pinceau prestigieux de Théophile Gautier pour décrire l'image d'un lever ou d'un coucher du soleil dans ces étranges parages. Seul, l'illustre peintre romantique se serait montré à la hauteur de cette audacieuse gageure et aurait dédaigné, pour la résoudre, de se rendre sur les lieux.

"Les Américains, pour exprimer l'originalité saisissante de ces extraordinaires paysages—et mon admiration recueillie était à chaque instant troublée par l'apostrophe triomphante de quelque jolie miss: «Vous n'avez rien de semblable en Europe!»—les Américains ont eu recours à la mythologie hindoue et ont vu dans ces masses superbes autant de sanctuaires dédiés l'un à Brahma, un autre à Siva, un troisième à Vishnou. La comparaison est ingénieuse, mais, quant à moi, je serai resté sur le sol national, car ces roches bizarres m'ont immédiatement rappelé les pyramides aux multiples gradins élevées par les Aztèques en l'honneur de leurs divinités farouches, pour la célébration de leur culte sanguinaire."

(translation)

'Erosion and other agents, atmospheric or geological, have worked the masses so powerfully that, far from remaining uniformly vertical, they have undergone formidable notches and stand like so many pillars and gigantic towers, separated from each other by lateral cirques and differing in the architectural configuration of the foundations, as well as in the more or less vertiginous escarpment of the slopes. The traveler truly attends a titanic spectacle and sees, according to the famous verse of Greek mythology, Pelion stacked upon Ossa.

'Your emotion is all the more vivid because nothing had prepared you for such a grandiose appearance. You come out of thick forests which a cart, devoid of any spring, has crossed in a series of leaps as sudden as painful for your aching limbs, you arrive in front of a bad hotel or rather in front of a group of Indian huts; where you can expect only the most rudimentary hospitality, you walk through a low hall and suddenly find yourself face to face with this imposing suite of Babels, looming proudly against the blue sky.

'The aspect changes with each new detour of the river, as you reach another promontory. The coloring, too, changes with each hour of the day and varies from straw yellow to dark red. It would take the prestigious brush of Théophile Gautier to describe the image of a sunrise or a sunset in these strange surroundings. Alone, [only] the illustrious romantic painter would have risen to the occasion of this audacious challenge—and would have disdained to resolve it, [or even] to go to the scene.

'The Americans, to express the striking originality of these extraordinary landscapes—and my reverent admiration was constantly troubled by the triumphant apostrophe of some pretty miss: "You have nothing like it in Europe!"—the Americans have had recourse to Hindu mythology and have seen in these superb masses so many sanctuaries dedicated, one to Brahma, another to S[h]iva, and a third to Vishnu. The comparison is ingenious, but, as for me, I would have remained on national soil, because these bizarre rocks immediately reminded me of the multi-tiered pyramids erected by the Aztecs in honor of their fierce deities, for the celebration of their bloodthirsty cult.'

T., H. S.

557 1903 On the Bright Angel Trail in the Grand Canyon of the Colorado. New Century Path, 6(30) (June 7): 12.

See also cover illustration, with legend (p. 2), "On the Rim of the Grand Canyon". It is not clear whether or not the author writes of a personal experience. The article is illustrated with four small photos of scenes at Grand Canyon; not credited but are among the usual promotional views. Most of the article comprises effusive, generalistic descriptions of the canyon, and all of the ways in which it cannot be expressed, but includes the observations:

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

"One's opinion of human ability and greatness sinks like a barometer before a storm as the first view of nature's masterpiece bursts before one's gaze. You are almost at the brink before a sign of the Canyon can be seen, then it bursts upon you in all its colossal splendor, causing an involuntary short quick gasp for breath, and a half-ejaculated, long-drawn-out Oh! Now if you will only rise to the occasion and get en rapport with nature, you will learn a lesson that can never be learned from any book or from any teacher except the great teacher of all, that divinity which dwelleth everywhere, an aspect of which we sometimes conceal under the name of 'nature.' • • • Unfortunately there are some who look upon the spot as a mere out-of-the-way 'Coney Island.' To them the sublimity is non-existent, the beauties merely vagaries of one's fancy, the immense distances too great a tax on their feeble brains to bother with. They come simply to rush down the trails to the Colorado river at the bottom as quickly as possible, rush to the top again in time enough to eat a 'thundering good meal,' a revel and a dance, and a rush for the first train away. Their only purpose in coming was to be able to boast of their feat and say, 'I have seen the Grand Canyon and climbed down to the river.' Truly they have done so with their body, but it might just as well have been carried down and up again in a box, for all the good it has done them."

Thompson, Charles L.

- 558 1903 The perspective of missions : an address before the General Assembly in Los Angeles, California : May twenty-sixth Nineteen hundred and three. [No imprint], 24 pp. (Board of Home Missions, General Assembly.)

See p. 24:

"I stood the other day at the edge of the Grand Canyon of the Colorado. All around were the signs of elemental wars—the crashes of Titan forces, now tossing mountains on the volcano's fiery hands, now plowing them a mile deep with the plowshare of glaciers, or carving them out with the blade of the river. But as the evening light played over soundless chasm, granite wall and splintered pinnacle, it revealed a glory like that which John beheld in the city of God.

With their wild prismatic light aglow
They hint the walls of eternal days,
Where onyx and jasper and gold will blaze
And the river of life will flow.

"Then in presence of that architecture of geologic ages one must exclaim, 'What hath God wrought!' And still He works—not on rocks which will be pulverized by the crash of worlds—but on souls, scarred by fires of passion, torn by Titans of evil. Still He works on a kingdom rent and chaotic but sublime even in its wreckage. The ages and his people are his ministers. And when time's evening glow plays over the scene of human toil and sacrifice, that which was scarred and torn shall catch the lustre of pearl and jasper, of opal and amethyst, and to men and angels, in glory beyond utterance it shall appear 'The Kingdom of God is with men' and 'The beauty of the Lord is upon us.'"

Trelease, William

- 559 1903 The Academy of Science of St. Louis. In: Societies and Academies [SECTION]. Science, New Series, 17 (June 5) (440): 907-908.

Includes notice of a lecture illustrated by lantern slides, by C. Barck, including Grand Canyon geology and description of "its first deliberate crossing" by "Mr. James" [presumably George Wharton James] and Barck, from Bass Camp to Point Sublime.

Whiting, Lilian

- 560 1903 The life radiant. Boston: Little, Brown, and Co., 375 pp.

See "A Summer Pilgrimage in Arizona", pp. 226-237.

"No pilgrimage of the Crusaders of old could be more impressive in its spiritual results than that which can be made to-day to the Grand Cañon of the Colorado in Arizona. The majesty and sublimity of the scene suggest

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

another world, not, indeed, an 'Inferno,' but a 'Paradiso.' It is a sea of color, a very New Jerusalem, on which one looks down from the rim of this Titanic chasm. It is a vision not less wonderful than that beheld by Saint John in the Isle of Patmos.

"The term 'cañon' is a misnomer for this supreme marvel of earth. One journeys to it anticipating a colossal variation on Cheyenne Cañon or the Royal Gorge. Instead, what does the tourist see? . . . the splendor of apparent architectural creations arrests the eye. 'Solomon's Temple,' the 'Temple of Vishnu,' and altars, minarets, towers, pagodas, colonnades, as if designed by architectural art, lie grouped in wonderful combinations of form and color."

From here, Whiting quotes extensively from Higgins (1892), though without credit, which, as with Higgins, comes down really to a summary comment:

"To contemplate this marvellous and sublime spectacle is to come into a new perception of the Divine creation. • • •

"The Grand Cañon alone is worth a pilgrimage around the world to see,—a spectacle so bewildering that words are powerless to suggest the living, changing picture."

Wood, Henry Cleveland

561 1903 The Grand Canyon. The Four-Track News (New York), 5(4) (October): 261.

I stood upon the rim of some strange world—
Vague, silent, mystical—its depths unfurled
In splendid, sloping terraces, mist-hung,
And wondrous in the shifting colors flung
Like draperies of gauze 'twixt space and sun.
    A sleeping silver snake, seen from the heights,
The far-off river rushing to its doom.
    From startling depths a city rose to view,
    Builted in ages when the earth was new—
Vast hanging gardens, gay in mineral bloom,
Enchanted castles, silent as the tomb;
    Domes, towers and ramparts, bathed in violet lights,
And tints—an artist's rapture and despair—
Ten million sunsets must have shattered there.

1904

Anonymous

562 1904 San Diego, Cal. In: Church Notes [SECTION]. Lutheran Observer (Lancaster and Philadelphia), 72(4) (January 22): 16 [also paginated concurrently for volume, 112].

"Rev. H. J. Weaver gave his stereopticon lecture on the Grand Canyon of the Colorado, illustrated by 75 colored views of the highest order of artistic merit. The lecture was pronounced superior to the views." (ENTIRE ITEM)

563 1904 Master plumbers in California; to our better halves. The Plumbers' Trade Journal [AND] Gas, Steam and Hot Water Fitters' Review, (February 1): 127-128.

Regarding a convention trip to California. Includes a brief retelling a descent into Grand Canyon on Bright Angel Trail, which includes every inch of embroidery that has been dutifully turned out by almost every other trail rider of the day:

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

"A certain manufacturer's representative who had an exhibit at the California Hotel was one of a party of ladies and gentlemen who took in the Grand Canon of Arizona on the return [j]ourney.

"A trip on burros down the Bright Angel trail into the canon was decided upon and after the necessary preparation the party sallied forth. The trail is a rather dangerous looking one, being simply for the most part a ledge hewn out of the solid rock walls varying from two to five feet in width and rarely at a less angle than 45 degrees, but for all that the guides will tell you that they have never had an accident, thanks to the wonderful sure-footedness of the patient little burros.

"When the party had descended about half way down most of them were physically tired or in nervous dread—some of them were both—though all were making a stiff bluff of feeling fine.

"Our manufacturing friend was very brave outwardly, but at one point, when his burro, as is their habit, stepped very close to the edge of the trail, cocked his ears and poked his head over to see the next descent, he was seen to bend over until his mouth was fairly in the little animal's ear and then was heard to exclaim in solemn seriousness 'You — — little fool you! Don't go so close.'

"The situation was far more ridiculous than the mere recital of it can portray and the great wonder is that the convulsed auditors didn't drop off the trail before their normal composure returned to them." (ENTIRE NOTE)

564 1904 The Spectator. The Outlook (New York), 76(7) (February 13): 399-400.
Column by "Spectator". See p. 399, item mentioning travelers' expectations of places, noting, "he expects what he finds"; with an example: "Even the Grand Cañon of the Colorado came to be a convenient receptacle for rubbish to the Chinese cook employed in the hotel upon its brink, and the Spectator has seen him slide potato-parings into that stupendous chasm without visible emotion." (ENTIRE NOTE)

565 1904 Social events. The Miami Student (Miami University, Miami, Ohio), 23(8) (May): 263-264.
See p. 263: "Mr. Henry Peabody, of Boston, Mass., gave an illustrated lecture before the students of Western College, Friday evening, April fifteenth, using for his theme, 'In the Footsteps of Cortez.' Mr. Peabody is a man of wide experience and an able lecturer. By request on Saturday evening he gave a second illustrated lecture entitled 'Arizona and the Grand Canon.' Both lectures were well chosen and the beautiful pictures were interesting to the audience." (ENTIRE NOTE)

566 1904 The Santa Fe. The Railroad Telegrapher, 21(5) (May): 603-604, (6) (June): 747-749.
News and information includes lengthy, disparaging comments relating to the more than 3000 Methodists en route to General Conference in Los Angeles, stranded for more than a day on the Grand Canyon line due to overexerted engines and failure of the road bed, and the overcrowding of facilities at Grand Canyon.

567 1904 [Lecture.] The Standard (A Baptist Newspaper) (Chicago), 51(42) (June 18): 29 [also paginated consecutively for the volume, 1309].
"Rev. Herman J. Powell gave his lecture on the 'Grand Canon' before the boys' brotherhood of the Memorial Church of Los Angeles, Cal., on May 20. Rev. C. C. Pierce is the pastor of this aggressive church." (ENTIRE NOTE)

568 1904 The Brigham lecture. The Miami Student (Miami University, Miami, Ohio), 24(3) (December): 94.
Review of lecture by Nat M. Brigham on "Grand Canyon of the Colorado". Also notes forthcoming lectures in Cincinnati and at the White House in Washington, D.C., "at the special invitation of President Roosevelt, his old classmate [at Harvard University], to lecture before a select company."

569 1904 California fragments. Lutheran Observer, 72(49) (December 2): 17 [also paginated 1553].
Includes note: "Pastor Oehler, of the German church, Sacramento, recently delivered his two new lectures, 'The wonders of the Grand Cañon' and 'The Rhine and its Beautiful Lengends,' [sic] to large audiences in the Congregational church of that city. The daily papers spoke in terms of the highest praise of the lectures, both

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

of which are the result of Rev. Oehler's own investigations and labors, even to the making and coloring of the slides." (ENTIRE NOTE)

- 570 1904 Rapport sur les conférences. In: Assemblée Générale du 15 Décembre 1904. Société de Géographie d'Alger et de l'Afrique du Nord, Bulletin, 9(4): clx-clxii. [In French.]
(transl. 'Report on conferences.')

See p. clxi, reviewing a lecture: "Avec M. Barbedette, nous rentrons dans le domaine géographique. Sa parole nette, précise nous a dévoilé les beautés de l'Amérique de l'Ouest, et à sa suite, nous avons pu admirer ce colossal et merveilleux grand Canyon de l'Arizona, ce Titan des abîmes, comme l'appellent les Américains." (ENTIRE NOTE) (transl. 'With Mr. Barbedette, we are entering the geographical domain. His clear, precise speech revealed to us the beauties of Western America, and following him, we were able to admire this colossal and marvelous Grand Canyon of Arizona, this Titan of the abysses, as the Americans call it.')

Barbedette, F.

- 571 1904 A travers l'Ouest Américain. Société de Géographie d'Alger et de l'Afrique du Nord, Bulletin, 8(1): 209-220. [In French.]
(transl. 'Across the American West.')

Grand Canyon, pp. 211-215. Alas, he displayed only black-and-white images that he had taken of the canyon: "Je ferai passer devant vos yeux une série de clichés que j'ai rapportés. Il vous donneront peut être une faible idée de la structure du Grand Canyon; ils seront hélas! impuissants à vous en rendre l'effet, car il leur manque la couleur." (transl. 'I will pass before your eyes a series of shots that I brought back. They may give you a faint idea of the structure of the Grand Canyon; they will be alas! powerless to render the effect to you, for they lack the color')

Bryan, William Jennings

- 572 1904 The wonders of the West. The Commoner (Lincoln, Nebraska), (October 7):.

Includes Grand Canyon, and is reprinted from time to time in various venues. See the Santa Fe Employes' Magazine, 2(8) (July 1908): 564-567, where this is reprinted but includes there a 1904 Kolb Bros. photograph of a lone Bryan astride a mule at the top of Bright Angel Trail. His remarks—part boring travel guide, part homily—are surprisingly common for a great orator. At his most original he tells us "There are 'sermons in stones' and the stones of this canyon preach many impressive ones" (but fails to mention that the "sermons in stones" are William Shakespeare's—"As You Like It", Act 2, Scene 1). "They not only testify to the omnipotence of the Creator but they record the story of a stream which both molds and is molded by its environment. It can not escape from the walls of its prison and yet it has made its impress upon the granite as, in obedience to the law of gravitation, it has gone dashing and foaming on its path to the sea." He remarks, "How like a human life!"—"The Colorado, pure and clear in the mountains, becomes a dark and muddy flood before it reaches the ocean, so contaminated is it by the soil through which it passes . . ." And, "The river also teaches a sublime lesson of patience."

Crosfield, Gulielma

- 573 1904 Two sunny winters in California. London: Headley Brothers, 187 [188] pp.

See "The Grand Canyon", pp. 143-154; letter written from "Auditorium Hotel, Chicago, March." An English Quaker woman's delightfully detailed account of a visit to Grand Canyon, apparently in 1902.

From the train, "In the dark we saw piled up snow along the track, and when we reached the end of the line, we had to scramble up a slippery snow path, to the little inn, the best way we could.

"Arrived there, the door opened upon a cosy, crowded, hot little office, where the anxious proprietor was doing his best to fit twenty guests with rooms all at once. We had telegraphed for ours and soon got the key.

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

Who in this motley crowd answers to the bell-boy? A little calling brings a lanky Californian, in a sombrero, who slouches along with our 'grips' out into the cold air, some way over planks, some way under cover, till we get to a small box with a large stove, where we do our best to sleep and dress when we want to, during the next two days."

On a trail trip into the canyon, "We had not gone far, before the great scene before us was filled with mists, rusing over the cliffs with incredible swiftness, and soon were were wrapped in a snow-storm. • • • By the time we had reached the limit of our ride, the sun began to shine.

"How to describe what we saw I really do not know. We were standing on one of the promontories overhanging the steep and last wall of the Canyon. • • •

"[This is] the most wonderful thing I really believe that exists on earth. • • •

"Then whew! up came another shrieking storm. Once more the snow-mists came dancing and tumbling over the stupendous walls above us on every hand, bringing to mind the troll dance in Grieg's music of Pier Gynt. In a moment we were in the heart of it. The guide insisted on our mounting at once, and when we faced it, the cold blasts almost sucked the breath out of us. How it howled, and screamed, and beat, and whirled; but it seemed part of the Great Pre-historic Pantomime, and I think we all enjoyed the life of it. I vaguely wondered what our path would be like blocked with snow, but trotted on my best with my eyes half shut and my face stinging with snow pellets, and my feet as cold as ice, exposed to the bitter wind.

"Happily before we reached the bad ascent, the hobgoblins had had enough of it. They gathered up their long tailed draperies, and skipped off as suddenly as they had come, till hardly a peaked cap peered over the crags of them. The sun fought his way out. Brilliant rainbows flecked the precipices, wings of fresh snow lay over the brows of the crags, fleecy snow-banners blew out where the winds still swept round the angles of the rocks, and we could soon piece together again the grand sweep of the amphitheatre, which we had lost in whirling wreaths of snow for a while."

From the hotel, "numbers of tourists were gazing all the time; one remarked it was 'the cutest thing they had struck yet.' One of the ladies and I managed to collect quite a choice collection of sayings, but I have not time or space to repeat them. • • •

"The next day was perfect, so bright and still, and the colours very brilliant. But it lacked the romance of the previous day. • • •

"Judging from these two railway journeys we have made, I should say American scenery was all scraped together and compressed into a few remarkable spots, and the rest of the country left without any . . . ."

Daneš, Jiří V.

- 574 1904 Exkurse ke Grand Cañonu a do Mexika. In: Zprávy [SECTION]. České Společnosti Zeměvědné, Sborník (Nákladem české společnosti zeměvědné, Praze), 10(10) (December): 230-231. [In Czech.]
(transl. 'Excursions to the Grand Canyon and Mexico.')

Brief summary of the field excursion of the 8th International Geographical Congress.

Darby, G. W.

- 575 1904 [Regarding members' trip to national convention in Los Angeles.] In: Links [SECTION]. Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, Monthly Journal, 38(7) (July): 530-531.

Includes notes regarding a stop at Grand Canyon; in their entirety:

"On account of there being no engine ready at Williams, we did not arrive at the Grand Canyon until after sunset. All other scenes on the face of the globe pale into insignificance when compared with this sublime and majestic work of the erosive elements of nature during the untold ages of the past. This canyon is 217 miles long, from 13 to 18 miles wide and 6,000 to 7,000 feet deep. Sculptured, towered, terraced and pillared, plateaued, battlemented and castellated in many different colors, it presents a scene of grandeur which pen fails

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

to describe. Our party divided, some taking the trail, others the rim. Bros. Souerbeck and Hukill took the trail afoot. The balance of the trail party went on burros. Sourbeck gave out and dropped by the trail. Hukill barely reached the top chirping for water, having left all his water with Souerbeck. And those who were mounted were very sore and tired when they reached the rim as this trail descends 2,000 feet in the first two miles. Those who took the drive were treated to scenes of beauty from Sentinel, Rowe's and O'Neil's [sic] points that cannot be duplicated anywhere else in the world."

Davidson, W. L.

- 576 1904 To the Pacific coast and back. The University Courier (American University, Washington, D.C.), 11(2) (July): 6-8. [Item signed "W. L. D."]

Includes remarks about the disastrous day, April 28, when 2,000 Methodists in 93 Pullman cars descended on Grand Canyon. (See also a more detailed recollection by Herben, below.) Davidson begins with remarks on the aridity of the region as they made their way across Arizona.

"The appalling thing is the absence of water. We were hoping to see a river, or at least a brook in that chasm yonder ahead, but when we approach it we find it absolutely dry, and yet giving evidence where, in the time of freshet, it had been swept by a mighty torrent. At certain places we were told that rain had not fallen for three years. Within a few miles of the Grand Canyon it was said that rain had not come for eleven months, but when those Methodist excursionists struck the Canyon the heavens were opened and rain, mixed with snow, came down to gladden the parched earth. Will any one of the two thousand Methodists who spent that Sunday, April 28th, on the rim of the Grand Canyon ever forget it? Nineteen engines and ninety three Pullman cars crowded the extemporized switches which had been built. The engines were dead, fires having to be extinguished because there was no water to fill the boilers, the water train having been wrecked on the journey up the hill from the main line, and all the water obtainable was that which had to be carried up on the backs of burros from the springs in the Canyon three thousand feet below the rim. A new track had to be built around the wreck and all trains were delayed from twelve to twenty hours. Food ran short in the dining cars. The Bright Angel Hotel fortunately had a good supply of ham and eggs, which were regularly served morning, noon and night at the uniform price of 75 cents per meal. Sleeping cars were without water for drinking and washing purposes, and some of the dining cars on the special trains had to restrict their passengers to two meals a day. What a Sunday it was! The open-air services on the rim of the Canyon will never be forgotten by those who participated in it, and at the vesper hour, in nearly all the Pullman cars, services were held, with brief addresses, prayer and Gospel songs.

"Words can not describe that wonderful freak of nature. No picture ever did it justice. Standing on the rim of the Canyon you look across and see domes and minarets and vast cathedrals tinted with all the colors of the rainbow. In the rare atmosphere of that high altitude it seemed scarcely a mile to the opposite rim, and yet those who know the facts tell you it is fifteen miles across. You look straight down three thousand feet to the valley below you. There is a little group of large tents in which the guides stop to rest with parties on their journey to the river. They look just like blocks of building stone. Stretching down the valley is a ribbon of green. You turn to your neighbor and say, 'Look at that beautiful strip of grass'; it looks just like it, and yet, when you descend you find this seeming strip of grass turns into a vast forest of trees from twenty to thirty feet in height. And still below this plateau you must descend two thousand feet by a circuitous and treacherous pathway to reach the roaring river whose action in the centuries gone has cut this awful but majestic gash in nature's face. There were a few hours of glorious sunshine between the snow storms of Sunday and Monday, which permitted fine views of the Canyon. Many persons descended with the guides. The pathway along the cliff is at times narrow and dangerous, but up to the present time no serious accident has happened. Many of the excursionists made the journey to the river and came back enthusiastic over what they had seen, and yet with one accord they ventured the statement that although they would not take a hundred dollars for the experiences which the trip had brought them, it would take much more than that amount to induce them to repeat it. It is doubtful if a more impressive wonder in natural scenery can be found in the world than the Grand Canyon."

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

Dawson, Edward M.

- 577 1904 Exhibit O. [Abstract of exhibits of the Department of the Interior at the Louisiana Purchase Exposition in St. Louis, Missouri, 1904.] From: Report of the Secretary of the Interior. In: Annual reports of the Department of the Interior for the Fiscal Year ended June 30, 1904. Report of the Secretary of the Interior. Report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office. Washington, D.C.: U.S. Government Printing Office, pp. 325-330.

See "Panoramas" (p. 330): "Three large panoramas, painted in oil, occupy one end of the space assigned to the Department, representing . . . (3) 39 feet long, the Grand Canyon of the Colorado, Grand Canyon Forest Reserve, Ariz." (ENTIRE NOTE) (The other two panoramas are "Yosemite Falls and Valley", 39 feet, and "Yellowstone Falls and Canyon", 18½ feet.) Regarding the Louisiana Purchase Exposition, as noticed in the Secretary of the Interior's report, see pp. 249-255.

Dellenbaugh, Frederick S.

- 578 1904 (TEXT ED.) The Grand Cañon of Arizona : through the stereoscope : the Underwood Patent Map System combined with eighteen original stereoscopic photographs. New York, London, Ottawa (Kansas), Toronto, San Francisco, and Bombay: Underwood and Underwood, 64 pp. with 2 maps (map 2 is fold-out).

This separately bound text accompanies a boxed set of 18 stereoscopic views by the firm of Underwood and Underwood. Its fold-out map of Grand Canyon delimits with overprinting the direction and breadth of view for each stereoview. Dellenbaugh not credited in this 1st ed. Box variants noted: boxes with gilt lettering or silver stamping. Text booklet either clothbound or with wraps. Later eds. printed without date (see Dellenbaugh, no date [1906-1908]). In addition to the difference in places of publication, this ed. differs from the later undated [1906-1908] ed. in the following points: 1) in later ed. the title-page adds credit to Dellenbaugh; 2) chapter title, p. 11, lacks tilde over "N" ("HOW THE CANON CAME TO BE"); 3) p. 31, last two lines rewritten (in 1904 ed. as ". . . of the Indians will hospitably show you the way to a point where you can get a . . .", in later ed. as ". . . Indian will show you the way to the point marked 1 on Map 1, where you get a . . .").

Fischer, Heinrich

- 579 1904 Der VIII. internationale Geographenkongreß. Geographische Zeitschrift (Leipzig), 10(12): 691-706. [In German.]
(transl. 'The 8th International Geographical Congress')

Includes notes of excursion to Mexico, which also stopped at Grand Canyon. See pp. 692, 699; and under "Der große Ausflug" ('The big trip') (p. 701 and following), specifically, pp. 702-703; a rather clinical set of impressions, but welcome in the face of the fact that few records are had of this trip as written by international correspondents—in fact, few records by any members of the congress other than to simply state they went to the Grand Canyon en route to Mexico. Fischer writes (here in translation):

'I'm now putting together the few days in which we made the trip to the great canyon, then returned to Albuquerque, and finally made our way south from there toward El Paso.

'We were able to get to know the canyon itself over the course of two days, once through several hikes along the edge and then through a descent down to the river; finally, lectures given in the hotel in the evenings provided an even more in-depth understanding and provided some knowledge of the history of the discovery. At this point, a final resolution was passed by the congress, with the consensus that it would be desirable to erect a memorial to Powell at the site of his great success and to appoint an American committee for this purpose. Without wishing to enter into a general description of the great canyon, which is all too often required, I only emphasize that the surface of the crystalline base, the obliquely dipping Algonkian strata, preserved only in isolated places as a result of faulting, and the common surface of both rock complexes, and finally the undisturbed accumulation of the Palaeozoic layers up to the Carboniferous speaks to the Americans of the partial course of three cycles, the last of which alone was not affected by disturbances and created the young form of

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

the canyon. Furthermore, the vegetative character is interesting: forest above: juniper, cypress, pine, in the undergrowth interspersed with thorn bushes and cacti (Opuntia), below the type of the Sonora desert, whose representatives have gone upstream from the estuary, interrupted by a richer tree-and-bush vegetation along the rivers.'

Hasty, E. E.

- 580 1904 Hasty's Afterthoughts [COLUMN]. American Bee Journal, 44(7) (February 18): 122.

Includes note: "Grand Canyon—Home of Bad Angels. The last front picture for the year 1903—Grand Canyon as Hutchinson gives us a peep into it, is a very unearthly sort of looking place. Still less does it look heavenly. Kind of a home of the bad angels, with the angels all gone on a vacation. (All gone but one, and he tempted 'em to go down.)" (ENTIRE NOTE)

This refers to the anonymous photo on the cover of the December 31, 1903, issue, which in turn refers to the anonymous account of the visit by convention delegates to Grand Canyon in the September 24, 1903, issue; for both of which, see above.

Heilprin, Angelo

- 581 1904 The Tower of Pelée : new studies of the great volcano of Martinique. Philadelphia and London: J. B. Lippincott Co., 62 pp., 22 plates.

See in Chapter 2, "The Tower of Pelée", p. 17:

"None of the grand scenes of nature which I had before seen—the Matterhorn, the Domes of the Yosemite, the colossus of Popocatepetl soaring above the shoulder of Ixtaccihuatl, or the Grand Cañon of the Colorado—impressed me to the extent that did the view of Pelée's tower, from the crater-rim on the afternoon of June 13 [1903]." (ENTIRE NOTE)

The Tower of Pelée, some 840 feet in height, is illustrated by a photograph by Heilprin as the frontispiece to the volume.

Herben, Stephen J.

- 582 1904 Across the continent to the General Conference—II. The Christian Advocate (New York), 79(19) (May 12): 28-29 (concurrently paginated for volume, 756-757).

En route to Los Angeles, Grand Canyon, and Needles, California, in passing, p. 28/756. Also, regarding the train's schedule delayed ten hours by the time they arrived in New Mexico (p. 29/757):

"The chief anxiety was to get to the Grand Canyon, in order to spend the Sabbath there in mute admiration of the wonders of nature as spread out in the most marvelous panorama ever presented to the gaze of mortal man. But the Canyon program was not carried out according to the original arrangement; more of which later." (See also part III, below.)

- 583 1904 Across the continent to the General Conference—III. The Christian Advocate (New York), 79(20) (May 19): 19-20 (concurrently paginated for volume, 795-796).

This installment of the series pertains chiefly to the stay at Grand Canyon, which is about the disastrous day when 2,000 Methodists descended on Grand Canyon. In addition to the crowd, accidents on the train line caused problems with food and water supplies and train departure times. See also a shorter recollection by Davidson, above. Herben's entire story is so noteworthy that nearly the whole of it is transcribed here, omitting only Herben's long quotation of the canyon's glories copied from "The Titan of Chasms", C. A. Higgins' memorable essay published in the Santa Fe Railway's own booklet all about The Grand Canyon of Arizona (the 1902 printing was surely right at hand).

"The Santa Fé road enters Arizona at Gallup and leaves it at the Needles. The distance between these points is 420 miles, and the running time is about twelve hours. It took longer than this for the delegates' trains to cover the distance. Our train reached Gallup about midnight Saturday, three hours late, and left Arizona at the Colorado River, where we were due at 7.30 Monday morning, on Tuesday evening at 7.30 o'clock, thirty-six hours behind the schedule. Many things happened between Gallup and the Needles that time will find it difficult to obliterate from the memories of the delegates and their fellow-travelers.

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

"One of the railroads that carried a large excursion from New York made the following statement in its circular of information: 'As will be noticed by referring to the detailed itineraries, all Sunday travel has been scrupulously avoided.' This was an agreeable statement for many of the delegates who have conscientious scruples as to Sunday railroad traveling, and not a few were induced to patronize this road, but before these pilgrims got to Los Angeles they were compelled to subject the fourth commandment to a severe strain. This was due to conditions of an unusual character existing at the Grand Canyon.

"It should be stated, however, that, while the necessity of Sunday travel was practically unavoidable, there was not a train on which religious services were not held. In nearly all of the cars there was joyous and reverent singing of hymns and a service of prayer or testimony. On some cars brief sermons were preached or addresses given, and, generally speaking, the day was observed in a becoming fashion.

"By Saturday a large number of excursionists had reached the Grand Canyon, leaving the main line at Williams and traveling sixty-four miles by rail to Bright Angel, at the rim of the Canyon. The railroad had made arrangements in the yard at the station for the accommodation of the trains, but it soon became evident that the yard was too small to serve the needs of the emergency. All day Saturday the trains rolled into Bright Angel; on Sunday others arrived, and at about four o'clock on Sunday afternoon the 'delegates' special' from Chicago, on which the writer was a passenger, screeched and groaned its way into the yard and occupied one of the two tracks on which trains were not standing. Right behind us was the last train with General Conference people to reach Bright Angel, a section of the Pennsylvania excursion, which should have arrived at the Canyon hours before.

"When the time came for the trains to leave the Canyon and resume the trip to Los Angeles a condition of affairs confronted the railroad officials that soon convinced everybody that there was no possibility of adhering to any sort of schedule. The 'yard' at the Canyon was crowded with engines and cars, at least 100 Pullman cars being congested there. A bad wreck had occurred on the branch between Williams and Bright Angel, and it took a long time to clear it away and permit the resumption of traffic. The first train through was a water train—made up of ten iron tank cars—which was bringing up water for the engines stalled at the Canyon. The delaying of the water train was a serious thing, for in a few hours every engine in the yard was 'dead'—without water. It was Monday afternoon before the water train got in, and it took hours to replenish the tanks of the 'dead' engines and relight their fires. Then when three or four of the engines got ready to haul out trains it was discovered that the congested condition of the yard made it a difficult thing to get these engines where they could be of service. One train got away about five o'clock on Monday, but the next one—that on which the writer traveled—did not get away until 11 p. m.

"Meanwhile a serious situation was developing among the stranded travelers. It is estimated that at least 2,000 persons were at the Canyon on Sunday, and these had to be fed. The longer the departure of the trains was delayed the lower the food supply at the hotel and on the dining cars went. By Monday night the hotel was near the bottom of the flour barrel; and every orange, banana, peanut, and cracker at Bright Angel had been gathered in by the persistent and hungry passengers. But the inadequacy of the food supply was not the only inconvenience to which the travelers were subjected at the Canyon. As all the water has to be brought in by train from Williams, sixty-four miles away, and as the water train had been delayed about twenty-four hours by the wreck, the supply in the Pullman cars for drinking and washing soon began to give out, and in some of them was entirely exhausted. So scarce did the water become that at least one passenger used of bottle of a celebrated brand of spring water for her morning ablutions on that memorable Sunday. Then the gas supply in some of the cars was insufficient, and only a few lights were turned on when night approached, while in other cars the passengers were compelled to sit in complete darkness. Besides this, the linen closets of many of the Pullmans had yielded up their last towels and other necessary concomitants of convenient traveling. With water, food, linen, and gas exhausted, there was grave danger of the exhaustion of the grace of patience also; but the travelers, each and several, evidently determined to endure hardness as good soldiers; and the outbursts were few and mild, although there was provocation enough to justify the explosion of a large amount of righteous indignation.

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

"It seems inconceivable that a great railroad should permit itself to become so helpless in the face of an emergency as was the case at the Grand Canyon. The delay in getting the trains out was simply inexcusable. True, there was a serious wreck on the branch road, but even when that obstacle was removed it seemed almost impossible to get the representatives of the road at the Canyon to approach the solution of their problem of a congested 'yard' with any respectable degree of intelligence and energy. The emergency demanded the presence of some man of authority, able to grasp details with ease, and competent to unravel the most perplexing situations of railroad experience with expedition and accuracy. But there was no official of the company of that type on the ground, and the result was that the hundreds of impatient and well-nigh exasperated travelers were compelled to submit to the slow and uncertain movements of incompetency and indecision.

"Although the visit to the Grand Canyon was attended with so many unnecessary and easily avoidable inconveniences, it was well worth making. The Canyon is the most stupendous panorama in the world. It baffles description because of the poverty of language and the limitation of the human intellect. It is a product of the divine intelligence, and when a mere man beholds it he is instinctively mute, for here he is reminded most forcibly that the finite cannot comprehend the infinite. Scientists, and many persons who know hardly the underlying principles of geology, have formulated theory after theory relative to the formation of this wonderful gorge; but when one beholds these terraces, turrets, chasms, gorges, cones, plateaus, and massive mountains, with their marvelous colorings, he has no room in his awe-stricken mind for the theories of men concerning the creation of this appalling miracle of nature. Old is this wonderland as the human race. Before man was it unfolded itself to the warm touch of the sun. Races have come and have passed away; civilizations have been created, have flourished to their highest developments, and have ceased; great world movements have been inaugurated and pushed onward to their successful issues; individual men have risen from obscurity to positions of power, responsibility, and honor, and have gone to their graves—but the Canyon has not changed. The early inhabitants saw it, and were filled with its mystery; the Indian beheld it, and worshiped it; the Spaniard gazed upon it, and crossed himself in dumb adoration; the traveler comes from far and near, from distant lands across the sea, and lifts up his heart to God! It is a dull and unfeeling soul that can approach this vast and wonderful product of God's handiwork without a peculiar sense of the power and presence of Him 'who hath measured the waters in the hollow of His hand, and meted out the heaven with the span, and comprehended the dust of the earth in a measure, and weighed the mountains in scales, and the hills in a balance.' [Isaiah 40:12].

"To attempt a description of this gorge of chaotic grandeur is perilous, even under the most favorable circumstances of long and intimate acquaintance with its unchanging glory. To make such an attempt after only a few hours of observation, meditation, absorption, and surrender to its mysterious spell is an absurdity of the first magnitude. Here is the colossal opportunity for the poet, the painter, the prophet, and the eloquent panegyrist. The ordinary mortal drinks in the majesty and beauty of the marvelous expanse and is speechless.
• • • "

Here Herben quotes at length (and without credit) from Higgins' "The Titan of Chasms", then continues.

"Tuesday morning found our train on the branch road about ten miles from Williams. We had started from the Canyon at eleven o'clock Monday night, being the second train to be hauled out of the tangle. It was eight o'clock Tuesday morning when we drew into Williams, having consumed nine hours to cover sixty-four miles. This was not remarkably rapid traveling for these days of Empire State and Twentieth Century Limited trains; but we were so grateful for being able to get away from the Canyon and the hardships and inconveniences of our sojourn there that we looked upon the town of Williams looming up in the distance as the very gateway to the land of promise.

"Our train lay at Williams, which is a substantial and enterprising mining [and lumbering center, two hours, while the water tanks were being replenished. Then we pushed on to Ash Fork, where a branch of the road leaves the main line for Prescott and other interior Arizona towns. To the passengers on our train Ash Fork will be enshrined in memory because here the inner man was refreshed after a long period of hardship and unavoidable neglect. The Harvey restaurant, as an institution, was fully appreciated by the scores of hungry travelers who sat down that morning in an attractive dining room, to the first satisfying meal they had eaten for three days.

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

The food was abundant, appetizing, and wholesome, the service courteous and faultless, the price reasonable—in fact, one cannot receive better treatment for the money in any of the high grade restaurants of New York than was accorded this band of tired and hungry travelers in the desert of Arizona.

“And so we pushed on, faint yet pursuing, and while the shadows of evening were gathering we approached the Colorado River, ran into Needles, partook of supper at another of the incomparable Harvey restaurants, and prepared for one more night of discomfort and irritating delay. As the gas tanks were exhausted, our car was lighted by three brakemen’s lanterns. But these suffice, for the passengers had long since become inured to hardship. • • •

“When we reached Los Angeles at eleven o’clock on Wednesday morning we were forty-one hours late, and had spent six nights on the sleeper instead of three; but our overland journey was ended in safety, and that was a thing to be grateful for, under the circumstances.”

Hitchcock, G. P.

- 584 1904 Annual report of the High School for the year 1903. Pratt Institute Monthly (Brooklyn, New York, New York), 12(7) (April): 179-200.

See under “Lectures and Public Exercises”, p. 184: “In connection with the work in Physiography, Mr. E. E. Randall, of Madison, N.J., will give a lecture on ‘The Grand Cañon.’” (ENTIRE NOTE)

Hutchinson, W. Z.

- 585 1904 Preparedness is the secret of most successes. The Bee-Keepers’ Review, 17(1) (January 10): 16-17.

Santa Fe Railway trip to the National Association meeting in Los Angeles. See p. 17: “I took my camera with me, made a picture of a small portion of the Grand Canyon, also of the [rail] car and the bee-keepers who made the trip in it across the continent.” (ENTIRE NOTE) The author, planning ahead, sold group photos that he took during the trip.

Kerp, Heinrich

- 586 1904 Die Aussereuropäischen Erdteile nebst den deutschen Kolonien. Trier: Verlag der Fr. Lintz’schen Buchhanlung, 356 pp. (Methodisches Lehrbuch einer begründend-vergleichenden Erdkunde. Mit begünder Darstellung der wirtschafts- und Kulturgeographie. Einleitender Teil: Die Methodik des erdkundlichen Unterrichts. (2 Aufl. 1902.) Band III.) [In German.] [Also a 1907 ed.]
(transl. ‘The non-European continents together with the German colonies’)

Although this is a geographical production, not one of personal impressions, the author pauses to take special note of Grand Canyon (pp. 270-272); specifically, “Am Rande des Großen Cañon des Colorado” (transl. ‘On the edge of the Great Canyon of the Colorado’) (pp. 271-272). Kerp quotes Balduin Möllhausen (source not credited, though surely from his Reisen in die Felsengebirge Nord-Amerikas bis zum Hoch-Plateau von Neu-Mexico, 1861 [see in Part I of this bibliography]), who visited the canyon in 1858 on the Ives expedition:

“Was nun, von der schwindelnden Höhe gesehen, vor dem bewundernden Auge liegt, das vermögen Worte nicht genügend zu schildern; wie im Chaos schwimmen ineinander tiefe Schluchten und abgesondert stehende, kastenförmige Überreste des Hochlandes; über das trockene, ziegelrote Sandsteinbett in der Tiefe türmen sich Tausende von Fuß übereinander die Formationen verschiedener Epochen, deutlich erkennbar an den grellen Farbengegensätzen; senkrecht stehen die Wände, als ob die geringste Erschütterung sie hinabzustürzen vermöchte; man bebt bei solchem Anblick und tritt unwillkürlich zurück von dem Abgrunde; wohin man auch das Auge wenden mag, überall trifft es auf nacktes, totes Gestein, überall scheinen die Uferränder von entfernen, tieferen Schluchten aufzutauchen, dem forschenden Reisenden ein gebieterisches Halt zurufend, zugleich aber auch eine schwache Ahnung von der Unendlichkeit weckend bei dem Gedanken: daß der fallende Tropfen die Schlünde bildete, die ihn von allen Seiten angähnen.”

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

(translation)

'What lies before the admiring eye, seen from the dizzying height, words cannot adequately describe; deep gorges and isolated, box-shaped remnants of the highlands merge as if in chaos; thousands of feet above the dry, brick-red sandstone bed below, tower the formations of different eras, clearly recognizable by the bright contrasts of color; the walls are vertical, as if the slightest shock could throw them down; one trembles at such a sight and involuntarily steps back from the abyss; wherever one turns the eye, one encounters bare, dead rock everywhere, everywhere the banks of distant, deeper gorges seem to appear, calling to the inquiring traveler an imperative stop, but at the same time awakening a faint inkling of infinity at the thought: that the falling drop [rain] formed the gorges that yawn at him from all sides.'

Möllhausen's Reisen has never been published in English in its entirety.

Knights Templar of Pennsylvania, Mary Commandery No. 36

- 587 1904 Pilgrimage of Mary Commandery No. 36, Knights Templar of Pennsylvania, to the Twenty-Ninth Triennial Conclave of the Grand Encampment U.S. at San Francisco, Cal. Philadelphia: [Knights Templar of Pennsylvania, Mary Commandery No. 36], 190 pp. (Cover title: From geyser to canon with Mary.) (Made by Thomson Printing Company, 310 Cherry Street, Philadelphia.)

Complete diary, August 22-September 22, 1904, from Philadelphia and return, by rail. See during the return trip, one day at Grand Canyon, September 14, pp. 143-149.

"Why the name of Bright Angel was applied to the one-storied log cabin, unpainted building which answers at present for a hotel, was a mystery to all. It also applies to the trail by which you go down from this point to the bottom of the canon. There it is more applicable as, if your horse should slip going down, you stand a very good chance of becoming the being after whom the place is called. When it is applied to the view, the first the pilgrims had of the place, the cognomen is also all right. Any other high-sounding title would answer equally as well. Although walking boldly down to the practically unprotected edge of the canon, the first impulse is to draw back, not a little, but to some distance. The sort of attraction which impels some persons to feel that they must jump down from any high altitude seems to come over you with redoubled force at this place." Followed by the usual gushing over colors and forms.

"Some of the party expressed a preference for the canon of the Yellowstone over that of Arizona. It is hardly fair to bring the two into comparison, they being on such totally different scales. Each is grand in its own way, but the Grand Canon of Arizona is on such a stupendous basis that it is not fair to belittle it by contrast with smaller things." Not everything is perfect, though.

"At Cyclorama Point, Matos was tendered the use of a white horse called Jim, if he would go back to the stable for it. It was the horse that President Roosevelt had ridden on his visit to the canon. Of course Matos seized the opportunity to sit where the President had sat, and returned with the guide for Jim. Returning on the narrow trail with the fresh horse, they suddenly met one of the coaches on its way, and had to turn out of the road quickly. The guide slipped through all right, but Matos struck the trunk of a tree with his knee with great force. It was first feared that the knee cap was broken, but when he found that it was not Matos continued his ride to the end. But after his return to the train he was found lying on the floor of the car unconscious, and Doc Righter was called to administer to the patient. While the doctor was attending to the injury the patient again collapsed. He was crippled up for several days, but fully recovered before reaching home."

And as usual, "The usual store, with curios and souvenirs of all kinds, was found at the canon, and was thoroughly overhauled by our pilgrims. Many of them were disappointed that we had not been long enough here to make the descent into the canon on horseback or astraddle of a burro. But it is an all day journey, and our schedule of course would not permit of lying over for another day. The party that had gone down this morning at an early hour only came up a few minutes before we left this evening. They had been thoroughly drenched with rain on their trip and were in sorry plight."

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

Little, Arthur

- 588 1904 A rapid run across the continent; from Boston to Los Angeles, San Francisco, Seattle and intervening points. The Congregationalist and Christian World, 89(33) (August 13): 222.

"Two days are enough to see only a small part of this 'Wonder that dwarfs all other wonders of the world'—'a scene, where silence seems to have dimension and color, and color to have melody and fragrance'—'a geological apocalypse, half mystery and half revelation'—'a very miracle of chromatic glory.' I will not weaken the force of these quotations with any words of mine, other than to say that this piece of God's workmanship must be seen and felt. It can never be photographed or described." (ENTIRE NOTE)

Lloyd, J. William

- 589 1904 Grand Canon of Arizona. The Conservator (Philadelphia), 14(11) (January): 164-165.

"Written at Point Eternity, October fifth."

O symphony of form and color and silence,
Dream-like in your deep of luminous ether,
Your faint-blue, shimmering sea of haze, strata-rippled;
Am I not indeed looking down into some lake enchanted,
Seeing the City that all men seek forever
Reflected there from heaven?
Surely this is not real, earth-born or earth-included!

Hark! from afar, far below a murmur,
A roar in a breath and a whisper,
The Still Small Voice audible,
The sound of the sea in a shell.

Save this, over all, holding all, the Arizona stillness,
Color-steeped, sun-saturated,
The great, wide, brooding, wonderful hush of the desert.

O what wait you for, O Desert, soft and terrible,
Motionless, beautiful and infinite?
Why are you so calm and expectant?
What god, what cycle, is coming?
Are you only the wide, O Desert?
Is it you that hold the Meaning?

McIsaac, C. H.

- 590 1904 U.S. Government exhibits. Lewis and Clark Journal (Portland, Oregon), 2(6) (December): 10-11, 14-15.

Lewis and Clark Centennial Exposition. See p. 15, notice of display of paintings by the U.S. General Land Office: "The immensity of the Grand Canon of the Colorado can be shown only imperfectly in the space available for the picture. The variety of coloring, however, is well brought out, and a good idea of the character and shapes of the formations can be obtained. The principal features of the Canon have received fanciful names suggested by their likeness to temples, pagodas and towers." (ENTIRE NOTE)

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

Mill, Hugh Robert

- 591 1904 The vengeance of the rain gods. Symons's Meteorological Magazine 39 (November) (466): 181-185. [Article signed "By the Editor."]

Notes from the excursion of the 8th International Geographical Congress, beginning with reference to the item by [Herbert Hall Turner], 1904. The title refers to the meteorological hazards of train travel; specifically "wash-outs", which troubled the trips across New Mexico and Arizona of Turner's and Mill's parties both.

"[We paid] a visit to the Grand Canyon, a natural feature vaster and more impressive than Niagara itself, and less easy to describe, for Niagara differs only in magnitude from humbler cataracts known to everyone, but the Grand Canyon is altogether unique, and comparison with nothing familiar can help one to realize it. • • • Next morning we came to the edge of the Grand Canyon; the dead greyish-green plain broke away in an indescribable series of precipices, buttressed walls and smooth slopes, white, yellow, red, brown and deep purple, as the whole series of geological strata, from Carboniferous to Archæan, lay exposed in the sides of the gorge, a mile deep and ten miles across. We saw only a narrow slice of the wonderful canyon, the full length of which is 250 miles, but we saw enough to fill our minds for the two days' stay and to appreciate the unclouded serenity of the sky, which allowed the high sun to show up every detail of the view." (ENTIRE NOTE)

The article concludes with dismissive reflections on Native American "rain dances", one of which they had observed while en route to the canyon.

Moss, R. Waddy

- 592 1904 An unusual conversion. The Epworth Herald (Chicago and New York), 15(4) (June 25): 91 (concurrently paginated for issue, 11).

Regarding an incidence of religious conversion of the "negro attendant Joe" [a Santa Fe Railway porter] during a rail delay at Grand Canyon when delegates of the Wesleyan Methodist church were en route to their General Conference. Quoted from a letter to the Methodist Recorder (London). Otherwise no special note about the Grand Canyon. (Regarding that otherwise disastrous day at the canyon, April 28, when 2,000 Methodists arrived at the same time, see both Davidson and Herbin, 1904.)

Salmons, C. H.

- 593 1904 To the land of the sunset sea. Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers Monthly Journal, 38(5) (May): 309-322. [Item signed "The Editor".]

A stop at Grand Canyon is noted, but rather than provide his own impressions, Salmons instead quotes Lummis and Stoddard and "Geo. B. Reevis, formerly General Manager of the Grand Trunk Railroad".

Taylor, Edward Robeson

- 594 1904 Under a pine at the Grand Cañon. Out West, 21(4) (October): 325.

Beneath a friendly, towering pine we lay—
Its sun-smit needles daning in their bright,
Gem-glittering sheen—and breathed the deep delight
That seemed to stream through all the veins of day.
Below, the awesome cañon's vast array
Swam silent in its sea of azure light,
While far beyond, within our wondering sight,
The desert stretched illimitably gray.
Above us screamed a rapture-hearted jay;
And while the breeze swept music to our ears,
Whose murmurs deepened all the joys of rest,
Dream's noiseless pinions wafted us away,

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

Beyond the toils and tumults of the years,
To farthest regions of the peaceful blest.

595

1904 To the Grand Cañon. Out West, 21(6) (December): 542.

Upon thy lofty rim we breathless stand,
As thy stupendous, myriad structures glow,
With color's opulence, while far below
The mighty river seems a narrow band.
Thou feignest thou art eternal, yet thy grand,
Unrivalled palaces will surely go
In wreck adown the ages as they flow,
While other beauties will their place command.
Time is for man alone, and not for Him
Who bade the light immortally to be,
And thee in all its amethyst to swim.
The Lord that fashioned us has fashioned thee,
And as we put our puny hands in thine
We thrill to feel that we are both divine.

[Turner, Herbert Hall]

596

1904 From an Oxford Note-Book [COLUMN]. The Observatory (London), 27(350) (November): 417-422.

The column is unsigned, but Turner is identified through other sources as the writer of the Oxford Note-Book. This is an addendum to a previously concluded series of articles about the writer's travel by rail across the United States, chiefly pertaining to astronomical subjects; this part comprising miscellaneous notes not in the series. Includes these remarks about the troubles of rail travel in northern Arizona, and a visit to Grand Canyon in August 1904:

"Somewhere in Arizona, 1904, Aug. 28.

"It would be affectation not to regard the railway journey we are at present taking as somewhat remarkable. A brief account of it may interest those who have not travelled in this country, though they must be cautioned against setting out in the hope of repeating our experiences, for we no doubt had exceptional luck. Still, the complacency with which our fellow-passengers have accepted most of the incidents indicates that something of the kind is within the reach of other tourists. As a preliminary, it may be stated that we hoped to make a three days' journey from Chicago to Flagstaff (stopping there on the chance of finding Mr. Percival Lowell at home); from thence an expedition to the Grand Cañon of Arizona, and then completing the journey to California, to see what Prof. Hale was doing on Mount Wilson, and to visit the Lick Observatory. We thought that this was a fairly straightforward business. But we are now better educated. • • •

"The first part of the programme was carried out with tolerable fidelity, the journey to Flagstaff being varied by nothing more noteworthy than half of the train running off the line. Novices like ourselves could scarcely avoid some little alarm when we saw the track torn up for 50 yards by the heavy baggage-cars which formed the front of the train, and which had run some distance through the sleepers before the powerful brake had pulled us up short and sudden. And of course there was necessarily some delay. The passenger-cars were backed away and taken round the scene of damage on the parallel line, and though we felt grateful to be personally safe, we could not help wondering, as we passed the stranded cars, how long it would be before we saw our baggage again. But we did not then know the resources of the country; these heavy cars were dug out and sent after us so speedily that they caught us up during the night, and we ultimately arrived at Flagstaff only about four hours late—more punctually, indeed, than the trains of several days previously. • • •

"The journey to the Grand Cañon, though nominally of only three hours' duration, was richer in incident than our previous one, for the train caught fire at least four separate times. By a certain irony it was the refrigerator cars which were partially burnt, sparks from the engine setting them alight near the roof. Buckets were filled at the engine and carried by willing hands to the flames, and those who could not get buckets stood on the forest and watched. Each time the fire was got under the train started with no particular warning, and in climbing hastily in on one occasion a man dropped his hat. It will give some notion of the time-scale to remark that at the next stop he ran back for it, and triumphantly returned with it before we had moved on again. But soon the fire-extinguishers became so skilled that it was no longer necessary to stop for them to work, and we steamed quietly along, with our busy corps of firemen pattering to and fro on the roof of the train with their buckets, until the refrigerator cars were damp enough to refuse further ignition.

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

"The Grand Canon is fortunately indescribable, so that no attempt to say anything of it need be made. Some weeks ago one who had seen it said it was the finest thing in the world, and when the query 'You think so?' was put almost mechanically, he rejoined emphatically 'I know so!' Now we have seen it we 'know so' too. We meant to spend one day there, and changed our plans at sight so as to make the one day into four. But there is a man of real intelligence who spends his whole vacations there; he has a tent close to the 'rim,' so that when he awakes in the morning he gazes at once on the whole glorious picture. There is a mine in the depths of the Cañon, whence its magnificence is seen from below, and so devoted are these miners that they will stay six or eight months at a time in their little colony without ever wishing to visit civilization. One of them was going to the St. Louis Exhibition, and I felt much tempted to apply for his job, only that I know so little of mining."

And thereafter the author's journey to California was encumbered by still more contracted descriptions of the misfortunes of rail travel.

Warner, Charles Dudley

- 597 1904 The complete writings of Charles Dudley Warner. (Thomas R. Lounsbury, ed.) Volume IX. Washington Irving. The Work of Washington Irving. Our Italy. Hartford, Connecticut: American Publishing Co. (Backlog Edition.)

See "Our Italy", pp. 257-432; specifically, "In the Heart of the Desert", pp. 391-400, and "On the Brink of the Grand Cañon—The Unique Marvel of Nature", pp. 401-410. Our Italy published in 1892, in turn from Warner (1891).

[Wendte, Charles W.]

- 598 1904 Theodore Parker Memorial. Benevolent Fraternity of Churches in the City of Boston, 70th Annual Report. Boston: George H. Ellis Co., Printers, pp. 49-66.

See in lecture courses, p. 59: "Mr. Arthur K. Peck. Illustrated lecture. 'The Grand Cañon of Arizona and Moki Indians.'" (ENTIRE NOTE)

Whitney, Orson F.

- 599 1904 History of Utah. Volume IV.—Biographical. Salt Lake City: George Q. Cannon and Sons Co., 707 [712] pp.

See Henry L. A. Culmer, pp. 652-654, which notes, p. 654, his avocation as an artist since 1880, specializing in landscapes; "He has been awarded first prize at several State fairs, and in 1893 [sic, 1903], for his magnificent painting 'The Grand Canyon of the Colorado,' was awarded the State prize of the Utah Art Institute, three hundred dollars." (see Anonymous, 1903, Deseret News, December 19).

Wittmack, L.

- 600 1904 Meine erste diesjährige Reise nach Amerika. Gartenflora (Zeitschrift für Garten- und Blumenkunde) (Berlin), 53(18) (September 15): 477-492. [In German.]
(transl. 'This year, my first trip to America')

About the author's trip to America in 1898. Although he writes that he has made a special effort to go see the Grand Canyon, he writes nothing about it! As he sees the journey:

"Von Kansas City trat ich nun eine weite, weite Reise nach dem fernen Westen an. Mein Ziel war das Grand Canyon des Colorado in Arizona, ein stellenweise 6000 Fuß tief abstürzendes Tal, in welchem der

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

Coloradofluß sich viele Meilen weit hinzieht, um dann später in den Meerbusen von Kalifornien zu münden. Das Grand Canyon gehört zu den „biggest“ (größten) Sehenswürdigkeiten Nordamerikas, ähnlich wie der Niagarafall, der Yellowstonepark und das Yosemiteetal, welche letztere drei ich schon 1893 [sic] besucht habe.

„Man gelangt zum Grand Canyon von Kansas City mit der Santa Fé-Eisenbahn, fährt bis Williams (dreiviertel des Wegs nach Kalifornien), von wo eine kleine Seitenbahn direkt zum Canyon führt. Die ganze Reise dauert über 48 Stunden und ist sehr ermüdend, da man abgesehen von dem ersten Teil der Strecke immer durch Wüsten fährt. Interessant sind nur an einzelnen Stationen die Indianer, oder wenn sie selbst nicht da sind, ihre Arbeiten in den Läden, namentlich die Navachodecken, wollene Decken, meist rot karriert, welche die Navachoin Indianer auf einfachen Webstühlen ziemlich kunstvoll herstellen, ebenso ihre Töpferarbeiten, Silbergegenstände etc.

„Zurückgekehrt von Canyon nach Williams, wandte ich mich nach der nächsten westlichen Station Ashfork, von wo eine Bahn direkt nach Süden, nach Phoenix . . . .“

(translation)

‘From Kansas City I embarked on a long, long journey to the far west. My destination was the Grand Canyon of the Colorado River in Arizona, a valley dropping 6,000 feet in places, through which the Colorado River runs for many miles, only to later flow into the Gulf of California. The Grand Canyon is one of the “biggest” (largest) sights in North America, along with Niagara Falls, Yellowstone Park and Yosemite Valley, the latter three of which I earlier visited in 1893 [sic].

‘You get to the Grand Canyon from Kansas City on the Santa Fe railroad, going to Williams (three quarters of the way to California) where a small branch line goes directly to the canyon. The whole journey lasts more than 48 hours and is very tiring because apart from the first part of the route you always drive through deserts. The Indians are only interesting at individual stations, or if they are not there themselves, their work in the shops, namely the Navaho [sic] blankets, woolen blankets, mostly checked in red, which the Navaho Indians produce quite artfully on simple looms, as well as their pottery work, silver objects etc .

‘Returning from Canyon to Williams, I went to the nearest western station, Ashfork, from where a train went directly south to Phoenix . . . .’

Wohltmann, F. [Wohltmann, Ferdinand]

601 1904 Pflanzung und Siedlung auf Samoa. Erkundungsbericht von Prof. Dr. F. Wohltmann, Kaiserlicher Geheimer Regierungsrat an das Kolonial-Wirtschaftliche Komitee zu Berlin. Berlin: Verlag des Kolonial-Wirtschaftlichen Komitees, 164 pp. [In German.]

(transl. ‘Plantation and settlement in Samoa. Exploratory report by Prof. Dr. F. Wohltmann, Imperial Privy Councilor to the Colonial Economic Committee in Berlin.’)

In-and-out: Grand Canyon, sunset to sunrise. See Wohltmann’s itinerary, pp. 2-4, which includes during the return trip (p. 4): “Mai 28. Abfahrt 9½ Uhr auf der Santa Fé-Bahn von St. Francisco durch Kalifornien nach Arizona. Mai 29. 7¼ Uhr abends Ankunft am Grand Cañon. Mai 30. Weiterfahrt 9 Uhr vormittags nach Chicago.” (ENTIRE NOTE) (transl. ‘May 28. Depart 9:30 a.m. on the Santa Fé Railway from St. Francisco through California to Arizona. May 29th 7:40 p.m. Arrival at the Grand Canyon. May 30. Departure 9 a.m. to Chicago.’)

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

1905

Anonymous

- 602 1905 Academy session. In: Transactions for December, 1904. Southern California Academy of Sciences, Bulletin, 4(1) (January): 2.

"The Secretary, Mr. B. R. Baumgardt, delivered a lecture on 'The Grand Canon of the Colorado,' illustrated by the lantern, with slides from photographs taken largely by himself and Mrs. Baumgardt, and colored by the latter." Followed by a one-paragraph synopsis signed "Editor" (name not indicated in issue).

- 603 1905 Snap shots on a mainland tour. The Friend (Honolulu, Hawaii), 62(2) (February): 5-7.

Grand Canyon, p. 7. Not photographic.

- 604 1905 Central Normal notes. In: State Educational News [SECTION]. Moderator-Topics (Lansing, Michigan), 25(34) (May 4): 678.

Includes: "Prof. Calkins gave an interesting talk in the chapel, Friday, on the Grand Cañon. He showed the different kinds of rock to be found in this region, and gave a glimpse of the wonderful stories these various structures tell to the geologist." (ENTIRE NOTE)

- 605 1905 [Lecture by François E. Matthes at 241st Corporate Meeting, on "Across the Grand Canyon by a New Trail".] In: Proceedings of the Club [SECTION]. Appalachia, 11(1) (June): 87-88.

- 606 1905 National Women's Christian Temperance Union tour. Christian Nation, 43 (August 23): 13-14. [The running head on p. 13 erroneously gives the date of publication as August 16.]

Itinerary. See p. 13, Sabbath stop at Grand Canyon, and description of canyon.

- 607 1905 The Spectator. The Outlook (New York), 80 (August 26): 1005-1010.

Column by "Spectator". Grand Canyon.

- 608 1905 [Swami Abhedananda tour of North America.] In: Vedanta in America [SECTION]. Vedanta Monthly Bulletin (Vedanta Society, New York), 1(8) (November): 125-126.

Notes, p. 125, "With the President of the Society, Prof. Parker of Columbia University, he climbed some of the high peaks of the Canadian Rockies, spent a few days at the Portland Fair, skirted the coast of the Northern Pacific and rode through the Grand Cañon of Arizona." (ENTIRE NOTE)

- 609 1905 Conférences sur les États-Unis. In: Informations [SECTION]. Le Globe (Société de Géographie de Genève), 44: 158-159. [In French.]

Announcement of lecture series by Arthur de Claparède under the society's patronage for the benefit of the blind, including "Le grand cañon du Colorado, the greatest thing in the world (Territoire d'Arizona)."

Brooks, Benjamin

- 610 1905 Over night at the edge of the Grand Canyon. (Illustrations from photographs by Dwight L. Elmendorf.) Scribner's Magazine, 37(5) (May): 615-626.

An "asthmatic lawyer" opines, "As far as explaining the scenery, it seems to me it's overexplained already. . . . Why, as for scenery the Natural Bridge of Virginia beats it all to pieces!" The next morning, when "a sunrise in the Grand Canyon lasts as long as you please", with his traveling companion from England, "we two sat on a flat

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

ledge, with our heels dangling, our elbows on our thighs, watching while the clock and the sun and shadows went round. But . . . I know of no way to describe it after all our looking."

Bryan, William Jennings

- 611 1905 Under other flags : travels, lectures, speeches. Lincoln, Nebraska: Woodruff-Collins Printing Co., 5th ed., 399 pp.

See "Wonders of the West; Written for the Commoner" (i.e., Bryan, 1904), pp. 385-399; see specifically pp. 395-399. Surprisingly common for a great orator—part boring travel guide, part homily. At his most original, he tells, "There are 'sermons in stones' and the stones of this canyon preach many impressive ones"—although he fails to acknowledge sermons in stones' author, William Shakespeare ("As You Like It", Act 2, Scene 1).

Carlier, L. [Carlier, Jules (Madame)]

- 612 1905 A Saint-Louis et dans l'Ouest. Revue de Belgique (Trente-Septième Année), Series 2, 43: 103-130. [Byline (p. 130) as "L. Carlier"; in table of contents as "Madame Jules Carlier".] [In French.] (transl. 'In Saint Louis and the West')

Grand Canyon, see entry dated "25 septembre", pp. 120-121. The author miscompares the Grand Canyon with the glacially formed Cirque de Gavarnie of the Pyrenees in France.

"Ce grand Cañon dépasse tout ce que nous atten dions et le Niagara lui même m'a produit beaucoup moins d'impression. C'est un cirque immense, vingt fois plus grand que celui de Gavarnie et d'une variété de tons dont rien ne peut donner une idée. Jamais je n'aurais pu me figurer quelque chose d'aussi gigantesque et saisissant et mes regards ne se lassent pas de parcourir l'admirable spectacle qu'ils ont devant eux. Bien certainement il est peu de merveilles de la nature aussi déconcertantes par leur étendue et leur coloris. Quels cataclysmes il a fallu pour produire une semblable accumulation de roches! On dirait que nombre d'entre elles ont été retournées et se trouvent à présent sur leur pointe, et le fleuve qui s'est creusé passage dans ce chaos géant parait un filet d'eau au fond de la gorge de 2,000 mètres. Tout cela est inou bliable et l'on a vainement tenté d'en rendre l'aspect dans les photographies coloriées que nous achetons dans le petit hôtel primitif où nous allons passer la nuit. L'air est vif et pur, les étoiles se montrent et devant nous, dans un calme majestueux, les pics s'estompent sur le ciel jusqu'à l'infini..." (ellipsis is part of quote).

(translation)

'This great canyon exceeds all that we expected and the Niagara itself produced much less impression on me. It is an immense cirque, twenty times larger than that of Gavarnie and of a variety of tones of which nothing can give an idea. I could never have imagined something so gigantic and striking and my eyes never tire of browsing the admirable spectacle they have before them. Certainly there are few wonders of nature so disconcerting in their extent and color. What cataclysms it took to produce such an accumulation of rocks! It looks like many of them have been turned over and are now on their point, and the river that has carved its way through this giant chaos seems like a trickle of water at the bottom of the 2,000 meter gorge. All this is unforgettable, and we have tried in vain to portray it in the colored photographs that we buy in the small primitive hotel where we are going to spend the night. The air is crisp and pure, the stars show themselves and in front of us, in a majestic calm, the peaks fade on the sky until infinity...'

Fassett, Charles Wood

- 613 1905 Missouri Valley excursion to Portland. The Medical Herald (St. Joseph, Missouri), 24(8) (August): 397-399. [Item signed "F."]

Medical Society of the Missouri Valley. See p. 399, regarding reports by many who returned via California and Grand Canyon: "And from these we learn that the stories of the grandeur of this trip are in no wise exaggerated nor overdrawn. The Canon is the largest and most beautiful in the world, and the hotel 'Tovar' one of the most unique and costly in the southwest. None should visit California without taking a side trip through the Grand Canon of Arizona." (ENTIRE NOTE)

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

Fountain, Paul

- 614 1905 The eleven eaglets of the West. London: John Murray, 362 pp. [Also later printings; and reprinted E. P. Dutton (New York, 1906).]

Grand Canyon, see pp. 291-296.

"I feel that I cannot improve on the descriptions of these cañons given in my first book [see Fountain, 1901], and I recommend that the account there given should be read simultaneously with the supplementary notes which I now give. • • •

"Sunset is the time when the most remarkable and romantic effects are produced; if the cañon is not seen at sunset, the grandest, most awe-inspiring of all Nature's scenes is missed. The man who takes the pains to come here, even if a mere 'doer' of sights, might have some little liking, if not love, for the beauties of the earth; and if he sees one sunset in the Grand Cañon, he will not be content, he will wish to see another . . . ."

Gosling, C. S. R.

- 615 1905 A few impressions of the Grand Canyon of Arizona, compiled from various sources. Western Journal of Education (San Francisco), 10(12) (December): 934-939.

Lengthy sections are quoted, but without citations. Seemingly a promotional piece by the Santa Fe Railway, in that p. [940] is a full-page Santa Fe advertisement for Grand Canyon.

Hall, Sharlot M.

- 616 1905 Beautiful Hávasu, the great arm of the Grand Cañon. Out West, 23(4) (October): 305-317.

In this dreamscaped travelogue Hall dallies for quite a while in the upper reaches of Cataract Creek, before following it into Havasu Canyon, where we join her.

"The Upper Hávasu is all in this gray-white limestone, cut into fantastic shapes and pitted with rough caves and fissures—wild and weird for the most part, in spite of its strange beauty. It is rougher and more difficult of access than the deeper cañon soon to come, and its endless gray walls have a sense of monotony; but as the cañon cuts down into the earth the limestone forms only a broad, gray cloak for the inner depths of rich, red sandstone.

"Great gorges come in in bewildering number from the sides and the whole country is a broken net-work of cañons with sheer walls thousands of feet above the narrow, rocky bed at the bottom. The far-away top, terraced back in wild, irregular cliffs and chasms like the broken steps of a giant's ladder, is glowing in the sunlight, while below it is cool and dim as a cave and the great walls seem almost to touch as they lean together. Big boulders hang out over the far rim, poised seemingly with such lightness that a touch might send them crashing into the depths below, and the scant thread of a trail at the bottom is filled and turned aside a dozen times in a hundred yards by those that have fallen in the past.

"Far down in the inner cañon the little spring comes to light again, a fine volume of sparkling, steel blue water, and here and there, where the great cliffs pinch back a few yards, leaving little level bits of ground, the Havasúpai Indians have their homes. Every tillable spot is a garden, and peaches, melons, and squashes ripen by the ton.

"There are three miles of these miniature farms, then the water which has been the life of the fields plunges over the beautiful Navajo Falls and for the rest of the way to the Colorado the cañon is too narrow and rocky and difficult of access for cultivation, even by the persistent Indians.

"Just above Navajo Falls many little springs deeply impregnated with lime join the Hávasu and for the rest of its way everything the water touches is deeply coated with a thick, white deposit. At one side where in the past a large spring had its course, there is a wonderful white skeleton of a long-dry falls; the lime-coated roots and tendrils sweeping down in graceful mimicry of falling water, and veiling a grotto festooned and draped like

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

a fairy shrine with the snowy crystal. Masses of oak leaves and small twigs cased in the lime cover the floor, the little leaf-points as distinct as on the fresh, green leaves fluttering on the bushes overhead.

"A quarter of a mile below Navajo Falls the Hávasu breaks down a green slope in a multitude of tiny, rippling streams which, sifted into sheets of pale, iris-tinted mist, unite again in the shadowy, spirit-like Bridal Veil Falls, beautiful beyond description.

"The whole face of the cliff is coated with white incrustations in lace-like filagree and ivory fretting. Long finger-points reach down, veiled in the shimmering water that plashes on other fingers thrust up from the pool below. Knots of dead leaves have been fretted over with the crystal and rise out of the blue basin like goblin faces; grinning gnomes and pixie guardians of the bowl which, fringed with ferns and mosses, is always half hidden in floating blue mist and fine-spun spray. • • •

"A quarter of a mile below the Bridal Veil, the Hávasu, gathering into a compact body, sweeps with tremendous rush over a broad ledge and drops two hundred feet without a break. This is Mooney's Falls, taking the name from a too-venturesome visitor who lost his balance in peering over the edge and toppled to his death.

"It is impossible to reach the bottom of the cañon below Mooney's Falls except by a long detour and for the remaining seven miles of its course to the Colorado the Hávasu tumbles in a series of headlong cataracts through a wild and difficult gorge little known until recent mining discoveries led prospectors to construct a rude but possible trail." The article ends abruptly, thus.

Hanzlík, St. [Hanzlík, Stanislav]

- 617 1905 Osmý mezinárodní geografický kongres. Věstník (České Akademie Císaře Františka Josefa, Praze), 14(8) (November): 519-530. [Signed as "St. Hanzlík" and is not a surname with "Saint".] [In Czech.]
(transl. 'Eighth International Geographical Congress')

8th International Geographical Congress trip to Mexico. Few records are had of this trip as written by international correspondents—in fact, few records by any members of the congress other than to simply state they went to the Grand Canyon en route to Mexico—so the entire entry on the visit to Grand Canyon (p. 528, as part of the section, "Výprava do Mexika" ('Expedition to Mexico')) is reproduced here. (Compare also the remarks by the German, Heinrich Fischer, 1904, the Chilean, Roberto Maldonado C. (1907), the Brazilian, Olyntho dos Santos Pires, 1915, and the very much lengthier remarks by the German, Richard Marek, 1906. See also the brief remarks by a wife of one of the attendees of the congress, the Brazilian, Maria Clara da Cunha Santos, 1908.)

"Odtud náš vlak odjíždí na západ, stoupaje výš a výše na Arizonské plateau, staví za chladného jitra ve Williams a obrací se odtud na sever ku našemu konečnému cíli Velkému kaňonu řeky Kolorada, kamž přijíždíme asi v poledne. Zde u kaňonu strávili jsme dva dny, k těmž cíli byly pořádány dvě výpravy dolů do kaňonu k řece. Velmi zajímavou je změna vegetace na úbočích kaňonu s výškou. Okraj a hořejší svahy jsou zalesněny, při sestupu do kaňonu stromové mizí a při cházíme k typické dužnaté vegetaci pouští: kaktusům, agave a j. Na hořejším kraji kaňonu padá někdy sníh, dole u řeky je však věčné jaro. Po oba večery našeho pobytu byly konány přednášky, jež měly za účel nás blíže seznámiti s geologií kaňonu."

(translation)

'From here [Albuquerque], our train departs west, climbs higher and higher to the Arizona Plateau, stops on a cold morning in Williams, and turns north from there to our final destination, the Grand Canyon of the Colorado River, where we arrive at about noon. We spent two days here at the canyon, where two expeditions were organized down into the canyon to the river. The change of vegetation on the slopes of the canyon with height is very interesting. The rim and upper slopes are forested, and the trees disappear when descending into the canyon when we walk into the typical fleshy vegetation of the desert: cacti, agaves, etc. Snow falls sometimes on the lower edge of the canyon, but at the bottom at the river is eternal spring. Lectures were held on both evenings of our stay, the purpose of which was to acquaint us more closely with the geology of the canyon.'

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

Hardt, H. B.

- 618 1905 (COMPILER) Official catalogue of the Lewis and Clark Centennial and American Pacific Exposition and Oriental Fair, Portland, Oregon, U.S.A., June 1 to October 15, 1905. Lewis and Clark Centennial Exposition, 1905. Celebrating the one hundredth anniversary of the exploration of the Oregon country by Captains Meriwether Lewis and William Clark. Portland, Oregon: Albert Hess and Co.; press of F. W. Baltes and Co.

See "Department of the Interior", pp. 36-37; specifically p. 37, listing of a panorama in oil, "39 feet long, the Grand Canyon of the Colorado, Grand Canyon Forest Reserve, Arizona" (not illustrated).]

Holmes, Burton

- 619 1905 Burton Holmes lectures : with illustrations from photographs by the author. Volume Six. New York: McClure, Phillips and Co., 336 pp. [Volume includes: "The Yellowstone National Park", "The Grand Cañon of Arizona", and "Moki Land".] [Reprinted 1908.]

Legendre, A.-F.

- 620 1905 Le Far-West Chinois. Deux années au Setchouen : récit de voyage, étude géographique, sociale et économique. Paris: Librairie Plon (Plon-Nourrit et Cie), 547 pp. [In French.]
(transl. 'The Chinese Far West. Two years in Setchouen: travelogue, geographical, social and economic study')

A peculiar comparison. The author, having never seen Grand Canyon, supposes the Yangtse gorges superior. See in Chapter 8, "De Ou-Shan a Kewi-Tcheou-Fou" (p. 62), his entire note:

"Je n'ai jamais contemplé le cañon de Colorado et autres cañons célèbres, mais je ne puis rien imaginer de plus sauvage, de plus grandiose, ni de plus stupéfiant à la fois, que les gorges de Yang-Tsé, dans leur longue succession de murailles sinistres, interrompues, de distance en distance, par des zones d'effondrement, où se décèlent les plus riants paysages, dans la beauté d'une végétation aux richesses presque tropicales."

(transl.) 'I have never contemplated the Colorado canyon and other famous canyons, but I cannot imagine anything wilder, more grandiose, nor more amazing at the same time, than the gorges of Yang-Tsé, in their long succession of sinister walls, interrupted here and there by fallen zones, where are revealed the most pleasant landscapes with beautiful vegetation of almost tropical richness.'

Lloyd, J. William

- 621 1905 Songs of the desert. Westfield, New Jersey: The Lloyd Group, Authors and Publishers, 26 pp.

Inside front cover: "Of this edition 500 copies were printed and types distributed. This copy is Number [handwritten number, with signature "J. Wm. Lloyd"]. Inside back cover: "This little book was printed for her father by Oriole Emerson Lloyd in her Out-of-the-Way Print Shop at Out-of-the-Way Home".

See "The Grand Canyon of Arizona", pp. 25-26. "Written at Point Eternity, Grand Canyon, October 5, 1903." Reprints Lloyd (1904).

A separate "Announcement" (one tri-fold leaf for mailing) specifies: "Announcement / Songs of the Desert / by / J. William Lloyd / [¶] Being a few little poems written by him on his Arizona journey and while sojourning among the Pimas. / [¶] Printed, bound, decorated and made into a book for her father by Oriole Emerson Lloyd, at her Out-of-the-Way Print Shop. [¶] Done on rough, tough paper, tinted like sand and leather, to remind you of the harsh, sweet life of this wild. [¶] In two colors, red and black, with Indian borders and hand-made pen-sketch initials. [¶] Each copy numbered and signed by the author. Price 50 cents. / For sale / by / The Lloyd Group / Box 511 / Westfield / New Jersey". Centered at left of recto: "An Announcement / sent by / The Lloyd Publishing Group / of Westfield, New Jersey".

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

Maguire, Shandy

- 622 1905 Troubles and triumphs of travel. (Concluded.) Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, Monthly Journal, 39(9) (September): 765-768.

The earlier installment is not pertinent. This one includes the following narrative and exchange (in total):

"The next morning after leaving we made plans to go to the Grand Canyon of Arizona. This trip was looked to with much pleasure. When we arrived at Williams, Ariz., the junction point for the trip, some misunderstanding relating to connections occurred. We all got mixed up, and having but ten minutes to untangle ourselves, through pure spite we decided not to go, and the vote was unanimous. The Durnells started ahead to their car to continue their journey homeward. We flopped down into our seats with every indication of colloquial squalls to continue indefinitely. My darling led off by saying:

"You should have gone to the Grand Canyon. We may never get another chance to see it."

"I was willing to go, but you and Mrs. Darnell took too long to arrange your bangs and get a gait on you to follow Chester and me."

"All right," she said, and she looked like Tam O'Shanter's wife,

'Knitting her brows like gathering storm,

'Nursing her wrath to keep it warm,'

as she continued, "You'll be sorry for not going, for I'll never forgive you."

"The train was just beginning to move as I sprang up, gathered up the grips and exclaimed, 'Come on, sooner than have a jawing match the rest of our lives for not taking it in, we'll get there; and as you are mounted astride a jackass with four legs, going down the trail, I'll admire your gracefulness, and if possible take a snapshot of you for the benefit of the grand-kids.'

"The next morning we 'did' the Grand Canyon from Oneill's [sic] Point to Rowe's Point, on the surface; and, indeed, we were well satisfied that we got the opportunity to see that stupendous work of nature."

McCutcheon, John T.

- 623 1905 The Mysterious Stranger and other cartoons. New York: McClure, Phillips and Co., [unpaginated].
See "Mr. Roosevelt in the Grand Canyon". ("... Not an office seeker in sight!")

Monroe, Harriet

- 624 1905 The Temple of Vishnu (Grand Cañon of Arizona). Atlantic Monthly, 96(4) (October): 536.

Vishnu, the gods of eld [sic] are dead. Long dead
Are Zeus, Astarte, and that lotus-flower
Isis of Egypt. Unto each his hour.
Yet though, silent within thy temple dread,
Locked against prayers, mounted above the tread
Of climbing feet, thou from thy purple tower
Contemplatest the stern inscrutable power
Whence all things come and whither all are led.
The day in splendor of lilac and clear blue
Visits thy mighty seat. The sapphire night
Broods in the abyss with darkness, and the rain
Veils thee with clouds, hails thee and bids adieu
In thunder. Steadfast on thy terraced height
Thou seest bold time besiege thy throne in vain.

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

Mosher, Leroy E. (Wagoner, Hank)

- 625 1905 "The Stranded Bugle" and other poems and prose including "The Eagle" (originally contributed to the Los Angeles Times:) together with an introduction by Gen. Harrison Gray Otis, and personal tributes from former associates and co-workers with The Times staff : with portrait. Los Angeles: The Times-Mirror Co., 379 pp.

See the prose item, "The Sublime Gorge", pp. 358-365, dated June, 1894. The author was a guest of W. W. Bass at Grand Canyon.

"Standing on the piñon-fringed rim of the great gorge of gorges, the Grand Cañon of the Colorado, the spectator is at first impressed, and if he be more than usually impressionable, appalled, by the wonderful ensemble—the cyclopean panorama of peak, turret, palisade, escarpment, pinnacle and open quadrangle. As his eye becomes somewhat used to focusing itself upon the vastness of the scene he begins at once the almost unconscious task of segregation; of picking out from its abutting neighbor each special feature which goes to make up the marvelous picture that is too wide for human vision, too far beyond the power of words to describe, to be adequately limned. The dream pictures one sees in the roaring flames of a sea-coal fire are here repeated in wondrous multiplication and in unspeakable magnitude. • • •

"For miles, at a point to the left center of the picture, there stands in stateliness a row of brownstone buildings as perfect in every detail as the hand-made structures that line Broad street in the City of Brotherly Love [Philadelphia]. There is the white sidewalk in front, the flight of steps leading up to the front doors, the windows, the apex of the roof. Each house is separate and distinct, but all precisely alike, seemingly, and as completely the dwellings of men as those that line Figueroa street, or the breezeswept slopes of Bonnie Brae.

"Where this row of buildings ends, the great wall breaks into a spasm of incongruity. The rectangular effect gives place to great piles of drift rock, shelving slopes of granite and sandstone, shuffled and intermixed, beetling heights and shadow-filled depths.

"Then the Supreme Architect again takes up His chisel and mallet. Here He builds a great church. To the eye of the looker-on it seems a rather small affair, but when one knows how deceptive is distance in this limpid air and lofty altitude of nearly eight thousand feet above sea level, he need not be told that it may be a thousand feet from the apparent street in front to the apex of the spire." [He goes on for a while, not omitting the obligatory blushing sunset impressions and "Egyptian, Chinese and Japanese temples".]

"But there is considerable digression about this, and this is one effect the Grand Cañon has upon people. It starts them talking of the age of the world; of the puny measure of man; of the end of time; of the beginning of eternity. On the brink of this spectacular wonder of the world speculation runs riot and the theorist gallops hot-foot. • • • [Then some more of the usual architectural wonders, plus the uniquely seen "great government building—a structure which might house the world's census takers, its patent models, its combined congresses, its aggregated libraries." [And more mansions and palisades—and again, twilight—then dawn to describe.]

Finally!— "It is Monday morning, June 4, 1894. Our guide has planned for today a descent to the great plateau, three thousand feet below the cañon's rim.

"Only the invalid of the party and the ex-Confederate with the broken collarbone remain with the chef and the teamsters to keep house.

"The trail is like most mountain trails, only a little bit more so. We are told that burros have carried women down it in safety, but it seems incredible, unless the burro dragged an anchor for ballast. The soil yields under the foot, and to the man who is unused to exercise the task of going down makes the knees quiver and the heart thump. On the way down he sheds a coat at one pile of rocks, a vest at another, and hankers to shuck himself nude of flesh and slide down in his bones.

"One bit of the trail leads along a great limestone ledge, and is easy going. As we swing around this ledge we face our camp, which, with its tent of snow and its bevy of camp-seekers, towers above us a thousand feet or more. The party strikes up the chorus of 'Daisy Bell,' and the sound is wafted up to the listeners of the rim-top with marvelous distinctness. We give a concerted yell, and the echoes leap among the rocks in an apparent

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

endless duplication. The camp-keepers shout down to us, and the sound comes as clear and resonant as the melody of silver bells. How sweet the air is! What exuberance, purity, freshness there is in it!

"From the limestone ledge the trail takes a sudden leap vertically toward the plateau. It is a slide, a crawl, a scramble. Down and yet down, over sloping rocks on which there is scarce a bit of foothold, we toil amid murmurs of disgust and frequent pulls at the tea-filled canteens. Firewater is taboo. Good, plain North American water or cold tea is the only thing drinkable permitted on this jaunt, and it is a most wise provision.

"The party had preceded the guide by a half hour or so, the trail being perfectly safe and distinct; and when the level was reached a council of war was held, the substance of it being that the kickers of the party wanted to go down to the river, a full day's journey for the round trip from where the session was held.

"When the guide arrived he was promptly jumped upon, and he thereupon made reply that if anybody wanted to go to the river after he had finished showing things for the day, he would go back to camp for grub and blankets.

"Let it be recorded that after the day's experience of some twenty miles, more or less, over rocks and shifty trails, nobody wanted to hear the word river, let alone go to see it." [More towering architecture.]

"Our guide is an Arizonian, and, as a consequence, perhaps, of his environment, is inclined to draw the long bow. He told us it was twenty minutes' walk to the crest of the Scenic Divide, but it took over an hour of toilsome scrambling over a land without even a ghost of a trail to get there.

"And yet when we saw the majestic panorama that was spread out above us, below us and before us, no man had the heart to call him a liar.

"Had we gone there with bleeding feet no one would have thought of caviling, for the Grand Cañon hushes human complaining; its majesty is so overpowering that one forgets to hurt or to tire. He feels himself such an atom that he lacks the superb nerve to complain at anything.

"It is now nearly midday. The sun stands over the great gorge and pours into it his concentrated rays of glory. He lights the enshadowed nooks and sweeps the purple from the slope and headland. The distance is full of haze, but about us lie the brilliancy of sunshine and the swimming airs that sparkle with sweetness and purity.

"Our guide promises luncheon at Mystic Spring, and says it is a half mile beyond yonder point; but it proves to be three miles or more.

"The effect of the Grand Cañon on an Arizonian's judgment of distance.

"Yet we are getting used to this.

"The Mystic Spring is not much of a spring as to quantity, but its quality is deliciousness itself. The luncheon-loaded burro was already at the rendezvous before us, and he proved at this particular juncture to be the most popular man in the party.

"Underneath a gigantic rock, forming a grotto that was cool and restful, the weary sightseers sprawled and ate, and ate and sprawled. The glories of the things seen were recounted, and the further views leading out to the west were gazed upon. Here in this waste of desolation and solitude, far from the madding crowd, viands take on added piquancy, a potted fowl has four wings, and a pate de foi gras hits the midriff with a musical thud.

"Amid these matchless splendors sawed out by the tooth of Time let us stay and dream, and gaze, and speculate, and theorize. Let us see new glories disclosed by the shifting lights of the afternoon as other glories become smothered and subdued in the shadows. Let us people these depths and distances with shapes to match them. Let us dream of the mighty monsters that once roamed and roared in these gorges. Let us lie here amid the sunshine and lulling breeze and let the world go by." [End!]

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

Muller, Hendrik P. N.

- 626 1905 Door het land van Columbus : een reisverhaal. Vereenigde Staten.—Mexico.—Cuba.—Costa-Rica.—Colombia.—Venezuela.—Trinidad.—Curaçao.—Suriname. Haarlem: Erven F. Bohn, 504 pp. [In Dutch.]
(transl. 'Through the land of Columbus : a travelogue. United States . . .')

Regarding a trip to America in 1901-1902. See pp. 163-170.

"Langs smal spoor bracht mij een klein treintje met houten banken in twee en een half uur aan den rand van den Grand Cañon of the Colorado-River, ook genoemd Grand Cañon of Arizona, waar een houten hotelletje enkele slaap- en eetvertrekken bevat. De nog al talrijke reizigers werden grootendeels ondergebracht in tenten, meestal verschillenden in één vertrek. Voor een klein fleschje spuitwater moest ik ½ dollar betalen.

"Niemand dacht er den volgenden morgen weder over, den tocht naar beneden te voet te ondernemen. Allen stegen te paard en 's avonds, toen ik terugkeerde, kwam men mij, één en al verbazing, aanspreken, omdat ik den tocht te voet had gedaan, die toch voor een Europeaan niet bijzonder bezwaarlijk is.

"••• Halverwege ruischt een klein beekje, en daar ontmoet ik een gezelschap Mexicaansche spoorwegarbeiders, half Indiaansch, bruin als negers. Zij hebben beneden geslapen in de open lucht en keeren nu van dezen voor hun genoeg ondernomen tocht terug. Zij spreken enkel Spaansch. •••

"Op eens beland ik op een kleine rotsvlakte, loop naar den rand en heb dan voor mij een tooneel, zóó afwijkend van wat ik ergens ter wereld heb gezien, zoo grootsch, zóó ongelooflijk, dat ik langen tijd behoef om mij rekenschap te geven van wat ik werkelijk vóór mij zie. Dat in woorden behoorlijk weer te geven, zoodanig dat men er zich een juiste voorstelling van kan vormen, zal mij niet gelukken. Ik zit aan den bovenrand van een nauwe rotskloof, zóó diep, dat de breede, woeste Colorado-rivier, die beneden er zich met luid geruisch een weg door baant, een glinsterend, smal voetpad lijkt. Aan de andere zijde van die kloof tot aan den gezichteinder verheffen zich ontelbare vestingen met torens, borstweringen en pyramiden, alle door de natuur uit de rotsen geslepen, hooge, machtige gevaarten, oprijzende uit valleien, soms mijlen breed. Heel, heel in de verte verrijst weder de rand van de Colorado-hoogvlakte, vanwaar ik ben afgedaald en waarin de natuur deze wonderwereld, dit reuzenbekken heeft uitgegraven. Met sterke, vaste hand heeft zij in alle rotsen zware, duidelijke lijnen getrokken, geheel en al waterpas en dus evenwijdig aan elkander, alleen hier en daar een inzinking van den bodem vertoonende. Van betrekkelijk jonge tot de oudste formaties teekenen zich duidelijk af, ook kolenlagen en zelfs het oudste graniet. Even onwaarschijnlijk als de vorm van deze rotsenvergadering zijn de kleuren. Roodpaars, als de kragen van krijgslieden, overheerscht; dan paars en groen. In haar overgangen vertoonen die kleuren tusschentinten. Boven het rood, kalksteen, ziet men eene geelwitte laag met roode vlekken en hier en daar groene struikjes. Welk een kleurenrijkdom! Behalve die kleine, lage struikjes, op verre afstanden van elkaar, geen plantengroei, niet één boom. Niet één enkel dier, behalve hagedissen en slangen. Tot aan den gezichteinder is geen levend wezen te bespeuren. Niet de minste beweging in de atmosfeer, geen geluid dan het doffe geruisch van de Colorado heel beneden.

"Lang vraag ik mij af, hoe deze roode vestingwereld, wonderlijker dan sprookjes, onverwachter dan het menschelijke leven, kan ontstaan zijn. De diepe, duidelijke, nergens ontbrekende waterpaslijnen schijnen te duiden op een ontzaglijke waterwerking. Maar de spiegel van de Colorado-rivier ligt hier niet minder dan 1850 meter beneden de randen van het bekken, dat hier 22 kilometer breed is, zoodat dit in zijn tegenwoordigen toestand moeilijk ooit geheel door de Colorado-rivier kan zijn opgevuld geweest; trots haar bijkans onbemerkbare kleinheid in verhouding tot den omvang en de diepte van bekken en kloof bevat zij, zooals gezegd, ook nu een groote hoeveelheid water. Ongetwijfeld heeft zij door haar kracht haar bed steeds dieper in den zachten rotsbodem gegraven en daardoor den afgrond, de kloof doen ontstaan aan mijn voet, misschien geholpen door een inzinking van haar bed, gelijksoortig aan die, hiervoren bij Yosemite beschreven. Maar voor het ontstaan van den tegenwoordigen vorm der rotsen kan ik geen andere bevredigende verklaring vinden dan eerst inzinking van den bodem tot een bekken en daarna langzame opheffing der rotsen, gelijktijdig met de uitschurende werking van het water. Daarnaast heeft verweering ongetwijfeld een rol gespeeld in haar vorming.

"Dit tooneel, dat zich over 217 Eng. mijlen, dus 70 uren gaans, naar ik in mijn hotel verneem [footnote here: "Baedeker zegt 300 mijl."] voortzet, is geheel eenig in de wereld; en het kan dus niet verwonderen, dat

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

een volkomen bevredigende en duidelijke verklaring niet gevonden is. Niets kan bij dit schouwspel vergeleken worden. De herinnering eraan vergezelt zelfs den veelbereisde tot zijn dood.

“Een wonder, dat men slechts ééns in zijn leven zal zien, laat men niet gedeeltelijk onbezocht; en zoo schrijd ik naar beneden langs een smal paadje, den rivierspiegel tegemoet. Na enkele uren wandelens kom ik daar aan en heb vóór mij niet een smal stroompje maar een krachtige, groote rivier van 65 meter breedte; hier heeft zij haar middenloop.

“De lucht is hier zóó drukkend geworden, dat ik tegen den terugtocht, de stijging van 1850 meter, begin op te zien. Een Mexicaansche spoorwegaarbeider, die door zijn straks tegengekomen makkers hier achtergelaten is, heeft hier den nacht doorgebracht en stelt mij voor hetzelfde te doen. Maar de puntige steenen die den oever geheel bedekken en de geringheid van het meegenomen voedsel maken dat weinig aantrekkelijk. In de verte daagt een landmeter op, die langs den oever ons bereikt; en nu aanvaarden wij gezamenlijk den terugtocht, somtijds kruipende op handen en voeten, met een bonzend hart, snakkend naar lucht. Hooger gekomen, trekken wij ons op aan de struiken en bereiken juist tegen het vallen van de duisternis ons hotelletje.

“Van een transport paarden, bestemd voor Williams, maken wij den volgenden dag een dankbaar gebruik. Gezeten in de wel harde maar uiterst gemakkelijke, houten, met leer overtrokken cowboy-zadels, die door hun hooge stutten van voren en van achteren de berijding der slecht getemde paarden gemakkelijk maken, rijden wij langs den rand van de cañon, die vanhier te diep is om duidelijk waarneembaar te zijn. Dan doorschrijden wij welgemoed de eenzame, eigendommelijke vlakke, die zich over geheel Arizona uitstrekt. Eerst rijden wij doo, hoog prairie-gras en vervolgens door woestijnachtig land, waarop het gras zich nog slechts in schaarsche bundeltjes vertoont naast lage, verstrooide pijnboompjes. Steenen worden talrijk; het land lijkt door God verlaten. Het schijnt mij niet waarschijnlijk, dat Zuid-Afrikaansche boeren, ingaande op hangende plannen, zich hier gelukkig zouden gevoelen.”

(translation)

“A small train with wooden benches took me along a narrow track in two and a half hours to the edge of the Grand Canyon of the Colorado River, also called the Grand Canyon of Arizona, where a small wooden hotel contains some sleeping and dining rooms. The rather numerous travelers were for the most part accommodated in tents, usually several in one room. I had to pay ½ dollar for a small bottle of sparkling water.

“No one thought again the next morning of making the journey down on foot. They all mounted on horseback, and in the evening, when I returned, I was approached, in complete astonishment, because I had made the journey on foot, which is not particularly difficult for a European.

“ • • • Halfway through, a small brook rushes, and there I meet a company of Mexican railroad workers, half Indian, brown as negroes. They have slept below in the open air, and are now returning from this pleasure journey. They speak only Spanish. • • •

“Suddenly I come upon a small rocky plain, walk to the edge, and have before me a scene so different from what I have seen anywhere in the world, so grand, so unbelievable, that it takes me a long time to realize what I really see before me. I won't be able to describe it properly in words, in such a way that one can form a correct idea of it. I sit at the top of a narrow rocky gorge, so deep that the wide, raging Colorado River, which cuts its way below with a loud noise, seems like a glittering, narrow footpath. On the other side of that gorge to the horizon rise innumerable fortresses with towers, parapets, and pyramids, all carved out of the rocks by nature, lofty, mighty monstrosities, rising from valleys, sometimes for miles across. Far, far away rises again the edge of the Colorado plateau, whence I descended and in which nature has excavated this wonderful world, this gigantic basin. With a strong, steady hand she has drawn heavy, clear lines in all the rocks, completely level and thus parallel to each other, only showing a depression of the bottom here and there. From relatively young to the oldest formations are clearly visible, also coal seams and even the oldest granite. As improbable as the shape of this rock meeting are the colors. Red-purple, like the collars of warriors, predominates; then purple and green. In her transitions those colors show intermediate shades. Above the red limestone, one sees a yellow-white layer with red spots and here and there green bushes. What a wealth of colours! Except for those small, low bushes, at great distances from each other, no vegetation, not one tree. Not a single animal, except lizards and snakes. Up to the horizon there is no living creature to be seen. Not the slightest movement in the atmosphere, no sound but the dull murmur of the Colorado far below.

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

"For a long time I wonder how this red fortress world, more wonderful than fairy tales, more unexpected than human life, could have come into existence. The deep, clear, nowhere missing level lines seem to indicate an immense water effect. But the mirror of the Colorado River here is not less than 1,850 meters below the edges of the basin, which is 22 kilometers wide, so that in its present condition it could hardly have ever been completely filled by the Colorado River; despite its almost imperceptible smallness in relation to the size and depth of the basin and gorge, it still contains, as said, a great deal of water. No doubt, by her strength she has dug her bed deeper and deeper into the soft rock bottom, and thereby created the abyss, the chasm, at my foot, aided perhaps by a depression of her bed similar to that previously described in Yosemite. But for the origin of the opposite form of the rocks I can find no other satisfactory explanation than first a depression of the bottom into a basin and then a slow uplift of the rocks, simultaneously with the scouring action of the water. In addition, resistance undoubtedly played a role in its formation.

"This scene, which extends over 217 English miles, so 70 hours walking, as I hear in my hotel [footnote here: 'Baedeker says 300 miles.'] continues, is quite unique in the world; and it is therefore not surprising that a perfectly satisfactory and clear explanation has not been found. Nothing compares to this spectacle. The memory of it accompanies even the much-traveled until his death.

"A miracle, which one will see only once in a lifetime, is not partially left unvisited; and so I stride down a narrow path toward the river mirror. After a few hours of walking I arrive there and have before me not a narrow stream but a powerful, large river 65 meters wide; here she has her middle course.

"The air has become so oppressive here that I am beginning to dread the return journey, the 1,850 meter ascent. A Mexican railroad worker, who has been left here by his comrades [whom I] recently met, has spent the night here and proposes to me to do the same. But the pointy stones which completely cover the bank and the small amount of food brought along make this little appealing. In the distance a surveyor emerges, reaching us along the bank; and now we make the retreat together, sometimes crawling on all fours, heart pounding, gasping for air. Having gotten higher, we pull ourselves up to the bushes and reach our hotel just before darkness falls.

"We make grateful use of a transport of horses intended for Williams the next day. Seated in the hard but extremely comfortable, wooden, leather-covered cowboy saddles, whose high struts make it easy for the badly tamed horses to ride in front and behind, we ride along the edge of the canyon, which from here is too deep to be clearly observable. Then we gleefully traverse the lonely, proprietary plain that stretches all over Arizona. First we ride through tall prairie grass, and then through desert-like land, where the grass now only shows itself in sparse bundles next to low, scattered pine trees. Stones become many; the land seems forsaken by God. It does not seem probable to me that South African farmers, following their pending plans, would feel happy here."

Munk, Joseph A.

627

1905 Arizona sketches. New York: The Grafton Press, 230 pp.

See "Canyon Echoes", pp. 130-150. After Munk (1899) but updates the text by comparing the Bright Angel and Grandview sections following the construction of the railroad to the rim. Takes note of the Bright Angel, Grandview, and Hance Trails, but focuses on the last of these, and devotes several pages to Hance's tales and his idea of the origin of the canyon. Not much in the line of personal reflections on the canyon, except the following, some of it re-edited from Munk (1899):

"Now that the Grand Cañon is made accessible by rail over a branch road of the Santa Fé from Williams on the main line, it is reached in comparative ease and comfort. But to stop at the Bright Angel Hotel and look over the guard rail on the cliff down into the cañon gives merely a glimpse of what there is to see. A brief stay of one day is better than not stopping at all, but to get even an inkling of its greatness and grandeur days and weeks must be spent in making trips up and down and into the cañon.

"After having seen the cañon at Bright Angel the next move should be to go to Grand View fourteen miles up the cañon. An all day's stage ride from Flagstaff to the cañon was tiresome, but the two hours' drive through the pine woods from Bright Angel to Grand View is only pleasant recreation.

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

"Seeing the Grand Cañon for the first time does not necessarily produce the startling and lachrymose effects that have been described by some emotional writers, but the first sight never disappoints and always leaves a deep and lasting impression.

"As immense as is the great chasm it is formed in such harmonious proportions that it does not shock the senses. But as everything about the cañon is built on such a grand scale and the eyes not being accustomed to such sights it is impossible to comprehend it—to measure its dimensions correctly or note every detail of form and color at the first glance. As the guide remarked, 'God made it so d— big that you can't lie about it.'

"To comprehend it at all requires time to re-educate the senses and make them accustomed to the new order of things. But even a cursory view will always remain in the memory as the event of a lifetime in the experience of the average mortal."

Munk concludes the article with remarks on other Arizona canyons.

Nippert, Alfred R.

- 628      1905      Eine unbekannter Winkel unseres Landes. Vortrag von Herrn Alfred R. Nipper, 1. Dezember 1904. From: Vortragsabende [SECTION]. In: Vorstands-Bericht des Deutschen Pionier-Vereins von Cincinnati, Ohio, für das 37. Verwaltungsjahr, endigend am 30. Juni 1905. Cincinnati, Ohio: Druck von Chas. F. Lotz, pp. 36-42. [In German.]
(transl. 'An unknown corner of our country. Lecture by Mr. Alfred R. Nipper, December 1, 1904.')

Features the Havasupai.

Otis, Eliza A.

- 629      1905      California : "where sets the sun" : the writings of Eliza A. Otis (Mrs. Harrison Gray Otis, long with the staff of the Los Angeles times) in poetry and prose : assembled, arranged and edited by her husband : in two parts under one cover : 1876-1904. Los Angeles: The Times-Mirror Co., 280 pp.

See "At the Grand Canyon. (Grand Canyon of the Colorado, June, 1901.)", p. 71:

God's own hand hath left its impress on thee,
His touch is seen upon thy rock-hewn forehead,
And thou dost stand, a world within a world,
Where Chaos lingers still, and Mystery
Walks dumb amid the mighty chiselings
Of Time. The sky looks down upon thee with Undying wonder, and the atmosphere
Throws robes of mystic color round thee which Change at morn and noon and eve their rainbow
Folds, intangible as the Summer's breath.
As from the edge of some far-off planet
We stand upon the rim of thy vast deep
And look down upon thy giant forms, thy Carved domes and temples with their rocky spires,
And thy wide valley's floor, where to our eyes
Thy mighty river seems a silver thread
Creeping with hushed voice amid the shadows.
Thy great trees, which lift their branches to the Sun, look like tender grasses, a living
Line of green, stirless upon thy breast,
As if the lullaby of ages had
Soothed them into slumber. Thou dost seem a-dream,
To lie while the airs of the old Past flow Round thee. Thou dost look into the face of Time and smile at Change, a marvel strange amid Created things. We may search the wide earth

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

Over and still find no likeness elsewhere
To thee. God's own finger hath scooped out thy Titan forms, and Time stands by in worshipful Admiration and is still. So we stand
Dumb with reverent awe, while Wonder wraps
Us in his robes of worship and clothes us
With humility, till our souls cry out—
Our God is here, for lo! we see His footprints
And the marvels of His hand within this place.

Pritchard, John W.

- 630 1905 Across the continent in good company. Being a description of a trip with five car loads of women whose business is to make the world better. Christian Nation, 43 (December 13): 14-15.

Rail trip to the National Women's Christian Temperance Union meeting in Los Angeles. Item is signed "J. W. P." Includes an abbreviated commentary on the stop at Grand Canyon.

"When the Santa Fe got hold of us our sight-seeing began to have a new zest to it, and the climax approached as we rode from Williams to the Grand Canyon of Arizona, at sunset. Think of a sunset so attractive in its colorings that 150 women and ten men looking at it forgot to talk. It was a sea of ruby filled with islands of emerald, then it dissolved into golden mist, enfolding sheets of flame, and was immediately transformed into angry looking clouds of smoke, pierced by a lurid light rising as from a vast conflagration, then it was a placid lake of faintest tints flecked with tiny sails, with fantastic forms far above every conceivable shade of color, when over all there suddenly fell the cloak of night; and soon the conductor's voice was heard calling 'Grand Canyon!' And we awoke. But there was no moon, and bye and bye we sought our bunks and waited for the morning. But who can describe the Grand Canyon? It is a measurless rift in the world's side where Nature mixed her paints and left the stains on the giant rocks. It is a great gorge thousands of feet deep with the Colorado river plunging along through a chasm at the bottom. McClure's [Magazine] told of an artist who led his bride blindfolded to the rim of the canyon and then tore away the bandage. She looked out over the wound in the world, and turning to her artist husband said, 'If you ever attempt to paint that I'll leave you!' It was once proposed to take a public subscription to pay John Ruskin for visiting our great west and especially Yosemite, Yellowstone, and the Grand Canyon that he might describe them, as only Ruskin could.

"After two nights and a day at the Canyon, the train made a quick run to Los Angeles, reaching there the following morning." (ENTIRE NOTE)

Roosevelt, Theodore

- 631 NO DATE The works of Theodore Roosevelt in fourteen volumes. Presidential addresses and state papers : Part One. New York: P. F. Collier and Son, Executive Edition, 400 pp. "1905?" date cited in [Library of Congress catalogue.]

See "At Grand Canyon, Arizona, May 6, 1903", pp. 369-372. Refer also to Roosevelt (1903).

Royal Academy of Arts

- 632 1905 The Exhibition of the Royal Academy of Arts, MDCCCXCV : the one hundred and thirty-seventh. London: William Clowes and Sons, Ltd., 80 pp.

Listed paintings include "The Grand Cañon of the Colorado River, Arizona", Thomas Moran, p. 10. Also, Moran's contact address in London is given on p. 73.

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

Thayer, Frank S.

- 633 1905 Glimpses of the Grand Cañon of the Colorado. Denver: Frank S. Thayer, 15 photos. [Variant(?) of Thayer (no date [1900]).]

Treves, Frederick

- 634 1905 The other side of the lantern : an account of a commonplace tour round the world. London, Paris, New York and Melbourne: Cassell and Co., 424 pp. [Also published by Funk and Wagnalls Co. (New York, no date). Also later printings.]

A world tour by a well-placed British surgeon, ending at the Grand Canyon; see "The Scene at the End of the World", pp. 415-419. Alas, his narrative is about as forlorn as his impressions of the landscapes surrounding the canyon. His greatest inspirations, perhaps, are those conveyed by the travel guides. He is wearied by the lands 'round about, then stutters his way through the canyon view. It is an object lesson of the dangers incumbent in having seen the world—and then, this. Yet despite it all, it tells him only about "the end of the world".

"In Arizona is a flat, arid, man-deserted plateau which is so vast that it covers nearly 100,000 square miles. On the shrivelled surface of this uplifted waste is a chasm—a stupendous crack in the earth. It is 217 miles in length, some 12 miles wide, and its walls, which are nearly vertical, are a mile in depth. At the bottom of this fearful abyss runs the Colorado River. This same Colorado is 'one of the great rivers of North America. Formed in Southern Utah by the confluence of the Green and Grand, it intersects the north-western corner of Arizona, and, becoming the eastern boundary of Nevada and California, flows southward until it reaches tidewater in the Gulf of California, Mexico. It drains a territory of 300,000 square miles, and, traced back to the rise of its principal source, is 2,000 miles long." [crediting Titan of Chasms].

"This riverway is called the Grand Canyon of Arizona, and is claimed to provide 'the most sublime spectacle of the Earth.'

"Among the many conceptions which have been formed of the circumstances which shall attend the end of the world is one which imagines that life shall gradually vanish from the face of the globe, grade by grade, the lower following the higher. Into the details of such an idea comes the supposition that the races of men would pass away, that the beasts of the field and the birds of the air would die in tum, and that a slower decay would fall upon the more gracious trees and flowers until the great world became a fruitless waste. On such a desert only the hardiest things that grow would linger, while, at the last, the dried-up earth itself would crack and crumble into nothingness. Any who incline to such a foretelling as this will find in the country of the Grand Canyon some realisation of what they have pictured in their fancies.

"From a land of fields and prosperous villages, from a point not far distant from the vineyards and peach orchards of Los Angeles, the road crawls upwards on to the great table land. It is a miserable track, through a parched and dying country, which is grey with the burden of unnumbered years. The earth has the pallor of cinders, and is strewn everywhere with a harvest of lean stones. The sickly grass is sapless and harsh. The few bushes are blanched of all colour; their branches are spidery and emaciated; their leaves rustle like shreds of dried skin. There are mummified shrubs which have still a semblance of life, and still bare their sterile tendrils to the unheeding air.

"The only trees are firs and pines, but they are dwarfed and stunted, or are bent and deformed by drought and horrid winds. Many have died, for the dead are standing dead in hundreds. Their bare boughs rattle in the passing gust, like bones in a gibbet, while the skeletons of those that have fallen are stretched in every shadow upon the stones. Only the sturdiest things that have life have survived—the fir, the pine, the sage bush, and the outcast of the desert.

"It may be that at one time, on this drear plateau, there were orchards and cornfields, meadows and the abodes of men. The place is now desolate and abandoned. The shrunken earth is waterless. There are signs of neither bird nor beast, and upon the table land has fallen the first hush of an eternal silence.

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

"The country, indeed, that is traversed on the way to the Grand Canyon may well be a realisation of the last struggle for life on the face of the earth. If the ending of the world be slow, there must needs be a time when the once luxuriant country will come to look as wan and pitiable as this.

"At the end of many miles of this Golgotha the traveller finds himself at a moment on the brink of an incredible chasm. He comes upon it suddenly and without warning. The whole expanse before him is as level as the sea—a limitless stretch of earth and stones and struggling pine trees. There is no shelving edge; no slope to the ravine. The chasm is a Titanic crack in the earth, with edges as sharp and as abrupt as a crack in an earthenware urn.

"The first view of this undreamed-of abyss conveys, with dramatic suddenness, only a sense of the awful and the stupendous. Here is an unsuspected, clean-cut breach in the earth, so immense that it is impossible to realise that to the pines on the opposite side is a flight of ten miles, or that the drop to the bottom of the trench is a mile sheer.

"It would seem that the rent is fresh, that the world has burst asunder but yesterday, for trees come to the very edge of the gap, the face of the fracture is raw rock, and this jagged cape that stands out from the side must have fitted—a day ago—into the wedge-shaped bay on the other brink, ten miles across.

"The sight of this portentous trough is so astounding, so sublime, that all sense of distance or of proportion is lost. Here is a spot where the planet is riven in twain. Here is the scene of a terrific world-ending catastrophe. One expects to hear rumblings far down in the depths, or to see smoke and tongues of flame shoot up from the gulf; but the chasm is silent as death, and through its channel there sweeps a clear, untroubled air.

"The view is not such as can be gained from a mountain top; it is a down-looking into a mile-deep gash in the earth, a peering into a well or into a terrific trench many leagues wide.

"It is useless to attempt any comparison of its proportions. Since the Canyon is in places twenty miles across, one may imagine that the English Channel, between Dover and Calais, had become dry, that its floor had sunken almost out of sight, and that those who looked into the trough, from the brink of Dover cliff, would gaze down a wall from 5,000 to 6,000 feet deep.

"This great fissure in a forlorn land may well be one of the rents in the crust of the world which shall herald its final rupture into fragments.

"The chasm is in vivid contrast to the drab level on either side of it, for it is a gulf of colour. Its walls and its floor are redbrick-red where the sunlight falls, claret-red in the shadows—a glowing channel of fervent tints, whose slopes and cuttings and piles of riven stone appear to be red hot.

"It is no mere depth of wall and gully. The floor of the Grand Canyon presents a gigantic sunken landscape, in which are rugged mountains, boding cliffs, fathomless ravines, and level plains. Hills of rock rise out of the abyss, peak after peak, and spire upon spire. There are prodigious coves and gulches. There are black pits miles in width, like counter-sunk mountains, and in such Titanic moulds Alps might have been cast.

"The earth seems to have been cracked by fire, and these masses of rent and tumbled rock may have been plucked out of its depths by bursting heat and be still aglow.

"Red is the prevailing colour of the Canyon, but it is not the only one. There is, in this underworld landscape, every tint of garnet, orange, and rose. There are the colours of the Alpenglów, the colours of the dawn; a cliff of Pompeian red, a plateau of brimstone yellow and copperas green, with a lavender shadow on it a mile in length. At one place is a blue-grey gorge, called Bright Angel Canyon, in which is a sapphire stream with an edge of emerald on either side of it.

"The very bottom of the chasm can only be seen at rare spots. Elsewhere the remotest floor of the gorge is a ragged fissure in black rocks, where, far down in the sunless hollows of the sinister cleft, the mysterious river roars on its way.

"On closer viewing of this ghostly landscape there is some suggestion of artificiality about it. The strata are horizontal, and the great torn masses of red rock look like colossal ruins of heaped-up brick with broken edges. The whole Canyon is a labyrinth of tumbled masonry. Here are, it would seem, the ruins of huge pyramids, ten miles square, rising from a slope made up of the dust of ages. Here are fractured battlements, roofless

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

subterranean passages, cellars that would hold a city, great stairs with steps three hundred feet high, and level terraces on which an army could be marshalled.

"There are wall sculptures of incredible proportions, curved mounds of stones, which might have borne aloft some fearsome amphitheatre, or which may mark the ruins of cirques and cloisters of a girth beyond the imagination of man. There are fragments of castles and of majestic temples, as well as towering masses of brick-like rock, which stand in rows as if they were the plinths and pediments of cloud-reaching pillars.

"Viewed in this wise it would seem that the mighty Canyon presents an allegory of the Foundations of the World which have been laid bare as the great planet became rent and shaken ere it crumbled into space.

"Far down, on a cliff side, are certain holes, such as sand-martins make in the wall of a quarry. They say that they belong to men of the Stone Age, and that they are many thousands of years old. On the other hand, they may be imagined to be the habitations of the very last human beings who eked out a vanishing life upon the surface of the earth."

White, William Allen

635 1905 On Bright Angel Trail. (Illustrated by Fernand Lungren.) McClure's Magazine, 25(5) (September): 502-515. [Full-page color illustrations by Lungren, pp. 505-512.]

White is overwhelmed like anyone else, and elevates into spiritual thought, but there are some things with which the canyon cannot please him—not even its name. Amazingly, despite the title, Bright Angel Trail takes a back sea to his expositions on the canyon itself. And after all is said and done, one is left with the impression that White is one of the very few who should not be allowed back in.

"To define in terms of miles this great gash in the earth, to say that the granite gorge section is sixty miles long, that it is a dozen or more miles wide and more than a mile deep, merely emphasizes the inability of the human mind to focus dimensions really vast. It seems shameful to put these figures down. They have their basis in the reaches of the human eye, in the short goings of man's intellect; but the Grand Cañon of the Colorado River, in Arizona, is one of the forces that makes the measureless inexpressible impressions of this life. There are few of them in the world—great primal things—the ocean, the desert, the mountains, the forest, the sky, and the great crowded cities of men. During the thousands of years of recorded time men have found some sort of halting expression for these mighty externals of the soul; the ocean has come to us in ten thousand sea songs most of which the race has long since forgotten; the desert and the mountains have been translated into language, even if imperfectly; the sky, which must have been man's first conscious source of terror when he rose from all-fours, has taught men to fear and then worship until now its moods fit into human moods, 'with a mild and healing sympathy' [borrowing from "Thanatopsis", by William Cullen Bryant]; the woods, 'man's first temples,' [Bryant, "A Forest Hymn"] still mean to the children of men all that is mystic, all that is vague and illusory in the groping human heart; cities for thousands of years have meant toil, injustice, and bondage—vanity, vexation, and woe. So this Cañon some day must have its special meaning to mankind, for it is like nothing else on earth. It is neither mountain nor desert nor sky, though it takes from all of them; but rather is it like the ocean in the eternity of its existence. For the Cañon seems infinitely old, and as permanent as space. But what it is and what it means to the world, other ages will have to say. They must discover it. For hundreds of years the Indians and primitive peoples have known of this Cañon, yet no mention of it is found in their religion or their folk-lore. The gold-seeking Spaniards of the Conquest, went to the brink; looked over and marched on, apparently unimpressed. One of their chroniclers calls the Cañon a 'rent in the earth,' and lets it go at that. The American pioneers saw it; but its strange and monstrous shape was beyond their ken or care, and they passed by without permanent word to attest that they saw it at all. The thing has not even been named; the title Grand Cañon is trite; it is a name that might have come from off a cigar-box, or from the dress-goods counter of a department store. The man who really discovers this profound expression of God in Nature will name it, and the name will mean something. • • •

"It cannot be that the fascination one feels in looking at this Cañon is a delusion having its root in idleness or mere self-mesmerism. The Cañon must have some meaning for men, as the other 'visible forms' of Nature have. The sea, with its ceaseless motion and its changeless shores, may have taught men poetry and given

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

them the first dreams of immortality; the woods have taught men to pray, and the sky has taught them hope. Here at this Cañon, the sun and the dry, clear air are painting a changing picture, full of color, full of the spirit of motion, full of mystery. One should not say that the Cañon is beautiful; it transcends mere beauty and passes into a 'far more exceeding glory.' But the heart of it is color. It is a rhapsody in color—great splashes and bands and daubs of color—blue shadows, deep and dead; tawny, strawberry tinged layers of granite; all the yellows in the paint-box; greens and gray-greens and pinks and lavenders, with the half-tones floating on the sun wraiths that haunt the air. He who can look at this monster chasm and not feel his soul stirring in uncanny sympathy with its depth, is dead, and Gabriel's trumpet will do little for him. One may hold communion with it as with great music; with the monody of the ocean, or with any of those big primitive expressions of the force that moves the universe, whether through man in art or through what we call Nature, as God made it. No better proof is needed of the existence of a dominant mind through all the universe than the consideration of how, on the one hand, the great passionate outbursts of the masters are art—great symphonies, great paintings, great messages to men, through words or symbols and of how, on the other hand, the sights and sounds of stark, untamed Nature rouse the human soul from its lethargy in the same miraculous fashion. The God that moves through 'Lear' and 'Lohengrin,' is He who 'plants his footsteps on the sea' and 'rides upon the storm.' [both from the hymn, "God Moves In a Mysterious Way", William Cowper]. The pilgrim to the Cañon must not go as one who visits a peepshow or a freak of Nature, but approach it as Moses came to the burning bush.

"The best possible view of the Cañon is from the top. There the atmosphere piles up over the crags and peaks beneath one's feet, and through this atmosphere, when the day is at its height, the actinic rays of the sun paint marvels in the huge, gaping furrow in the earth. From the rim one gets two impressions—so strong that they seem almost too big for the soul to hold—like the soul-smiting terror that comes to one who gazes long at the stars. The two impressions are of numberless infinitely—reaching horizontal lines and of eternal silence. There are few curves in the stretches of stratified rock that make colored ribbons many miles long; and the human eye is not used to taking in so much. Over these vistas the dry air of the desert quivers with the heat. Perhaps it is the river mist rising, perhaps it is sheer delusion; but in the motion that seems to stir the radiant air, a white wraith floats, eluding the eyes that would locate it, yet ever present in the sunlight that falls upon the facing cliffs. One feels that this illusory apparition is the spirit of silence that dominates the scene. And it is the silence of the place that appalls; for such a turmoil, even of rock, as rages beneath one, would seem in the nature of things to need some wild voice to release its wrath; but here is silence so deep that an engine's scream could not rend one corner of the measureless pall. One is bewildered with the maddening thrall of pulsing air, and throbbing color, and beckoning lines all leading to dreams of infinite life; and against that—the silence of infinite death. Indeed, the spirit of the thing below seems to creep into a man's soul through his body and lay hold upon his heart and his nerves. At night, as he lies in his bed, the terrific depths that strained his eyes by day reach up and grapple him. Many a man has clutched the bedclothes in a tremor of fright at the recollection of the scene. The phantasm of this red pit is real, as real as Nature's other manifestations that move her children.

"One might know the Cañon from the rim for years and not get tired of it; for as a whole its charm is exhaustless. But if he would break the entity, and know the Cañon in detail, one must go down into it; and of all the trails, they say Bright Angel is best. • • • The way to make the Bright Angel trip, if one is not too lazy, is to walk down and ride back. On foot one can loiter and loaf and invite his soul. But a horse has his own ideas and no man can divide time with a horse and see the full grandeur of the place. Afoot, one may sit down every few hundred feet and look at the walls towering above him. There is a lift and mass about these walls that fills the soul with unutterable things. Out between the diverging walls, if the time be early afternoon, the sun is plying his paint-brush on the peaks and hills below, while up Bright Angel Creek the blue shadows seem to be smudged into the canvas, in a rough, crass silhouette, as though God's elementary drawing-class had been put in charge of the lines and angles. But the color—the great kaleidoscope of color that is streaked and splashed through this petrified silence, the symphony of blues and browns and grays and yellows and pinks and reds, with the faint green tints of the scant vegetation of the place—the color is the work of old journeymen angels, who know what delights men's souls. The black-blue shadows seen in the morning from above fade at high noon with the directly falling light, and in the afternoon seem to grow bluer, losing detail, and become mere pools of color reflecting the sky in the shimmering air that is piled high over the desolation of the place; the reds become more vivid; the yellows more highly burnished and the green tints in the grays come out with greater definiteness. It

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

is in the afternoon that the Cañon is at its best. And no more inspiring view may be had than is found on coming down Bright Angel Trail. • • •

First, White goes on at some length about what is art to man and God; and about civilization and spiritualization. In the canyon, "He is in the presence of big, simple, primordial things that go to the core of human nature, and seeing these things man may not babble of matters frescoed on the surface of life. • • • It seems so plain, so evident—so trite almost that one should not fail to transcribe it. Yet no one has caught it, no one has described it. • • • But the artists who have put it in mimic form and color have made it complex. And the writers who have tried to tell of it have made mere muddles of words that mean nothing. The Cañon's master has not come to it. • • • The experience of those who try to paint or to reproduce the Cañon in words is invariably this: the thing they do upon the spot seems unspeakably bad; there is in it nothing to commend it to the man who sees before him the real subject. • • • The Cañon is too fresh from God's hand for man's mind to conceive it in terms of art."

He then describes, at some length, the "one great experience" for one who travels down Bright Angel Trail—"sunset on the mesa; and that is worth all the trip [on which he expounds but not in any unexpected way] • • •

"Sunrise in the Cañon is not important. There is a thrilling roseate moment of dawn and a commonplace appearance of the sun as commonplace as the coming of the milkman. But to make the journey to the river from the mesa and back by noon, as most tourists do, it is necessary to get up for the sunrise."

Later, White does appreciate the sunrise on the rim, but for the time being he continues to lecture on how to view canyon scenery while descending to the river.

"The river itself at the foot of the Bright Angel Trail is a disappointment. There it is muddy and not swift and savage enough to convey the idea of freedom. It slips languidly through the rock-walls that try to hold it, with here a ripple and there a pool, and with no sign of vegetation or life to relieve the stony monotony. A man is glad to get on his horse for the upward journey." And he continues, without a break, "There is nothing new in the upward journey to the mesa, and little that is beautiful, save as one pauses to look back. The morning light in the Cañon, viewed from below, is not pleasing.

". . . by the time one has been in the Cañon a day he learns to take some pleasure in looking down and finding the worm-track of the trail thousands of feet below. The harmony of Nature is perfect; though there be a million details in the hillside or on the desert, though animals of the place may slip through the wilderness unnoticed, let a man appear, and he stands out big and obtrusive, and man's works strike a harsh, discordant note, and so the trail stands out of the hillside like a cruel welt on the face of Nature.

"When one has climbed from the river to the top of the trail in a day, unless he is used to horseback riding, he is too tired to waste much time on the sunset. It is a beautiful sight, but is not so beautiful as midday from the rim, or sunset from the mesa. Nor is it so beautiful as the sunrise from one of the many peninsulas that jut from the top of the Cañon into its depths. Moonlight in the Cañon is a ghastly sight; the life goes out of the light, and one seems to be looking upon the face of death, for color is the soul of the place. At night the silence of the stars and the silence of this pit—each eternal and maddening to human consciousness—mingle in an awful spell that falls upon the soul like the lonesomeness of the grave. There is something of death in life and of life in death in the grim inevitableness of this silence, so changeless and yet so vital. The stars and the yawning Cañon grip the soul and draw it to a communion with something strong outside itself—something that escapes definition and analysis; something that the ancient people meant when they said that they walked with God!"

1906

Anonymous

636

1906 Free public lectures. Drexel Institute Bulletin (Philadelphia), 2(3) (January): 5-6.

See p. 5: "VI. Lecture, The Grand Canyon and Yosemite Valley, by Howard W. DuBois, Friday, February 9, at 8 p. m., in the auditorium. The lecture will be illustrated by an extensive collection of colored stereopticon views, unsurpassed for their high artistic quality." (ENTIRE NOTE)

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

- 637 1906 The New England Sanitarium. In: Medical Missionary [SECTION]. Atlantic Union Gleaner (Seventh-day Adventists, Atlantic Union Conference, South Lancaster, Massachusetts), 5(1) (January 3): 8.

Includes notice of stereopticon lecture by George Wharton James, given at the sanitarium December 16 (1905) "on the Grand Canon of Colorado" [sic]. Also, parlor talks were given by him on other subjects.

- 638 1906 En kvinnlig globe-trotter. Idun (Illustrerad Tidning för Kvinnan och Hemmet) (Stockholm), 19(30) (July 26): 359-360. [In Swedish.]
(transl. 'A female globe-trotter')

Brief article about the world travels of Miss Eva af Winklerfelt [1854-1934], with biographical notes and photographic portrait. Includes a casual note that she had visited the Grand Canyon and took the trail into it (probably at Hance's, though possibly also on the Bass trails, depending on when she had been there):

"Från Mexiko reste hon öfver El Paso till Grand Canyon i Arizona, ett af världens under i fråga om bergformationer och färgprakt. Där företogs en lifsfarlig ridt ned i dalen längs en väg, som för det mesta endast är en smal stig och slingrar sig utmed höga klippor och bråddjup. Nere i djupet finnes en asbestgrufva." (ENTIRE NOTE)

(transl.) 'From Mexico, she traveled across El Paso to the Grand Canyon in Arizona, one of the wonders of the world in terms of rock formations and splendor. There was a life-threatening ride down the valley along a road, which for the most part is only a narrow path and winds along high cliffs and abysmal depths. Down in the depths is an asbestos mine.'

- 639 1906 In Grand Canyon. Our Paper (Massachusetts Reformatory, Concord Junction), 22(23) (June 9): 356.

From Chicago Record-Herald.

Allen, William C.

- 640 1906 At the Grand Canyon, Arizona. The Friend (Philadelphia), 80(4) ("Seventh-Day, Eighth Month 4" [Saturday, August 4]): 31.

Item is dated by Allen "Seventh Month 8th, 1906" (July 8, 1906).

"This is one of those brilliant sunny mornings, such as you get nowhere else than in the Rocky Mountain region. It is worth going a four day's [sic] journey to be four days in an atmosphere like this. • • •

"From the hotel is a typical view. The great walls stand out, tier on tier, with off-shoots down into the canyon, of all sorts of fantastic shapes and colors. Then the colors are magnificent, varying with every change of the sun's course. The great walls, or points of rocks, or pyramids, are tinted with reds, yellow, buff, amethyst, white, green, grey and purple. Last night, when I thought the glory had been exhausted for the day, a few parting rays of the sun sent great bands of pink and red across the deepening purple of approaching night.

"Close by the hotel is Hopé House [sic], where Indians live, weaving blankets and baskets. I saw a cute little baby being bound up yesterday, it cried, as if it did not enjoy its mother's attentions. There are a good many Indians around. They are rather shy, but seem light-hearted and good-natured. • • •

"This morning I wandered by the rim-rock, observing the changing effects of color, form and shadow, for miles and miles away. It is not distinctly a peaceful scene. There is nothing soft in the hard rocks and precipices. Yet all are toned into a harmony, as only the Creator of the Universe can do it."

Anthony, Henry L.

- 641 1906 Correspondence. In: Grand Commandery, Knights Templar of Michigan, Fiftieth Annual Conclave : held at Detroit, June 12, 13, and 14, A.D. 1906, A.O. 788. Kalamazoo, Michigan: Ihling Bros. and Everard, pp. 3-114 [sic].

See under "Kansas", p. 43:

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

"The Grand Commander [John C. Postlethwaite] waxes eloquent over the trip to the Twenty-ninth Triennial. Of the day devoted to the 'Grand Canon of Arizona,' he said: 'It was a great privilege to be permitted to stand upon the crest of this great canyon and behold its wonderful formation, its ponderous natural walls, grand fortresses, lofty pyramids, bronzed monuments, mighty precipices, vast columns, deep recesses, awful chasms, its cataracts, peaks, domes, cathedrals, temples and battleships formed by the stratas [sic] of the earth in variegated colors, and to stand upon the rock on the verge and look down into the awful abyss five thousand feet below, and then to look upward into the heavens which seemed to envelop you! One is impressed with the thought that heaven and earth are kissing each other, and that he is gathering in all the sweetness of the fond embrace, and thereby inspired to "praise God for His wonderful works to the children of men." [possibly originally from Huntington Porter, Divine Providences Noticed: A Discourse Delivered At Rye, Thursday, January 1, 1801; Being the Commencement of a New Year, and a New Century (Charles Peirce, Portsmouth, New-Hampshire, 1801, p. 8)].'"

Baird, George D.

642 1906 Picturesque New Zealand. Western Field, 8(3) (April): 167-177.

Baird travels to the antipode to realize this. "But if your dreams give you no peace until you see the very earth open and display the grandeur of its appalling depths, then stand on the rim of the Grand Cañon of Arizona and tremble as the solid earth yawns beneath you." (ENTIRE NOTE)

Bowman-Metcalf, Sadie

643 1906 Grand Canyon of the Colorado. Overland Monthly, New Series, 47(2) (February): 164.

The author's surname is noted as hyphenated in the index to the January-June issues; it is not hyphenated in the poem's by-line.

From cliffs to cliffs the twilight drifts—
Pale Evening holds her breath—
A moment trembles o'er the Gulf,
Then smiles, and meets her death.
Is it for Evening they are sad—
Abyss and stream and star—
Or this their secret breathed to Night:
"The mighty loneliest are?"

Is it a fancy that the stars,
Called by the stream's unrest,
Subdue the lines of entry pines,
Steal past each guarding crest—
And, slipping through her prison bars,
Fall, trembling, on her breast?

Is it a thought, by wind-elves wrought,
Where midnight shadows lie,
That all the Past awakens at last,
Between this gulf and sky—
With songs of hearts too sad to live—
Of souls too brave to die?

Is it a dream, by cliff and stream,
Amid those silvered domes,
That Incan chiefs chant old beliefs,
Whene'er the Sun-God roams?
There still the Moqui tells his beads
The Supai breathes his prayer—

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

And newer breeds, of sunless creeds,
May find an answer there!

Chapple, Joe Mitchell

- 644 1906 At the Grand Canyon. The National Magazine (Boston), 24(2) (May): [unpaginated section], [5 pp.].

Apparently this is the final chapter of a much longer, serialized piece, "A Month in Mexico", which relates to the widely advertised commercially conducted tours managed by Charles H. Gates.

"In the early morning we arrived at the Grand Canyon. The party clambered out of the cars to wander up to the rim of the great chasm—just outside the famous hotel El Tovar. As I looked for the first time upon that marvelous scene, that Sunday morning at sunrise, it seemed as though all the world were in a spirit of worship before the great Divinity. Here the finite seemed to touch the Infinite." And so on, repeating the "spirit of worship" at Rowe's Point.

He takes a trip into the canyon on "Midnight", a mule of "skittish disposition", where on the Tonto Plateau "how trivial and insignificant we felt with our egg shells scattered on the great rocks, where the egg shells left by former visitors showed that we were not the first party to lunch on this romantic spot, where it seemed almost desecration even to eat."

He repeats an impossibility that others have proclaimed, that "From the bottom of the canyon you can look up and see the stars at noonday as plain as though it were midnight."

He goes on at length about El Tovar, Hopi House, and the tour group's return eastward.

- 645 1906 Through the golden West. The National Magazine (Boston), 25(3) (December): [unpaginated section], [13 pp.].

See p. 13, "No American should miss viewing the Grand Canyon, long since registered as one of the sights of the world." (ENTIRE NOTE)

Cowan, John L.

- 646 1906 Apotheosis of the ass. Overland Monthly, 48(2) (August): 85-90.

"The most melancholy and disheartening sight to be seen in all the West . . . is the prostitution of this austere and virle soul to base, ignoble and effeminate uses. Surely to fill the [G]rand Canon of the Colorado . . . and other corners of God's great Western picture gallery with guides, photographers, lunch counters, paper bags and peanut shells, were sacrelige enough. To take the laborious and long-suffering donkey, however, and treat it as a lay figure, or a portable appendage to the scenery . . . these are flagrant wrongs which mean-minded men have perpetrated through sordid love of the dimes and quarters of the summer tourists."

Dellenbaugh, Frederick S.

- 647 NO DATE (TEXT ED.) The Grand Cañon of Arizona : through the stereoscope : the Underwood Patent Map System combined with eighteen original stereoscopic photographs : Explanatory Notes edited by F. S. Dellenbaugh[,] author of The Romance of the Colorado River, North Americans of Yesterday, etc. New York and London: Underwood and Underwood, 64 pp. with 2 maps (map 2 is fold-out). ("527" noted on title-page; "Printed in the United States" on title-page verso.) [1906-1908.]

This is a later ed. (1st ed. 1904). This separately bound text accompanies a boxed set of 18 stereoscopic views by the firm of Underwood and Underwood. Its fold-out map of Grand Canyon delimits with overprinting the direction and breadth of view for each stereoview. Box variants noted: boxes with gilt lettering or silver stamping. Text booklet either clothbound or with wraps. Clothbound cover stamping: Grand Canyon of Arizona : through the stereoscope : Underwood & Underwood. In addition to the difference in places of publication, this ed. differs from the 1904 ed. in the following points: 1) title-page adds credit to Dellenbaugh; 2) chapter title, p. 11, adds tilde to "N" ("HOW THE CAÑON CAME TO BE"); 3) p. 31, last two lines rewritten (in 1904 ed. as ". . . of

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

the Indians will hospitably show you the way to a point where you can get a . . .”, in this later ed. as “. . . Indian will show you the way to the point marked 1 on Map 1, where you get a . . .”

Dryden, Mary V.

- 648 1906 Sketches of a western trip. The Medical Missionary (Battle Creek, Michigan), New Series, 15(5) (July 31): 33, 36-38.

Begins with some long, but predictable, remarks on a rimside visit to Grand Canyon, though she does refer to it as a “gigantic freak of nature” where “immense boulders and rocks of various hues and tints lie in promiscuous confusion”. She comfortingly points out that “a cement wall about two and one-half feet high has been built to prevent visitors from falling over the precipice.” A mule trip into the canyon is a “wonderful trip which is well worth all that it costs in expense and wearying effort”.

Edward, Brother A.

- 649 1906 By land and sea to the Orient. IV. The Manhattan Quarterly (Manhattan College, New York), 3(1) (April): 54-58.

Grand Canyon is “the grandest sight of natural beauty the eye of man has seen.” “There is not a shade or a tint of color that may not be seen at some hour of the day within the limits of this yawning chasm, on whose beauties volumes have been written.” Nothing more substantive.

Erk, Edmund Frederick

- 650 1906 A merry crusade to the Golden Gate : under the banners of Allegheny Commandary, No. 35, Knights Templar, Allegheny, Pa. : a complete story of the Twenty-Ninth Triennial Conclave, Grand Encampment, Knights Templar, U.S.A., San Francisco, Cal., September, 1904, and a tour of ten thousand miles through the wonderland of the West. [No imprint], 321 pp. (Printed by The Werner Co., Akron, Ohio, and Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania.)

A stunningly detailed, if occasionally corny, description of a visit to Grand Canyon, including a ride to the river, fills pp. 256-275, accompanied by numerous interleaved plates from various sources, though not all of which depict Grand Canyon. The usual castles and crags; copious yawning, myriads, things bold and bare; a “cry of ‘Great Heaven’ ” and “solemn silence”. It is one thing to read of the canyon casually listed as a world wonder, but here is a surprisingly informative litany of assessments that over several pages actually contrast the canyon with “the Colossus of Rhodes, Diana’s Temple at Ephesus, the Mausoleum of Artemisia, the Pyramids of Egypt, Pharos of Alexandria, Walls and Hanging Gardens of Babylon, and the Statue of the Olympian Jupiter”—and why the canyon cannot be compared to them.

“It is the one great wonder of the world.”

“There is but one standard by which the enormity of the Grand Canyon can be measured, and that is by the Grand Canyon itself.”

Finley, H. M. [Finley, Harold M.]

- 651 1906 The Grand Canon. The Yale Monthly Magazine, (February): 9.

Different from the poem of the same name by Finley (1910).

Silence! and solitude! unearthly glows!
Horrors of yawning rock! Awe of the vast!
Away, ye sense enthralling spells!—Away,
Ye morbid, nameless fears! a place is this
For thoughtful worship of the Infinite.
Oh wond’ring, let the true sublimity
Of all this sunken massiveness declare

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

The majesty and power of the One
Who made it! Slight is this among God's works,
For lo,—the sun that paints these flaming walls
With his replendent prismic colorings;
The moon that sheds her lurid emerald
Into the depths,—these are God's handiwork.
The starry millions of the sky are His.
And what means this, earth's greatest wonder then?
Here, where the chasm yawns, an obscure stream,
Forever crawling to the distant sea,
Has dug a cañon, thinking but to while
The aeons of eternity away.

Fred Harvey [firm]

- 652 1906 El Tovar by Fred Harvey : a new hotel at Grand Canyon of Arizona : Santa Fe. [Chicago]: Santa Fe Railway, 32 pp. [including wraps]. ("Text by William Haskell Simpson; Cover by Louis Akin; Photos by Detroit Photographic Co., Putnam & Valentine, and others.") ("Ad.236. 7-10-06. 5 M".) [Also later eds.]

The place to experience Grand Canyon.

Gerritsen, C. V., AND Jacobs, Aletta H.

- 653 1906 Brieven uit en over Amerika door C. V. Gerritsen en Dr. Aletta H. Jacobs. Amsterdam: F. Van Rossen, 179 pp. [In Dutch.]
(transl. 'Letters from and about America by C. V. Gerritsen and Dr. Aletta H. Jacobs')

See Letter X. [10] by Carel Victor Gerritsen, "3 Dec. 1904.", pp. 103-119; specifically, pp. 112-113:

"Men spoort van het station Williams in een paar uur naar de *grand canyon** of Arizona en honderd pas van het station staat men voor een afgrond, die—behalve door zijn uitgebreidheid en diepte—een wonder van kleurenpracht en grillige vormen te aanschouwen geeft; een pracht die geen pen in staat is te beschrijven. In de diepte stroomt de Colorado rivier, doch men kan haar daarboven ternauwernood zien, daar die diepte 1800 meter bedraagt. Eerst wanneer men afdalt langs een pad dat ruim 10 kilometer lang is—een weg die gewoonlijk op een paard of muilezel wordt afgelegd—krijgt men menig denkbeeld van deze meer dan 100 meter breede rivier en van de ontzaglijke rotsblokken die de wanden van dezen afgrond vormen. De schitterende kleurenpracht, telkens varierende wanneer de zon haar licht op een ander deel der uitstekende punten en gedrochtelijke vormen doet sehtjnen, doet het oog in stille bewondering op dit ontzettend grootsche natuurtafereel staren. Eindelijk na lang staren, zoekt het oog een grens, maar deze is niet te vinden. Althans niet in de lengte. Deze scheur in de aarde is, langs de rivier gemeten, driehonderdvijftig kilometer lang (meer dan 8 maal de afstand van Amsterdam naar Arnhem!) en twintig kilometer breed (van Amsterdam tot Haarlem). Voor zoover mij bekend, bestaat er geen ander natuurtafereel van dien aard : zóó groot en zóó schoon." (ENTIRE NOTE)

(translation)

'One travels from Williams station to the Grand Canyon* of Arizona in a few hours and a hundred paces from the station one stands in front of an abyss which, in addition to its extent and depth, presents a marvel of splendor of colors and capricious shapes; a splendor that no pen can describe. Down below flows the Colorado River, but it can hardly be seen above, as that depth is 1800 meters. It is only when one descends along a path over six miles long—a road usually traveled on horse or mule—does one get the idea of this more than 100 meter-wide river and of the immense boulders that form the walls of this abyss. The brilliant splendor of color, varying each time the sun shines its light on another part of the projecting points and monstrous forms, makes the eye gaze in silent admiration upon this immensely grandiose scene of nature. Finally, after a long stare, the eye seeks a boundary, but it cannot be found. At least not in length. Measured along the river, this crack in the earth is three hundred and fifty kilometers long (more than 8 times the distance from Amsterdam to Arnhem!)

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

and twenty kilometers wide (from Amsterdam to Haarlem). As far as I know, there is no other such natural scene: so large and so beautiful.'

* A footnote defining "grand canyon" reads: "Van het Spaansche woord canon = bergkloof." ('From the Spanish word cañon = mountain gorge.')

Goblet d'Alviella (comte) [Goblet d'Alviella, Eugène]

654

1906 A travers le Far-West : souvenirs des États-Unis. Des voyages dans l'Union Américaine.—Les Montagnes rocheuses.—Les Mormons.—San Francisco.—Universités californiennes.—Le parc du Yosémité et le grand Canyon.—Le progrès religieux aux États-Unis. Bruxelles: P. Weissenbruch, Imprimeur du Roi, 236 pp. [Capitalization in extended sub-title, thus.] [In French.]

(transl. 'Through the Far West: Memories of the United States. Travels in the American Union.—The Rocky Mountains.—The Mormons.—San Francisco.—California Universities.—Yosemite Park and the Grand Canyon.—Religious Progress in the United States.')

See p. 12, reference, in passing, to "prodigieux cirque du Grand Canyon" (transl. 'prodigious cirque of the Grand Canyon'). See illustration, "Le Grand Canyon de l'Arizona" (after Holmes), Plate 2 (facing p. 36); and see Chapter 5, "Le Parc du Yosémité, le grand Canyon de l'Arizona et les Indiens des Pueblos" (transl. 'Yosemite Park, the Grand Canyon of Arizona and the Pueblo Indians'), pp. 137-155.

For as detailed as are the author's remarks about his trip to the Far West in 1904, he offers rather muted remarks about the Grand Canyon (pp. 148-150).

"Aux environs de Williams s'étend le Désert peint (Painted desert); qui doit cette dénomination un peu emphatique au coloris accentué de ses roches et de ses sables. L'embranchement du Grand Canyon traverse un plateau sauvage qu'accidentent vers le Sud les cimes volcaniques des monts San Francis. Le jour finit comme le train s'arrête au seuil de la grande fissure où une excellente auberge, l'Hôtel de l'ange brillant (Bright Angel Hotel), accueille le voyageur sur la margelle même de l'abîme. Le Grand Canyon du Colorado est certainement une des merveilles du monde, mais une merveille qu'il est difficile de décrire. Les termes: fissure, crevasse, cirque, amphithéâtre ne peuvent donner l'idée et encore moins rendre l'impression de cette gigantesque vallée d'érosion, large de 12 kilomètres et profonde de 5,000 pieds, qui frappe par la forme et la couleur de ses rochers non moins que par l'énormité de ses dimensions.

"De ses deux parois abruptes, toutes flanquées d'aiguilles; de tourelles, de pinacles, se détachent çà et là des promontoires ruiniformes, qui semblent s'avancer l'un vers l'autre à travers la vallée, uniquement séparés par le lit du fleuve qu'on voit briller, puis disparaître à plusieurs reprises dans les sinuosités obscures des gorges inférieures. Par un contraste qui accentue encore l'aspect tourmenté de ces rochers, leurs flancs dénudés sont constitués par une superposition régulière de strates horizontales, alternativement blanches, grises et rouge vif, suivant qu'elles sont formées de granite, de calcaire ou de grès. Aucune végétation ne s'y découvre, — sauf vers le fond du Canyon, où l'on pénètre par un sentier escarpé, pour se trouver, après trois heures de descente pénible, sur les bords d'une rivière écumante, dans une cuve ou plutôt un couloir de roc.

"De l'hôtel je gagnai successivement plusieurs points de vue, où le regard, n'étant pas arrêté, comme à Bright Angel, par des parois latérales, est mieux en état de saisir tous les détails. de ce panorama sans rival en son genre. Le meilleur éloge que j'en puisse faire, c'est de déclarer que mes impressions ne se trouvèrent ni émoussées ni même défraîchies, comme je le craignais, par les innombrables représentations ultra-coloriées du Grand Canyon sur lesquelles je n'avais pu m'empêcher d'arrêter les yeux dans toutes les gares du Far West.

"L'atmosphère de l'Arizona est tellement transparente qu'il est fort difficile de s'y rendre compte des distances. Par une échancrure des falaises opposées — qui me fait l'effet d'être à quelques milles et qu'on me dit à 40 kilom. de distance — on entrevoit vaguement une crête de montagnes qui sera, it à plus de 120 kilomètres! Les levers et les couchers de soleil, si remarquables dans l'Arizona, sont ici d'une beauté particulière et je me rappellerai longtemps le lever du jour auquel j'assistai de la terrasse du Bright Angel Hotel. A mesure que l'aube descendait dans l'abîme ténébreux, les nuages teintés de pourpre par le soleil encore sous l'horizon faisaient paraître plus écarlates les gradins et les pitons de grès rouge qui tranchaient sur les teintes claires des roches environnantes."

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

(translation)

'Around Williams lies the Painted Desert; which owes this somewhat emphatic name to the accentuated color of its rocks and sands. The junction of the Grand Canyon crosses a wild plateau that is broken to the south by the volcanic peaks of the San Francis Mountains [San Francisco Peaks]. The day ends as the train stops at the threshold of the great fissure where an excellent inn, the Bright Angel Hotel, welcomes the traveler on the very rim of the abyss. The Grand Canyon of Colorado is certainly one of the wonders of the world, but a wonder that is difficult to describe. The terms: fissure, crevasse, cirque, amphitheater cannot give the idea and even less give the impression of this gigantic valley of erosion, 12 kilometers wide and 5,000 feet deep, which is striking in form and color of its rocks no less than by the enormity of its dimensions.

"From its two steep walls, all flanked by needles; turrets, pinnacles, here and there stand out ruiniform promontories, which seem to advance one towards the other through the valley, only separated by the bed of the river which we see shining, then disappearing several times in the dark sinuosities of the lower gorges. By a contrast which further accentuates the tormented aspect of these rocks, their bare sides are formed by a regular superposition of horizontal strata, alternately white, gray and bright red, depending on whether they are formed of granite, limestone or sandstone. No vegetation can be seen there—except towards the bottom of the Canyon, where one enters by a steep path, to find oneself, after three hours of painful descent, on the banks of a foaming river, in a basin or rather a corridor of rock.

"From the hotel I successively gained several points of view, where the gaze, not being stopped, as at Bright Angel, by the side walls, is better able to grasp all the details of this kind of unrivaled panorama. The best praise I can give is to say that my impressions were neither dulled nor even faded, as I had feared, by the innumerable ultra-colorful representations of the Grand Canyon on which I could not but help get out of my eyes in all the stations of the Far West.

"The atmosphere of Arizona is so transparent that it is very difficult to realize distances there. By an indentation in the opposite cliffs—which seems to me to be a few miles away and which I am told is 40 kilometers away—we vaguely glimpse a mountain ridge that will be more than 120 kilometers away! The sunrises and sunsets, so remarkable in Arizona, are of particular beauty here, and I shall long remember the sunrise which I witnessed from the terrace of the Bright Angel Hotel. As dawn descended into the dark abyss, the clouds tinted purple by the sun still below the horizon made the steps and the peaks of red sandstone appear more scarlet, which stood out against the light tints of the surrounding rocks.

- 655 1906 Dans le Far West. V.—Le Parc du Yosémité, le Grand Canyon de l'Arizona et les débordements du Rio Grande. Revue de Belgique (Trente-Huitième Année), Series 2, 46: 203-227. [In French.]
(transl. 'In the Far West. V.—Yosemite Park, the Grand Canyon of Arizona and the borders of the Rio Grande.')

Extracted from A travers le Far-West (see above).

James, George Wharton

- 656 1906 The waterfalls of Havasupai Canyon. Arizona Magazine, 1 (July): 1-6.

Lloyd, Elizabeth

- 657 1906 Down the Grand Canyon. Scattered Seeds (First-day School Association of Philadelphia), 38(3) (March): 58-59.

The writer's report of her Grand Canyon experience is written for a Philadelphia Quaker Sunday School association, mostly about her ride down to the river.

"On the map the Colorado River is marked by the same black line that is used to indicate the course of rivers in general, but the real stream is unlike any other in the world. Other streams, to be sure, have worn deep gullies by their waters, but the Grand Canyon of Arizona, through which the Colorado flows, is so much longer and deeper and wider than any of the others that they are not to be compared with it.

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

"Imagine yourself, after making a gradual ascent by railway for four hours, standing on the brink of a chasm thirteen miles wide. Looking down into this chasm you see hills piled one against another, and in among them, a mile below where you are standing, winds a silver thread of a river. The sides of this great chasm, and the rocks and hills within it, are red, and yellow, and green, and white, and black, standing out in distinct belts or blended and shaded together. The whole forms the most wonderful panorama of color in the world.

"The adventurous traveler is not satisfied with viewing the canyon from the top, though there are a score of view points from which he may see as many different panoramas unfold before him. His desire is to get down to the silver thread at the bottom. There are two ways of following the steep and narrow trail that the United States Government [sic] has made along the banks of the canyon; if you have plenty of breath and muscle and can stand a rarefied air, you may walk down and back, or you may ride on back of horse or mule. I decided to ride down, and so engaged a steed and saddle, and a divided skirt, the evening before.

"After breakfast in the morning I went to the starting place and saw more than a dozen animals saddled. The guide looked at me and concluded I was old enough to be handled carefully, so he summoned a sedate black mule named Rebecca, that had had twenty years' experience in mountain climbing. There were two ladies besides myself in the party and the guide put us in front next to him.

"The trail down which we rode zigzagged along the mountain side; often it was not more than four feet wide, with the sheer rock going up on one side of us and down on the other, for hundreds of feet. Often there were short turns, where it seemed as if the animals would walk right off into space before they could head in the opposite direction. We did not get used to this gradually, for one of the ugliest and steepest places is almost at the start.

"We had gone but a few hundred feet when the lady from Pittsburg, who rode between me and the guide, screamed. The guide turned his head to see what was the matter, and quick as a flash his horse, which had never been down the trail before, wheeled round in the narrow path. This made the lady's mule back against Rebecca's nose, and Rebecca unconcernedly turned half way round and poked her nose out over the chasm below; I did not feel so unconcerned as she did, and the guide finally lifted her off and deposited her on a rock beside the path. But we could not turn around on that narrow trail, and finally, when the guide assured her that nobody ever had been seriously hurt going down, and promised to send his horse on ahead and lead her mule, she consented to get on again.

"I did not scream, but my knees shook, and I held on to the high pommel with both hands, letting the reins hang on Rebecca's neck; I realized that she knew a good deal more about that business than I did. So one after another we went down the steep and crooked path; where it was roughest and steepest I saw nothing except where Rebecca was planting her feet, but when we came to an easy place I matched glimpses of the glory all about me. Twice, when we came to 'Jacob's Ladder' and 'The Corkscrew,' we all dismounted and let the mules go on ahead, while we clambered after them.

"We started shortly after eight o'clock in the morning. Half way down we came to a plateau where a party was camping out. Their tents and all their provisions had been brought down on the backs of mules. Here we dismounted and rested for a few minutes. By noon we reached the bed of the river, no longer a silver thread, but a great stream of crystal water. On the side of the stream there was sand like the sand on the seashore, except that its grains showed all the colors of the rock that had made them. We drank of the river water from the guide's tin cup, and found it sweet. We spent an hour on the rocks and sand, resting and eating lunch the guides had brought; it was good in itself, and our appetites made it better.

"Going up the canyon we felt much safer, partly because we had become accustomed to the steepness, and partly because we were no longer afraid of falling over the animals' heads. So we took long looks at the grandeur round about us, and photographed it on our memories that we might have it always. By this time the lady from Pittsburg was as brave as any of us, and very thankful to the guide for making her get on her mule again.

"Several times we stopped for the mules to take breath. We dismounted again at 'Jacob's Ladder,' and when we had climbed that short but steep stairway in the rocks, we too were glad to rest and breathe quickly for awhile. It was five o'clock when we again reached the top, tired all over, but very happy and hungry. I felt like

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

a friend who had said, 'I would not have missed going down into the Grand Canyon for five hundred dollars, but I would not go again for another five hundred.'"

Lloyd, J. William

- 658 1906 Grand Canyon of Arizona. From: "Comments" section. In: The Grand Canyon of Arizona : being a book of words from many pens, about the Grand Canyon of the Colorado River in Arizona. [Chicago]: Santa Fe, Passenger Department, p. 119. [Volume also reprinted 1909.]

Credited to The Conservator (Lloyd, 1904).

Marek, Richard

- 659 1906 Durch die Prärien Nordamerikas zum Grand Cañon des Colorado. Zeitschrift für Schul-Geographie (Wien), 27(2): 33-48. ("Nach einem am 8. April 1905 im Naturwissenschaftlichen Vereine für Steiermark gehaltenen Vortrage.") [In German.]
(transl. 'Through the prairies of North America to the Grand Canyon of the Colorado' 'Based on a lecture given on April 8, 1905 in the Natural Science Association for Styria')

A report of the field excursion of the 8th International Geographical Congress, held in the United States in 1904, with a side trip to the Grand Canyon. Few records are had of this trip as written by international correspondents—in fact, few records by any members of the congress other than to simply state they went to the Grand Canyon en route to Mexico—so the entire entry on the visit to Grand Canyon (pp. 42-48) is reproduced here. (Compare also the far briefer remarks by the German, Heinrich Fischer, 1904, the Chilean, Roberto Maldonado C., 1907, and the Brazilian, Olyntho dos Santos Pires, 1915. See also the brief remarks by a wife of one of the attendees of the congress, the Brazilian, Maria Clara da Cunha Santos, 1908.)

". . . Bei Williams zweigt von der Hauptlinie, die nach Kalifornien führt, eine Lokalbahn ab, die bis zum Rande des Cañons vordringt. 100 km weit fährt man auf ihr, und auf der ganzen Strecke ist kein einziges Haus, nicht einmal eine Hütte zu sehen, obwohl man vom Waggon aus meilenweit freien Ausblick hat! Das ist der echte Far West, das Land des fernen Westens! Langsam nur fann unser Train auf der ganz primitiven Schienenanlage vorwärts, dabei gibt es stundenlang feine Abwechslung in der Landschaftsszenerie; unsere Gemütsverfassung während dieser Fahrt läßt sich leicht vorstellen! Wir alle wurden von einer nervösen Ungeduld gequält, sie äußerte sich vor allem darin, daß wir sozusagen unausgesetzt unseren vielgeplagten Reijemarschall mit der Frage bestürmten: Wann kommt denn endlich der Cañon? Und mit bewunderungswürdigem Gleichmüte gab er zur Antwort: noch 20, noch 10, noch 5 km. Auf einmal blieb der Zug stehen. Unter dem Rufen der Schaffner „all out“ stürzen wir aus unseren Wagen, die uns, in unserer Ungeduld geradezu Kerker geworden waren. Wir wußten, daß wir kaum 200 Schritte vom Cañon entfernt waren, doch war von ihm noch immer feine Spur, da den Ausblick nach vorne ein kleines Buschwäldchen hinderte. Jeder von uns suchte sozusagen im Sturm lauf dieses lekte Hindernis zu nehmen. Die ersten am Ziele trieben die Nachzügler durch Winken zur Eile an; so waren wir in Kürze alle am Ziele angelangt und merkwürdig, trotzdem wir bei 80 Personen anwesend waren, es herrschte lautlose Stille; keine wortreiche Bewunderung kommt über unsre Lippen, denn was mit Einem Male sich vor uns auftut, indem wir aus dem Wäldchen heraustreten, das ist etwas nie Geschautes, Ungeheures, Infaßbares. Zunächst fann unser Auge sich gar nicht zurechtfinden in diesem Wirrjal von Schluchten, die aus der Tiefe emporstarren, und in dem Meere von Lichteffecten, die von den nackten, sonnendurchglühten Gesteinswänden ausstrahlen; vergebens müht sich auch unser Verstand, sich über die Größen- und Entfernungsverhältnisse ein annähernd richtiges Urteil zu bilden.

"So sind wir Neulinge anfangs alle ein wenig enttäuscht; aber nicht an der Landschaft liegt dies, sondern an uns selbst, die wir eben unfähig sind, auf einmal eine so grandiose Landschaftsszenerie in uns so aufzunehmen und zu verarbeiten, daß wir ihre Schönheit auch genießen könnten.

"Erst nach mehreren Stunden, in denen wir einzeln oder in kleinen Gruppen am Rande des Cañons stehen, sigen oder dahinwandeln, finden wir uns hinein, und je mehr es uns gelingt, aus der Fülle von Einzelheiten gewisse Grundzüge herauszuerkennen, desto reicher wird der Genuß, desto größer die Bewunderung. Kann man nach dem Gesagten noch erwarten, daß ich eine zutreffende Schilderung von dem versuchen werde, was ich

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

hier in diesem Wunderlande jah? Ich will es nicht annehmen, denn das hieße Unmögliches von mir verlangen. Gerade der, dem ein gütiges Geschick das Glück bereitete, den Grand Cañon selbst zu sehen, empfindet erst so recht die Unmöglichkeit, die Eindrücke wiederzugeben; ich habe dicke Bücher und viele sonstige Schilderungen über diese Gegend vor- und nachher gelesen, ebenso zahlreiche Bilder und Photographien, die ihn darstellen sollen, betrachtet, und doch sie alle beiseite gelegt mit dem Gefühle des Unbefriedigtseins. Nein gewöhnlicher Sterblicher soll sich solchen Tuns vermessen, nur die größten Künstler der Feder und des Pinsels mögen sich an eine solche Aufgabe wagen!

“Nur die schlichte Frage: Was ist der Cañon und wie entstand er? die will ich zu beantworten versuchen.

“Der Cañon ist ein Schluchtsystem, das sich der Colorado—von den Spaniern mit diesem Namen wegen der braunen Farbe seines schlammigen Wassers belegt—in das Tausende von Quadratmeilen ausgedehnte Hochplateau von Neu-Mexiko und Arizona eingerissen hat. Dieses Schluchtsystem ist am Flusse selbst 349 km lang, oben von einem Plateaurand zum gegenüberliegenden gemessen 13-16 km breit und 900-1500 m tief. Um diejen Distanzangaben mehr Anschaulichkeit zu geben, wollen wir sie auf die Umgebung von Graz projizieren. Man denkt sich das Grazer Feld über die ganze Fläche von Steiermark und noch über die Nachbargebiete ausgedehnt. Mitten hindurch aber ginge eine gewundene Spalte, die vom Semmering bis über Steinbrück hinaus das Land querte. Die Ränder dieser Spalte klaffen soweit auseinander, daß ihr Abstand voneinander die doppelte Breite des Grazer Feldes erreicht. Um von diesen Rändern zum Flußspiegel hinabzugelangen, hat man zweimal so tief hinabzusteigen, als vom Plateau des Schöckels nach dem an seinem Südfuße gelegenen Orte Radegund. Fürwahr, solche Entfernungs- und Größenverhältnisse an sich würden genügen, diese Tallandschaft zu einer der größten Sehenswürdigkeiten zu erheben.

“Doch nicht diese Dimensionen allein sind es, die den Naturfreund hierh locken, vielmehr ist es die Ausgestaltung der Talwände, ihr Formen- und Farbenreichtum. Es wäre ja durchaus irrig, würde man sich den Grand Cañon als eine einfache Schlucht vorstellen. Blicken wir auf das gegenüberliegende Talgehänge! Es bildet nicht eine einzige jäh zur Tiefe abstürzende Wand, sondern ist in zahlreiche Terrassen gegliedert. Als eine haarscharf gezogene Linie erscheint vor uns, sich 40 km hinziehend, der Rand der Ebene, von ihm stürzt mehrere hundert Meter, fast senkrecht eine weißliche Kalkmauer hinab zu einer sanfter geneigten Fläche aus rot und weiß gebändertem Sandstein, dann folgt der Red Wall, eine 350 m hohe Mauer aus purpurrotem Kalkstein, unter diejem folgen graugrüne Schiefertone und braune Sandsteine, die wieder eine sanfter geneigte Fläche von mehreren Kilometern Breite darstellen, es ist dies die sogenannte Esplanade; in dieje ist dann erst die eigentliche Flußklamm 300-400 m tief eingeschnitten, deren Rände schokoladebraune Algonkinschichten und steil aufgerichtete und wirt durcheinandergefältelte Gneis und Glimmerschiefer von violettgrauer Farbe bloßlegen. Die Esplanade springt somit gegen die Mitte der Schlucht vor, daß ganz wenige Stücke des Flußlaufes selbst vom oberen Rande des Cañon sichtbar sind; der Fluß ist daher nur eine ganz nebensächliche Erscheinung im Gesamtbild von der Höhe aus, man bemerkt ganz in der Tiefe einige braune Flächen scheinbar unbewegten Wassers. Und doch ist es ein Fluß von 100 m Breite, dessen Wasser in zahlreichen Wirbeln und reißendem Laufe hoch aufschäumt! Aber nicht bloß im Profil, sondern auch in der Horizontalen sind diese Terrassen aufs reichste gegliedert. Bald springt der oberste Rand weit gegen die Mitte zu vor, bald tritt er wieder zurück und dieje Konturen ahmt in abgeschwächter Stärke die Rante jeder der oben beschriebenen Terrassen nach: jo entstehen unzählige Nischen und Bastionen; treffen irgendwo sehr scharf ein- und ausspringende Winkel aneinander, so werden einzelne Gesteinspartien fast ganz von dem Talgehänge losgelöst und starren als gewaltige Türme aus den Tiefen empor, das sind die sogenannten Tempel.

“Gegenüber einer jo komplizierten Modellierung der Felsmassen erscheint das Bemühen, durch einen prägnanten Ausdruck die Fülle der Erscheinungen treffend zu bezeichnen, wohl kaum von Erfolg begleitet; und doch versuchte fast jeder von unserer Reisegesellschaft diese Aufgabe zu lösen, es trieb ihn dazu schon der lebhaft Wunsch, das vielgestaltige Landschaftsbild möglichst treu seinem Gedächtnisse einzuprägen. In mir rief die Cañonlandschaft die Erinnerung an die Südtiroler Dolomiten wach; würde man von diesen ein Gipsrelief und hernach von diesem einen Abguß herstellen, so müßten das Gegenbild der Dolomiten und ein Relief des Cañon sich in hohem Grade ähneln. Da dieser Vergleich der Cañonlandschaft mit einer auf den Kopf gestellten Dolomitlandschaft mehrfach Anklang unter den anwesenden Gelehrten fand, so habe ich ihn auch heute angeführt; vielleicht trägt er dazu bei, denen, die das Vergleichsobjekt, die schönen Berge Südtirols, aus eigener Anschauung kennen, eine richtigere Vorstellung vom Cañon zu geben.

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

„Der Reichtum an Formen und Farben, der hier geradezu in verschwenderischer Fülle auftritt, kommt doch eigentlich erst durch die wundervolle Klarheit der Luft, die sie durchdringt, zu voller Geltung. Es ist ein Himmel von duftigstem Blau, der sich über das Tafelland und seine Schluchten wölbt. So klar ist die Luft, wie bei uns auf den Bergen an sonnigen Wintertagen, daß das Auge alle Entfernungen unterschätzt; niemand von uns wollte glauben, daß die Bäumchen auf dem Plateau jenseits des Cañon, an denen wir noch deutlich sogar die Äste unterscheiden konnten, 15 km von uns entfernt waren! Und vom Himmel herab blickt die liebe Sonne; ein Meer von Lichtstrahlen durchflutet das Land und durchdringt alle die Millionen von Schluchten, Rissen und Winkelchen. Doch das Schönste von all dem Wunderbarschönen ist der beständige Wechsel in den Lichteffekten. Um Mittag erscheint der uns zugekehrte Steilabsturz in schattenlosem Glanz und im gelblichweißen Schein der hochstehenden Sonne. Je mehr diese sich senkt, desto rötlicher wird der Farbenton, der über der ganzen Szenerie liegt, desto kräftiger und länger werden auch die Schatten, die „wie die Zeiger von riesigen Sonnenuhren“ gespensterhaft die hohen Wände hinaufklettern. So herrlich und überwältigend schön das Bild schon den ganzen Tag über sich darbot, zeigte es doch eine mit dem Sinken der Sonne noch zunehmende Pracht.

„Wo soll da der von solcher Herrlichkeit in Seligkeit versetzte Sterbliche die Worte finden, die Sonnenuntergangsstimmung in diesem Zauberlande wiederzugeben! Schon hüllt die Tiefe der Schlucht ein graublaues Dunkel ein und läßt sie noch unergründlicher erscheinen; gleichzeitig aber erglühen die höchsten Spitzen der Türme und Bastionen in derselben Pracht wie die schönsten Gipfel unserer Berge, doch zum Greifen nahe; ihren Fuß aber deckt unergründliche Finsternis. So scheinen sie Riesenfackeln zu sein, von unsichtbaren Händen gehalten!

„Obwohl es recht kühl wird und uns Hiße Gewohnten fröstelt, so harren wir doch aus, so lange dies unvergleichlich schöne Schauspiel währt. Doch ach! Die südlichere Breite läßt die Sonne schneller als bei uns hinter dem Plateau verschwinden und nur zu rasch verschwindet die erhabene Pracht, verblassen die Farben. In den Anblick dieser Herrlichkeiten versunken, verharret jeder von uns solange im Freien, bis auch der lebte Lichtstrahl der Finsternis hat weichen müssen; selbst dann noch fann sich der Beschauer nur schwer loßbreißen, zu mächtig wirken auf ihn die Eindrücke, die er erfahren!

„Es mag scheinen, als hätte ich schon genug Lobesworte auf den Grand Cañon des Colorado gefunden, und doch habe ich eines seiner größten Vorzüge noch gar nicht Erwähnung tun können. Es ist nicht nur eines der an landschaftlicher Schönheit reichsten Gebiete der Erde und deshalb ein auserlesenes Ziel für den Naturfreund, sondern in gleicher Weise eines der interessantesten Objekte für geologische Studien und als solches eine klassische Stätte für den Naturforscher. „Der Geologe, der in unseren Gegenden oft zu klagen hat, jeine Untersuchungen würden durch die Pflanzendecke, welche große Teile seines Arbeitsfeldes verbirgt, so erschwert, daß vielfach an die Stelle erakter Beobachtung mehr oder mindere unsichere Kombination treten müsse, findet hier bei fast völligem Mangel des Pflanzenwuchses alles so übersichtlich und bequem zum Studium vorbereitet, wie in einem aufgeschlagenen Buche.“ [footnote:] [Tiefe, über Wüsten und Steppen.]

„Versuchen wir es, darin zu lesen! • • • “ [Here the author takes a couple of pages to describe the geological history of the Grand Canyon.]

„So tiefe Einblicke in die Geheimnisse des Weltalls eröffnet der Cañon. Ehe wir die meisten von uns wohl für immer von ihm scheiden, trennen wir uns und jeder stellt sich, abseits von seinen Gefährten, noch einmal an den Rand dieses Schluchtenlabyrinthes. Doch dieses ist nicht mehr in undurchdringliche Nacht getaucht. Längst schon war luna, die Mondgöttin, am sternenbejäteten Himmel heraufgefahren und hatte einen zarten Lichtschleier über all die Felswände gewoben, die aus den unergründlichen Tiefen zu uns emporragten. Rein Laut stört die erhabene Einsamkeit. Da hält die Seele Zwiesprach mit der Natur; vor ihrer Herrlichkeit müssen alle kleinlichen Gedanken aus unsern Herzen weichen. In diejem Momente fühlt man erst so recht, was der Dichter meint, wenn er singt [quoting Schiller]:

„Es gibt im Menschenleben Augenblicke,
Wo er dem Weltgeist näher steht als sonst.“

(translation)

`. . . At Williams, a local railroad branches off from the main line leading to California, which advances to the edge of the canyon. You travel 100 km on it and not a single house can be seen on the whole route, not

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

even a hut in sight, although you have miles of unobstructed views from the wagon! This is the real Far West! Our train only slowly moved forward on the very primitive rail system, while for hours there was fine variety of landscape scenery; our state of mind during this journey is easy to imagine! We were all tormented by a nervous impatience, which expressed itself above all in the fact that we constantly assailed our much-troubled Reisemarshal with the question: When will the canyon finally come? And with admirable indifference he answered: 20 more, 10 more, 5 km more. Suddenly the train stopped. With the conductors shouting "all out", we rush out of our cars, which, in our impatience, had almost become dungeons for us. We knew we were barely 200 yards from the canyon, but there was still but a faint trace of it as a small patch of scrub obscured the view ahead. Each of us tried, so to speak, to take this obstacle by storm. The first at the goal urged the stragglers to hurry by waving; so before long we had all reached our destination and it was strange; although 80 people were present there was complete silence; no words of admiration escape our lips, for what suddenly opens up before us as we step out of the grove is something we have never seen, tremendous, comprehensible. At first our eyes could not find their way at all in this maze of gorges staring up from the depths, and in the sea of light effects radiating from the bare, sun-drenched rock walls; our intellect tries in vain to form an approximately correct judgment about the proportions of size and distance.

`So we newcomers are all a little disappointed at first; But this is not due to the landscape, but to ourselves, who are simply incapable of suddenly absorbing and processing such a grandiose scene in such a way that we could also enjoy its beauty.

`Only after several hours, in which we stand, sing or stroll along the edge of the canyon, individually or in small groups, do we find our way in, and the more we succeed in recognizing certain basic features from the abundance of details, the richer it becomes enjoyment and greater admiration. After what has been said, can one still expect that I will try to give an accurate description of what I am doing here in this wonderland? I don't want to accept it, because that would mean asking the impossible of me. Especially those who are lucky enough to see the Grand Canyon for themselves feel the impossibility of reproducing the impressions; I have read thick books and many other descriptions of this area before and after, as well as looked at numerous pictures and photographs that are supposed to represent it, and yet put them all aside with a feeling of dissatisfaction. No ordinary mortal should presume such an activity, only the greatest artists of pen and brush may venture on such a task!

`Just the simple question: what is the canyon and how did it come about? I will try to answer that.

`The canyon is a system of canyons carved by the Colorado River—named by the Spanish for the brown color of its muddy waters—into the thousands of square miles of New Mexico and Arizona high plateaux. This canyon system is 349 km long on the river itself, 13-16 km wide measured from one plateau edge to the opposite and 900-1500 m deep. In order to make the distance information more clear, we want to project it onto the area around Graz. The Grazer Feld was thought to have extended over the entire area of Styria and even over the neighboring areas. But a winding chasm would go right through it, crossing the country from the Semmering to beyond Steinbrück. The edges of this fissure gape so far apart that their distance from each other reaches twice the width of the Grazer Feld. In order to descend from these edges to the level of the river, one has to descend twice as deep as from the plateau of the Schöckel to Radegund, which is at its southern foot. Truly, such distances and proportions in themselves would suffice to elevate this valley landscape to one of the greatest sights.

`But it is not these dimensions alone that attract nature lovers here, rather it is the design of the valley walls, their richness of form and color. It would be quite wrong to imagine the Grand Cañon as a simple gorge. Let's take a look at the opposite valley slope! It does not form a single wall falling abruptly to the depths, but is divided into numerous terraces. A sharply drawn line appears before us, stretching for 40 km, the edge of the plain, which falls several hundred meters, almost vertically, down a whitish limestone wall to a gently sloping surface of red and white banded sandstone, then follows the Red Wall, a 350 m high wall of crimson limestone, under which follow grey-green slates and brown sandstones, which again form a more gently sloping surface several kilometers wide; this is the so-called Esplanade; the actual river gorge then cuts 300-400 m deep into each, the edges of which reveal chocolate-brown layers of Algonkian and steeply inclined and confusedly folded gneiss and mica slate of a violet-grey color. The Esplanade juts out somewhat towards the middle of the gorge, so that very little of the course of the river itself is visible from the top of the canyon; the river is therefore only

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

a completely secondary phenomenon in the overall picture from the heights, one notices a few brown areas of apparently unmoving water far down. And yet it is a river 100 m wide, whose water foams up in numerous whirlpools and torrential flows! These terraces are richly articulated not only in profile, but also horizontally. Sometimes the uppermost edge projects far towards the middle, sometimes it recedes again and each contour imitates the edge of each of the terraces described above in a weaker intensity: there are innumerable niches and bastions; if very sharp angles coming in and out meet somewhere, individual parts of the rock are almost completely detached from the valley and stare up from the depths as mighty towers, these are the so-called temples.

`In contrast to a formalized modeling of the rock masses, the effort to aptly describe the abundance of phenomena by means of a concise expression is hardly successful; and yet almost every one of our traveling party tried to solve this task, driven by the lively desire to imprint the varied landscape as faithfully as possible on his memory. The canyon landscape brought back memories of the South Tyrolean Dolomites; If one were to make a plaster relief of these and then a cast of this, the counter-image of the Dolomites and a relief of the canyon would have to be very similar. Since this comparison of the canyon landscape with an upside down dolomite landscape was repeatedly well received by the scholars present, I have also quoted it today; perhaps it will help to give those who know the comparative object, the beautiful mountains of South Tyrol, a more correct idea of the canyon.

`The richness of form and color, which appears here in almost lavish profusion, really only comes into its own through the wonderful clarity of the air that permeates it. It is a sky of the most fragrant blue that arches over the plateau and its gorges. The air is so clear, like here on the mountains on sunny winter days, that the eye underestimates all distances; none of us wanted to believe that the saplings on the plateau beyond the canyon, on which we could still clearly distinguish even the branches, were 15 km away from us! And the dear sun looks down from heaven; a sea of rays of light floods the land and penetrates all the millions of ravines, fissures and nooks. But the most beautiful of all the wonderfully beautiful [things] is the constant change in the lighting effects. At noon, the steep drop facing us appears in shadowless splendor and in the yellowish-white glow of the high sun. The more it sinks, the redder the color tone that lies over the whole scene, the stronger and longer the shadows that climb up the high walls like the hands of gigantic sundials, like a ghost. The picture is so glorious and overwhelmingly beautiful had already presented itself all day long, but it showed a splendor that increased with the sinking of the sun.

`Where should the mortal, brought into bliss by such splendor, find the words to reproduce the sunset mood in this magic land! Already the depth of the gorges are in a grey-blue darkness and makes them seem even more unfathomable; at the same time the highest spits of the towers and bastions glow in the same splendor as the most beautiful peaks of our mountains, yet close enough to touch; but their feet are covered in unfathomable darkness. So they seem to be gigantic torches, held by invisible hands!

`Although it will feel right and freeze us who are familiar with it, let us hold out as long as this incomparably beautiful spectacle lasts. But alas! The more southerly latitude lets the sun disappear behind the plateau faster than with us and the sublime splendor disappears all too quickly; the colors fade. Lost in the sight of these glories, each of us remains in the open air until the living ray of light has had to give way to darkness; even then it was difficult for the viewer to tear himself away, the impressions he experienced were too powerful!

`It may seem that I have had enough praise for the Grand Canyon of the Colorado River before I have been able to mention one of its greatest assets. Not only is it one of the most scenically beautiful areas on earth and therefore a choice destination for the nature lover, but it is also one of the most interesting objects for geological study and as such a classic site for the naturalist. "The geologist who often has to complain in our region that his investigations are made so difficult by the plant cover that hides large parts of his field of work, that often more or less uncertain combinations have to take the place of actual observations, finds here almost complete lack of plant growth; everything is prepared so clearly and conveniently for study as in an open book [footnote credit: "Tiesse, Over Deserts and Steppes]."

`Let's try reading it! ••• " [Here the author takes a couple of pages to describe the geological history of the Grand Canyon.]

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

"The canyon opens up such deep insights into the mysteries of the universe. Before we, most of us, probably part from it forever, we separate and each of us stands, apart from his companions, once more at the edge of this labyrinth of ravines. But it is no longer immersed in impenetrable night. Luna, the goddess of the moon, had long since ascended the starry sky and had woven a delicate veil of light over all the cliffs that towered up to us from the unfathomable depths. Pure sound disturbs the sublime loneliness. Here the soul communicates with nature; before her glory all petty thoughts must depart from our hearts. In those moments one really feels what the poet means when he sings:

"There are moments in human life
When he stands closer than usual to the spirit world."

Monroe, Harriet

660 1906 Temple of Vishnu. From: "Comments" section. In: The Grand Canyon of Arizona : being a book of words from many pens, about the Grand Canyon of the Colorado River in Arizona. [Chicago]: Santa Fe, Passenger Department, p. 118. [Also reprinted in 1909 ed.]

Reprints Monroe (1905), but miscredited as "Temple of Vishnu, Grand Canyon, by Wm T. Patchell." (Correctly credited in the 1909 ed.)

Moreau, George

661 1906 L'envers des États-Unis. Paris: Plon-Nourrit et C<sup>ie</sup>, 295 [297] pp. (Librarie Plon.) [In French.]
(transl. 'The other side of the United States')

Moreau's entire remarks about the Grand Canyon (pp. 35-37) are reproduced here. Apparently this is about an earlier trip, either to Hance's or Grandview.

"En Arizona, le grand cañon du Colorado est également splendide. Cette vaste coupée s'étend sur près de trois cents kilomètres et sa profondeur, aux endroits les plus intéressants, varie entre neuf cents et quinze cents mètres. Elle porte successivement les noms de Glen Cañon et de Great Cañon.

Les communications dans cette contrée laissent fort à désirer et le touriste doit quitter le chemin de fer à Flagstaff pour prendre une diligence qui le mène en dix heures au point le plus remarquable. La distance à franchir ainsi est d'un peu moins de cent vingt kilomètres. Mais à l'arrivée, quel dédommagement! Quelle vue splendide sur des entassements de terrasses violemment colorées! Quels merveilleux profils de crêtes et de sommets!

"La terre semble manquer tout à coup et lorsque le regard plonge dans l'immense fossé, il en jaillit un flamboiement. Les parois évidées et bariolées ressemblent à la palette d'un maître coloriste, abondamment revêtue par la main prodigieuse de l'artiste d'une polychromie effrénée. Tout en bas, se démène un ruisseau d'argent; c'est le rude Colorado que la distance rend infime et dont les colères, vues à distance, s'es timent pour ne plus conserver que du charme. De tout cela monte un bruit que répercutent les sonorités de la gorge et qui stupéfie le visiteur.

"Et les flots passent, formés de gouttes de lait qui viennent du Wyoming, de l'Utah ou de plus loin, rongent toujours les flancs de leur prison et portant au golfe de Californie les débris arrachés aux assises en place depuis des myriades d'années."

(translation)

"In Arizona, the great canyon of the Colorado is also splendid. This vast cut extends over nearly three hundred kilometers and its depth, in the most interesting places, varies between nine hundred and fifteen hundred meters. It successively bears the names of Glen Cañon and Great Cañon.

"Travel arrangements in this country leave much to be desired, and the tourist must leave the railway at Flagstaff to take a stagecoach which takes him to the most remarkable point in ten hours. The distance to be covered in this way is a little less than one hundred and twenty kilometers. But on arrival, what compensation! What a splendid view of piles of violently colored terraces! What wonderful ridge and summit profiles!

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

'The earth suddenly seems to be missing and when the gaze plunges into the immense ditch, a blaze springs from it. The hollowed-out and variegated walls resemble the palette of a master colourist, abundantly coated by the prodigal hand of the artist with an unbridled polychromy. At the very bottom, a silver rivulet moves; it is the stern Colorado that distance makes small, and whose anger, seen from a distance, fades away to retain only charm. From all this rises a noise echoed by the sonorities of the throat and which amazes the visitor.

'And the waves pass, formed of droplets which come from Wyoming, Utah or further afield, still gnawing away at the sides of their prison and carrying to the Gulf of California the debris torn from the foundations in place for myriads of years.'

Page, Walter H.

- 662 1906 [Comment] In: The Grand Canyon of Arizona : being a book of words from many pens, about the Grand Canyon of the Colorado River in Arizona. [Chicago]: Santa Fe, Passenger Department, pp. 117-118.

Credit given as "Walter H. Page, Editor World's Work, in newspaper interview, May 25, 1905."

"At El Tovar there is a billiard room, also a large music room—both beautiful apartments. Although there were many guests, the billiard tables, piano and waxed floor were seldom used. This seemed strange until I got under the spell of the canyon. That titanic chasm won't permit games and dancing. It is fascinating to such a degree that one wishes to look at it all the time. Describe it? A man who has never seen it can do that better than one who has been under its charm. I am going back again some day."

Prang, Louis (Mr. and Mrs.)

- 663 1906 [Correspondence.] In: Ruddy, Ella Giles (ed.), The mother of clubs, Caroline M. Seymour Severance : an estimate and an appreciation. Los Angeles: Baumgardt Publishing Co., p. 173.

"Extract from the many letters of 'The Dear Tramps,' as Madame Severance calls them [Mr. and Mrs. Prang]."

'Grand Canyon of the Colorado, April 21, 1902. The place is crowded,—all indoor accommodations spoken for, so we had to take up with a tent, which we gladly did, as a new experience in our peregrinations is always welcome. And the storm which tried its best to lift us up into an aerial flight into the canyon, the hail rattling on the canvas over our heads, the thunder and lightning and the icewater to wash in in the morning—at a temperature of 25 degrees—gave us an experience to satisfy our appetites for once,—completely.'" (ENTIRE NOTE)

Primbault, Henri

- 664 1906 Au pays de la jeunesse et de l'énergie. (Suite.) La Revue Générale (Bruxelles), 83(1) (January): 31-49. [In French.]
(transl. 'In the land of youth and energy. (Continued.)')

Part of a serialized article (series begins in the March 1905 issue). This part begins at the Grand Canyon (pp. 31-33); a curiously vague account insofar as the itinerary is concerned. The timing of the visit is obviously shortly after the railroad reached the canyon rim.

"Il ne faudrait pas croire cependant que le site célèbre est très fréquenté et qu'une ville s'est bâtie sur les bords du gouffre. Nous sommes fort loin de Niagara: un wagon de rebut rempli le rôle de gare et l'hôtel terminus à quelques pas de là est une méchante cabane en bois insuffisante pour le nombre croissant des touristes, entourée de quelques tentes où nous passons deux nuits par un froid sibérien. On ne s'est même pas donné la peine l'arracher les arbres pour installer ce véritable campement. Tel est le cadre sauvage du plus admirable tableau de la nature. Dès l'aube, chassés par le froid, nous courons sur les bords du Canon dont les premiers rayons du soleil dorment les innombrables infractuosités. La gelée blanche donne au paysage un aspect encore plus féérique. • • •

"Mais pour bien saisir, sentir les dimensions colossales du précipice l'œil ne suffit pas, il faut y descendre, ce qui constitue l'excursion classique pour tous les visiteurs. A sept heures nous sommes à cheval escortés de

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

deux guides portant notre déjeuner, et sur un sentier à peine tracé nous descendons dans l'abîme: mais il serait trop long et trop fatigant d'aller jusqu'au fleuve et nous nous bornons à faire la moitié du trajet, ce qui demande huit heures. C'est une véritable ascension à rebours présentant tous les charmes et toutes les diversités de l'escalade d'une montagne sans oublier les panoramas variés: tantôt on est accroché à un rocher prenant à vos yeux des teintes invraisemblables, tantôt on traverse une véritable forêt invisible du haut, tantôt on se perd au milieu des éboulis. Nous arrivons ainsi sur un assez vaste plateau à mille mètres environ de profondeur et surplombant le reste de la coupure. On y jouit des deux effets bien distincts du haut et du bas, et l'ensemble du panorama est de toute beauté. Les dimensions prodigieuses du gouffre, la disposition architecturale des assises donnant aux rochers l'aspect de véritables tours de Babel, les arrêtes vives se découpant sur le ciel bleu, la couleur éclatante des roches que ne cache aucune végétation, la bizarrerie des sculptures colossales qui ornent les puissantes façades de grès, de granit, de marbre, de laves, tout cet ensemble qui varie d'aspect à chaque heure du jour, à chaque détour du fleuve, est d'une grandeur et d'une étrangeté sans rivale. On comprend les souvenirs d'admiration mêlés d'effroi que les géologues rapportent de leurs études dans le Grand-Canon, surtout ceux qui ont descendu le courant du fleuve, perdus au fond de l'abîme, sur sa sombre nappe d'eau coupée de rapides. • • •

"Désolés de ne pas pouvoir entreprendre cette excursion originale et grandiose, nous nous bornons à errer tout le jour autour de notre hôtel, découvrant à chaque pas un nouveau site, un panorama plus grandiose. La forêt elle-même a son charme: nous en arriverions à envier l'existence d'un vieux Canadien français, perdu dans ces parages depuis de longues années, et qui nous donne quelques renseignements sur la région. Quelle vie cependant! Il fait paître ses bestiaux dans les immenses forêts de l'État, et passe parfois des semaines entières sans rencontrer son semblable. Il parle avec peine le français, prétendant l'avoir oublié, il en est de même de l'anglais, nous dit un de nos compagnons de route.

"Le Yellowstone-park et le Grand-Canon ne sont pas les seules merveilles de l'Ouest américain, et comme je le disais au début du présent chapitre, il suffirait de chercher, 'et surtout d'aménager, d'organiser pour créer dans ces immenses régions une douzaine de grandes Suisses."

(translation)

'It should not be believed that the famous site is very popular and that a city has been built on the edge of the abyss. We are a long way from Niagara: a scrap car acts as a station, and the hotel terminus a few steps away is a nasty wooden cabin, insufficient for the growing number of tourists, surrounded by a few tents where we spend two nights this week. Siberian cold. They did not even bother to pull up the trees to set up a real camp. Such is the wild setting of nature's most admirable picture. At dawn, chased by the cold, we run along the banks of the Canyon whose first rays of sun gild the innumerable crevices. White frost gives the landscape an even more magical aspect. • • •

'But to fully grasp, feel the colossal dimensions of the precipice the eye is not enough, you have to descend there, which is the classic excursion for all visitors. At seven o'clock we are on horseback escorted by two guides carrying our breakfast, and on a barely traced path we descend into the abyss: but it would be too long and too tiring to go as far as the river and we limit ourselves to doing half the journey, which takes eight hours. It is a true reverse ascent presenting all the charms and all the diversities of climbing a mountain without forgetting the varied panoramas: sometimes we are clinging to a rock taking on incredible hues in your eyes, sometimes we cross a real forest invisible from above, sometimes we get lost in the middle of the scree. We thus arrive on a rather vast plateau about a thousand meters below and overlooking the rest of the gorge. We enjoy the two very distinct effects of the top and the bottom, and the whole panorama is absolutely beautiful. The prodigious dimensions of the chasm, the architectural arrangement of the foundations giving the rocks the appearance of veritable towers of Babel, the sharp edges standing out against the blue sky, the dazzling color of the rocks that no vegetation hides, the oddity of the colossal sculptures which adorn the powerful facades of sandstone, granite, marble, lava, all this ensemble which varies in appearance at each hour of the day, at each bend in the river, is of unrivaled grandeur and strangeness. We understand the memories of admiration mixed with dread that geologists bring back from their studies in the Grand Canyon, especially those who descended the current of the river, lost at the bottom of the abyss, on its dark sheet of water cut by rapids. • • •

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

‘Sorry for not being able to undertake this original, grandiose excursion, we limit ourselves to wandering all day around our hotel, discovering at each step a new site, a more grandiose panorama. The forest itself has its charm: we would come to envy the existence of an old French Canadian [Louis Boucher], lost in these parts for many years, and who gives us some information on the region. What a life though! He grazes his cattle in the vast forests of the state, and sometimes spends whole weeks without meeting his fellow man. He barely speaks French, claiming to have forgotten it, the same is true of English, says one of our traveling companions.

‘Yellowstone Park and the Grand Canyon are not the only marvels of the American West, and as I said at the beginning of the present chapter, it would suffice to seek, and above all to arrange, to organize in order, to create in these immense regions a dozen great Switzerlands.’

Prudden, T. Mitchell

665 1906 On the Great American Plateau : wanderings among canyons and buttes, in the land of the cliff-dweller, and the Indian of to-day. New York and London: G. P. Putnam’s Sons, 243 pp., map.

See Chapter 4, “Under the Spell of the Grand Canyon, pp. 36-89; reprinting Prudden (1898).

Raymond, Rossiter Worthington

666 1906 The Grand Canon. The Yale Courant, 43(1) (November): 67.

Printed between quotation marks, thus.

“A thought of God on earth expressed!
The silence of His perfect rest!
The patience of eternal power;
The ceaseless change from hour to hour;
Forms in alternate gloom and flame
That bide evermore the same;
And do but wear such fitful guise
Reflected in our human eyes,
Which compass only in their range
The things that change, or seem to change;
The blended hues of heavenly birth
Beyond the tenderest tints of earth
That fill and flood her spaces wide
With surges of celestial tide;
The beauty of that awful brink
Where meaner thoughts in rapture sink
And souls see clear though eyes grow dim
While space and time are lost in Him.
Methinks I could not faint or flee
In any conflict yet to be,
Whatever pathway must be trod,
Might I but keep this thought of God.”

Reichel, Willy

667 1906 Kreuz und Quer durch die Welt. Okkultistische Reiseerlebnisse. Leipzig: Druck und Verlag von Oswald Mutze, 214 [216] pp. [In German.]
(transl. ‘Criss-crossing the world. An occultist’s travel experiences.’)

Grand Canyon, see pp. 72-73:

“Auf dem Wege durch Arizona machte ich von Williams aus einen Abstecher nach dem „Grand Canyon“. Dieser ungeheure Schlund hat in seinem zugänglichen Teil eine Länge von 217 Meilen neben einer vertikalen Tiefe von ungefähr 6000 Fuss und ist 13 Meilen breit an dem Punkt, von wo aus ihn die Besucher meist

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

betrachten. Der Verfasser von „Etidorhpa“ hätte seine Fahrt durch die Unterwelt hier beginnen lassen sollen.“
(ENTIRE NOTE)

“*„Etidorhpa“ oder das Ende der Erde von John Uri Lloyd, Leipzig, (Wilh. Friedrich).“

(transl. 'On the way through Arizona I made a detour to the 'Grand Canyon' from Williams. This immense chasm, in its accessible portion, is 217 miles long by a vertical depth of about 6000 feet, and is 13 miles wide at the point from which visitors usually view it. The author of 'Etidorhpa' [Etidorpha in English] should have started his journey through the underworld here.)

Compare published English translation of the book (Reichel, 1908). See also Reichel (1907).

Riley, William Wendell

668

1906 Poems of love and home. Los Angeles: Commercial Printing House, 156 pp.

See "Silence of the Canyon", p. 89; and "Beauties of the Grand Canyon", pp. 153-155:

SILENCE OF THE CANYON.

Grand Canyon had no speech to make.

She never said a word.

While I viewed her matchless glory,

I was startled by a bird.

It came flying, tumbling through the air,

And stopped beside me there,

And sung the sweetest little song.

How I wanted you to hear.

A little chipmunk then rushed out

And stood on his hind legs

And chattered me a welcome

To this land of towering crags.

Then, another little songster,

From the tip top of a pine,

Sang as sweet as ever echoed

In the valley of the Rhine!

But the Gorge was mute, but glorious,

Magnificent, sublime!

Her secrets still remain her own

And will thruout all time!

BEAUTIES OF THE GRAND CANYON

Wonderful land of the Rockies,

Land of the Titan and genii,

Mute as the dawn of creation,

Under the same high and blue sky:

Stretching away in the distance,

Like the dreams of a happy young heart,

Tinted with morning's bright colors.

O picture of exquisite art!

Grand, magnificent Canyon,

Where flows that wild, matchless stream,

That races its way thru the mountains,

Where earth in its making is seen:

Where temple, cathedral, and castle,

Minaret, steeple, and dome,

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

Were carved by the mighty world builders,
From mountains on mountains of stone.

Their architecture was perfect,
Their painters were not amateurs,
Their beauty, men never have equalled,
Their work, thru the ages, endures.
Angelo, Phidias and Reubens,
Goetha, Melanchton, and Gray,
And thousands of men in all ages,
Were masters of men, in their day;

But their work will fade—it will crumble,
And men will forget all the Past,
But this art in the heart of the Rockies,
Is carved from the granite that lasts.
Milleniums may pass o'er our planet,
Our maps and our world will be changed,
But the Canyon, out in the wild mountains,
O Lord, let it ever remain!

There men see the earth in its making—
So mighty, majestic and solemn;
Its massive, eternal foundations
Facade, and turret, and column.
'Tis building thru all the long ages,
Unfinished; completed, it seems,
The masterpiece 'mong earth's great wonders
Of canyon, and mountain, and stream.

The genius of God is unfolding
Just now as in ages agone.
Dissolving, revolving, evolving,
Unmaking, and making, our home.
Shall the architrave of this planet,
Be surpassed in the ages to come!
This Canyon, these Mountains, this River.
O trinity of wonders in one!

Sill, Louise Morgan

669 1906 In sun or shade : poems. New York and London: Harper and Brothers, 226 pp.

See "The Canyon of the Colorado", p. 61. Reprints Sill (1901).

Smith, Emily Frances

670 1906 Sunday at the Grand Canyon. The American Thresherman (Madison, Wisconsin), 9(3) (July): 7-8.

More than a Sunday, and it may as well be any well-trod days of the week, but off we go in the masculine third person:

"A Sunday at the Grand Canyon of Arizona is worth all it costs, and that is saying a great deal, considering the financial outlay involved, and the muscular and optical strain.

"By the time the traveler has gotten as far into Arizona as the Grand Canyon, he has become accustomed to the high rates, canned food and lack of modern conveniences common to that region, and has acquired the automatic pump-handle movement between his shoulder and his pocket which enables him to grasp the details and the completeness of the panorama he is paying for. Despite the mediocrity of the topography, twisted by the short road, there is an intangible charm which may be a reflection of the witchery of the Navajo Desert—

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

that lava-scarred, mirage-haunted land of lavish sun, where the elements mix and splash their paints, where wind, water and atmosphere play strange tricks upon imagination. When in the early twilight he leans over the thread of a fence separating the hotel from the precipice, and looks up at the blue portals of heaven and hears the angels singing, down into the vestibule of the inferno and listens to the crackling flames, his reason is not amenable to the natural explanation of phenomena. The heavenly music is the wind-touch on the pine forest's arboreal framework, and the roaring upward borne is the tumult of the Colorado River, insanelly ambitious to beat itself to the sea. Distance is lost in immensity. Those rocks: are they pebbles, boulders or peaks? Is that really a ship anchored against the rim of the world or is it a seismic accident? Is yonder, so like Jerusalem, a mirage, or crumbs left from a banquet of waters before time began? Is that a Greek cross imbedded in the heart of the vacuum or is it the ramifications of the gorge? While he watches, Night rises out of the canyon. Awful blackness swims in the abysses. Cold, solemnity and the wonder of Arizona starlight are upon him.

"He wanders into the hotel parlor, reads the fire-stories in the grate, weaves through the crowd in the curio rooms, admires the rugs, robes and rubbish, buys a few trinkets, writes postals to his friends, takes his kerosene lamp and retires to the niche in the wall assigned him as a sleeping apartment.

"It is not quite canny, that perch on the edge of space. The wind-music in the pines has changed to a wail, and that terribly white moonlight throws unearthly shapes athwart the window. The pit is so near. Through it the long arms of eternity are reaching for him. The mysterious forces which have wrought the marvel are still at work, and who knows what minute contiguous terra firma may disappear inside those gaping jaws?

"The ghosts are laid at dawn. Out of the gray gulf rises the statuary, the terraces, the abutments, blossoming from tender tints to gorgeously. The vapors creeping up the rocks so shift the aspect of them that never to the observer are they twice alike. The mystery of the Canyon is its indescribability and impenetrability. To study it is to take a kalaeidoscopic view of an enchanted region.

"Even when the sunshine sprays the seismic rose garden and diamond-dusts the silver ribbon of river five thousand feet below, the sight-seer anticipates with misgiving the trail trip which duty calls him to undergo. A man is born brave, and his courage wavers not save in the face of real or fancied danger, and he mounts his sure-footed Rosinante and looks dubiously delighted. A woman is a timid creature to whom no amount of 'sights' will compensate for a sudden violent death,—the spectre which grins from every phase of Canyon exploration. She declares that she doesn't feel very well and thinks she had better not join the party. The ruse is rejected. She is bantered. The cavalcade waits. The 'safest horse on the trail' stands saddle for her. She is inveigled into a sombrero and divided skirt, a courtesy tendered by the management for the comfort of tourists and seventy-five cents. Her teeth set, her eyes glassy, she grips the saddle-horn and allows the guide to lead her steed down the air-balustraded path. Though in fancy she slips forward and is trampled, though many an overhanging boulder drops and crushes her, though the trail crumbles and her heart stops, though she sinks in the sand by the river and rises not again, there is no recorded instance where she fails to return to those who love her and those who do not, notably the ones whom she urges by no means to think of leaving without taking the trail trip, which is perfectly delightful. Having thus done all the harm she can, she gives herself up to liniments and massage and in a few days is able to move without feeling as if every muscle were full of pins.

"One can form no conception of the Canyon's immensity without probing it. Viewed at closer range, and internally, denuded of the fantastic, it is only what it poses to be, the deepest, awesomest, grandest fissure in the world. To descend it is to see monstrous rocks recede toward the sky until they become mere blots; to watch small stones, approaching, grow into promontories.

"The beginning of the trail is an easy incline, which gives confidence to the timid rider, and an expression of pleasurable excitement which takes well in the picture snapped from the elbow of the path [a reference to the Kolb brothers, photographers]. Thence onward the way is more precipitous. At the Devil's Stairs, riders dismount and climb down the slippery stone gradations. But that is one of the easier exigencies of the trail. There are places where a mere footold divides a wall of rock from vacuity, places where the curves are so sharp that the horse's head and shoulders project over apparently bottomless space. At such times one's native faith in predestination bolsters him; he closes his eyes to shut out the frightful possibilities; and slowly, carefully, his equine preserver anchors each foot, and in less than three hours lands him at the tent city on the plateau, which from the fence on the rim looks like a few handkerchiefs bleaching on the grass. There everybody rests. Solid

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

and other other refreshments are obtainable. The cavalcade jogs sleepily across the safe level, and finally begins another descent, deep into shadowy recesses, by devious and tortuous paths, beside which the width and meanderings of the upper trail are as a public turnpike. Notwithstanding the previous shocks and trials of the trip, one is not prepared for the crowning infelicity, the Corkscrew, around which the string of a path is wound; where, above and below, apparently suspended in space, sections of the train are making laborious and hazardous descent. A misstep, either direction, and two or three of the sections in front would be telescoped. Few are brave enough to trust themselves to a horse's sure-footedness or lack of suicidal intent. Generally, passengers dismount and walk down the Corkscrew, with many a backward and upward glance to see if any in the rear are descending by gravitation, and with many a shuddering peep below where shadowy space suggests a fiendish anticipation. At the base of the Corkscrew the obvious danger is past, and the gentle incline to the river is bordered by clear and merry streams, and modest canyon flowers.

"It is noon when the party arrives at the brink of the Colorado River. A strip of clean white sand invites a barefoot exploration along the whipping, churning, thundering, writhing torrent. After a few minutes relaxation, they assemble on the lap of a ledge and eat their sandwiches, hard boiled eggs, pickles and cake; tell stories; throw pebbles into the water; take snapshots, and at one o'clock begin the ascent. Spirits rise with the elevation. The trail seems less arduous. The horses take more interest. Down-bound parties are encountered and pleasantries exchanged.

"This is nothing to one who has climbed the Alps,' says a young woman, leaning on an alpenstock.

"Huh!' ventures a listener, sotto voce, 'I'll wager she's a Missouri school ma'am and this is her first trip out of the state.'

"Again the tent city is reached and refreshment repeated. Cactus apples are gathered and more snapshots taken. The guide rides near the timid one and talks of the misfortunes which induced him to take the trail, the fatalities which he has barely escaped, and the schemes nearing maturity by which dollars will become in his sight as the sands on the Colorado beach.

"Is the trail trip worth while? If the object be information, mental and physical wrench: yes."

Stoddard, S. R. [Stoddard, Seneca Ray]

671 1906 The Grand Canyon of Arizona. Anybody's Magazine (Sacramento, California), 1(3) (July): 17-28. [The Contents page for this issue lists the author as E. R. Stoddard, an error.]

The well-known landscape photographer, widely traveled but most renowned for his work in the Adirondacks of New York State, recalls an October 1894 trip to the canyon, from Flagstaff to Hance's. Includes a description of a trip down Grandview Trail. Photographs by the author appear throughout.

"The way to The Grand Canyon led over a lava strewn road that ran through alternating open and forest land. I was the only passenger—in fact, the stage was run that day exclusively for my benefit. The round trip cost $25.00 and owing to the construction of the vehicle and the character of the road I felt that I had my money's worth. • • •

"At nine o'clock we reached our stopping place on the edge of the Canyon. We had been thirteen hours in doing the seventy-five miles and it was a relief to stand. A welcome light streamed through the window and the open door of the hotel office which was a log-house. The sleeping accommodations consisted of wall tents with wooden floors, warmed when considered necessary, by a cheery kerosene lamp. My natural desire for a bath after the dust of the day at first caused blank astonishment in the landlord, then, as he evidently sized me up for a tenderfoot, incontrovertible argument to the effect that I would get just as dirty next day! Finally, as a concession to a crank that might become dangerous if not appeased, he measured out a gallon of water from the slender stock that had been brought in on condition that I should drink Apolinaris which was to be charged at a moderate (Western) price.

"Now, one may go to the very rim in a Pullman and stop at a modern hotel with all the conveniences of civilization. For this the main line is left at Williams, 34 miles west of Flagstaff, and by a spur 67 miles north to the Grand Canyon at a point 16 miles west of Grand View, where I first looked into the abyss. Naturally, I was anxious to see the wonder so, after supper, borrowing a lantern, I went out and stood on the edge. It was a good lantern, yet it left something to be desired for the scenery was mostly a mile deep and averaged ten miles away.

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

"My first glimpse in the morning was through an opening in the gnarled and twisted cedars. I doubted if I looked on solid things. Rather it seemed a glimpse of a red and yellow sky softened by the blue haze while below was a shifting sea up out of which came terraced islands of blood and gold. As the sun rose higher the sea dried up and I looked down into the purple and on to the wonderful mountains of the depths. Grander in form than any mountains of the upper earth are they, suggesting those heavenly ones that Christian beheld as he neared his journey's end. They stand as castles; as pinnacled cathedrals; as mighty turrets with vertical walls; hip-roofed and belvedere; as royal tents of many colors sloping true from center-pole to fluted edge. Deeper still, glistening in the lowest gorge with reflected sky came glimpses of the rushing Colorado in seeming but a tiny rivulet.

"Buttress on buttress, terrace on terrace, mountain over mountain they rise up level with the plain. Ordinarily, with thoughts of a mountain one associates an upheaval. These come from erosion [sic]. Mind can not grasp the perspective of the ages passing while the slow water did its established work. Down there are peaks higher than the highest of the Adirondacks yet their summits are lower than the plain whereon you stand. The approach has no suggestion of what awaits you here. Backward, and at right and left the plateau stretches level as a floor. On every side a plain save this entrancing horror into which you gaze. Nowhere else on earth have mountains such color. Foundations that are almost blue, long lines of cliffs like blood growing purple in the distance, summits beyond like pure gold. Line on line, peak on peak they reach above the drifting mist. • • • "

Here Stoddard spends time quoting C. A. Higgins, Lieutenant Ives, and John Wesley Powell; all about the astonishing wonders and perspectives of the canyon.

"Wandering idly that first day along the brink I beheld an apparition. Bright Angel trail was then unknown. Here was one in the flesh. I was unprepared for the sight and like Moses of old, modestly hid my eyes, but on nearer approach discovered that it was a real wrapper she had on instead of what I at first thought. Diffidently I begged the privilege of picturing her, and she coyly consented. [Stoddard includes that picture in his article, with the legend, "I was unprepared for the sight." (p. 22)] Then I learned that she was one of a party of four, taking their vacation trip in a prairie schooner in which they slept at night with their other valuables, provisions, etc., cooked and ate their meals in the open, and in this not unpleasant way were doing the Grand Canyon. Later I received a letter written by the same hand and another picture in elegant clothes intended to overcome the effect of the one I then secured, and with it the knowledge that I had unwittingly been making free with a school ma'am.

"The second day I secured a guide for [at this point pages 24/25 are mistakenly transposed in the magazine; correctly ordered here] the trip into the lower regions. This guide was well worth knowing. Once he owned claims to the value of $100,000) and a ranch with sheep worth $10,000), but he ventured, into 'the street' and went broke on wool. As a guide he was a success. In addition to knowing things generally that were going on in the outside world he knew things about the Grand Canyon of more interest than its mere trails.

"He on his sturdy sorrel [a photograph is included, p. 22] and I on a sure-footed white mule broke over the edge of the cliff about three miles west of the first view and went down into the depths. The way led zigzag, down slopes like the roof of a house, along balconies overhanging unknown depths, on shelves in cliffs descending vertically a thousand feet—at Suicide Point it was 1,500 feet, and a hair-raiser as one looked over. Hull explained that it was so named because it was such a good place if one was inclined that way. As we, belated, crept past it by moonlight on the return that night, I wondered as to the sensation of the plunge.

"This trail was opened in 1891 to reach a copper mine three miles from the rim as we traveled, and 2,800 feet below. From it was taken a lump of ore weighing 600 pounds, 75 per cent pure copper, and sent to the Columbian Exposition as a part of Arizona's exhibit, then because of the difficulty of getting the ore to market the mine was abandoned. Two miles further and 2,000 feet lower, according to the guide, we found the first water flowing from the ground, and in the shade of a cottonwood tree had our lunch.

"All about us were mountains. Backward, quite blue with the distance, was the Golden Lion and the notch through which we had descended. Near by, Cheops rose in its immensity, beside which the Cheops of the East would appear but as a tiny cone. Along the circling terrace we went towards where gold topped Vishnu's Temple

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

stood while Castor and Polox [sic, Pollux] reared their unconquered heads further at the left. Halting on the way near where Bright Angel trail now joins this older one, we looked down from the last terrace into the gorge where ran the river. Yellow as gold it seemed as compared with the deep red of the rock through which it ran. Beyond the red cliffs rose other mountain heights, and over all I saw a storm cloud gather and break, and the rain descending through the crystal vault, yet as it fell it vanished; dissolved and drank up by the thirsty air before it could reach the ground. It is the common way. Storms gather and break in the upper air, but the rain seldom reaches earth. Yet sometimes the powers of the upper air prevail over the lower, and the floods from some fierce cloud-burst almost in a moment transform the dry beds of canyons into roaring torrents that sweep everything before them. Still with this occasional cloudburst the average rainfall of the section is but about three inches in the entire year. Here we left our steeds, for the rest of the way was too steep for fourfooted beasts to descend.

"We are in a warmer climate now. From the top to the bottom one passes through about all the changes, from temperate zone to the airless tropics. I had shed garments along the way until its salient points were most effectively flagged, and there could be no danger of losing the way. Hull said I brought back pleasant memories of a fashionable bathing beach in the height of the season. I had inadvertently dropped the remark while we were eating our lunch that the way was not restful, and he had fired off that ancient thought about being born tired as an original idea. I admitted the fact. When we looked down into the Red Canyon at the yellow river flowing below he suggested that this was about the limit of the usual trip. I thought I could stand it a little further. Later he became suspiciously solicitous about my well being, and thought we had gone about far enough. Descending still further, he showed that he was somewhat disgusted at my perversity, but when I intimated that I had not come 3,000 miles to stop short at that additional number of feet, he gave me quite clearly to understand that I could have all the fun I wanted, only I must remember that it was just as far up as it was down, and a damned sight harder. We reached the river at last. He formed the rim of his sombrero into a cup in a way that woodsmen learn, and dipping from the stream offered me a drink. It was yellow and thick with mud, but it was nectar. The place was a furnace. The heat almost intolerable. No faintest breath stirred the water. My tongue was too large for my mouth, which, in addition, seemed filled with cotton that would not out. I was triumphant, but paying for it. Some spears of grass, juiceless as dried hay, which I essayed to chew, offered slight relief, but I had the proud satisfaction of hearing in tardy acknowledgment and as a concession to sand, that I was the first man who had ever gone all the way to the bottom for pleasure.

"Past this in 1871 [in context, 1869] came the intrepid Major Powell from above. Near this point the three men deserted, preferring risk of savages to the terrors of the further unknown way. The little world that knew, wondered at Major Powell's daring yet, two years before his venture, a man went through alone, running the gauntlet of the stream from far above and reaching civilization below, bruised and nearly exhausted from starvation and exposure."

Here Stoddard concludes with the story of James White, ending with a transcription of White's letter to his brother about his misfortunate adventure. See Stoddard (1906) under James White in Part I of this bibliography.

Taylor, Edward Robeson

- 672      1906      Into the Light and other verse. San Francisco: Stanley-Taylor Co., 156 pp. [See "Under a Pine at the Grand Canyon", p. 116, and "To the Grand Canyon", p. 117 (both reprint verses by Taylor in 1904); and "To the Grand Canyon of the Colorado", p. 123:

We breathless view thee as a thing that's living,
Filled with thine own all silent-moving blood,
No less than are thy furred and feathered creatures,
Nor than thy roaring, wonder-working flood;—
And truth, when filled with light's empurpling wine,
Who then can doubt they life to be divine?

Or when mysterious dawn creeps o'er the desert,
To fold thee in her wide-embracing arms,
And all thy palaces, and domes, and towers,
Tremble with seeming new-created charms,

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

While Navajo, by her in passing kissed,
Serenely glows a flawless amethyst.

White, William Allen

- 673 1906 On Bright Angel Trail. In: The Grand Canyon of Arizona : being a book of words from many pens, about the Grand Canyon of the Colorado River in Arizona. [Chicago]: Santa Fe, Passenger Department, pp. 63-65. [Volume reprinted 1909.]

Text selected from White (1905).

Whiting, Lilian

- 674 1906 The land of enchantment : from Pike's Peak to the Pacific. Boston: Little, Brown and Co., 347 pp. [Also reprinted 1909.]

See Chapter 11, "Grand Cañon; the Carnival of the Gods", pp. 311-338. A long and engaging chapter, richly grown from Whiting's (1903) earlier work, is frequently interrupted by borrowings from poets and other authors, yet also reflects her privileged upbringing and education before embarking on a career as a successful journalist and author.

"One takes the wings of the morning and arrives at the uttermost parts of the earth to find—the Grand Cañon, the scenic marvel of the entire world.

"Only to the poet's vision is the Grand Cañon revealed; only to the poet's touch do its mighty harmonics respond. For this sublime spectacle is as vital as a drama enacted on the stage, only its acts require the centuries and the ages in which to represent themselves. Whatever one sees of the Grand Cañon,—it matters not from what commanding view of vision or vista, one sees only an infinitesimal point. It is the Carnival of the Gods.

• • •

"Statistical comparisons are, at best, a necessary evil which, once confronted, need not companion one further. It is beauty, it is sublimity, not mathematical assurances, that really lays hold on life. • • •

"The majestic panorama dominates every detail of daily life. As when in Bayreuth for the Wagner music-dramas alone, every other consideration is subordinated to these, so in life in El Tovar, on Bright Angel Trail, one's hours for sleep and for any daily occupations are held strictly amenable to 'effects' in the mysterious splendor of the Titanic underworld. To see the cañon under the full moon; to see it when all the pinnacles of rock are leaping in rose-red flame under a sunrise; to see it in a dream of twilight as the purple canopy falls,—all these hours,—all hours are made for the magical transformations. With every breath of change of the atmosphere this celestial beauty changes. • • •

"Even if one has seen the Grand Cañon before, he is surprised to find how absolutely newly created it is to him when its haunting magic draws him back. No enshrined memory can compare with the reality. In seeing the Petrified Forest one checks it off as a thing accomplished for life. It is definite. The great logs of agate and jasper and chalcedony lie on the ground as they have lain for perhaps thousands of ages. It is a wonder—the seventh wonder of the world, if one pleases—and the paradise of geologists, but it is unchanging. Not so the Grand Cañon. The cañon is a perpetual transformation scene. Its color effects rival those of an electric fountain under the full play of the spectroscope. It is rose, purple, amber, emerald, pearl gray, pale blue, scarlet—according to atmospheric states. One leaves it in the late afternoon with the rocky towers and pinnacles and battlements all in glowing scarlet, seen through a transparent air. He steps out upon the broad hotel piazzas an hour later and, behold, the uncalculated spaces of the cañon are filled with a half-transparent blue mist which envelops all the curious sandstone formations that gleam in pale rose and opal tints through this thin blue mist, and assume wraith-like shapes. • • • To draw one's chair out on the broad balcony of the new and beautiful hotel, El Tovar, and sit and dream and gaze and wonder, and wonder and gaze and dream, is, perhaps, the greatest joy one can have in all the time passed here, especially if the solitude can be the solitude à deux. No joy, no interest, is of much consequence until or unless it is sympathetically shared. As a décor de scène the Grand Cañon is unrivalled. The magic and mystery of all the universe broods over its Titanic spaces. • • •

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

"On first alighting from the branch of the Sante Fé that runs from Williams, Arizona, to Bright Angel, at the head of Bright Angel Trail on the Grand Cañon,—a three hour's ride of transcendent beauty among the purple peaks of the San Francisco mountains,—on first stepping from the train up the terrace to the beautiful 'El Tovar' built on the very rim of the cañon, one objects strenuously to entering the hotel. His eye has caught the Vision,—a 'celestial Inferno bathed in soft fires?' or the 'Promised Land?' or the mystical vision that John saw on the Island of Patmos? The hotel would, presumably, remain; but this spectacle,—what can it be save a mirage, one never seen before on earth and perhaps not to be too confidently anticipated in Paradise? Would such a picture remain? Can one safely leave a sunset which is all a miracle of splendor while he goes in to dine? Can he safely turn away from the heavens when a young moon at night is winging her way down the sky and expect to find her midway in the heavens? And could one safely leave this most marvellous scene of all while he should bestow himself in his rooms?

". . . the Grand Cañon prefigures itself to one as an apparition, and while he may gaze upon it under all changing lights of dawn, of noonday, of sunset—and of moonlight—he cannot come to any realization that it is there all the time. His room in the hotel may look out into it and over it; and, waking in the night, he rises and leans out of his window to see if it is still there. One does not expect a vision of the New Jerusalem, a palpitating, changing, flaming, throbbing sea of color—in its rose-reds, its greens, its amber, gold, and purple—to remain like a field or a forest. It seems a thing of conditions, visible at one moment, vanished, perchance, the next."

Whiting retires to recite the many sculptural forms of the canyon; the placements of architectural forms from around the world, the splatters of color, and the impressions of grand operas. She credits the huge increase in visitors to the canyon—813 in 1900, 6883 in 1903, and now in 1906 vastly more, "after the fashion of compound interest"—to the railroad and Fred Harvey (obviously); it all "insures to every traveller any degree of luxurious comfort he requires. In fact, 'El Tovar' is so inclusive of comfort as to be fairly a feature of the cañon . . . ." She returns now to run through some history—Powell, and some mixed-up reminiscences of Spaniards—and some more creature comforts, before turning to Hopi House across the way, with its "quaintly garbed Hopi Indians within in attendance"—"a curiosity", she says. But not nearly as much of a curiosity as the "old Indian" she says comes periodically to El Tovar to ask for food (with success)—her narrative of the man's engagement of the staff, using supposed quotations, begs condescension. She sums up the scenes:

"So the little trifles and pleasantries of the comédie humaine assert their place in the general life even on the rim of the sublime spectacle of the Carnival of the Gods."

Even having quoted from a variety of poets and authors already, Whiting now embarks on John Wesley Powell's Colorado River voyage, and refers to George Wharton James' canyon meanderings, before mentioning, "It is a noticeable fact, and one which the general reader may regard with quiet amusement, that all the writers who even attempt to allude to the Grand Cañon quote copiously from each other; and this is the almost inevitable instinct of each, in order to reinforce himself with authority for statements which, to those who have not themselves gazed upon this Carnival of the Gods, would sound incredible even to the verge of the wildest extravaganza." Then for the next five pages she rolls out a bibliography's worth of names and snippets—and these, mind you, from among those only up to 1906. And, oh yes, Thomas Moran, too—with a quotation suffixed from someone else about his canyon canvasses.

Whiting ends with a respectful-turning-condescending acknowledgment of her trip from "Pike's Peak to the Pacific" (by rail, of course), that her most "treasured possession is that of the friendships formed during this enchanted journey; of the generous kindness, the bountiful hospitality; the exquisite courtesy and grace constantly received from each and all with an unflinching uniformity, including those in widely varying relations and pursuits; those who, according to outer standards, are the more, or the less, fortunate in power, resources, or development . . . ."

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

Winter, William

- 675 1906 The Grand Canyon of Arizona. The Pacific Monthly (Portland, Oregon), 15(1) (January): frontispiece, 3-7.

A novel introduction leading to a writer's feelings for the canyon . . .

"Many years ago it was my privilege to cross the Atlantic Ocean in the steamship Alaska, on the voyage to Liverpool. She took a northerly course and presently passed near to icebergs, in a region of intense cold; and there came a day when she was the center of one of the most sublime pageants ever seen by human eyes. She was carrying sail at the time, as well as steaming; for the wind, though blowing a gale, was fair, and the sea, though rough and angry, was not tempestuous. Suddenly, a great and dense haze of silvery mist swept over the ocean; a white squall struck the ship; and, almost in a moment, sail after sail was ripped from her yardarms, as if those sails had been so many sheets of paper; while, as she reeled and plunged in the weltering surges, her hardy sailors, responding to the shrill whistle of the boatswain, nimbly and with laughter, swarmed up the shrouds, to cut away the flapping canvas, and give it to the merciless wind. For a little while nothing could be seen but huge, white-crested waves, all round the ship. Then, overhead, the white mist lessened and parted; the stainless blue dome of the sky became visible; the encircling vapors began to grow transparent; the whole wide expanse of ocean was once more disclosed—agitated, and rolling fiercely under the stress of tempest—and, from verge to verge of the horizon, the heavens were spanned with colossal arches of brilliant rainbow. Never had it been my fortune to behold a scene of such commingled terror and glory; nor—though I was aboard the Augusta Victoria in October, 1889, when she nearly foundered, in the most terrible of ocean storms—have I gazed on any spectacle of natural grandeur commensurate with it until now—when I stand upon the verge of this dread abyss, at once beautiful and awful, and look across the towers and castles, the crags and mountains, the weird caverns and subterranean floods of the Grand Canyon of Arizona."

. . . which then for the remainder of the theme promptly drops into Everyman's worn-through descriptions of battlements and human vision unabled—and then, despite the article's title, all these are left behind so as to appreciate for the reader the wonders of California.

1907

Anonymous

- 676 1907 Down the Grand Canyon. In: From Other Magazines [SECTION]. The Strand Magazine (London), 32 (January) (192): 716.

Brief excerpt of trail trip, from E. W. G. Wesson article in Wide World Magazine; with illustration.

- 677 1907 Two women in the desert. Good Housekeeping, 44(6) (June) (344): 673-675.

Imagine this: "Two of our Good Housekeeping women ventured through the Painted Desert, a summer or two ago, to the Grand Canyon of the Colorado without male escort." One woman is identified as "Mrs Carlson" of Connecticut.

- 678 1907 The Harvey system. Santa Fe Employes' Magazine, 1(8) (July): 271-277.

Fred Harvey. See p. 273, favorable comparison of meals served at the Harvey Hotel in Needles, California, and El Tovar, Grand Canyon.

- 679 1907 [F. W. Prince lecture.] In: Along the Trail [SECTION]. Santa Fe Employes' Magazine, 1(8) (July): 300.

"Recently Mr. F. W. Prince, city passenger agent, San Francisco, delivered in Trinity Church, Berkeley, Cal., his illustrated lecture on the Grand Canyon and the petrified forest. The church was filled to overflowing, and

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

everyone who was fortunate enough to be present voted Mr. Prince an entertaining and instructive speaker.” (ENTIRE ITEM)

680 1907 A popular lecture by Mr. Prince. Camera Craft, 14(9) (September): 416.

Summary of lecture by Frederick W. Prince to the California Camera Club, on “The Grand Canyon of the Colorado”.

681 1907 California Camera Club. In: Club Notes [SECTION]. Camera Craft, 4(9) (September): 423.

Notes, “The August illustrated lecture was delivered by Mr. Frederick W. Prince, before an immense audience. The subject was ‘The Grand Canyon of the Colorado,’ and was illustrated with beautifully-colored slides, panoramic views, and a number of moving pictures. The lecture was keenly enjoyed.” (ENTIRE NOTE) See also an anonymous summary, p. 416.

682 1907 [F. W. Prince lecture.] In: Along the Trail [SECTION]. Santa Fe Employes’ Magazine, 1(10) (September): 396.

“F. W. Prince, city passenger agent at San Francisco, was recently lecturing before the Elks at Oakland and informed his hearers that he was going to throw upon the canvas one of the most interesting and beautiful scenes in the Grand Canyon. The slide was turned and then appeared the picture of a saloon at Williams labeled ‘Life Saving Station and Thirst Emporium.’ The picture was greeted with applause and the audience insisted on an adjournment.” (ENTIRE ITEM)

683 1907 The fly in the picture. In: Stories Just a Few [SECTION]. The Lyceumite and Talent (Chicago), (The Lyceumite, 6(2)) (Talent, 18(6)) (December): 42.

Summary of presentation by Martin Tew on “Wonders of the West”, when “a fly, seemingly as big as a mastodon, walked into the picture, took a position on the heights of Vishnu temple and looked down into the canyon.”

684 1907 [Lecture notice.] In: Geographical Record [SECTION]. American Geographical Society, Bulletin, 39(1): 42.

“. . . the speaker of the evening, Mr. Howard W. Du Bois, who addressed the Society on the Grand Cañon of the Colorado. Stereopticon views were shown.” (ENTIRE NOTE)

Aldao, Carlos A.

685 1907 Á traves del mundo. Buenos Aires: M. Biedma é Hijo, 408 pp. [In Spanish.]
(transl. ‘Around the world.’)

Grand Canyon, pp. 158-159. Beyond the ordinary, not too particular about the canyon, but enjoyed John Hance, who was judged more articulate even than Balduin Möllhausen.

“No hay palabras, ni fotografías, ni pinturas que den una idea de aquella maravilla. Hasta que cayeron las sombras de la noche estuve en el puesto de observación, como queriendo meter en mis ojos aquel paisaje que nunca volvería á ver. • • •

“Después de la comida en el hotel nos reunimos los huéspedes alrededor del fuego para escuchar al guía de la casa, á quién llaman (capitán). Ori undo en esos lugares donde había pasado su vida, de contestura delgada, fuerte y nerviosa, de fisono mía simpática, ojos vivos y pera blanca, era el tipo del Uncle Sam. Con cómica seriedad, empezó á narrar aventuras de caza y mentiras tan estupendas, dichas con tal gracia, que todos lo declaramos superior al barón Mulhausen [sic].”

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

(translation)

'There are no words, or photographs, or paintings that give an idea of that wonder. Until the shadows of night fell, I was at the observation post, as if wanting to put into my eyes that landscape that I would never see again. • • •

'After dinner at the hotel, the guests gather around the fire to listen to the guide of the house, whom they call (captain). Originally from [other] places where he had spent his life, thin, strong, and nervy, a sympathetic face, lively eyes, and a white pear [goatee], he was the type of Uncle Sam. With comic seriousness, he began to narrate hunting adventures and lies so stupendous, told with such grace, that we all declared him superior to Baron Mulhausen [sic].'

Möllhausen (notable in American history for accompanying exploratory expeditions in the West and Southwest, including the Ives Expedition on the Colorado River and to the Grand Canyon; see Möllhausen in Part I of this bibliography) was not a baron and perhaps the title was confused with the actual baron of the expedition, F. W. von Egloffstein. Note as well that, on returning to Germany for the final time after the conclusion of the expedition, Möllhausen became a widely read novelist, basing many of his adventures in the Southwest.

B., H. B.

686 1907 The Grand Canyon. The Gospel Messenger (Elgin, Illinois), 46(12) (March 23): 185, 181 [pagination reading order thus].

A spiritually-inspired view of the canyon for the faithful back home, with a couple of nods to the material world; in its entirety:

"Well, here we are, as the result of a long-felt desire, to see one of the greatest wonders of the western world—"The Grand Canyon." We arrived at this place on yesterday evening, and spent the night in the 'Bright Angel' hotel, located within fifty feet of the edge of a scene so great and so grand that language fails to express it, in a way to give even a faint idea of its beauty and grandeur.

"We don't for a moment intimate that the Lord ordered weather for our special benefit and pleasure; but if he had, we could have asked for nothing better. From evening to morning it was delightful, and from morning to evening we have had perpetual sunshine, so bright, so soft, and an atmosphere so pure and clear that it has proven to be a day of great satisfaction and enjoyment. We are told by the citizens here that they have not had such a fine spell of weather for years. Since early morning we have been busy taking in the different view points. Now, just as the evening sun is sinking in the west, while kissing the rainbow-tinged walls of the eastern side, and the dark and blue shadows are rising upward from the depths below, we have seated ourselves on the edge of this view point of the canyon to see it in its shine and shadows as it hides itself in the darkness of the approaching night.

"On hearing so much about this greatest of American wonders, we had been trying to save our descriptions for this special occasion. And now, as we have come to it, we are at a loss as to how to use them. There are occasions and scenes that so overcome and fill us with admiration that we are made speechless. Some of you have seen sunsets, where the golden-edged and silver-lined clouds stand edged up against each other in such magnificent mixture and profusion that we are made to say, 'How wonderful! How indescribable!' And that is about all the description we are able to give. Language is too empty to give the picture that has been made in the soul. So it seemed to us this morning as we faced this strange, this magnificent view, as miles and miles of it opened up in the light of the rising sun. Some said it was a panoramic view of rainbow-tinged clouds, mixed with the sunshine and shadows. Others said that it reminded them of a great city kissed with the crimsoned rays of morning sunlight as it streamed through rain-laden clouds. Others saw it in their dreams of the Heavenly City, the New Jerusalem, as seen by John on the Isle of Patmos.

"And still others have specialized in their imaginations, and we have pointed out to us, 'The Mishnel [Vishnu] Temple, The Temple of Isis, The Zoroaster Temple, The Temple of Solomon, The Battleship Iowa.' And there is room for hundreds more of things that may be seen by a slight stretch of the imagination. Indeed, there is simply no end to the shapes and forms that have been worked out by the direction of the Omnipotent Hand. We shall not attempt to give our impression of this greatest of geological wonders. The very first thought that came to us, as the wonderful sight flashed upon us, was, 'See what God hath wrought!' [after Numbers 23:23].

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

"We hear men say that they will not believe things which they cannot understand. They refuse to accept the story of Jonah and the whale because they cannot understand how a whale could swallow a man. Is the thing too hard for God to do? If so, here is something a thousand times harder to do, and yet who but God could have done it? It has been made—we see it with our eyes, and understand it much less than the many wonderful things which God has made as we have them revealed in the Bible,—and yet here is God's handwriting so evidently displayed that we feel like baring our heads and worshiping, not the things made, but the Maker. We heard a number say: 'Who can look at a thing so immensely grand and awe-inspiring and yet say, "There is no God"?' It seemed to be the united opinion of all present that a scene so wonderfully formed and displayed must necessarily teach, if nothing else will, that there is a God.

"In order to have a further idea of this natural wonder it is necessary to see it from different points. The first and a very fine view is had in front of the hotels. From here the view is very fine indeed. And because of the convenience in access, it can be had at any time during the day and thus get the different effects as produced by the sun striking it at the different heights and angles. The second favorite view is at O'Neill's Point, some three miles east of the hotel. This makes a very interesting drive and gives a view of the canyon from a different standpoint. In the afternoon we took another three-mile drive to Rowe Point, which gave us a view from another angle. These three points give a very complete view of this, the most interesting part of the canyon, all of which can be had by spending one day and two nights at the place.

"The arrangement of the Santa Fe road is very good, as they give stop-offs on all through trains at Williams, where you get a train for the canyon, arrive there in the evening in good time to get a fine sunset view. Next morning, see it as the sun rises up over its towers and temples and have the day for taking in the other different views. If you have taken the Hudson trip, seen the Niagara Falls and wandered through the Garden of the Gods, your list is not complete until you stop off and see the Grand Canyon.

"Our enthusiasm may have mystified our more sober judgment, but our last look on our last evening there gave us a peculiar experience. Just as the dusk of the evening melted away before the silvery light of the moon, as it slowly rose over the eastern edges of the distant walls of the cavernous depths beneath and beyond, an apparently new world opened up to us, such as we had never seen before. And we were made to feel that we were in the very presence of the great 'I AM,' who made the worlds according to his purpose and for our good and enjoyment. It is more than the finger marks of his power. It is the expression of the incomprehensibility of his wisdom divine."

Biddle, Ellen McGowan

687 1907 Reminiscences of a soldier's wife. Philadelphia: Press of J. B. Lippincott Co., 259 pp. [Privately printed through Lippincott?]

See pp. 237 regarding a visit to the Grand Canyon of the Yellowstone; specifically, p. 238: "I have since visited the Grand Cañon of the Colorado, which must be the most wonderful thing in nature—certainly, the most awe inspiring. It is vastly larger and grander in every way, but to my mind not nearly so beautiful." (ENTIRE NOTE)

Blanchard, R.

688 1907 Quand les femmes ont-elles cessé de monter à cheval à califourchon? In: Correspondance Médico-Littéraire [SECTION]. La Chronique Médicale (Paris), 14(23) (December 1): 790. [In French.]
(transl. 'When did women stop riding astride horses?')

Part of a series relating to the title question. In this note is the observation that women may rent split skirts to ride horses into the Grand Canyon.

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

Brooks, Benjamin

- 689 1907 The Southwest from a locomotive. Santa Fe Employes' Magazine, 1(10) (September): 365-374. Credited to Scribner's Magazine; i.e., Brooks (1903). Includes Grand Canyon.

Espenschied, Charles

- 690 1907 A typical western city. El Paso, Texas. The Northwestern Miller (Minneapolis, Minnesota), 70(4) (April 24): 219-220.

"As to the Grand Canon, I can do no better than to quote from a letter I wrote a few minutes after my first sight of the wonder:

"I shall not attempt to describe it. I had read so much about it and seen all kinds of pictures of it; yet I was not prepared for what we saw. I think it is the most awe-inspiring sight in the world. Its grandeur and mystery make it irresistibly fascinating. Everyone should try to see it; it is well worth any great sacrifice within reason. I am glad I lived to see it, and shall want to come back again.

"This and Yellowstone Park are, to me, the greatest wonders in the world. Niagara, and other great falls, as well as great volcanoes, are grand, but explainable, at least to our satisfaction, but the mystery of these two natural wonders will, probably, never be satisfactorily explained. It does not strike you as large in the sense of bigness; in fact, I know of no words that can describe this sensation. You are just dumbfounded and spellbound."
(ENTIRE NOTE)

Hall, Sharlot M.

- 691 1907 A Christmas at the Grand Canon [sic]. Out West, 26(1) (January): 2-14.

Arizona's own poet-historian spends time down the Grandview Trail some ten years earlier (about 1897), stealing away from her companions to be "alone with the Cañon and the night". Her intimately delightful account, drifting for a while to Christmas past, in its entirety:

"It was nearing the end of December in a year when the Wilderness was still wilderness, as it will never be again—when wagon-roads were few and railroads distant and no one stopped to look twice at a line of white-covered wagons headed westward. We were but one wagon, for we were seekers of other things than the new empires in the West.

"We had traveled for days through the largest forest left untouched by ax and saw in the United States—the dark, beautiful Mogollon, lonely and unknown on its cliff-walled plateau. Long reefs and gorges of lava had turned us aside—lava brown and bright as when it flowed out of the earth. There were areas where volcanic clinkers and dull-red, sponge-like boulders of pumice half-buried in ash barred the way, and miles where a rough coating of lime over the broken lava struck fire from the wagon-wheels and cut harshly on hoofs and sole-leather.

"Climbing the strange round hills scattered over the plateau beyond the San Francisco peaks, like giant bubbles over a pot of mush, we had found them to be old vents and craters, some of them holding lakes of shining water shadowed by tall pines whose green tops never looked over the brown lava rim to the world beyond. Mid-afternoon the forest opened, the trees grew smaller, and between the gray trunks and low branches we caught glimpses of a dim, many-banked cloud across the distant horizon. The sun dropped down through the trees; dusk and twilight and starlight came; but we clove on, for the water-barrels were empty and we must reach the 'Tanks'—the little rain-filled pools in the rock of the Rim—or make a 'dry camp' and go thirsty till morning.

"Always the cloud came nearer, its up-piled masses turning to pale vaporous gray and lavender as the moon rose. The wind died down and the air had a hush as of waiting. The horses grew uneasy, shying and snorting with the instinctive animal sense of something unusual ahead; and, as the wagon stopped and I rode on alone, my prairie-bred pony shivered under me and at last refused to move.

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

"I had been watching the play of light on the many-banked cloud now I looked down. The earth fell away at my feet as if the hemispheres had parted. Sheer walls of darkness swept down interminably till they were lost in the pale-lighted cloud that came up to meet them. It was the Cañon, veiled and mysterious under the night: the dim, ever-changing cloud bank was the farther wall, fifteen miles away from the southern Rim on which I stood.

"Breakfast was eaten long before the first sunlight began sifting down through the tall pines around the camp. The wagon-cover was drawn down over the bows at both ends and tied fast; the horses were hobbled and turned loose to take care of themselves, and light packs were made up, a blanket and a lunch for each traveler—for this was the 24th of December, and Christmas eve was to be spent in the bottom of the cañon, as near the river as might be.

"The trail was new, scarcely a well-marked outline much of the way, leading down to a lately-discovered copper mine reputed to hold great wealth. Pitching headlong over the great cliff-wall of the Rim, it crawled along the face of precipices, here and there on a roadway of logs held to the rock by long, deep-driven iron bars. At the outer edge of this narrow path, unguarded by so much as a blade of grass, the walls dropped down till eyes and brain were dizzy with the depth. We passed through tunnel-like clefts and hollows in the time-worn rock, or went cautiously along the hand-breadth path that wound round and round the brink of a great promontory that seemed to sway and quiver under our weight as we crossed.

"Far below, so far that he looked no larger than a swallow, a great black eagle htmg, rocking and dipping idly on his strong wings as he looked perhaps for some shy rock-rabbit for his Christmas dinner. Lower and lower we passed, by ledge and cliff and gorge, till the dwarfed brush that fringed the midway terraces as we had looked down became trees, and the little round rabbit-burrows along the ledges were revealed as wide-mouthed caves in cliffs hundreds of feet high.

"Something more than half way down we came to the mine—a raw new hole in the face of the cliff, the little tent of its prospector owners standing on the clump of waste ore lately taken out. Beyond the mine the trail grew constantly dimmer, now a faint thread crossing great scarps of sandstone, now lost on a mountain-side of sliding shale that rolled and rattled away behind our feet, startling the birds and rabbits in the depths below.

"Planting our feet firmly, we slid down slanting cliffs coated deep with a beautiful moss in which small starry-white flowers were blooming, and dropped into hidden cañons where the grass was green as spring. The air grew warmer and scarcely stirred by the lightest wind. The pines and upland growth gave way; mesquite and catclaw and cactus sparsely covered the long, desert-like slopes, and through the air, so still before, a far, low, throbbing sound came up.

"Nearer and nearer, now loud, now almost lost, the great voice called. Around every cliff-turn it seemed to wait, yet hours brought it no nearer. We were seven miles from the Rim and more than a mile down in the heart of the earth when the rugged, cactus-strewn slopes broke away and up the seamed and scarred gray cliffs the River roared its challenge.

"We filled our canteens at the water's edge and the dusk was already beginning when I stole away to follow the long trail to the Rim—alone with the Cañon and the night. The others would make camp under the cliffs without me and I would be half way to the mine before I was missed from the party—too late for following.

"My heart beat fast—not with fear, though there was danger, but with pure joy of daring. This night was mine, and the voice of the River went with me, singing a great Valhalla chorus flung up the mighty walls to the dark, over-leaning forest above.

"Back along the boulder-choked ledges, up over the moss-hung cliffs; now stopping to trace the dim trail; now hurrying where it was plainest, for the better-marked way beyond the mine must be reached before dark. The loose shale slid away under my feet, but always I made the next step just as the path behind slipped down and was gone.

"At one narrow turn a boulder, dislodged from above, dropped at my feet, rebounded over the edge of the trail, and went crashing down the cliffs, sending up a line of sparks and fume of rock-smoke at it struck the projecting ledges. Long after the sparks were lost in darkness, the muffled thud, thud, came back, as it kept its way to the bottom.

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

"The last ray of light went out as I reached the little white tent, whose owners, having 'struck it rich,' were celebrating Christmas in the town, ninety miles away. There should have been a moon just past the full, but already heavy clouds were rolling over the Rim, filling the Cañon with mist and darkness, and the trees were shivering in the low, purring wind that goes before a snow-storm.

"There was no turning back. Even in the face of the storm, more danger lay below than on the clearer trail above. And there was no stopping—the gray pelt of a mountain lion, shot as he leaped through the door of the tent, was staked out just beside the entrance—surety of no refuge there. I was not seeking refuge; there might be all the night-hunters of the Cañon, lynx and lion and wild-cat, or some belated bear, abroad on the trail beyond; but for this night we were of one kin. The Irish peasants hold that all the animals of earth sing together at midnight of Christmas Eve; I would hear the hymn of my wild brethren and sing with them. The darkness settled down, impenetrable to any eyes not born and bred to the night. My feet kept the trail I could not see, and remembering the huge precipices around which we had wound our way in the morning, where one false step would mean death on the ledges a thousand feet below, I kept one hand always on the inner wall to guard against mischance.

"Sometimes I stopped and felt the way inch by inch, striking my hands on cactus and cat-claw till the fingers were torn and full of thorns, or letting my arm swing down over the edge of the trail into the black gulf beyond; but the winter and the storm had harried all the smaller skulking things to shelter. The civet cats, the ill-favored spotted skunks, the surly gray badgers, were all far back in the rock-clefts and only the big, fearless, storm-loving hunters were out to share or dispute the trail with me.

"The voice of the river, made resonant by the night and the mist, came up to me. A fox harked in the caves and the sound echoed back and forth, weirdly multiplied, as if the hymn of the beasts was already beginning. Now and again the soft tread of cushioned feet seemed to lead or follow, and pebbles rolled down at some light leap from ledge to ledge.

"As I reached the great spur, over which the trail skirted the promontory, the wind struck full, almost sweeping me over the edge and making the big rock hum and sing as if ready to fall. I crept into a crevice and held fast; the clouds were rolled up and flung back and the full moon of midnight flooded the Cañon. Wall by wall, peak by peak, gorge by gorge, the mighty panorama was unfolded.

"I crouched under the sheltering ledge, wrapped in awe and wonder. What other eyes had ever watched through Christmas Eve on such a scene! Far away children were sleeping, dreaming of expected toys; mothers were putting the last touches to the Christmas tree; homes were full of light and mirth. I, alone in the wilderness, kept watch with the wild things of earth in their own place.

"And the hymn was coming. Down a dim side-cañon a mountain lion called to his mate; the wind caught up the cry and sent it on, mingled with the harking of the fox and the croak of a raven blown from his tree top. Other sounds drew in, till, with my head bowed on the rock, I seemed to hear the great earth-hymn sweeping upward; the roar of the stormy forest, the voice of the River, the rush of the wind—and, upborne over all, the strange, uncouth, beast-cries blended for this one hour in mighty harmony.

"The wonder of it stayed after the wind was still and the Cañon dark and the snow falling in big noiseless flakes. The towering walls seemed to hold the rhythm of that unworded anthem and the far-off hurrying water repeated its melody. But the wild hunters, having kept their watch with the Night, went back to their lairs, and I was alone on the trail.

"As I went on, the wet flakes whirling against my face and the snow crunching under my feet recalled the first Christmas I could remember—a night not unlike this and in a land only a little less wild. Then I had crunched the snow under copper-toed boots and my head had brushed the flakes from the low bushes. The trees, interlaced and bending with snow, had made a roof over the little creek where we walked on the ice. Far at the end of this low white tunnel a light streamed out from the arched openings of the lime-pits full of burning logs. Here the soft gray limestone quarried from the hills above was being turned into plaster for the rough walls of frontier homes—and here I was to find a strange new thing called Christmas.

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

"Black figures ran in and out in front of the pits, poking the fires with long poles and sliding fresh logs into the yawning red mouth. Beside one fire they were cooking supper—boiling coffee in an iron pot and toasting strips of buffalo-meat on sharp sticks held over the coals.

"On a ledge above the pit-mouth was a red apple and a little china box with blue bands, and two hands clasped on the lid. That was my Christmas; and, curled in a buffalo-robe behind a pile of logs, I watched the leaping flames and marveled at my wealth. The apple was eaten, reluctantly, weeks after when it had begun to wither; but I have the box yet, and in every Christmas fire I see the red coals of the lime-pits and the dark figures of the men—and the snow and a little, wondering child.

"It was long past midnight when, with slow climbing, I came again to the Rim. At the top of the trail the camp lay white and still, the sheeted wagon covered with snow. I stood up on the tongue and felt for something in the dark—and then laughed; for the something was a knitted stocking of red yarn that a child had hung out of the front of a covered wagon years in the past.

"That wagon had stood in a clump of stunted pine trees on the summit of the Rocky Mountains. It had left the far-off plains months before, and doggedly followed the old Santa Fe trail, road of the dreamers and Argonauts, through plain and desert and foothills, till now, on the very summit of the Great Divide, in a wilderness of snow, it stood quiet—a camp-fire dying low in front and inside a child who dreamed of Santa Claus.

"He was good, the old Saint, who belongs to little Ishmaelites as well as to city dwellers. In the morning there was a thick green book in the red stocking—the songs a man had made as he followed the plough and turned the daisies under his share in a land half a world away. Songs that the child was to shout from the hill-tops of a yet wilder land, with only the herded cattle to hear.

"Christmas morning at the Grand Cañon was just an eddy in a great white whirlpool of snow. The air was dark with it, falling in big, noiseless flakes; the pines were wreathed and hidden in it, their long limbs dragged down with the weight. The supple young oaks and undergrowth were laid tent-like on the ground, every twig pinioned with masses of snow.

"In these low tents the plumed mountain quail huddled in warm, twittering coveys, too sleepy and comfortable to fly at the approach of footsteps muffled in the snow. The little rock-rabbits sat under the boughs and moved their long ears back and forth and opened their eyes wide in wonder at the changed world.

"When the camp was stillest the branches of a shaggy cedar parted cautiously and great eyes looked out at the tent and the sheeted wagon. A deer, a doe with the snow shining along her back and nostrils tense with curiosity ready to merge into fear, peered out, and behind her two well-grown spring fawns stood amazed at her boldness. An incautious movement sent her leaping away, flinging the snow from the low branches as she went.

"The snowflakes sputtered and spit as they fell on the big bank of coals where the Christmas dinner was presently cooking. A royal fireplace, such as Robin Hood might have had in Sherwood Forest, and a dinner to match. Little John never dressed finer venison, and Friar Tuck turned no spit for bird such as ours; for this kingly fellow, who dangled twisting and turning on his length of wire from a convenient limb, was a wild turkey—the New World's gift to the Christmas tables of the Old.

"The huge bank of sweet cedar-coals over which he hung was kept in bound by a dead patriarch who would have been none ashamed in Sherwood; and in the lee of this friendly back-log a haunch of venison roasted in a big Dutch oven, ringed round with plump quail, each one stuffed full, as was the royal bird himself, with delicate piñon nuts.

"We had gathered them a few days before, beating the little nuts out of the brown cones, to the cheating of our wild comrades—the ravens and the big, scolding, crested blue-jays—and scattered over the white fat of the haunch was a toss of wild marjoram, another gift of the forest to our feast.

"Robin Hood never tasted such delight, even in raiding the good abbott's luncheon panniers, as the potatoes baked in hot cedar ashes till their brown hides were ready to burst; and friar Tuck knew no such delectable stuffing for pious ribs as yellow yams cooked in a frying pan under the dripping breast of a piñon-filled wild turkey.

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

"Dinner was done to a turn when our belated river party tramped in with good will to do it justice. It began with a soup of plump young rock-rabbits stewed to jelly, with toasted piñon-nuts dropped in at the last moment. And it ended, not with wine and black coffee, but with fragrant, amber-green tea brewed from a shrub whose clumps hung over the brink of the Cañon. A sovereign drink the herb-wise pioneers held this tea, and rarely good we found it, though it was known only by an Indian name.

"It was lucky for our own hungry party that the turkey was reduced to a heap of bones and the haunch shorn of its juiciest morsels when the pad of unshod hoofs on the snow warned us that we were not to be without Christmas guests—unbidden but willing feasters. The first breath of a camp fire that taints the wind takes an unworded invitation to every brown son of the wilderness within a day's ride; and soon a circle of winter-pinched, cat-hammed ponies stood around the camp, humped up in comfortless knots with their heads drooping toward the fire around which their owners squatted cheerfully and made quick end of our Christmas dinner.

"After they had done, to scraping the last pot and wiping the last dish, we heaped the fire with dry cedar-logs and pelted it with pine cones that sent up long, popping trails of sparks, while our guests cleared away a circle of snow, spread a bid [sic] red-and-black Navajo blanket on the ground, and gambled with cards made of buckskin, on which the figures were rudely drawn and colored.

"At midnight, when belts and buckles of hammered silver and buttons of silver coin, and even blankets and shirts, had changed owners many times over, they put away the cards, and, rolled in the gay blankets, slept around the fire, while the ponies waited with heads drooping lower and lower. Perhaps in their dreams they thanked the 'white man's big medicine day' for a good feed, or reckoned the chances for breakfast.

"For me the Christmas night went out with another watch alone on the brink of the Cañon. A white, silent hour when the air seemed full of whispering voices; not the wild hymn of the beasts, but that greater call of the Unknown that has haunted the hearts of men in City and Wilderness alike since that mighty gorge below was no more than a hand-breadth trail through the forest."

692 1907 A Christmas at the Grand Canyon. Santa Fe Employee's Magazine, 2(1) (December): frontispiece, 15-23.

Reprinted from the January 1907 Out West.

Havice, Marcus Hill

693 1907 The Grand Canyon of the Colorado. [No imprint], [32] pp. (Privately published, Sun Printing and Binding Co.)

Verse and photography.

Hendrix, E. R.

694 1907 In "God's reservation". Christian Advocate (Methodist Episcopal Church, South, Nashville, Tennessee), 68(33)(3480): 1030-1031 (also paginated concurrently for issue, 6-7).

Author was a Methodist bishop. Begins with remarks on the Petrified Forest, but is principally about Grand Canyon.

"One feels that he has been admitted into God's great studio, where after laying the foundations of the earth, God was giving beauty to column and architrave."

But, concluding with one of the canyon's greater ironies with the hindsight now of more than a century, "One notable thing about this abyss is that no one has ever been tempted to commit suicide here. It is too awful to contemplate—springing into a bottomless abyss! The inclination is to prayer rather, here in the home of the Infinite God."

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

Jauker, Otto

- 695 1907 Durch die Prärien Nordamerikas zum Grand Cañon. Geographischer Anzeiger (Gotha), 8 (October): 228-229. [In German.]
(transl. 'Through the prairies of North America to the Grand Canyon')

Reprint of Jauker (1906).

Maldonado C., Roberto

- 696 1907 Comisión científica en Europa y Estados Unidos de N. A. Valparaíso, Chile: Talleres Tipográficos de la Armada, 231 pp. ("Publicado en la Revista de Marina por orden de la Dirección General de la Armada.") [In Spanish.]
(transl. 'Scientific commission in Europe and the United States of North America')

Includes a report of the 8th International Geographical Congress, held in the United States in 1904, which conducted a field excursion to Mexico with a side trip to the Grand Canyon. Few records are had of this trip as written by international correspondents—in fact, few records by any members of the congress other than to simply state they went to the Grand Canyon en route to Mexico—so the entire entry on the visit to Grand Canyon (pp. 78-79) is reproduced here. (Compare also the remarks by the Czech, Stanislav Hanzlik, 1905, the German, Heinrich Fischer, 1904, the Brazilian, Olyntho dos Santos Pires, 1915, and the very much lengthier remarks by the German, Richard Marek, 1906. See also the brief remarks by a wife of one of the attendees of the congress, the Brazilian, Maria Clara da Cunha Santos, 1908.)

"En la misma tarde seguimos viaje al occidente, para alcanzar el Estado de Arizona y visitar así el gran Cañón del Colorado, que se considera como una de las maravillas de la arquitectura geológica.

"En la mañana del 26 de septiembre llegamos á la estación de Williams, que nos dejaba próximos al gran Cañón del Colorado y á una altura de 2.000 metros sobre el nivel del mar.

"Una ligera excursión á pie, nos permitió alcanzar y estudiar esta gran maravilla de la naturaleza, que rivaliza en poder y hermosura con Yellow Stone Cannon [sic].

"El río Colorado, que tiene un curso de más de 300 millas de longitud, corre por un majestuoso valle denominado Gran Cañón del Colorado: tiene sus flancos casi verticales, elevándose á mil metros, desde el lecho del río, por lo cual parece confundirse desde ahí con el azul del cielo.

"El conjunto de estos flancos atrevidos, que semejan esculturas colosales, y cuyos colores cambian con la posición del sol y á cada vuelta del río, es, sin duda alguna, de una grandeza y poder sin rivales en el mundo entero.

"Se comprende, dice el sabio geógrafo francés M. Reclus, aquella maravilla, como el recuerdo de una admiración mezclada de espanto, sobre todo por los que tienen la fortuna de navegar en el río, como perdidos en el fondo de un abismo y sobre un lecho de aguas impetuosas, que á cada paso producen corrientes violentas y peligrosísimas.

"En el día hicimos varias excursiones por las partes más accesibles del Cañón, á fin de admirar aquellos barrancos gigantescos, que imitaban castillos y millares de figuras fantásticas, que nos hacían recordar las leyendas de las Mil y una noches.

"Determinamos la altura del lugar en que nos encontrá bamos, resultando 2.250 metros sobre el nivel del mar; asimismo, el ancho del Cañón, de 6- á 7 millas y con 1.500 metros de profundidad.

"En la mañana del 27 hicimos un descenso por aquellas grandiosas murallas de granito, á fin de admirar de cerca el río Colorado. La excursión fué un tanto penosa; pero se realizó sin novedad." (ENTIRE NOTE)

(translation)

'In the same afternoon we continue our trip to the west, to reach the State of Arizona and thus visit the Grand Canyon of Colorado, which is considered one of the wonders of geological architecture.

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

'On the morning of September 26, we arrived at the Williams station, which left us close to the Grand Canyon of the Colorado and at a height of 2,000 meters above sea level.

'A slight excursion on foot enabled us to reach and study this great wonder of nature, which rivals the Yellow Stone Canyon in power and beauty.

'The Colorado River, which has a course of more than 300 miles in length, runs through a majestic valley called the Grand Canyon of the Colorado: its flanks are almost vertical, rising a thousand meters from the riverbed, for which it seems to become confused from there with the blue of the sky.

'The ensemble of these daring flanks, which resemble colossal sculptures, and whose colors change with the position of the sun and with each turn of the river, is, without a doubt, of a greatness and power without rivals in the entire world.

'It is understandable, says the sage French geographer Monsieur Reclus, that wonder is like the memory of an admiration mixed with horror, especially for those who have the fortune to navigate the river, as if lost at the bottom of an abyss and on a bed of impetuous waters, which at every step produce violent and most dangerous currents.

'During the day we made several excursions through the most accessible parts of the canyon, in order to admire those gigantic ravines, which imitated castles and thousands of fantastic figures, which reminded us of the legends of the Thousand and One Nights.

'We determined the altitude of the place where we were as 2,250 meters above sea level; likewise, the width of the Canyon, from 6 to 7 miles and 1,500 meters deep.

'On the morning of the 27th we made a descent down those grandiose granite walls, in order to admire the Colorado River up close. The excursion was somewhat painful; but it was done without incident.'

Mayor des Planches, E. [Mayor des Planches, Edmondo]

- 697 1907 Attraverso il continente Nord-Americano. Nuova Antologia di Lettere, Scienze ed Arti (Roma), Series 5, 131 (September/October) (215): 353-375. [In Italian.]
(transl. 'Across the North American continent')

Part of a series regarding the author's trip by rail across America. See p. 362, in a diary entry dated July 8, Grand Canyon bypassed, dismissively: "Sono in forse se fermarmi e deviare a Nord per visitare il Gran Canon del Colorado, una delle meraviglie del continente nord-americano. Ho impegni. Il tempo stringe. Proseguo." (ENTIRE NOTE) (transl. 'I am in doubt whether to stop and turn north to visit the Grand Canyon of the Colorado, one of the wonders of the North American continent. I have commitments. Time is running out. I continue.')

Oppenheim, James

- 698 1907 In the Grand Canyon of the Colorado. The New York Times, (December 22): New York Times Magazine, p. 3.

Holy uplifting joy: light through tremendous spaces:

Sun, a fire in the heights: the clean pines piercing the sky:

Far-flung before me, beneath me, the Cañon's six-thousand-foot faces

Sloping by infinite falls to the pit where the crushed stones lie—

Welter and tumble of granite, a sea caved in to Earth's centre,

Amphitheatre stupendous, and I at the brow, gazing in,

I, round-wound by the gales that blow from the heavens and enter

The Cañon, smiting the Deeps and rolling through chasms a din.

Lo, as I gaze, all eyes, all heart, in that chaos of color,

Shadow and sun and tint, I am drowned as in infinite seas—

I am even as a star that sweeps, where the heavens grow vaster and fuller,

With the millions of suns, flame-tost through the empty Eternities.

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

And I dream that beneath—far—far—world-dropped and swallowed in Vastness,
Lost in the pit of the Cañon, a pebble lies, swarming with billions
Of infinitesimal creatures! O pebble, fall'n in the fastness,
O'er-run by the strange Man-millions lost in the strange Star-millions!

Yet they gaze up from the pebble: knowing they are themselves:
Seeing a Cañon about them: glimpsing a sun above:
Searching far up the rocks for the Law that rivets the shelves:
Oh, Law that tortures and slays them—naming it God and Love!

Yoking the Law, dream-found: creating as gods create:
Toiling in quicksands of Pain, though they know that the hand of Death
Wipes them away forever—returning the unseen hate
With love, with service of hands, with blood and spirit and breath!

Oh, if the Law is hate, these creatures are greater than Law,
They, on the pebble hard-pressed, facing the Cañon's spaces,
Standing up rolling their hymns, their strong deeds fired with awe.
Breasting the sweep of the rocks with the faith in their upturned faces!

Shall they be wiped away? Is the pebble alone concerned
With their magnificent Fight? No, all the skies and their suns,
Hot with their chemic fires, are ten times trebly burned
In the fire of the Souls of men, the Earth's god-glorious ones!

Surely those beings shall sweep at the Death from their little Earth,
Rock by rock up the Cañon: yea, till at last let free
Here in the sky and the sun and the pines in their windy mirth,
They shall stand as Lords and Gods of the roll'd Eternity!

Yea, and if this be so, every pang, every pain they feel
Is swinging them toward the eternal, is a blessing more than a ban:
Is a fire of God that molds, is a trumpet of God whose peal
Cries them on up to the heights: I thank God I am a man!

Reichel, Willy

- 699 1907 A travers le monde : investigations dans le domaine de l'occultisme. Paris: Frédéric Gittler, 111 [113] pp. [In French.]
(transl. 'Around the World: Investigations in the Field of Occultism')

Translation of Reichel (1906). Grand Canyon, see pp. 41-42:

"En traversant l'Arizona, je fis de Williams une petite excursion au «Grand Canyon». Cet immense abîme a, dans sa partie accessible, une longueur de 217 milles avec une profondeur verticale d'environ 6.000 pieds et une largeur de 13 milles au point d'où les visiteurs le contemplant le plus souvent. L'auteur d' «Etidorpha»(1) aurait dû placer là la porte des enfers." (ENTIRE NOTE)

"(1)«Etidorpha» oder das Ende der Erde, von John Uri Lloyd (Leipzig, Wilh. Friedrich.)" [cited in German]

(transl. 'While traveling through Arizona, I took a short trip to the "Grand Canyon" from Williams. This immense chasm has, in its accessible part, a length of 217 miles with a vertical depth of about 6,000 feet and a breadth of 13 miles at the point from which visitors most often contemplate it. The author of "Etidorpha"(1) [Etidorpha in English] should have placed the gate of hell there.')

Compare published English translation of the book (Reichel, 1908).

Seton, Grace Gallatin

- 700 1907 Nimrod's wife. (Pictures by Walter King Stone and Ernest Thompson Seton.) New York: Doubleday, Page and Co., 406 pp. [Also printed by Archibald, Constable and Co. (London, 1907).]

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

Also a facsimile reprinting with foreword by Mary Zeiss Stange, Stackpole Books (Mechanicsburg, Pennsylvania, 2004).]

"Nimrod" is the author's husband, the naturalist Ernest Thompson Seton (born Ernest Evan Seton Thompson). See Chapter 3, "The Grand Cañon and What It Did To Nimrod", pp. 55-80. This is an engaging narration of a visit to the canyon at Hance's, which was probably when they were returning East from California in 1899. The preamble, dealing with the arrival of the author and her husband in a late-spring Flagstaff, sets the stage:

"I suppose we really walked in the trail of good luck when we visited the Grand Cañon, for we saw in its most curious phase, that mightiest gash of a mighty river in its immensity and beauty, suddenly roll wonder on wonder before us, as though the whole world were striving then and there to empty its coffers in one glorious offering at the feet of God! but we knew not what was reserved for us and when we passed from the warm Pullman sleeping car on to the platform of Flagstaff we shivered and repined.

"Although it was nearly June, Nature in her vagaries had flung a snow storm around San Francisco peak and we in summer clothes with only hand baggage thought regretfully of the trunks and warm clothing that were speeding onward to Pine Cone Lodge [their eventual destination in Idaho].

"Between eye-shutting and eye-opening to be plunged from warmth, light, flowers, all out-doors in joyous mood, to the sleet and snow and the wind that was almost a blizzard, and cold against which our covering seemed no protection, required a plentiful application of traveller's philosophy. The street in front of us was running rivers of slush. • • •

"We had given ourselves very little time to visit the Cañon and when we were informed that the stage would not run to the Cañon that day, the prospect of spending a third of the precious time in the Palace Hotel at Flagstaff met with scant favour. • • • [When the author goes in search of more suitable clothing at a dry goods store, Nimrod says] 'I will skirmish for a private conveyance. Can you be ready in an hour if my gold proves convincing?' • • •

"An hour later we dashed out of town behind four half-broken mustangs whose principal endeavour seemed to be to stay off the ground as much as possible. The two-seated mountain carry-all swung from side to side, sending the mud in showers around it and upon the tarpaulin curtains that partially protected us. We were on the back seat and I wondered if we really could stay right side up."

But the lengthy preamble is omitted here because the fetching typography and illustrations are as much a part of the experience as is the story, told as if the reader were with Nimrod and wife. (The reader is encouraged to find a copy of this book to appreciate the whole account as it was meant to be enjoyed.) The preamble, of more pages than the duo's stay at the canyon, deals with the hotel in Flagstaff and the wild, wintry relay ride to the canyon—"From side to side the carry-all swung, bump—thump—jerk—. We clung to each other and to the carriage. First on one wheel then on another it tottered, but the driver was clever. He made no attempt to keep the road."—and we pick up our travelers as they—finally—approach the canyon, with their entire encounter transcribed here:

"'I hope they have something substantial. No communication for three days and a party of ten snow bound there is not encouraging,' said Nimrod, beating his hands together to restore circulation.

"Another hour past. 'See, isn't that a light,' at last!

"'At least there will be hot coffee,' he added, apprehensively. Seventy miles of cold and storm with only a sandwich lunch having made us solicitous of creature comforts. The sounds of the wagon had brought some one to the door and a cheering bar of light streamed into the darkness. There was hot coffee and other things and with anticipation of the morrow, we stole up the rough uncarpeted stairs to a cold, bare little room, undressed shivering, and as quickly as possible sought oblivion on a bumpy mattress under calico patch-work quilts—maximum of weight and minimum of warmth. I love creature comforts, the tub bath, the warm dressing room, the nightly hair brushing, the soft light covering and easeful bed—and when foregone, it is a deliberate renunciation for some recognised good. After all, those things do not touch the soul, and life in the mountains does. Under its spell the unimportant details of a routine life in the East shrink to their proper size and one expands as the purple lupin unfolds its sensitive leaves to the sun, and shuts them again in the dark.

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

"In the morning I opened eyes on the figure of Nimrod perched on a chair peering through a small window in the roof.

"`Well?'

"`Can't see a thing. A thick grey fog—might as well be on board ship. What luck!'

"About eleven there were signs of the fog lifting and we, eager with anticipation, put on rubber coats and goloshes. We were cautioned not to go more than a hundred feet from the door, as the Cañon began abruptly. Hand in hand we advanced through the mist until suddenly we stopped and drew back breathless. The peculiar difference in the blankness before us showed that in a moment we would have stepped off into space to fall—how far we could not tell, but even then, as we stood straining our eyes, appeared in ghostly forms the tops of trees. The place was full of mystery, as we stood on the edge of the unknown that peculiar stillness of a fog heavy about us, while spread before, if we could but penetrate the veil, lay unimagined wonders of Nature's treasure house. Then the thick whiteness around us began moving right to left and upward. The whole closed curtain rose wave after wave, mile after mile, and revealed an expanse of colour and form shining in the sunlight stretching on—on—to the end of the world, so appallingly beautiful that I felt my brain reel. Turning away from the terrifying grandeur of it, I sank to the ground. The suddenness of the revelation had left no time for preparation, and I gazed at the commonplace grass blades to restore my balance.

"In a moment, half ashamed of so much emotion, I looked up to see Nimrod disappearing into the stable. He was gone so long that I began to feel worried; then he came back looking triumphant and a little sheepish. Without a word he thrust an envelope into my hand with something written on it. Mushrooms grow best in dark detritus, the edelweiss scorns all but the most rugged spot in which to flower, Nimrod in a pigstye had produced this:

'A thousand miles—the continent upheaving
Thro storms of sand, of rain, of driving snow,
And then a sudden pause upon an awful hidden brink
Where all upheaval seemed to fail, an inch before your very feet.
The reason lost, the universe forgot, in mists unknown, immeasurable.

And then a change:
This way and that the Powers uproll the veil;
An inch beyond your very foot a great abyss.
Down! down! down! the mists are rolled away,
Thousands upon thousands of headlong dizzy feet.
Down! down! down! with piney forests on their nearest side,
More small than moss,
Down! down! down! to blue eternity.
And up! up! up! the swirling mists are rolled,
Till peaks prismatic gleam and rise
In sheen of purple, opal, red and gold.
Up! up! in ranks until they seem to comb the flying scud
That swims upon the heaven of heavens;
And shadowy peaks still higher yet appear,
And up and up and upward still, till lost in blue eternity.
And still the mist is rolled away,
And in the light of revelation there,
Far down—unspeakably far,
A long thin winding shining line—gray green,
The river—ancient as the earth—
Whose aqua-fortis flood, God's graver was,
With which this gorge was cut.
Profounder than the gulfs between the stars it seemed,
And awful as the day of Judgment come.

One moment there the sun refulgent shone;
Then warning, "Thou hast seen enough

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

For all thy days remaining."
Far down the mist of mists is rolled again
A film, a veil, a curtain-like futurity,
The last, the nearest of the peak is hid,
And just an inch beyond your very foot
An awful brink abysmal.'

"Just think what it did to him—a calliper scientist.

"In a place homely—most homely—and time-tried he had sought mental equilibrium. He had to run away from the tremendous vision to unload his mind of the burden, ere it was crushed!

"In the sublime there is no laughter; so more sanely now we surveyed the scene. All the colours of the rainbow blazed mile after mile away like some titanic jewel casket, with the gem of all, the boiling, seething flood of the Colorado flashing like a tiny streak of lightning, down crag after crag, valley after valley, below.

"So this was the Cañon that painters had dared to portray, that writers had dared to describe. I was drunk with the gorgeous beauty and immensity of it, even glad to turn away and be busied with the details of a horseback ride along the brink. We reluctantly decided to give up the trip down the Cañon, as Hank's [sic] Trail was out of repair and dangerous owing to the storm. The guides were unwilling to take us that day, and we could not wait.

"As I was getting into the saddle, having obtained a battered riding skirt, a nomadic 'outfit' of Indians came up to the hotel. There were about twenty horses, five men and several women, children and dogs. They were not allowed to stop, but passed at a snail's pace, while two of the men bartered badger skins for tobacco and sugar, and a squaw displayed some baskets and beadwork of Apache designs.

"'It is good to be here before the railroad and the funicular to the bottom and the modern hotel and all the tiresome civilisation that is sure to come, and before the Indians give us Greek beadwork.'

"'The savages out-savaged,' Nimrod replied, mounting his animal, and gibed no more, for the Buckskin playfully rolled his eyes and bucked and bucked and bucked."

Southwick, C. E.

- 701 1907 The Albert Lea, (Minn.) Assembly. In: The Chautauquas [SECTION]. The Lyceumite and Talent (Chicago), (The Lyceumite, 6(1)) (Talent, 18(5)) (November): 68.

"'The Grand Canon' was presented by Nat Brigham, and proved that our audiences are interested in America illustrated lectures as well as foreign." (ENTIRE NOTE)

Taylor, Edward Robeson

- 702 1907 Selected poems. San Francisco: A. M. Robertson, 159 [161] pp. ("This book was printed by the Stanley-Taylor Company at San Francisco in the month of March and year nineteen hundred and seven. Six hundred and fifteen copies were printed of which sixty-five are on Alton Mills hand-made paper and contain a signed photograph of the author. Only fifty of these are for sale." (p. [161]).)

See "Under a Pine at the Grand Canyon", p. 52; "To the Grand Canyon", p. 53. Both reprint verses by Taylor in 1904.

Tobey, Olive A. R.

- 703 1907 [Letter to the editor.] From: Irrigation Fortunes and Aborigines. In: Editorials by Elizabeth [Towne]. The Nautilus (Holyoke, Massachusetts), 9(5) (March): 34-36.

A letter in response to a previous article in this serial, on irrigation by "Professor [Edgar L.] Larkin". The letter concludes with unrelated remarks (p. 36):

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

"You must ask Professor Larkin for a description of the Grand Canyon of Arizona. That is a cut in the face of the level mesa that takes one's breath away, it is the most glorious thing on earth. You put Niagara into it and it would only make a shining patch of misty water against one little bit of one of those awful, wonderful walls.

• • •

"But, dear heart, the Canyon is the closest thing to the overpowering that exists.

"I was talking with a gentleman who was with the English when they entered Lhasa. He says nothing in the Himalayas can compare with this gorge, this Arizona Canyon, and it is true, I fancy, for when this man first looked down into this wonderful gorge he gasped with sheer pleasure."

1908

Anonymous

704 1908 Father Rosa's lecture. The Niagara Index (Niagara University), 40(10) (March 1): 152.

"THE GRAND CANON OF THE COLORADO was the subject of an interesting lecture given in the Auditorium by Rev. M J. Rosa, C. M., of the Faculty. Fifty beautiful stereopticon slides made from negatives exposed in a telescopic camera and projected upon the big screen by means of two powerful calcium lights, illustrated the speaker's vivid description of that grand work of nature and wonderful geologic formation." Text summarizes appearances of rim views and a trip down Bright Angel Trail.

705 1908 The Bible, or about the Bible? In: Editorial [SECTION] (Stephen J. Herben, Editor; Dan B. Brummitt, Assistant Editor). The Epworth Herald (Chicago and New York), 19(16) (September 12): 400.

"Men do not read descriptions of the Grand Canyon as they stand on its brink . . . ."

706 1908 The Baltimore Life Underwriters' Association. In: The Companies [SECTION]. Baltimore Underwriter (Baltimore, Maryland), 80(12) (December 21): 184-185.

Principally regarding the association's participation in the 19th annual convention of the National Association of Life Underwriters in Los Angeles. Includes remarks on trip to Grand Canyon:

"At Williams, Ariz., the special train bearing by this time all delegates and guests east of this point, was greeted by a delegation from Los Angeles and San Francisco and deluged with oranges and flowers from sunny California. Running up to the Grand Canyon of the Colorado, two days were spent 'mid the scenes and enjoyments of this indescribably beautiful and marvelous work of nature, this wonder of wonders, a mighty chasm more than a mile in depth, thirteen miles across from rim to rim and two hundred and seventeen miles long. The service and hospitality of El Tovar was most perfect, and Mr. Brandt [sic, Charles A. Brant], the genial host, will long be remembered for his unflinching courtesies and delightful entertainment extended the entire party during these two memorable days." (ENTIRE NOTE)

The Abraham Lincoln Centre and All Souls Church

707 1908 The Abraham Lincoln Centre and All Souls Church Annual : containing a summary of the work for twenty-five years, 1882-1907. Chicago: The Abraham Lincoln Center, 105 pp.

For All Souls Church, see "Sermons for 1907", which list includes "Sermon of the Grand Canyon of the Colorado" (title only).

Atwood, Julius W.

708 1908 Report of the Archdeacon. In: Journal of the Sixteenth Annual Convention of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the Missionary District of Arizona held in Trinity Church, Phoenix, Arizona,

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

Wednesday and Thursday, April 29 and 30, 1908. Phoenix: Press of the Southwestern Stockman, pp. 38-39.

The archdeacon probably sees Grand Canyon's tourists only as a pitiful reserve of ecclesiastical aloofness; perhaps missing the canyon's position of overarching spiritual inspiration.

"I have cast longing eyes towards the north, but have found little encouragement at the Grand Canyon where I had hoped it might be possible to hold an occasional service and to interest the tourists who visit the Grand Canyon in the missionary work of Arizona." (ENTIRE NOTE)

Bates, E. Catherine [Bates, Emily Katharine]

709 1908 Do the dead depart? And other questions. London: T. Werner Laurie, 284 pp. [Also published by Dodge Publishing Co. (New York, 1908).]

As expected from the title, this book is spiritual in nature. See Chapter 3, "A Mother's Guardianship in America", which includes this English woman's lengthy description of a visit to Grand Canyon at Peach Springs in 1886. However, a good part of the story is omitted here because it is not pertinent to the canyon; it involves her runaway imagination that she and her friend would be murdered by their guide, Billy. Compare her far more informative recollections of this visit that she published some 21 years earlier (Bates, 1887.)

"Very much against the advice of our American friends, Miss Greenlow and I had arranged to visit the Grand Cañon of the Colorado—in Arizona, and not in the Rocky Mountains, as some people suppose.

"In those days it was a much more difficult expedition than, I am told, it is at present. There was absolutely no accommodation up there except a small wooden shanty only used when some stray photographer or naturalist found his way to this then remote district and was driven up to it for a night's lodging, taking his provisions with him. We turned a deaf ear to our prudent counselors, telling them that we should never have seen anything in America had we listened to every one's advice in our travels! In this special case the advice was more than justified, but we could not know this beforehand, and we were extremely anxious to see the beauties of which we had heard such extravagant (but not really exaggerated) accounts.

"We reached Peach Springs (where the railway was to be left) safely, and after a few hours' rest in a miserable wayside inn, our host told us that all arrangements had been made for our comfort and convenience and that at eleven o'clock a buckboard (a very primitive vehicle without springs) would be ready to carry us and the provisions ordered for us, some thirty-five miles up the cañon to the wooden shanty aforesaid. We found that we were to be consigned to the care of a good-looking but rather taciturn young man of twenty-six or twenty-seven, who was later on to combine the offices of cook, housemaid and guide, companion and friend in one. For our host after driving us up to the shanty and giving us in charge to 'Billy,' calmly announced that he proposed to take the buckboard back again, leaving us entirely dependent upon our feet for locomotion.

"This was rather a shock as we had been led to suppose that he would 'boss the expedition' himself and that Billy was only taken up as his lieutenant. However we had already committed ourselves to a three days' stay, Friday being the day of our arrival, and the man assured us that he had arranged the provisions accordingly and that Billy was an absolutely dependable and estimable person.

"Poor Billy! He certainly did well by us, but it was a little discouraging to hear from himself (as soon as the Peach Spring impostor had disappeared) that he had been picked up from a gambling saloon two or three weeks previously and that this was his only claim to respectability!

"Moreover he was quite frank in telling us that his dearest friend had been Billy the Kid, a notorious character . . . ." Which leads in to the Diamond Peak climb on Sunday. Miss Greenlow had sprained an ankle, so it was Billy and our author who "started at 6 A. M. to climb a mountain in front of the shanty, which had been tempting me since my arrival. It was only some 3,000 feet above us, but the view was said to be most extensive and magnificent, which proved to be quite true. We had spent the intermediate day strolling up and down the cañon and gathering exquisite flowers from the sides of the narrow creek or brook which ran through it. We had to climb a good many rocks during our investigations, and Miss Greenlow had unfortunately sprained her ankle

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

over one of these and was quite unequal to the Sunday expedition which we had planned, but said she should really enjoy a few hours alone. So I had no scruples in taking her at her word.

"After a hasty cup of tea, Billy and I set out together and a pretty stiff climb brought us at length to the plateau of the mountain just below the real top."

Here begins the author's runaway imagination, when Billy produces a revolver and begins to work on it. She imagines "the Kid" will rob them, and worse. It is a sure digression from the Grand Canyon, for several pages; and in fact there is no further mention of the climb.

After the Diamond Peak sojourn, ". . . we found on that very Sunday morning that our Sunday dinner must consist of beans, as there was no meat left! It then turned out that our host had only brought up enough meat for one whole day, although we had told him we wished to stay until Monday!

"Billy was a real gentleman at heart and suffered vicariously for the sins of his employer, although it was obviously not his fault. He had known nothing about the commissariat's deficiencies, it appeared, until after the man drove away. Moreover, Billy also was put upon short commons. We had a little tea left for the afternoon and our supper again consisted of a handful of beans and some dry bread, the butter being also exhausted. Billy went all over the cañon in the afternoon, in a vain attempt to shoot something for our next meal. He had absolutely no success. Monday morning came and we stayed in bed as late as possible, feeling rather hungry by this time. Breakfast was a fresh shock to us, for even the dry bread was failing us now! Billy, with an assumption of sulky bravado which was intended to hide his very real mortification, put down a piece of very dry bread, certainly not so large as the palm of my hand and said, 'There! you two ladies had better settle with a six-shooter, which of you is to eat that—there isn't enough for both!' Things were really looking rather desperate; all the more so because we had naturally lost all confidence in the man at Peach Springs and yet were completely at his mercy. Obviously we could not walk thirty-five miles back; nor could I, in any case, have left my companion with a sprained ankle. We knew by this time how much faith to put in the man's promises and had therefore no reason to suppose he would come for us on Monday, if it should suit him better to come the following day or even on Wednesday. We could only feel really certain that he would act in the matter entirely as best suited his convenience and would have no more scruple in starving us for an extra day or two than he had shown in leaving one day's provisions for a three days' stay.

"It was really a case of 'not knowing where your next meal would come from,' and as such was perhaps an experience worth having. There was literally not a crumb of bread left in the shanty and there was obviously no need for laying the cloth for dinner. The hours dragged wearily on and we felt more and more weak and helpless and depressed."

Here, then, is a brief connection with the titles of the book and of this chapter—the author communes with her deceased mother of their troubles. "'Be patient,' came the answer; 'your trouble is almost ended now. He is coming up the valley. He will be here within half an hour.'

"It was just 5:30 P. M. when he appeared, bringing a piece of tough meat and some hard biscuits and a bottle of Californian port with him. He did not show the smallest sorrow for the discomfort entailed upon us by his niggardly carelessness, but calmly observed, 'You may think yourselves lucky that I came at all today; fact is I meant to wait till tomorrow, to drive a gentleman up here, but at the last moment he made up his mind to give it up; so thought I might as well come to-day.'

"We were so eager to get out of his clutches as quickly as possible that we would not even wait to have the very tough bit of meat cooked; we drank the port and ate the biscuits and insisted upon being driven back at once to more civilized quarters, whilst Billy remained behind for the night to put things straight, and kept the meat for his share of the entertainment. We gave him a royal tip for his services and parted with mutual regret I think. I have often wondered what became of Billy. It was soon a question of what would become of us! We sat up all night at Peach Springs for fear of losing our 4 A. M. train and we had not been an hour in our 'sleepers' when a terrific jolt sent us flying to the bottom of our berths . . . ."

Train wreck! And her adventures continued.

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

Benignus, Wilhelm

- 710 1908 Stimmen der Wasser. Amerikanische Landschaftsbilder, Skizzen in Prosa und Gedichte. [No imprint] ("Satz und Druck der Redaktion des „Teckboten“, Kirchheim-Teck, Württemberg, Deutschland" [title-page verso]), 121 pp. [In German.]
(transl. 'Voices of the waters. American landscape paintings, prose sketches and poems.')

See "VII. Der Kolorado und der Grand Cañon von Arizona" (pp. 81-86), which contains the poems "Der Kampf mit dem Kolorado" (pp. 81-83) and "Der Grand Cañon des Kolorados" (pp. 84-85); with notes, p. 86. Accompanied by four photographic illustrations: "Der Grand Cañon des Kolorado Flusses" (p. 74, fold-out), "Eine Strecke ruhigen Wassers des Kolorado Flusses" (p. 76; credit, "Photo, W. W. Bass. A. T. & S. T. Ry." [sic]), "Die Brautschleier-Fälle, (Bridal Veil Falls,) des Cataract Cañons" (p. 78; credit, "„Grand Canyon of Arizona“, Book. A. T. & S. T. Ry." [sic]), "Tropfsteinhöhlen, Grand View Trail" (p. 80; credit, "Photo, Putnam & Valentine. A. T. & S. T. Ry." [sic]).

Bryan, William Jennings

- 711 1908 The wonders of the West. Santa Fe Employes' Magazine, 2(8) (July): 564-567.
Reprinted from Bryan (1904). Accompanied by frontispiece (p. 564), a 1904 Kolb Brothers photo of a lone Bryan astride a mule at the top of Bright Angel Trail.

Carr, Clark E.

- 712 1908 My day and generation. Chicago: A. C. McClurg and Co., 452 pp.
Compares Yosemite and Grand Canyon, pp. 91-94.

Chapple, Joe Mitchell

- 713 1908 The happy habit. Boston: Chapple Publishing Co., Ltd., 463 pp.
There are two states to this 1908 title and imprint, differing in content and pagination (see also below). See "In the Grand Canyon", pp. 402-411. The usual loss of Niagara in the canyon depths and invocations of Norse gods.
"We threw a rock off and the suction drew it in quickly, showing that power of gravitation and drawing which is now noticeable between the skyscrapers of New York. • • •
"Of course we had to visit the bottom of this wonderful abyss—wanted to get to the bottom of things, you know. There was some hesitation, but I ventured on the back of 'Midnight,' a mule of skittish disposition. • • •
"About half-way down I looked around me and saw a cheering sight for a traveler upon the mountain-side—the body of a dead mule."
Some of this text repeats that of Chapple (1906, in The National Magazine).

- 714 1908 The happy habit. Boston: Chapple Publishing Co., Ltd., 348, vii pp.
There are two states to this 1908 title and imprint, differing in content and pagination (see also above). See "In the Grand Canyon Depths", pp. 330-337.

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

Crawford, Jack [Crawford, John Wallace]

- 715 1908 The broncho book : being buck-jumps in verse by Captain Jack Crawford : roped for relief of the author, the divertisement of tenderfeet, and the joy of all those who love God's Great Out-of-Doors. East Aurora, New York: The Roycrofters, 143 [144] pp.

See "God's Anteroom", pp. 18-20.

O canyon, grand and wild and free!
You've got a lariat on me.
My soul is bronch-busted, too,
My hat is off. I bow to you,
Almighty Hand, who cut this brand
That broncho souls can understand.

I gaze in awe and silence here;
I want to laugh, I find a tear
That irrigates the soul I feel.
O Mother Nature, I would kneel
And clasp and kiss thy mighty hand
And worship in this temple grand.

What's that you say, you silly dude?
Such sentiments are weak and crude?
God! Yes, to brainless things like you,
Whose soul no greatness could imbue,
To see, or feel, or understand
God's mighty hand.

You go to Europe, do you not?
Because you worship God, I wot—
Yes, fashion's god, a foolish dame,
And yet you love her just the same,
And bow and worship at her shrine—
How different this God of mine!

Almighty scar on mountain crest!
My soul seems waking from the tomb,
And I, a mite on Nature's breast,
I never knew, I never guessed,
But now I know what is, is best,
And this is God's own anteroom.

O Mother Nature, hold my hand
And steady me a little while,
That I may feel and understand
This awe-inspiring sight so grand,
God's greatest, most impressive brand
Clean-cut, and deeper than a mile.

And now I see the lightning flash,
I hear the thunder roll and crash,
While echoes through the canyon dash
Mid heaven's tears.

O Mother Nature, hold me tight
While fall the shadows of the night;
My trembling soul is all afright
With holy fears.

Almighty scar! Almighty Hand
That smote thee, who can understand

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

And who describe this wondrous land
Beyond compare?
Can mortal paint the flower's perfume,
Or see beyond the mystic tomb,
Or e'en describe God's anteroom,
So wonderous fair!

Crawford, Oswald [pseudonym] [Harris, William Richard]

- 716 1908 By path and trail. [No place]: From the Press of the "Intermountain Catholic", 225 pp. [Also published under the imprint of Chicago Newspaper Union (Chicago, 1908) under his Catholic academic title, Dean Harris.]

Includes an unusual tourist's perspective of the canyon—the view of the Inner Gorge from the bottom (p. 34).

"But the dominating feature of the terrifying scene was not so much its transcendent majesty and isolation as its air of great antiquity. Turning and looking up I saw a vast structure of adamant, of black gnessoid, shale and shist [sic], traversed by dykes of granite that were old when the waters of the great deep submerged the domes of the highest mountains."

Hathaway, Ves Q.

- 717 1908 The Grand Canyon. Santa Fe Employes' Magazine, 2(11) (October): 935-936.

An unusual poem not only for its taking note of the Peach Springs region of the canyon (its author is from Peach Springs) but also for its appearance in the Santa Fe Railway's organ after it established its well-known facilities at the South Rim village.

To those who have been born and reared
In states with floorlike land
This is a place of wonders sure,
With all its desert sand.
And everywhere the mountains high,
With many deep ravines—
It puzzles one at first to see
The ever-changing scenes.
In yonder canyon is a wall
With stones of every hue—
A seam of black, then one of red,
Then one of azure blue.
From base to top this wall is said
To measure near a mile;
The hand of our Creator here
Has left a wondrous pile.
And by this wall a river flows
Whose waters beat and dash;
O'er rock and clay it pounds its way
With never-ending plash.
A pile of rock called Sunset Peak
Is on the other side;
Around its base flows Diamond Creek,
Whose crystal waters glide.
From out a narrow canyon deep,
With walls of painted tone,
Where Nature played some wondrous freaks
But left them here alone.

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

Tonight I revel in this clime
Of stars and moonlight fair;
No brush and paint can justice do
This scenery so rare.
The sun in all its splendor bright
Seems almost out of tune,
When from its burnished portal leaps
The molten silver moon.
The gentle zephyr wafted by
From yonder mountainside
Is freighted with a fragrance sweet
As it through the vale doth glide.
And yet with all the grandeur here,
So much to please the eye,
If I could see dear home tonight
To this I'd say goodbye.

Holder, Charles Frederick

718 1908 The great American abyss. Country Life in America, 14(2) (June): 151-152.

Disjointed, and unclear as to whether this embraces a first-hand report.

"It is a waste of time to attempt to describe adequately the Grand Canyon of the Colorado; it cannot be done."—then the author proceeds to do so.

"In Colorado [sic] is the greatest of all rifts, or canyons, on earth—an abyss so deep, so wide, so beautiful and awe-inspiring that the impression as one passes on is like a dream."

Later, "How shall we look at it? As the artist who is entranced by its display of tint and hue and shade? As the poet, carried away by the solemnity of the vision? Or as the student of geology who sees aside from its beauties its true meaning, its majesty and significance?"

Illustrated with six photos, which seem to be stock images from uncredited sources.

Holt, Henry

719 1908 A foreign tour at home. II. Putnam's Monthly and The Reader, 4(1) (April): 66-73.

Grand Canyon, pp. 66-70. Begins, "The Grand Canyon of the Colorado, in Arizona, is probably, of all great natural objects known to men, the one of which it is hardest to convey an adequate idea by either words or pigments." Later, "Now I am not going to essay the impossible task of conveying an impression of the color, light effects, or even forms, except as these are naturally treated in connection with the dimensions." And on.

James, George Wharton

720 1908 Through Ramona's country. Boston: Little, Brown, and Co., 406 pp. [Reprinted 1909, 1911, 1913.]

Southern California and lower Colorado River region; although see also p. 39, reference to the author's encounter with a Havasupai man on the rim of Havasu Canyon.

Johnson, Clifton

721 1908 Highways and byways of the Pacific coast. New York: Macmillan Co., and London: Macmillan and Co., Ltd., 323 pp. (American Highways and Byways.) [Reprinted 1915, 1926.]

See "The Grand Canyon of Arizona", pp. 1-29.

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

722 1908 The Grand Cañon in storm. Outing Magazine, 52(1) (April): 88-95.

The storm descended during a trail trip into the canyon.

"All the wild medley of buttressed cliffs and lonely pinnacles became vague and evanescent. Much of what would usually have been in view was hidden altogether, or came and went with the shifting of the storm. There was no beginning or end to the world roundabout, and the only solid portion was that under our feet. The rest was a mystery of cloud and fog and a dreamland of half-discerned titanic crags.

"As we neared the top we could hear a roaring sound as of surf along the seashore. It was the wind in the trees at the crest. Now the rain turned to snow, and when we climbed out of the cañon we came into a world of white with a wild wind whirling the flakes and buffeting the fog that rose in weird baffled masses from the yawning valley depths.

"The great gorge was a vacancy of gray mist, and some new arrivals inquired where the cañon was, anyway. One man after looking down into the void and trying vainly to penetrate its vapors said: 'I and my two daughters come here yesterday to see the cañon, and the trip has cost me a lot of money. I must go away by the next train and I haint seen a dern thing but snow and fog. I'd no business to have come at this time of year. March is a mean month. It ought not to be allowed.'

However, I was satisfied, and I wondered if at any other time of year I could have had such varied and beautiful visions of the marvelous chasm as those I witnessed while I was there in the uncertain March weather."

Le Play, Albert E.

723 1908 Notes et croquis : d'Orient et d'Extrême-Orient. Paris: Moreau Frères, 428 pp. [In French.]
(transl. 'Notes and sketches: from the East and the Far East')

Tour around the world; year(s) not indicated but preface dated July 1908, which notes, "Mes notes journalières, les lettres écrites aux miens, ainsi que des documents récoltés en cours de route m'ont servi à écrire ce livre : ce sont les impressions d'un spectateur souvent ignorant, d'un voyageur un peu pressé, mais d'un observateur impartial." (transl. 'My daily notes, the letters written to my family, as well as documents collected along the way have served me to write this book: they are the impressions of an often ignorant spectator, of a traveler in a bit of a hurry, but of an impartial observer.')

Grand Canyon, see pp. 409-410, plate facing p. 410:

"15 juin

"Après avoir traversé l'Eden Californien, avec ses forêts d'oran gers, de citronniers, d'abricotiers, de pêcheurs, qui entourent Los Angeles, le verger du monde, je suis arrivé dans l'Arizona. [¶] C'est dans cet Etat que se trouve un des sites les plus prodigieux que l'on puisse contempler; c'est le grand Cañon du Colorado. La première description en a été donnée par le major Powel [sic] qui, en 1869, descendit le Colorado sur une distance de mille milles. On peut le suivre sur une longueur de deux cent dix -sept milles et sa profon deur varie entre mille et dix - sept cents mètres. La distance entre les falaises à leur partie supérieure, mesure de cinq à dix milles.

"La rivière qui coule dans cet étonnant défilé a une centaine de mètres dans sa plus grande largeur. Les murailles du cañon, irrégulières, sont terrassées et découpées en des myriades de tours et crêtes, de teintes variées.

"Le grand Cañon du Colorado est un des spectacles naturels les plus impressionnants; devant un tel bouleversement géologique, l'esprit reste d'autant plus confondu qu'il s'attend moins à un pareil spectacle. Lorsqu'on monte aux frontières du Sikkim, on se trouve en présence d'un massif montagneux, le plus grandiose du monde; on éprouve à sa vue un sentiment d'admiration plutôt que de surprise; devant le grand cañon de l'Arizona, la formation de ces gorges colossales, dans le but de livrer passage au Rio Colorado qui paraît bien petit, est déconcertante. On dirait que l'eau a entraîné des érosions progressives du sol, en même temps que se produisait une élévation lente du roc. Sur les parois du cañon, on peut suivre toutes les assises, depuis les formations carbonifères jusqu'au granit." (ENTIRE NOTE)

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

(translation)

'June 15

'After crossing the Californian Eden, with its forests of orange trees, lemon trees, apricot trees, peach trees, which surround Los Angeles, the orchard of the world, I arrived in Arizona.

'It is in this state that is one of the most prodigious sites that one can contemplate; it is the Grand Canyon of the Colorado. The first description was given by Major Powel [sic] who, in 1869, descended the Colorado a distance of a thousand miles. It can be followed over a length of two hundred and seventeen miles and its depth varies between one thousand and seventeen hundred meters. The distance between the cliffs at their upper part, measures from five to ten miles.

'The river flowing in this astonishing defile is a hundred meters at its widest point. The walls of the canyon, irregular, are terraced and cut into myriads of towers and crests, of various hues.

'The Grand Cañon of the Colorado is one of the most impressive natural spectacles; in the face of such a geological upheaval, the mind remains all the more confounded the less it expects such a spectacle. When one climbs to the borders of Sikkim [in India], one finds oneself in the presence of a mountain range, the most grandiose in the world; one feels at the sight of it a feeling of admiration rather than of surprise; in front of the great canyon of Arizona, the formation of these colossal gorges, with the aim of giving passage to the Rio Colorado which seems very small, is disconcerting. It seems that the water caused progressive erosions of the soil, at the same time as a slow elevation of the rock took place. On the walls of the canyon, one can follow all the foundations, from the Carboniferous formations to the granite.'

McLeod, Malcolm James

724 1908 A comfortable faith. New York, Chicago, Toronto, London, and Edinburgh: Fleming H. Revell Co., 2nd ed., 191 pp.

See pp. 23-24. One of the experiential things that come up from time to time is the re-telling of visits to Grand Canyon, which regretfully too often only re-tell, in butchered form, events that in the first place may never have happened as such. This is one such retelling, although one that adds some personal reflections on the reported event:

"Last February a man was telling of a visit he had been making to the Grand Cañon of Arizona. As he stood on the verge of the chasm, looking down a mile sheer into the yawning gulch, and then thirteen miles across to the hither wall, he was speechless. His eyes welled up with tears. His flesh began to creep and his hair to move, as though possessed by some great fright. There were two men by his side. They stood a moment looking down. Presently one of them remarked, 'Pretty big hole, Tom.' 'Och, pshaw, come on,' the other made answer. 'Let's go. I wouldn't give a paper of pins for that.' It meant nothing to him. Nothing to him that startling sweep of wonder! Nothing to him those ridges of eternal rock! Nothing to him that dreadful, indescribable void! Nothing, nothing to him! People say sometimes, 'Facts, facts, give us facts.' The facts are all about us. Alas! it is not facts we need, but eyes. Eyes to see the grandeur, eyes to see the glory, eyes to see the supernatural, eyes to see God." (ENTIRE NOTE)

McNary, J. W.

725 1908 The Grand Canyon. In: Vacation Experiences [FEATURE]. The Independent (New York), 64 (June 4): 1255.

One of many "swap stories" by "readers of The Independent". Peculiarly telegraphic and muted in its implied enthusiasm.

"Spend your vacation in camp on the rim of the Grand Canyon of the Colorado in Arizona, and the memory of such an experience will be one of the joys of your remaining years. It is so different that no other point approaches it in uniqueness of scenes and experience.

"Yes, you may have seen the Canyon—during the one to three days of the average tourist—but that is only an introduction. With acquaintanceship and a degree of familiarity with this great chasm, it reveals to you its

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

real character. Let the effect of its grandeur soak in. Make friendly overtures to its spirit, get the message it has for you. It will be a secret you cannot impart it.

"The lights and shadows of the early morning, intensified by the slanting rays of the rising sun, bring out in bold relief the prominence of the opposite side, thirteen miles distant, while the elongated shadows, shrinking with the advance of day, with the sun light invading every nook and corner, the bold cragged and irregular face of the opposite front interspersed with darkened valleys finally, penetrated by the noonday sun, the whole scene changes to a flattened wall, when the shadows begin to grow from the other side of the prominences, a constantly changing scene, a moving picture with a film of rock and crag sixty miles long and 5,000 feet from edge to edge.

"Fuel is plentiful in the forest near the hotel at Bright Angel; water may be obtained from the tank cars of the railroad company, and supplies by arrangement with any of the grocery men at Williams. Sleep on the ground, it is dry, clean and sandy; provide abundance of bedding, as the air is cool and bracing; altitude, about 8,000 feet." (ENTIRE ITEM)

Millard, Bailey

726 1908 The poet mayor of San Francisco. The Bookman, 27 (July): 467-473.

Mayor Edward Robeson Taylor. See p. 470:

"About three years ago, [William] Keith, [John] Muir and Taylor visited the Grand Cañon of the Colorado together, Muir to write an article for the Century, Keith to sketch, Taylor to receive inspiration for sonnets (of which he wrote several on the spot) and all to enjoy a great outing. There is much of the rollicking boy in each of these rare old men, and the fun they had on the journey was, according to the somewhat conflicting stories of each—one putting the expense of the jokes upon the others—of a droll and whimsical nature, though it did not mar their appreciation of the natural wonders they saw.

"I had a great time in the cañon," wrote Taylor to me, "with Muir and Keith, and was moved to some writing."

"When I afterward saw him and asked about this book of sonnets on the Grand Cañon, he repeated:

"Book of sonnets! Can't you let me off easier than that? Behold the total: Four sonnets, twenty-two lines on a lizard seen in the Petrified Forest, and nineteen six-line stanzas on "Bass of Bass' Ferry" whom we accidentally met and who interested me greatly. The human animal beats trees and cañons. Of course they lie in different planes and can't with propriety be compared; but in the matter of interest what can exceed or come up to the human animal?"

Reichel, Willy

727 1908 An occultist's travels. New York: R. F. Fenno and Co., 244 pp.

Translation of Reichel (1906). Grand Canyon, see pp. 55-56:

"On the way through Arizona, I branched off to the Grand Cañon. The accessible part of this immense gorge has a length of two hundred and seventeen miles, and a vertical depth of 6000 feet, and is thirteen miles wide at the point from which visitors generally view it. The author of 'Etidorpha'* ought to have had his journey to the Under World commence here." (ENTIRE NOTE)

"**Etidorpha or The End of the World*, by John Uri Lloyd."

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

Santos, Maria Clara da Cunha

- 728 1908 America e Europa : impressões de viagens. Rio de Janeiro: Typ. do Instituto Profissional Masculino, 326 [327] pp. [In Portuguese.]
(transl. 'America and Europe: travel impressions')

The author accompanied the professional travels of her husband, José Americo dos Santos, an engineer. In 1904 he attended the 8th International Geographical Congress in the U.S. that offered a transcontinental rail tour to Mexico, which also visited the Grand Canyon (pp. 155-156):

"Chegamos ao Grande Canyon depois de cinco dias e de cinco noites de incessante viagem. Que beleza e que deslumbramento! Ahi falhamos um dia todo. Tomamos carruagens e fomos percorrer os pontos mais interessantes desse extraordinario lugar, que de um modo superior impressiona e abala a nossa imaginação! Foi, seguramente, esse ponto, um dos mais interessantes motivos para a longa e dispendiosa viagem dos congressistas. Nunca pensei em vêr espectáculo tão maravilhoso como do Grand Canyon! • • •

"A vista, por mais perfeita, não alcança, não pode abranger a esse colossal Canyon, cujas paredes, em camadas successivas, apresentam diversas côres e propriedades que fazem a delicia dos geologos cientistas. Disse-me um professor que de perineio com aquellas rochas enormes e aquellas terras avermelhadas, existiam camadas de preciosas pedras, sobresalindo o rubim e a granada. • • •

"E' uma beleza que arrebatá e impressiona até aos proprios incompetentes, como eu, que só tinha olhos para admirar e ceração para seutir que só Deus poderia ter feito uma obra assim tão imponente tão extraordinaria!"

(translation)

"We arrived at the Grand Canyon after five days and five nights of incessant travel. What beauty and what awe! There we spent a whole day. We took carriages and visited the most interesting points of this extraordinary place, which in a superior way impresses and shakes our imagination! It was, surely, this point, one of the most interesting reasons for the long and expensive trip of the congressmen. I never thought of seeing a spectacle as wonderful as the Grand Canyon! • • •

"The view, however perfect, cannot reach, cannot encompass this colossal canyon, whose walls, in successive layers, present different colors and properties that delight geologists. A professor told me that in the midst of those huge rocks and those reddish lands, there were layers of precious stones, especially ruby and garnet. • • •

"It is a beauty that stuns and impresses even the incompetent, like me, who only had eyes to admire and the certainty to feel that only God could have done such an imposing work, so extraordinary!"

Skinner, Emory Fiske

- 729 1908 Reminiscences. Chicago: Vestal Printing Co., 358 pp.

See p. 313. An unenthusiastically straightforward abstract: "At the conclusion of our visit in this city [Albuquerque], we decided to go and see the Grand Canyon of the Colorado. We took a Pullman car and arrived at our destination in the forenoon and stopped at the Hotel El Tovar, which occupies a site seven thousand feet above sea level and is close to the rim of the canyon. It is built of pine slabs and stone and is from three to four stories high. It is very attractive in appearance and has the accommodations usual with a first class hotel. In nearby buildings were displayed many curious articles made by the Navajo Indians. A few rods from the hotel was a cliff where one might look thirteen miles across the canyon to the other side, and also look down to where the river flowed, a mile below. The chasm is stupendous; how or when Nature formed it, has never been satisfactorily explained; but the magnitude of it impresses the onlooker with a sense of the wonderful power of Nature." (ENTIRE NOTE)

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

Tolman, William

- 730 1908 [Remarks.] In: Proceedings of the Nineteenth Annual Convention of the National Association of Life Underwriters, Berean Hall, Auditorium, Los Angeles, Cal., August 18, 19, and 20, 1908. Boston: The Standard Printing Co., p. 137.

The speaker's name given only as "Mr. Tolman"; his full name is given in the index. Remarks during a "Five-Minute Topics" session on, "Is Twisting Ever Justifiable?" (The term "twisting" pertains to the unfavorable act of life insurance twisting, when an agent misrepresents facts in order to replace a client's existing policy with that of another underwriter.) Includes a peculiar interaction with the canyon, one perhaps apocryphal, for the sake of his audience:

"I arose in the early morning and left my little hotel, the 'Hotel Telford,' [sic] to see the sun rise in the most horrible, strangest, wildest place in the whole world, the Grand Canyon of Arizona. I went to sleep on the bench and had a dream, and I saw in the distance the clouds trying to obscure the beautiful sunlight, and I looked down in that awful chasm below, and I saw the strong colorings, the red and yellow, and overhead the beautiful velvet blue, and I saw four words plainly printed on the horizon in [the] distance two hundred and ten miles off, 'Press towards the mark.' [Philippians 3:14] We know what our duty is on twisting."

Whitson, B. F.

- 731 1908 From palm to pine. The Friend (Philadelphia), 81(48) ("Seventh-day, Sixth month 6, 1908" [Saturday, June 6, 1908]), 378, (49) (June 13): 388, (50) (June 20): 396-397.

A serialized article; see p. 388, regarding a train trip from California.

"The town of Williams is a busy place of 1500 inhabitants, employed chiefly in lumber and mining industries. A branch road to the northward carries passengers and supplies to El Tovar hotel, sixty miles distant on the rim of the Grand Canyon. The carfare for the side trip is six dollars and fifty cents, exclusive of accommodation or service at El Tovar. Two of our party had preceded us in order to visit this unparalleled gulch, said by authorities to be vaster than any other ten canyons on the face of the earth. They joined us that evening, enthusiastic indeed, but bewildered by the wonders they had seen."

1909

Anonymous

- 732 1909 Daring auto trip to Grand Canyon. Deseret News, (June 19): 2 [issue pagination].

Edwin G. Woolley, Mrs. Woolley, and Miss Arbelia Burt begin automobile trip to Grand Canyon's North Rim. A second automobile will be driven by "Chauffeur Dunlop" with David Affleck and four children.

- 733 1909 American Pharmaceutical Association; Los Angeles, Cal., August 16 to 20, 1909. Merck's Report (New York), 18(9) (September): 246-250, 252-254.

Report on the annual meeting. Includes two photos (but no text mentions): "A Ph. A. Party, 'Just Before Starting Down the Bright Angel Trail, Grand Canyon, Ariz.'" (p. 250, large group photo, not mounted); "A Ph. A. Party, 'On the path down the Bright Angel Trail to the River, Grand Canyon, Ariz.'" (p. 252, guide and eight mounted men and women [this is apparently a Kolb Brothers' photo]).

- 734 1909 Taft opens dairy show. The Elgin Dairy Report (Elgin, Illinois), 19(19) (September 27): [2].

President William Howard Taft will open the National Dairy Show on October 14 "by pressing a button in the El Toro Hotel [sic], Grand Canyon, Col. [sic], which will set the machinery in motion."

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

- 735 1909 Taft gazes into the Grand Canyon. Arose early that he might see the color effects of sunrise over the great abyss. Arizona is enthusiastic. President favors statehood but warned territory against such a constitution as Oklahoma's. Deseret News, (October 14): 7 [issue pagination].
- William Howard Taft.
- "After traveling over the deserts practically all day yesterday and being enveloped in clouds of red finely powdered dust, President Taft awoke today at the rim of the Grand Canyon of the Colorado.
- "The air at the altitude was crisp and cool, and Mr. Taft looked forward to this day of rest and sight-seeing with the greatest possible pleasure.
- "The president arose early with the desire of spending as much time as possible about the rim of the vast abyss, which in places is more than a mile deep, and that he might see the color effects of sunrise. The president's original schedule did not call for his arrival here until 9 a. m. but the lay-over at Ash Fork last night was cut in order to gain more time for the canyon trip. The president's day was made up of morning and afternoon stage trips to various points of interest about the rim of the canyon. The time was too short for any attempt to go down the trail leading to the raging muddy waters of the Colorado river at the bottom of the big cut. Luncheon was served at the Hotel El Tovar, the president being the guest of the Arizona committee."
- 736 1909 Dairy show open. Daily Commercial Letter (Milwaukee, Wisconsin, Chamber of Commerce), 53 (October 15, Second Edition, 1:30 P.M.): [2].
- "Touching a telegraph key at Grand Canyon, Ariz., 2,200 miles away, President William H. Taft opened the great dairy show at the Auditorium last night." (ENTIRE ITEM)
- 737 1909 [President Taft.] In: Events of the Week [SECTION]. The Rural New-Yorker (Rural Publishing Co., New York), 68 (October 30): 951.
- "The fourth annual dairy show was opened October 14 in Milwaukee. President Taft, from the Grand Canon of Arizona, pressed the button which started the machinery." (ENTIRE NOTE) William Howard Taft.
- 738 1909 Fest-Bummler snapshots. The American Bottler (New York), 29(11) (November 15): 43-44.
- Regarding the Fest-Bummler Band, a mostly women's band, which accompanied the transcontinental tour of the American Bottlers' Protective Association of the United States. Includes note about "Mrs. J." who was "Smiling all the way down the 'Bright Angel Trail' when big men were saying their prayers"; and "Welbrock's ambition will eventually secure him a job as a guide on the 'Bright Angel Train' [sic] for he certainly made that mule 'grunt' some." (ENTIRE NOTE)
- This item is independently appended to the article, "The Bottlers' transcontinental tour; compiled from the diary of Mrs. H. M. Worth, Hatboro, Pa[.], and illustrated with snapshots by Messrs. Fred Happersberger and R. E. Schoder", pp. 38-43, wherein Grand Canyon is mentioned [p. 40] but itself is not accompanied by photos at Grand Canyon.
- 739 1909 Japanese trade experts complete tour. Pacific Northwest Commerce (Seattle, Washington), 1(6) (December): 18-19, 23.
- See p. 23: "They paused briefly in Albuquerque and then proceeded to the Grand Canyon of the Colorado, the grandeur of which held the Japanese spellbound for the better part of a day." (ENTIRE NOTE)

Barrett, Frank N.

- 740 1909 Farm-factory-fireside. How the cannery has united all three. Trade (Detroit, Michigan), 16(8) (February 24): 10-14.
- "Illustrated lecture delivered by Frank N. Barrett, editor American Grocer, at Ryerson Public Library, Grand Rapids, Feb. 8, 1909. Seventy-five or one hundred illustrations were used, some of which are shown herewith." [not illustrated in this item]. "Years ago, when the writer camped at noon in the great Coconino forest of Arizona,

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

in a region without a house, and where the land was unsurveyed, the first object he saw was the ubiquitous tin can. And when 4,000 to 5,000 feet within the jaws of the Grand Canon of Colorado [sic], the camp fire was started, discarded tin cans were found bearing well known names, and which immediately put the memory in touch with home and familiar scenes." (ENTIRE NOTE) Compare Barrett (1896).

Bass, William Wallace

741

1909 Rhymes and jingles. Los Angeles: Arroyo Guild Press, 48 pp. [October, 1909.]

Five Quail Books—West, Catalogue Eleven, p. 5, states: "W. W. Bass published several poem books. The oldest copy known to 5QBW is dated 1909, entitled Rhymes and Jingles. All editions are scarce to rare, except the circa 1970" (i.e., William G. Bass, no date). Also a 1909 imprint of J. F. Rowny Press (printer), Los Angeles, 33 pp.

Bass's own disclaimer (p. 7): "I trust it is not necessary for me to assure the reader I am neither so foolish nor presumptuous as to assume that my crude and simple rhymes are worthy any serious attention as poems. An almost self-educated boy, sent into life early to earn his own living, who, for thirty years has been daily grappling with the pioneer and primitive problems in somewhat pioneer Arizona, can scarcely be expected to understand and apply the laws of prosody with professional skill. My jingles have given pleasure to my guests around my campfires and merely to extend the sphere of that jolly and unique experience I have presumed to insert them in these unpretentious pages." Those that pertain to his impressions and expressions of the Grand Canyon are transcribed here, which include Bass's own, peculiar rendition of the origin of the canyon.

THE GRAND CANYON

These lines are descriptive of the ride by stage from Williams to the Canyon.

Will you join me, gentle reader,
For a roam through wonderland?
I will take you to a Canyon,
Long, and wide, and deep, and grand.
We will joumey through the valleys,
And across the sandy plain,
To commune with wondrous Nature,
Seeking to her works explain.
Far away you see the grandeur;
Towering walls appear to view;
What you see there, gentle reader,
Is a mountain rent in two:
In this valley, where we linger,
Once a lake, whose reatless swell
Washed the crests of yonder mountain,
Countless ages, none can tell.
At your feet a human dwelling—
See its crumbled walls today,
Stone and mortar plainly telling
Of a race long passed away.
Who they were and what their calling,
Not even one is left to tell;
Earthquake ravages appalling,
Seething death, their lot befell.
To your right the snow-capped 'Friscos,
Towering high 'mid azure blue,
Down its slopes and through the valley,
Lava courses, plainly view.
To your left and far behind you,
Other mountains great and small;

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

Heaps of ashes, core, and cinders—
Dead volcanoes! so say all.

Now we've reached the "Colorado";
On its rocky walls we stand,
Gazing down in speechless wonder,
Never was a sight so grand.
Here a terrace, there a steeple,
Gilded spires of heights unknown,
Towering mountains, raging river,
All within these walls of stone.

Ever changing, never ceasing,
Lights and shadows, blending hues,
Granite, marble, lime, and sandstone,
Forming panoramic views.
Here we find in grand succession,
Each formation, old and new,
Gracious book of information
Nature has prepared for you.

What a field for art and science,
Poet, painter—every mind,
In this wondrous work of Nature
Fitting food will surely find.
Let us estimate its vastness,
What its age, and how 'twas made,
Join us, ye who count the ages,
One and all pray lend your aid.

For the following "Questions" and "Answers", Bass notes, "The unsatisfactory explanations of Powell, Dutton and other geologists must serve as my excuse for this composition."

QUESTIONS

Oh! where did you come from, you dirty red thing,
Born in the mountains of many a spring
Whose clear crystal waters you claimed as your own,
Mixed them with mud and lashed them to foam?
First is the "Green," and next the "Grand,"
But now Colorado, because of your sand,
Your silt and your mud; and now they do say,
That out of pure spite you hid you away
In this unearthly, inaccessible place,
So that no man could find you, or look into your face,
Except it might be as he stood on your brink,
A half-league above you and died for a drink.
But now that I've met you, come, let us be friends,
For some of your meanness you may make amends.
Come, tell me, how first you came to this place?
Have you always been rushing along at this pace?
Did you rasp out this chasm in old Mother Earth?
Or was she split open the day of your birth?
Was there ever a time in ages long past
When over her surface you graciously cast
Your life-giving fluid to clothe her in green?
I don't like to think you were always so mean.
Just think of the friends you would have if you could;
And I'm half inclined to believe that you would

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

Spread out through these valleys in the broad light of day.
Now, mad rushing River, come, what do you say?

ANSWERS

Well now, my dear boy, if you won't say any more,
I'll try for one moment to shut off my roar,
And see if I cannot hunt up the page;
Yea, now I have found it, the Tertiary Age!
In the record I keep of passing events,
Since first I set out for the mysterious hence,
'Twas then I was born, my Father, the Lake
His afternoon nap was preparing to take,
His surface was smooth, and transparent as glass,
For hundreds of miles—it's the truth, Mr. Bass.
The lesson I've learned from my Mother, the Earth,
In whose bosom I've nestled since the day of my birth.
Away down in her bowels, in the Igneous veins
She had an attack of griping and pains;
A trembling sensation, and then a great crash
That formed the Grand Canyon—that wondrous gash!
The fact is apparent that as she grew old
Her skin grew thick as her body grew cold,
A constant contraction made the inside too small.
The outside was folded, my dear boy—that's all.

COME TO BASS CAMP

If you find your health is failing,
And you need a little rest,
A trip to Arizona
I am sure would suit you best;
Just drop the cares of business,
And forget your aches and ills—
Try pure air and lots of sunshine,
As a substitute for pills.
Camp grub and lots of exercise,
A horse-back ride each day;
Sleep out beneath the stars at night—
It will drive disease away.
Become a child of Nature,
Let her take you in her arms,
She will speak to you in raptured tones,
And reveal to you her charms.
You have read about our Canyons,
And our mountains clothed in pines,
Of mysterious ancient villages,
And fabulous wealth of mines;
There's an endless store of knowledge
To be gained by one and all,
And priceless health and vigor,
Is awaiting at your call.
Now, if you're undecided
And don't know where to go,
Just write to Bass, the Canyon Guide,
Because he's sure to know;

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

His camps are full of interest,
His trails are built with care,
With rigs or Saddle Animals,
He will safely take you there.

He knows the points of interest,
Up and down on either side,
He has horses, mules and burros,
And you can walk or ride.

You can cross the Colorado
On a cable every day—
The River may be raging,
But it cannot block the way.

You can camp upon the Shinumo—
That never-failing stream,
Whose pure and crystal waters
With health and vigor teem,
Where are famous melon-patches,
And gardens on its shore;
With chickens, eggs, and vegetables.
Oh, who could wish for more!

Burton, G. W.

- 742 1909 Burton's book on California and its sunlit skies of glory : also Letters from Europe and Miscellaneous essays in literature, ethics and politics. Three volumes in one. Los Angeles: Times-Mirror Printing and Binding House, 156, 138, 210 pp.

See "Burton's Book. Vol. I. On California", where, despite the title, pp. 1-6 are boldly headed, "The Grand Canyon". (Silly us, for thinking otherwise.)

"Skyward on the great uplift of the North American continent, where Utah, Nevada and Arizona join, is a broad tableland, part desert, part forest, 6000 to 10,000 feet above sea level, and tens of thousands of square miles in extent.

"Here is the Grand Cañon of the Colorado, one of the most stupendous natural wonders of the globe. • • •

"Dante's inferno might suggest something of this great rift in the earth crust were it not that there is nothing but the opposite of gloomy in the Grand Cañon. Its various fantastic forms, its warm coloring, its limpid air and its weird spirit attract, entice, charm, enchant, entrance the mind.

"On this mountain height the sun's rays in midsummer gild the crags by 4 o'clock a.m. I was out with the first rays, and as I stepped from the door of the hotel there lay this weird wonder of the world."

Burton immediately goes into the deceptiveness of distances, and the "dark streak" of "the celebrated Granite Gorge" holding within it its "yellow tide". He goes on in this vein, then starts throwing things into the canyon, though interestingly suggests: "Place the great pyramid of Egypt in the river and the Washington Monument on its apex, and their combined height will require the aid of the tallest church steeple in Christendom to appear above the rim of the gorge . . ." Then he moves on to note the "grotesque carvings" of the canyon walls, and a brief lesson in geology at the hands of Titans. He now wrests from the hands of the writers and tourists before him the usual recitation of human-made objects seen in the canyon, and, uniquely, does something with them:

"Tourists have attempted to give names to these fantastic forms. There are the 'Battleship Oregon' and the 'Temple of Isis,' and the 'Tomb of Cleopatra.' Were the space occupied by the 'battleship' scooped out it would form a harbor large enough to hold the American Navy. Were the 'temple' hollowed out, with galleries surrounding it, all the people of California might worship within it. But the priest who served at the altar, were he Stentor himself and armed with a megaphone, could not make his voice heard through half the vast edifice. If the 'tomb' were excavated all the dead dynasties of Egypt might sleep in its vast spaces."

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

The vast forms within and along the canyon sustain new life through Burton; more than just listing the things that are there he tells novel things about what they do:

"These various forms graven here by stream, by winds and rains, present in places the appearance of great amphitheatres, in which the wild beasts of the primeval world might have fought while the Titans filled the seats as spectators. There are fortress-like creations as if here the Titans had tried to storm heaven and dethrone Jupiter. Salient angles jut out one to three miles from the main wall. Flying buttresses spring a thousand feet into the air. There are reentrant angles that cut the mountain half in two. Great bastions frown from towering heights as if to defy demons from the pit. Escarpments are cut which the very gods could not scale. • • •

His geological perspective condenses so neatly, and then he descends into that very well of time:

"So vast are the geologic eras which have passed while the Grand Cañon has been forming that the pendulum of the clock that measures time in the Granite Gorge has not swung once through its arc since the first human being looked into its wonderful depths.

"I was there one Sunday morning. Before daylight I went down Bright Angel trail alone on foot. Every two steps took me down very nearly one foot into the chasm. The limestone cliffs began to tower above me, the sandstone gorges began to yawn beneath my feet. Still down I went until the limestone was all above me, and I was among the sandstone. The sun was up and firing the red sandstone a burning red, while it brought the myriad shapes out into clear relief. At places masses of limestone in layers hundreds of feet in thickness and larger than whole blocks of six-story buildings stretching from street to street, hung above my head. Huge pines grew along the slopes to right and left. The white sandstone in gaping chasms lay below.

"Still further down the red sandstone in amphitheatres, in bastions, escarpments and flying buttresses, gleamed bright in the sun. Then I began to realize the grandeur of this great wonder of the world. A sense of overpowering awe comes over the soul. The mind becomes oppressed with awfulness. One's knees begin to shrink as if in the presence of incomprehensible powers. One's head is bent low in involuntary reverence before an unseen presence whose almighty hand is felt to have been impressed on every feature of the surroundings. • • •

"The Valley of Chamouni had Samuel Taylor Coleridge to put in sublime verse a poet's impression of its grandeur. When will arise the American poet to do some measure of justice to the grandeur, the coloring, the fantastic carvings, the gigantic architecture and the charm upon the mind of the Grand Cañon of the Colorado?"

Dadant, C.-P.

- 743 1909 Voyage N° 3. Société Romande d'Apiculture, Bulletin (Lausanne (Suisse)), 6(4) (April): 74-77. [In French.]

Third installment of a series; other parts of this serialized article are not pertinent to this bibliography.

Returning east by train, the author in a part ". . . traverser le désert de l'Arizona et du Nouveau-Mexique, quarante huit heures de chaleur et de poussière, mais avec une interruption bien intéressante d'une journée au Grand Canyon de l'Arizona, une crevasse de cinq mille pieds de profondeur et de vingt kilomètres de largeur à son sommet, au fond de laquelle coule la rivière Colorado." (transl. '. . . cross[ed] the desert of Arizona and New Mexico, forty eight hours of heat and dust, but with a very interesting interruption of a day at the Grand Canyon of Arizona, a five thousand foot deep crevasse and twenty kilometers wide at its summit, at the bottom of which flows the Colorado River.') But no more than that.

Diven, Thomas J.

- 744 1909 Aztecs and Mayas. Chicago: The Antiquarian Co., 2 volumes.

See Vol. I (248 pp.), pp. 120-121, reference to a view in Jerome, Arizona, which "influenced me as even the Grand Canyon of the Colorado did not."

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

Hamilton, Tom

- 745 1909 For all the world to see. Santa Fe Employes' Magazine, 3(10) (September): 1137-1143.

A most peculiar association—an embellished narrative of a trail trip into Grand Canyon, illustrated with stock Santa Fe photos of Grand Canyon scenery, yet it describes a trip on the trails of the Santa Fe's hostler arch nemesis, William Wallace Bass, whose guests often crossed the Colorado River to reach Shinumo Camp up Shinumo Creek on the north side. The trip is fraught with danger, including a storm and flash flood while along the creek, and account of the precarious return across the river and up to the South Rim on a washed out trail. Bass is not mentioned by name—except pointedly to the geographic feature, "Bass Tomb". Clearly this was a Santa Fe-produced item to discredit Bass. Incidentally, at this very time the railroad had torn up the platform at the Bass Station flag stop on the Grand Canyon Railway (see also in Orr, 1910), a few miles short of the terminus at Grand Canyon village, where Bass would receive his guests and take them to Bass Camp much farther west.

Howe, E. W.

- 746 1909 Daily notes of a trip around the world. Vol. I. Hawaii, Japan, China, the Philippines, Ceylon. Topeka, Kansas: Crane and Co., 2nd ed., 375 pp.

See pp. 13-25, quoted from the author's diary beginning October 29 [1905]; it is chiefly a description of the amenities to be had by taking the train to Grand Canyon more than what the canyon meant to him. (Note as well that this was but two years after President Roosevelt applauded the "wisdom of the Santa Fe railroad people in deciding not to build their hotel on the brink of the canyon".)

"Nature has done so much for the Grand Canyon that I am glad to find that man has done a notable thing on the rim of the canyon, and that notable thing is El Tovar. • • •

"I was not greatly impressed, therefore, with my first view of the Grand Canyon; principally because I did not see it first from the most favorable place [El Tovar!]. After walking and driving to the various places along the rim, and viewing the canyon from different points of advantage, I find it growing on me. Had I not engagements ahead I would remain another day. And if I should remain over another day, I should probably long for a stay of a week. . . . No picture, no description, can give you an idea of it." [ellipsis is the author's].

After giving the canyon's dimensions, he asks, "What can art do with such a canyon as that?" "And scenery every foot of the way; wonderful scenery for 217 miles, and marvelous scenery at thousands of points. That is a summary of the tremendous story. • • •

"And then think of a picture on the wall, 10x18 inches, labeled 'The Grand Canyon of the Colorado River!'"

Loveland, H. D.

- 747 1909 [Verse in "Comments" section.] In: The Grand Canyon of Arizona : being a book of words from many pens, about the Grand Canyon of the Colorado River in Arizona. [Chicago]: Santa Fe, Passenger Department, p. 118.

New to this ed.

Oh wonderous work of Master Builder's hand;
Unmeasured, vast sublime, eternal, grand.
For ages hast thou been and still must be,
Through all the cycles of eternity,
A monument unto that Power sublime,
That called thee from the pregnant womb of Time.
But not as in the ages past unsung,
Thy grandeur yet shall be the theme of tongue,
Of people and of nations yet to be,
Who, loving God, must recognize in thee,
The proof that as thou art, so God must be.

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

Mason, Harry B.

- 748 1909 The trip to Los Angeles. A daily diary written on board the Santa Fe train which took the eastern and middle-western members of the American Pharmaceutical Association to the meeting last month—interesting incidents which transpired along the way. Bulletin of Pharmacy (Detroit), 23(9) (September): 360-365. [Item signed "H.B.M."]

See pp. 362-363, and additional photos on p. 365. Additional photo also in 23(10) (October): 405.

"Friday, August 13.—Well, here we are at the Grand Canyon in Arizona—'the awful brooding chasm as deep as the ocean and as profoundly silent as the stars.' [Quoted without credit from McCutcheon (1909).] I cannot describe it, and if I made the attempt I should simply revel in adjectives and then find too few of them in my vocabulary.

"This morning at 6 o'clock we got into Williams, Arizona, the junction point where we left the Santa Fe to take the winding, climbing road up to the Canyon. We laid over at Williams for two hours to wait for a delayed Western train and meantime ate our breakfast at the very comfortable hotel beside the track—another one of the Fred Harvey inns scattered all along the Santa Fe. The air was cool and bracing and everybody enjoyed the liberty of the open after three or four days of confinement in the Pullmans. Then we all got aboard and the engine fairly groaned and puffed and wheezed as it bravely pulled us up the mountain side—a two hours' climb to the El Tovar.

"Leaving the train, we ascended the wood stairs, registered at the Tovar, left our rooms as quickly as our baggage had been deposited in them, and then with one accord we all walked out front to the precipice only 100 feet or so from the porch.

"Exclamations of surprise and wonderment burst from every one. It was a stupendous sight, fairly staggering the imagination. • • •

"But we are back now at the hotel—some of us sitting here on the porch in full view of the Canyon, while others are at the writing desks inside, feverishly sending picture postals to their friends at home and telling them how wonderful and marvelous it all is. The camera fiends are in evidence. I looked up just now to see Professor Remington and his daughter strolling along the parapet and stopping occasionally to erect a tripod and make an exposure. • • •

"But the scene is too vast, too comprehensive—it cannot be imprisoned on a camera plate. • • •

"Saturday, August 14.—Another day at the Canyon! • • •

"But the wagon drivers are a prosaic lot. 'All aboard' they yelled before we had time to satiate our souls with the mystery, and back we were driven to the hotel over those roads which are hard indeed on a man not well cushioned and upholstered by nature.

"This morning everybody was up for an early breakfast, and then about half the party mounted mules and started for the trail trip down into the Canyon itself. There was much laughter and gayety as they started off—the women with divided skirts and leggings rented for the occasion, and the men with all sorts of grotesque costumes. • • •

"Lunching at the tents on the plateau, they started back afterwards and returned to the hotel about 5.30 this afternoon. What a weary and wilted crowd they were! But they declared with one voice that they had had the time of their lives, and the rest of us had to take their word for it.

"This evening, however, they are walking with peculiar gaits, and I am told that some of the ladies ate their dinners standing up in their rooms.

"What a treat the stop-over of two days at the Canyon has been!"

McCutcheon, John T.

- 749 1909 Doing the Grand Canyon. Appleton's Magazine, 13(6): 641-648.
This is the quintessential perspective of Grand Canyon tourist humor, "illustrated with cartoons by the author", which is one of the few truly "mandatory reading" items of the Grand Canyon literature. The Fred Harvey

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

company was quick to snap up this work and distributed it as a separate booklet, too, which ran into many printings. The eight classic cartoons are also reproduced here, following key excerpts from the text. The excerpts are up to the task, but barely; like the Grand Canyon, see the real thing. McCutcheon really was there.

"In describing the Grand Canyon, one should go into a course of literary training and gradually work up to it.

"The casual tourist approaches the Canyon with some dread. He fears that he will be disappointed.

"It isn't much trouble to reach the Grand Canyon any more. A Pullman Sleeper takes you up to within a couple of hundred yards, and you are supposed to walk the rest of the way.

"You register leisurely so that you may compose yourself for the supreme moment when you are to get more sightseeing in one glance than is possible any place else in the world —

"As we sat in the comfortable hotel rotunda that evening, surrounded by everything that goes to make life pleasant and comfortable, there would come moments of silence as though each one was vainly struggling to realize that only a few feet away on the right lay that awful brooding chasm, as deep as the ocean and as profoundly silent as the stars.

"Most people go down by the Bright Angel Trail, which leads directly down from the Hotel El Tovar, and on which the round trip may be done in about eight hours. The motive power is mule-back, reenforced by a small switch which seems to have little persuasive effect, but imparts a sportylike jauntiness to the rider.

"The presence of one old lady will have a wonderful effect in bracing up the courage of the whole party.

"The caravan is halted while a young man takes a photograph of the crowd [the Kolb brothers, photographers]. When you return in the evening finished copies will be ready for you, if you wish to purchase them. Of course everybody buys a copy, for who would not give the required amount to have eternal evidence of his daring Israel-Putnam-like dash down the Grand Canyon. The photographer is very crafty, for he posts his camera in a position overhead that makes the trail look twice as steep as it really is.

"In the meantime the guide is answering time-honored questions, such as: 'Was anyone ever killed on this trail?' • • • The guide cheerfully gives the required information, whether he knows it or not.

"Many people come down and spend the night in the tents [at Indian Garden], thereby getting an experience which enables them to say afterwards, "When I was roughing it out in Arizona."

"By one o'clock you eat your lunch at the edge of the river, with mind somewhat clouded by the realization that you have to go back every foot of that long trip you have come. You do it, however, and at five o'clock the caravan returns like triumphant explorers to the hotel at the top. You look for an easy chair—soft preferred—and discuss with one another your various heroisms of the day.

"A man from Indiana who gazed at the scene in silent admiration for a half hour, shook his head and slowly remarked: "Well, sir, it does seem as though the Creator did it just to show what he could do when He tried."

"An hour later the great dining room is full of busy people, and the large lady who looked so funny in her divided skirts, now appears in a bewitching gown and a slight impediment in her walk.

"But the chief ordeal of the day is yet to come. When you go back to the hotel to smoke a final cigar in comfortable ease, you will observe a scene of frenzied activity. Every table is thronged by busy writers. It is the picture-post-card hour, and people are writing cards to everybody they know. It makes you very ill at ease. The fever is hard to resist, and you feel as though you ought to be at work also. After vainly fighting against it for a while, you give up and join the picture-post-card gang. You buy a dozen because you get them cheaper that way, and then write to your six best friends, and finally finish up the other six by writing to people who will wonder whose initials are signed to the cards.

"By ten o'clock the lounging room is empty, and you go away to dream of frightful falls, of mules leaping down thousand-foot cliffs, and of rocks crashing down upon you, inflicting lasting injury. All through the night you have hairbreadth escapes and claw your bedclothes in impotent frenzy. You die a hundred deaths, but in spite of the great mortality you are ready for a good breakfast in the morning."

. . . and thus, you have done the Grand Canyon. (The cartoons by McCutcheon are on the following four pages.)

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

Cartoons by John T. McCutcheon (1909)

"In silent contemplation."

"The start from the hotel."

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

"No danger if you don't fall off."

"As they will describe it back home."

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

"The dare-devil photographer."

"In the Hopi House."

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

"The picture-post-card hour."

"—As in your sleep you dream of things infernal."

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

750 1909 Doing the Grand Canyon. Kansas City, Missouri: Fred Harvey, 19 pp. [Also later printings.]

751 1909 Doing the Grand Canyon. [No imprint?], 8 pp.

Separate, reprinted from Appleton's Magazine, 13(6) (June, 1909). Different from Fred Harvey editions; larger format. Some Fred Harvey eds. include credit to Appleton's Magazine.

Remy, Jean S.

752 1909 The log book at the canyon. Santa Fe Employes' Magazine, 3(8) (July): 880-882.

Includes selections from visitors' registers at El Tovar and Bright Angel. Credited to Great Southwest Magazine. Never mind the limp transcriptions; Remy ends: ". . . I remember coming out in the crisp, cool, early morning 'to see the sun rise.' At least that is what we called it. Really it was being present at the creation of a world."

Rice, William S.

753 1909 Afoot down the Grand Canon. Overland Monthly, New Series, 54(6) (December): 544-550.

"Originally it was my intention to descend the canyon in the usual, conventional style, with a guide and a burro train, but when two gentlemen in the tourist party from Bright Angel Hotel announced their intention of following afoot, I promptly made up my mind to be one of them. [But] . . . the two would-be pedestrians, whose timidity overcame them at the last minute, left me to make the journey alone. • • •

The author writes of the splendid scenery as he leisurely walks down the trail. "The place was silent as a tomb—save at intervals when the faint voices of the descending tourists stole upwards through the morning air." He appreciates the birds, the pines and junipers, and eventually, in a long, descending paragraph, the rocks. "The entire effect, under a brilliant sun in a perfectly clear atmosphere, is gloriously beautiful." He reaches Indian Garden, "the colony of tents . . . nestled amid a cool growth of willows", where running water "was very welcome to my parched tongue as nowhere else on the trail was there the slightest suspicion of a spring. • • •

"I decided to take the trail to the left and view the river from the top of the great granite gorge", walking out across a "miniature desert" where adding to "the sun's uncomfortable rays the unapproachable cacti often thrust their stinging spines unceremoniously into my nether limbs in a most aggravating fashion. For a while the scenery did not impress one, but when the end of the journey was reached, like a climax in a great story, the granite gorge opened up beneath the jagged, rocky shelf that hangs dizzily over the terrible abyss and offered a magnificent point of observation from which to obtain photographs. The panorama here is less extensive than from the rim, and shows up to better advantage on a 4x5 ground-glass focusing screen than the latter, which, outside of an 8x10 and a telephoto lens is a mere jumble of inconsequential ridges and furrows.

"Dwarfed by such prodigious mountain shores, which rise immediately from the water's edge at an angle so acute that would deny footing to a mountain sheep, it is not easy to estimate confidently the width and volume of the tawny, muddy flood whose dull, sullen roar faintly reached my ears. I wandered up, as though spell-bound, upon a mighty monolith or shelf of rock that commands a view up stream and down for many miles. Beyond, the river disappeared, apparently behind the mountain walls. Beneath me it slipped by with an oily smoothness for a space, and then suddenly broke into violent waves that combed back against the current and shot unexpectedly here and there, while the seething volume swayed tide-like from side to side, and long curling breakers formed and held their outline lengthwise of the shore, despite the seemingly irresistible velocity of the river. The stream is often laden with drift huge tree trunks which it tosses like tooth-picks in its terrible play."

Reminded of the long climb out, "a threatening sky and low and distant thunder murmurings protested warningly against a longer delay. • • • [A] thunder shower raged in the canyon far below, but only a few stray drops managed to reach me and moisten my clothes. For myself I did not fear, but the camera would be a wreck should there be a downpour such as we had had a few days previous.

"Nature was very kind; she waited until I was snugly quartered at the log cabin about the roaring fireplace before her tears fell. It was no gentle downpour, either. The lightning flashed and the thunder boomed and reverberated from crag to crag in a deafening bombardment. At times the log house trembled like a pine tree

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

in a gale, and the rain came down in torrents. By and bye the rage of the storm was spent, the sun peeked out through the golden rifts in the gray blanket overhead, tinging the remarkable peaks and 'ruined castles' in a deep orange-red glory. Now the whole face of nature was changed. The multitude of spires, peaks, side canyons and walls, all blended into one harmonious whole—a deep, unfathomable gorge of purple gloom, and only the most elevated peaks—the leading actors in the calcium light of this marvelous amphitheatre, caught the blood-red tints of the after-glow.

"Finally even these sun-fires died away, leaving the whole scene a monochrome of sombre violet. Just as the scene was dissolving from twilight to moonlight, several great, white, balloon-like, cumulus clouds floated up from the river, until they overflowed the rim. Slowly, majestically in spectacular grandeur they moved! The stars and the moon came out, and another phase of the canyon's moods lay spread before us, as the daylight scene in part revived in silver light, and a thousand spectral forms projected from the impenetrable gloom—'dreams of mountains, as in their sleep they brood on things eternal.' [as inscribed over El Tovar's north-facing veranda].

"Long might I have gazed and never tired of the scene, but there was a crisp, frosty tang in the September air, and I tore myself away from this enchanting scene to snuggle around the blazing fireplace at the inn where, in the cheery atmosphere of indoors, fellow tourists drawn hither from all quarters of the globe to witness this, the greatest of all scenic wonders, exchanged tales of travel that were both interesting and thrilling.

"There was the middle-aged couple from a farm in Nebraska, a prominent New York educator, tourists from Phoenix, Denver, St. Louis, Chicago and the East, Presidents of railroads, bankers, and last, but not least, many ladies and a few children.

"All who had been down to the river were enthusiastic about the trip, although none of them were unmindful of being sore from the saddle. The few new arrivals who contemplated taking the trail on the morrow, listened eagerly to the various experiences, but to not one of them did my method of 'hitting the trail' appeal. It was 'too strenuous,' they all declared, even the sore ones, and yet on the following morning I could have made the trip again without the slightest feeling of soreness or fatigue."

Smith, A. R.

754 1909 A visit to the Grand Canyon. The Educational Messenger (Seventh-day Adventists, Central Union Conference, Educational Department, College View, Nebraska), 5(20) (August 5): 2-3.

"When I found I could make the side trip from Williams to the Grand Canyon I was much pleased, for I had heard of that far-famed place and its wonders, and I was curious to see how wonderful it really was. Our train left Williams quite early in the morning, and the scenery was so different from that along the main line of the Santa Fe that I stood on the rear platform the entire distance of seventy miles, where I could breathe the cool air fragrant from the pine forests.

"When we reached the station I eagerly climbed to the El Tovar, though I was fearful that my fancies had pictured the canyon grander than it really was, but when I saw this titan chasm I was delighted to find it far more beautiful than I had dreamed. One mile deep, thirteen miles wide, and stretching far to the right and to the left, it surely is one of Nature's grandest spectacles! The sun had not risen very high, yet high enough to chase away the haziness, and the coloring of the various rock strata was most gorgeous. Words can not describe the beautiful harmony of that scene; one must see it in order to appreciate it.

"Being naturally curious to see all there is to see about any strange thing, I made preparations to walk to the river in the bottom of the gorge, seven miles from the hotel on the rim. Two others went with me—a chap from Harvard and another from Boston, and we had a splendid time even if the sun did shine in his might. When we reached the river I was disappointed; for I had heard that it was only a few feet wide but that it was very deep. It may be deep, but it is not narrow. The current, however, is quite swift and treacherous. I had also heard that the rock walls rose so high on either side that when one looked up he could see stars shining during the day. As a matter of fact, the height of the walls of the gorge varies from five hundred to a thousand feet in the vicinity of the point where the trail reaches the river, and stars can be seen only at night. One of the guides,

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

who came down with a party, said the temperature was higher that day than it was the day before when the mercury registered 120°.

"I returned alone, and I shall never forget that torturous climb up the Bright Angel Trail with only one drink of water in seven miles of Arizona sunshine, and with no breeze to cool the heat. I was surprised and disappointed to find that the view was not nearly so good below the rim as it was from the rim; as we descended the opposite walls seemed to lower, and our view became constantly more and more limited and less imposing.

"When I finally regained the rim and watched the somber shades fill the chasm as the sun sank to rest, I was delighted; and I felt many times repaid for the trouble and inconveniences of my visit to the Grand Canyon of the Colorado." (ENTIRE ITEM)

Taylor, Edward Robeson

755 1909 Bass. In: Bass, William Wallace, Rhymes and jingles. Los Angeles: Arroyo Guild Press, pp. 3-6.

A politician's paean, pandering to his host, dated June, 1904; but not all original material for Bass as he inserts some of his other verse, too.

BASS

By Edward Robeson Taylor, Mayor of San Francisco, California.

Do you know Bass-Bass of the mighty canyon
That grandly cleaves fair Arizona's breast,
The man who there has kept a famous ferry,
As many a lonely traveler can attest?
Well, if you don't, it makes my wonder grow,
For he's a man well worth your while to know.

No one could doubt that he would meet undaunted
All dangers that would dare to cross his way,
With that strong jaw, firm lip, determined bearing,
And straight-outlooking eye of glittering gray,
That to bravado surely is unknown,
But which must nurse a lightning of its own.

No counterfeited man, you'd quickly hazard,
When once you've grasped him with a gripping feel:
A man who has been lying close to Nature
Till he has got the impress of her seal;
A man who could unaided onward bear
Against the veriest devils of despair.

But he's not quiet; no, such life is in him,
You fancy nought could blind him e'en in sleep;
His utmost being seems to be o'erbrimming
With unremitting energies that sweep
Him ceaseless on, with rest for him no more
Than for the Colorado at his door.

In thrilling tones he'll tell you how the canyon
By geologic magic has been made,
Therein reciting all the various blunders
That scientists around it have arrayed,
And yet disclaiming all the time that he
Is blest of learning in geology.

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

In truth, its rocks have been to him as brothers
In closest bond for now this many a year,
And he to their innumerable, age-long voices
Has bent an eagerly attentive ear,
Until he confidently dares to feel
They would no secret from his quest conceal.

What time on time this man has seen the splendor
Of sun, and moon, and star, upon them beam,
How oft has stood in silent, awesome wonder
As roared full-mouthed their mighty-rushing stream!
No other heart so closely beats to theirs,
No other breast so much their mystery shares.

And every page that lovers of their glories
Have set at large is his and safely stored,
Accounting these of all his earthly treasures
The one supreme, inestimable hoard,
Which, like a miser, he looks o'er and o'er,
Still always wishing it were more and more.

And yet, depending not on printed pages,
Nor word of others for his gathered lore,
But rather on his own eye sharply searching
The canyon's mystery to the very core,
Still not despising e'en the smallest thing
That can to him some crumb of knowledge bring.

He views the canyon as a thing that's living,
Filled with its own all silent-moving blood,
No less than are its furred and feathered creatures,
Nor than its roaring, wonder-working flood;—
And truth, when brimmed with light's empurpling wine,
Who then can doubt it bears a life divine?

Or when mysterious dawn creeps o'er the desert,
To fold the canyon in her lovely arms,
And all its palaces, and domes, and towers,
Tremble with seeming new-created charms,
While "Navaho,"* by her in passing kissed,
Serenely glows a flawless amethyst.

All this he talks of, and of Arizona,
In stream that bears all opposition down,
For when once fairly started nothing stops him—
Opposing statement, argument or frown.
Like his own river he pursues his way,
With nothing strong enough to bid him stay.

And verse of his he pours in ceaseless torrents
From out the foaming fountains of his heart,
Where flash some sparkling gems, though somewhat lacking
In highest finish of poetic art—
Poet unique, who can at call rehearse
The multitudinous treasures of his verse!

You then might fancy him some bard archaic
Before his auditors in rapt array,
Striking his harp with passion-kindled fingers,
As burst ecstatic his triumphant lay,
While all the welkin loud resounding rang
When higher still entrancingly he sang.

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

And he has bound himself unto the desert,
Till she has giv'n him secrets of her own—
Plants that are blest with magic power of healing
Some hurt or malady to mortals known;
And these, as by the desert's own command,
He uses oft with deft and generous hand.

Upon the desert's edge, on an oasis
Made verdurous by the labor of his hand,
His home now blooms, where his beloved canyon
Stretches far on magnificently grand,
And which, with countless ages on its back,
Has carved its long, incomparable track.

And there he'll ferry you across the river
As safe as though he led you o'er the land,
Reciting all its various moods and humors
The flood has kindly let him understand,
Till hospitality throws wide her doors,
And new possessions evermore are yours.

These men of desert, forest, stream and mountain,
How large they loom before us as we gaze—
Like those great things to them as friends familiar,
Or like the stars which there all newly blaze;
And we that live in cities as we must,
Oft lean on them with simple, childlike trust.

Muse, fold thy wings; for Bass, like the Grand Canyon
Is larger than thy best can meetly sing;
Thou canst no more than modestly adventure
These insufficient leaves of pay to bring,
And thus in part discharge the debt I owe,
For Bass, you see, is worth our while to know.

* "This refers to the beautiful Navaho Mountain that swims in the purple haze about two hundred miles away."

Wilson, John L.

- 756 1909 Iowa against the world. From: Proceedings of the Southeastern Iowa Horticultural Society held at Washington, Iowa, November 18, 19, and 20, 1908; Thirty-ninth Annual Meeting. In: Report of the Iowa State Historical Society for the year 1908 : containing the proceedings of the Forty-third Annual Session held at Des Moines, Iowa, Dec. 8, 9, 10, 1908 : also transactions of the auxiliary societies. Volume 43. Des Moines: Emory H. English, State Printer, pp. 311-317.

Includes remarks on a visit to Grand Canyon.

"The only stop I made to speak of along this part of the country is the one I made at Williams, Arizona. I stopped here and took the branch road sixty miles up to the Grand Canyon of Arizona. And I just want to say to you people if you ever make a trip to California and do not stop off and see the Grand Canyon you have missed the half of your trip.

"The sight of this canyon will make you think of your creator and if you do the Bright Angel trail, clear down to river, on foot, you will think of the days of thy youth. When I started down into this canyon, the weather was about at zero with about four inches of snow on the ground; when less than one-third of the way down the snow disappeared and I was carrying my overcoat on my arm; and at half way down I found spring flowers in bloom and was in my shirt sleeves; and when I got to the bottom it was like a May day in Iowa.

"And again I say, when you get rich growing fruit in Iowa by Oregon methods and decide to spend a winter in California, don't miss the Grand Canyon." (ENTIRE ITEM)

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

Worth, H. M. (Mrs.); Happersberger, Fred; AND Schoder, R. E.

- 757 1909 The Bottlers' transcontinental tour; compiled from the diary of Mrs. H. M. Worth, Hatboro, Pa[.], and illustrated with snapshots by Messrs. Fred Happersberger and R. E. Schoder. The American Bottler (New York), 29(11) (November 15): 38-43.

The Fest-Bummler Band and "Bottler Tourists" tour to California. Grand Canyon, p. 40. (No illustrations from Grand Canyon, but see also the "Fest-Bummler Snapshots", pp. 43-44 [listed herein under Anonymous, above].)

"We arrived at the Grand Canyon 7 A. M., were transferred to Hotel El Tovar, where we had lodging and four meals. • • • We spent Saturday in seeing the Grand Canyon, which is one of the grandest works of nature. The beholder is overwhelmed by the stupendous panorama that lies wholly beneath the eye. Never was a picture more harmonious. Only by descending into the Canyon, can one arrive at anything like comprehension of its proportions. Our party used different ways of making the descent. Those on mules went the whole distance. A few of the gentlemen went part way down the trail on mules. I don't know which they enjoyed the more the mule or the canyon. I do not think the mule. Mr. H. M. Worth and W. D. Worth walked the whole distance, not experiencing much more fatigue than the riders. All declared the Canyon wonderful beyond description; and we were loath to leave it the next morning and proceed on our journey."

1910

Anonymous

- 758 1910 Weston's great walk. Santa Fe Employes' Magazine, 4 (March): cover, 39.

72-year-old Edward Payson Weston en route on a walk from Los Angeles to New York, d Grand Canyon. Peculiarly, there is no news of what he thought of the place, even in this magazine, the railway's own Grand Canyon soap box. "On February 10 he arrived at Needles, and, always resting on Sunday, he has pushed steadily eastward, deviating from his course at Williams, Ariz., to take a little jaunt of 120 miles to the Grand Cañon and return. He spent two days drinking in the glories of the cañon and then pressed forward toward Albuquerque, which city he reached on February 29."

- 759 1910 Peck and Lohr's peregrinations. Making an extended tour of the West—Will not reach New York before May 1st. Music Trade Review, 50(15) (April 9): 33.

"Carl E. Peck, vice-president of Hardman, Peck & Co., and Fred W. Lohr, secretary, who are combining business with pleasure in calling upon the western trade, were at the Grand Canyon of the Colorado a couple of weeks ago, where they were pictured in an interesting spot. Mr. Lohr writes that business is inclined toward quietness wherever he has visited, and that his orders are comfortably satisfying. They will not reach New York until about May 1." (ENTIRE NOTE) A photo is included, with legend, "Fred. Lohr and Carl E. Peck at Grand Canyon", depicting the well dressed men standing on a trail; locale uncertain.

- 760 1910 The trip to San Francisco. The Bulletin (Concatenated Order of Hoo-Hoo, Nashville, Tennessee), 16(176) (June): 2-4.

Regarding sights to be seen en route to the Annual Meeting in San Francisco. Includes the following remarks: "The Grand Canyon of Arizona is the one crowning effort of nature, not only in Arizona but in the whole world. It is a staggering gash, being over a mile in depth at the place where the railroad makes it most easily accessible. To see the canyon it is necessary to make a side trip of sixty-five miles from Williams. This trip takes about three hours, but at the end—how unforgettable is the scene and how utterly indescribable. Don't take less than two days at the canyon. One for the trip down the trail and one for a drive along the rim. Of course a week or ten days would be better, but two days will let you see much of this wonderful chasm." Several photographs accompany the article, but the "utterly indescribable" Grand Canyon is not shown.

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

- 761 1910 The excursion of the eastern chemists to the 42d General Meeting of the American Chemical Society at San Francisco. The Chemical Engineer (Chicago), 12(1) (July): 28-29.

Includes brief remarks on a dawn-to-sunset stop at Grand Canyon. "Only a few members of the party ventured to descend into the canyon and they only to one-half its depth. It is reported that the temperature was about 130 and as the only way of going down into the canyon is on burro back, the explanation why so few of the party took the trip is easy."

- 762 1910 Enthusiasm. In: Some Santa Fe Smiles [SECTION]. Santa Fe Magazine, 4(11) (October): 75.

Anecdote about a woman from Emporia, Kansas, fainting at Grand Canyon. Humor, after William Allen White.

- 763 1910 Four Twentieth Century trains for bankers' trip. Railroad Men, 24(2) (November): 31-33.

"On the way out the party stopped at the Grand Canyon of the Colorado, in Arizona, where many a banker for the first time found himself short of superlatives in trying to describe this yawning freak of Western nature." (ENTIRE NOTE)

- 764 1910 [Artist William Ritschel.] In: In and Out the Studios [SECTION]. American Art News, 9(5) (November 12): 3.

Begins with the note that Ritschel "returned last week from Colorado [sic], where he spent the summer painting the Grand Canyon."

- 765 1910 [Artists at Grand Canyon.] In: Art Notes [SECTION]. Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, Bulletin, 5(16) (December 24): 392.

"Thomas Moran, Edward Potthast, DeWitt Parshall, Elliott Daingerfield and F. Ballard Williams, who recently visited the Grand Canyon of the Colorado, have returned from their trip, and, according to the American Art News, they appear to have had an excursion singularly free from misadventure. They saw the Canyon in all its phases and aspects, in the varied and contrasted coloring of dawn, mid-day and sunset, and even in a snow storm, and the results of their trip and study will doubtless be seen at the coming exhibitions the coming winter and spring.'" (ENTIRE NOTE)

Atwood, Wallace W.

- 766 1910 The annual report of the Secretary for the year 1909. In: Annual Report for the Year 1909. Chicago Academy of Sciences, Bulletin, 3(3): 6-26.

See p. 22, notice of lecture, "March 5—'Studies in Geology: The Grand Canyon of the Colorado River.' By Dr. Wallace W. Atwood, Secretary of the Academy." (ENTIRE NOTE)

Bass, William Wallace

- 767 NO DATE Poems. [No imprint], 8 pp. [Ca. 1910-1916.] [Five poems on the Grand Canyon and Colorado River, in whole or in part.] [4<sup>3</sup>/<sub>8</sub> × 7<sup>3</sup>/<sub>4</sub> inches.]

Crawford, Jack [Crawford, John Wallace]

- 768 1910 Whar' the Hand o' God Is Seen and other poems. New York: New York Lyceum Publishing Co., 152 pp.

See "God's Anteroom; The Grand Canyon of Arizona", pp. 18-19. Reprints Crawford (1908), but differs by printing the last word as "fair?" (versus "fair!" in 1908).

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

Dauthendey, Max

769 1910 Die geflügelte Erde : ein Lied der Liebe und der Wunder um sieben Meere. München: Albert Langen, 547 [548] pp. [In German.]
(transl. 'The winged earth: A song of love and wonders across the seven seas')

A travelogue in verse. See the contiguous sections, "Grand Canon im Colorado-Gebirge" [sic] ('Grand Canyon in the Colorado Mountains'), pp. 511-513; "Am Weltabgrund" ('At the world abyss'), pp. 513-516; "Sieben Schaukelstühle" ('Seven rocking chairs'), pp. 516-517. These sections include material that pertains to the writer's observations in Williams, Arizona, and ends with reflections on sitting on El Tovar's veranda; but because this is a unique travelogue (in Fraktur, too), rather than expressly a poetic vision, the entire sections are transcribed. (The translation that follows farther below is provided only as a courtesy to those who do not read German, offering a general sense of the text, stanza by stanza; it is not meant to be relied upon as a careful, sensible translation of the nuances of the original verse.)

Grand Canon im Colorado-Gebirge

Station Williams

Fort von Los Angeles, der Stadt der Königin der Engelscharen, war ich zwei Tage jetzt im heißen Eisenzuge hingefahren,
Bis ich dann ankam an der Erde größtem Abgrund, der war so breit und tief, als ob mein Fuß dort an dem Ende des Planeten stund. Auf viele hunderte und hundert Meilen die Riesenschluchten hier mit vielen tausend Abgrundkeilen
Der Erde rote Rinden tief zerteilen. Man sagt, es leide hier die Erd' an Wunden, die nimmermehr vernarben, nie mehr heilen und immer rotgetrocknet offen stunden. —
Und hier droht einst dem Erdball End' und Tod. Hier soll die Erde, diese Kugel Kot, in ihren brachen bunten Rinden sich einst im letzten Kampfe winden,
In Teilen auseinanderkrachen. Denn tiefer als Gebirge sich sonst zur Höh' aufmachen, verschwinden hier zur Tiefe hin die Gründe, in deren Länge, deren Breite die Augen dir erblinden.
Du kannst des Abgrunds Ende nirgends finden, es können deine Blicke sich über dieser Spalte Riesenweite hinüber nur durch Luft mit Luft verbinden.
Und in der Runde, uferlos für deine Augen, deine Hände, stehst du hier vor der Erde einstiger Todesstunde, stehst du vor dieser gähnenden Gebärde oben auf grünen Waldeswiesen
Vor einem einzigen, großen, roten Abgrundriesen, wie vor dem Totenbette deiner Erde. —

Die Cowboy-Station Williams

Eh' ich den Grand Canon erreichte, sah ich im Spätnachmittag Williams an, die winzige Cowboy-Station. Und nachts erst keucht bergauf der Zug zur Bergregion, auf eine waldbestellte Platte, Wo ich am Morgen dann den großen Weltabgrund dicht an dem Waldhotel zu Füßen hatte. —
Williams liegt flach, mit kaum drei langen Straßen, hölzern auf einem Feld, das kahl und brach. Cowboys, mit
Lassobündeln an den Sätteln, erscheinen in der Abenddämmerung,
In Hemd und Gurt und Hose, gleichwie Geschosse in den staubigen Wolken, auf kleinen Pferden und reiten durch die leeren Sassen mit ihrem Freiheitsdrang in den Gebärden.
Da stehen Budenladen, in Staub und Rasenerden wie versunken, die mit Reklamelettern prunken und in den leeren Fenstern einladen in der Prärien Öde
Zum Kaufe von viel eisernen Gespenstern, Automobilen, Nähmaschinen und Telephon und Schreibmaschinen; und diese Worte wirken hier in dieser Wüste endlosem Revier in ihrem Ton
Wie Bracks von fernstem Hafenteile. Die alten, grünen Spiegel in den Bars und den Salons erglänzen jetzt nach Sonnenuntergang.

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

Und selbst die Stars der großen Städte, die schreien hinter dem Büfette mit Blechgewalt aus Grammophonen um die Wette. Und Cowboys mischen sich den Brandygrog an den Bartischen, an den langen, Und wischen sich den Bart ab an den Wangen von jungen, fahrigen Dirnen, die sie sich im Vorübergehen fangen, die, aufgeputzt und abgenutzt, von einem Barhaus in das andre sprangen.
Trutzig trinkt, kaut, raucht, haut, schreit, schimpft und speit die Cowboyschar, als ob sie mitten in Newyork hier war. Und war doch, von der Welt weit abgeschnitten und verschlagen,
Nur eine kleine Gilde, auf ihren Kleppern dürftig nur beritten, im kargen Steingefilde. Und weil sie alle hier nur für ihr eigen Leben, nur ganz allein für sich,
Für niemand als für sich, im öden Land hier waren, so müssen sie sich atemlos das Leben in die Ohren schrein und haben nichts sich als Geschrei zu sagen.
Denn ihrer Lebenszeit, in diesen Prärien der Einsamkeit, gilt nur der Trutz als höchster Putz; und ihre Herzen leerer jagen als Wracks, die niemals heim mehr finden, in Wildnisse verschlagen.

Am Weltabgrund

Am nächsten Morgen steh' ich oben am Grand Canon, im braunen Holzhotel, drinnen die Halle, voller Büffelköpfe, bei mächtigen Kaminen hockt, Behaglich ausgeschmückt mit Jagdschloßblauen, und gern als Gäste Milliardäre lockt. Im Garten stehen neugepflanzte Bäume, die, ohne Schatten, noch auf Laub und Breite warten.
Vom Hause fort, hinter dem letzten Baum kaum hundert Schritt, trittst du an einen meilenlangen Raum, der, dir zu Füßen, dich erschreckt verwundert. Du siehst nur eine Tiefe ohne Ende, und drinnen, wie entzündet von farbigen Flammen ohne Fesseln, Stauen sich Felsenbuchten in Erdenschlünden und Erdkessln, gleich hunderttausend roten, blauen, grünen, grauen, weißen, gelben gigantischen Riesensesseln.
Sie steigen aus dem bodenlosen Raum und schweben auf der blau und violetten Tiefe, als wären sie der Platz für alle Unterwelten.
Als ob die Hölenfürsten und alle Engelscharen sich hier die Gessel für den Jüngsten Tag hinstellten, so dehnen sich Millionen von Arenen
Und ründen sich mit feuerfarbenen Thronen. Es ist ein riesig rosiges Gebirge dort unten in den unbekanntem Gründen. Die Höhen aber ragen nicht herauf.
Glatt an der Kugelfläche dieser Erde enden, in einer Linie, alle platt. Es ist, als hat man hier auf Meilen, ins Innere der Erde, die mächtigsten Gebirge eingerissen, Und drinnen tief sieht man nicht mehr die Wurzeln von jenen unergründlich tiefen Keilen. Die Ferne fort in einen violetten Nebel lief.
Und niemand rief über den Weltabgrund jemals ein Wort. Kein Ruf aus einem Mund, kein Schal erreicht den unsichtbaren Jenseitsort hinter dem Nebeltuch im leeren All. —
Jede Arena, die du eingebuchtet unten siehst, ist stundenweit und wie ein Muschelohr gewunden.
Und tagelang und tagetief sind diese Windungen, die runden; und wie in einem Irrgang, und ohne daß du dir ein Ende in diesem Chaos in der Tiefe dort gefunden, Hältst du die beiden Hände vor die Augen, erschrocken, wirr. Du siehst die Blutfarbe von deinen Fleischgeweben auch in dem Abgrund in der tiefsten Erdennarbe leben.
Vom dunkelsten Karbon bis tief hinab zu dem archaischen Gneis liegt hier die Bläue toter Adern, zerschnitten wie der Erde treue Pulse,
Als hätten sie hier langes Kadern und hätten hier entsetzten Kampf gelitten. Und mitten in den Tälern, den zerfetzten, liegt hier die Wunde, wie ein Welttheater,
Der Neugier in der Runde offen. Du findest nirgends hier von diesem Schauspiel je das Ende. Du kannst die Gegenstände drunten nicht erkennen,

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

Die Meilenzahlen, die die Felsensessel drunten trennen, nicht mehr nennen. Ich sah tief unter mir ein weißes Papier, nicht größer als ein Zeitungsblatt;

Das aber war ein riesiges Hotel auf einer Felsenstufe in den Schlünden; und was ich sah, war nur das Dach im Felsgewirr, Das lag wie ein Papier so klein und flach im halben Abgrund unter mir.

Es war, als hätt' sich hier ein zackiger Planet einst wie ein ungeheueres Rad in das Erdinnere hineingedreht; und nun blieb ewig, wie gefärbt vom Feuer zweier Leidenschaften, Durch die Millionen Jahre fortgeerbt, die Wunde rot und aufgebrochen in unserer Erde siebenfarbig haften. Und hier wird einst die Todesstunde, hier einst der Jüngste Tag der Erdenwelt, wenn sie zerfällt unter den Todeshieben, hier dieser Stelle zugeschrieben.

Hier an der Waldesschwelle, wo ich stand, und die sich „glänzend Engellager“ nennt, sagt man, fahnen Erzväter und Erzengel dann auf ihre Sessel hin in heiligen Scharen.

Und in der Tiefe in den Schlünden, wo sich pechschwärzlich die Gesteine ründen, erstehen die Sesselbeine aller Sterblichen, die fortgegangen, um den Tod in seiner Tiefe zu ergründen,

Und die sich dann von neuem hin zum Leben sehnen. Und in den tausend purpurnen Arenen, auf blau und violett und weiß und rosigen und gelben Felsensesseln sitzen, der Todesfesseln bar,

Dort Schar bei Schar paarweis die Glücklichen, die sich zum Lichte wieder retten und sehen an ihr Sehnen, allein dann in der Fieberklarheit.

So geht die Sage von dem Weltgericht, die hier am Abgrund groß andächtig und gesprächig spricht. — Ich ließ die Luft des warmen Kiefernstandes, der kühlen Waldbergeichen, von Moos und Matten und der bleichen Birken Duft

Um mich und meinen Schatten an dem Waldweg streichen und fühlte überall bei Harz und Rinden, als könnt' ich hier den ersten Lufttrunk aus meiner Heimat wiederfinden.

Und dicht schien mir die Heimat durch die Luft genaht, trotzdem mich noch ein letztes, großes, liebent' Meer, leer, von der Liebsten trennen tat.

Nichts scherte mich der rote Höllenabgrund, der wildgerippte Kreuz und Quer; es ging die Waldbien' honigsuchend, und Sommerwärme nebenher.

Lag auch die Erde aufgerissen mit rot und blauem Felsgedärme, und hielten dort im Engellager Erzväter heute schon Gericht

Über der Menschheit gut und schlecht Gewicht, mir war es recht. Mich quälte nicht die Tiefe jener Schlünde, die hier noch keiner zählte, und denen jeder Boden fehlte.

Die Füße stießen mir nicht hier an aller Erde Ende. Ich sah die Felsenwände nicht zerriffen. Ich sah sie nur wie einen Haufen rosiger Seidenkissen,

Die drunten durcheinander und rund umhergeschmissen. Ich sah nicht Höllenschlote, sah nur die Abgrundfarbe wie zweier Menschen herzerblühte und tiefverliebte Röte;

Und nirgends sah ich Todesnöte und nirgends wildzerschlissen Erdenwunden. Mir war, als hätt' ich hier für meine alte Sehnsucht endlich ein offenes Hochzeitsbett am Ende dieser Welt gefunden.

Sieben Schaukelstühle

Unter der Mittagsonne brannte rot, unauslöschlich in dem siebenfarbigen Feuerton, der Grand Canon. Ich ging zurück im Waldstück, das sich das „glänzende Gezelt der Engel“ nannte.

Und ich erkannte, daß ein Name in der Welt oft mehr enthält, als uns beim ersten Hinschaun in die Augen fällt. Die schwersten Reisetage lagen hinter mir, das durfte ich laut sagen; und überall, wovon ich jetzt geschaut, sah ich die Welt, auch wenn sie Schlucht und Felsen mir in meine Wege stellt,

Glänzend wie ein Gezelt der Engel ragen. — Ich habe die Veranda im Hotel El-Tovar aufgesucht, die lag im Morgenstundenmeer

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

Mit Schatten kühl und nah dem Waldgewühl und war noch leer. Nur große sieben Schaukelstühle hatten im Luftzug Kurzweil dort.

Der Morgenwind kam her und rührte bald den einen, bald den andern an, und ich kam auch heran und setzte mich hinzu, und mit mir sahen in den Wald

Die andern sechs der Stühle. Und wir begannen alle schaukelnd ein Wiegen und ein Wandern. „Es schaukeln jetzt daneben sechs Engel jener Meere,

Die hinter dir schon liegen,“ sprach ich still glücklich vor mich in die leere, „und mit dem siebenten mußst du nicht weit mehr fliegen.“ Da meckern höhnisch plötzlich aus dem waldigen Garten

Berg-Ziegen, die im Sand dort scharren. Und meine Augen starrten auf ein Indianerhaus, das machte mich jetzt völlig wach, als lachte es mich aus mit Dach und Wand. Meerweit war ich noch fern von meiner liebsten land!

Wohl sind sechs Meere hinter mir geblieben, doch ach, wie viele Meereswellen trieben noch Schabernack, gleich diesem Ziegenpack vor mir,

Die sich die Stirnen stoßend rieben. — Die Heimat lag noch fern im grauen Sack. „Nein,“ sagte ich mir dann, „auf sieben Stühlen hier

Sitzen nicht Engel überwundener Meere nah bei mir. Mein Herz, es dreht sich zwischen Luft und Schmerzgefühlen.

Ich glaube, daß jetzt hier um mich, weil ich so sehr verzagte, der siebenfache Geist von sieben Städten der Indianer, die man in der Provinz die ‚sieben Sterbenden‘ jetzt heizt,

An meiner Ruhe nagte. Die sieben Städte liegen nahe hier, im Bergrevier, und ihre müde Seelenwelt um meine kreist.“ — So sagte ich zu mir.

Ich habe mich auf meine festen Füße vom Schaukelstuhle wieder aufgerichtet und sah mich bald erhaben, bald vernichtet, bei Engeln und bei Sterbenden, am Ende aller Welt,

Zwischen die Wollust und den Schauder gleichwie an einen Scheideweg gestellt, und mußte bald Geplauder und bald Erschrecken fühlen, —

Sogar bei sieben leeren Schaukelstühlen.

(translation)

Insofar as verse is difficult to capably translate while retaining the author's sense, the translation that follows is provided only as a courtesy to those who do not read German, offering a general sense of the text, stanza by stanza; it is not meant to be relied upon as a careful, sensible translation of the nuances of the original verse.

Grand Canyon in the Colorado Mountains

Williams Station

Leaving Los Angeles, the city of the Queen of the Hosts of Angels, I had now traveled two days in the hot iron train,

Until I arrived at the world's greatest abyss, which was so wide and deep as if my foot were standing at the end of the planet. For many hundreds and hundreds of miles the giant gorges here with many thousands of abysses

Deeply part the red bark of the earth. It is said that the earth here suffers from wounds that will never scar, never heal and always lie red and dried open. —

And here one day the globe will end and die. Here the earth, this ball of filth, shall one day writhe in its broken colorful bark in the last struggle, Crack apart in parts. Because deeper than mountains otherwise rise to the top, the grounds disappear here towards the depths, in whose length, whose breadth your eyes go blind.

You can't find the end of the abyss anywhere, your eyes can only connect with air across this gigantic gap through air.

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

And in the round, boundless for your eyes, your hands, you stand here in front of the earth of the hour of death, you stand in front of this yawning gesture above on green forest meadows

Before a single, great, red abyss giant, like before the deathbed of your earth. —

The Williams Cowboy Station

In the late afternoon, before I reached the Grand Canyon, I looked at Williams, the tiny cowboy station. And only at night does the train pant uphill to the mountain region, onto a slab cultivated with forest,

Where in the morning I had the great abyss of the world at my feet close to the Waldhotel. —

Williams lies flat, with scarcely three long streets, wooden in a field that is bare and fallow. Cowboys, with lasso bundles on their saddles, appear at dusk,

In shirt and belt and trousers, like bullets in the dusty clouds, on small horses and ride through the empty seats with their desire for freedom in their gestures.

There are stalls, as if sunk in dust and turf, boasting billboards and inviting in the empty windows in the prairie wasteland

For the purchase of many iron ghosts, automobiles, sewing machines and telephones and typewriters; and these words have an effect here in this desert endless territory in their tone

Like brackishes from distant harbors. The old green mirrors in the bars and saloons now gleam after sunset.

And even the stars of the big cities, behind the buffet, they shout loudly from gramophones in competition.

And cowboys mix the brandy grog at the bar tables, at the long,

And wipe their beards on the cheeks of young, erratic whores they catch in passing, who, dressed up and worn out, jumped from one bar house to another.

The cowboy crowd defiantly drinks, chews, smokes, hits, screams, scolds and spits as if they were here in the middle of New York. And yet, cut off from the world and devious,

Only a small guild, poorly mounted on their nags, in the barren stone region. And because they're all here just for their own lives, just for themselves,

Were here in the barren land for no one but for themselves, they must cry their life out breathlessly in their ears and have nothing to say to themselves but shouting.

For in their lifetime, in these prairies of loneliness, only defiance counts as the highest finery; and chase their hearts emptier than wrecks that never find home, lost in wilderness.

At the world abyss

The next morning I stand up at the Grand Canyon, in the brown wooden hotel, inside the hall, full of buffalo heads, squatting by mighty chimneys, Comfortably adorned with hunting lodge whims, and willingly attracts billionaires as guests. In the garden there are newly planted trees, which, without shade, are still waiting for foliage and width.

Away from the house, scarcely a hundred paces behind the last tree, you come to a room stretching for miles, which, at your feet, shocks and amazes you. You see only a depth without end, and within, as if kindled by colored flames without chains,

Rocky bays are dammed up in earthen chasms and earthen cauldrons, like a hundred thousand red, blue, green, grey, white, yellow gigantic giant armchairs.

They rise from the bottomless space and float on the blue and violet depths as if they are the place for all underworlds.

Millions of arenas stretch out as if the princes of the caves and all the hosts of angels were setting up their chains for the last day

And round themselves with fire-colored thrones. It's a huge pink mountain range down there in the unknown grounds. But the heights do not rise.

Ending smooth on the spherical surface of this earth, in a line, all flat. It is as if the mightiest mountains had been torn down for miles into the heart of the earth,

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

And deep inside you can no longer see the roots of those unfathomably deep wedges. The distance ran away into a violet mist.

And no one ever cried a word across the world abyss. No call from a mouth, no scarf reaches the invisible afterlife behind the foggy cloth in empty space. —

Each arena you see indented below is hours wide and convoluted like a clamshell.

And day-long and day-deep are these whorls that round; and as if in a maze, and without finding your end in that chaos down there,

Do you hold both hands in front of your eyes, frightened, confused. You see the blood color of your flesh tissues living even in the abyss in the deepest scar of the earth.

From the darkest carboniferous down deep to the archaic gneiss here lies the blueness of dead veins, sliced like pulses loyal to the earth,

As if they had long cadres here and suffered horrified struggle here. And in the middle of the valleys, the tattered ones, here lies the wound, like a world theater,

Open to curiosity in the group. You will never find the end of this spectacle anywhere here. You can't see the objects below

Say no more to the number of miles separating the rock chairs below. Far below me I saw a piece of white paper no larger than a newspaper sheet;

But this was a huge hotel on a ledge in the gorges; and what I saw was only the roof in the tangle of rocks, It lay like a piece of paper so small and flat in the half abyss below me.

It was as if a jagged planet had once turned into the earth's interior like an enormous wheel; and now remained forever, as if colored by the fire of two passions,

Inherited through the millions of years, the wound red and broken open in seven colors clinging to our earth. And here the hour of death, here the Judgment Day of the earthly world, when it crumbles under the blows of death, is ascribed here to this place.

Here at the threshold of the forest, where I stood, and which is called the "bright angel's lair," they say, the patriarchs and archangels then set out on their chairs in holy crowds.

And in the depths of the chasms, where the blackened rocks round, arise the ses legs of all mortals who have gone to fathom death in its depths,

And who then yearn for life again. And in the thousand purple arenas, on blue and violet and white and pink and yellow rock-seats fit, stripped of the chains of death,

There flock after flock in pairs the lucky ones, who save themselves to the light and see in their longing, only then clear in the fever.

So goes the legend of the Last Judgment, which speaks devoutly and talkatively here at the abyss. —

I let the air of the warm pine stand, the cool forest mountain oaks, the scent of moss and mats and the pale birches

Around me and my shadow on the forest path and felt everywhere with resin and bark, as if I could find the first air drink from my homeland.

And home seemed so close to me through the air, although one last, great, dear sea, empty, separated me from my loved one.

I didn't care about the red abyss of hell, the wildly ripped criss-cross; the woodland bees went in search of honey, and summer warmth at the same time.

The earth lay torn open with red and blue entrails of rock, and the patriarchs were already holding judgment there in the camp of angels

About mankind's good and bad weight, I was fine. I wasn't tormented by the depths of those chasms that nobody here had counted and that lacked any bottom.

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

My feet did not stumble here at every end of the earth. I did not see the cliff walls torn apart. I just saw her like a bunch of pink silk pillows

The downstairs mixed up and thrown around. I didn't see the chimneys of hell, only saw the color of the abyss like two people's hearts blossoming and deeply in love;

And nowhere did I see mortal distress and nowhere wildly torn earth wounds. I felt as if I had finally found an open wedding bed at the end of this world for my old longing.

Seven rocking chairs

Under the midday sun burned red, inextinguishable in the seven-colored fiery tone, the Grand Canyon. I went back into the forest called the "Shining Tent of Angels".

And I realized that there is often more to a name in the world than meets the eye at first glance.

The hardest hours of the journey were behind me, I was allowed to say that out loud; and everywhere I've looked now, I've seen the world, even if it puts gorges and rocks in my way,

Shining like a tent of angels tower. — I went to the veranda of the Hotel El Tovar, which faced the sea of dawn
With shade cool and close to the forest throng and was still empty. Only big seven rocking chairs were entertaining there in the breeze.

The morning wind came and touched now one, now the other, and I came over and sat down and looked into the forest with me

The other six of the chairs. And we all started rocking a sway and a walk. "There are now six angels of those seas swaying beside them,

The ones already lying behind you," I said quietly happily to myself into the emptiness, "and with the seventh you don't have to fly much further." Suddenly there was a sneering bleat from the wooded garden

Mountain goats pawing in the sand there. And my eyes stared at an Indian house, which made me completely awake now, as if it was laughing at me roof and wall. I was still far away from my favorite country!

Six seas are still behind me, but alas, how many sea waves are still playing tricks, like this pack of goats in front of me,

Who rubbed their foreheads. — Home was still far away in the gray sack. "No," I then said to myself, "on seven chairs here

Do not angels of conquered seas sit near me. My heart, it turns between air and feelings of pain.

I believe that now here around me, because I despaired so much, the sevenfold spirit of seven cities of the Indians, which in the provinces the 'seven dying' are now called, nagged at my calm. The seven cities are close by here, in the mountains, and their weary world of souls revolves around mine." So I said to myself.

I got up on my firm feet from the rocking chair and saw myself now exalted, now destroyed, with angels and with the dying, at the end of the world,

Between voluptuousness and shuddering, as if placed at a crossroads, and had to feel now gossip and now terror,—

Even with seven empty rocking chairs.

Erickson, R. J.

770 1910 Gamma Deuteron—Knox. In: Chapter Correspondence [SECTION]. The Phi Gamma Delta (The Fraternity of Phi Gamma Delta), 32(6) (April): 636-637.

Regarding the Knox College glee club trip to California via private car on the Santa Fe Railway, performing at Santa Fe Reading Rooms. "The Grand Canyon has been a great treat to us. Some of us walked down and back and are now groaning every time we have to move." (ENTIRE NOTE)

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

Finley, Harold M.

771 1910 The Grand Cañon. The Pacific Monthly (Portland, Oregon), 23(4) (April): 422.

A rewriting (not as engaging) of the poem of the same name by Finley (1906).

The spirit gave the sun a peerless brush
And bade him paint this dull profundity
With rio of prismatic lavishness
Till not one stone were gray. At his command
The zenith moon lent all her emerald,
And what were else but sombre, awful depth
Grew lurid loveliness. For setting, then,
He gave the gold day resplendent skies;
The solemn desert night a billion stars.

Here, where a bored world gapes, an obscure stream
Forever crawling to some distant sea
Has digged a cañon, thinking but to while
The æons of eternity away.

George Kleine [firm]

772 1910 Catalogue of educational motion picture films : licensed by Motion Picture Patents Co. Chicago and New York: George Kleine, 336 pp. (Printed by Bentley, Murray and Co., Chicago.)

A typewritten note in the copy in the New York Public Library reads, "this is the first catalog of educational motion pictures ever published." The catalog lists films that are available on lease to schools, theaters and other parties. See p. 65, film no. 6608: "Stage Leaving Hoppi House [sic] and Panorama of Grand Canyon. Approximate Length, 150 feet." Description reads:

"Within a stone's throw of the sheer wall of the canyon, the Hoppi House is located, an irregular stone and adobe structure built to resemble an Indian pueblo in miniature and from which point the start is usually made to Bright Angel Trail and the descent to the bottom.

"Our first picture shows a Hoppi Indian buck, squaw and papoose in the quaint garb of their tribe and changes to a very animated picture in which a 4-horse coach is loading with passengers before Bright Angel Trail. On the way a panorama of the canyon walls is unfolded to view before the audience. A stupendous picture that lies wholly beneath the eye as if the spectator stood upon a mountain peak instead of the level brink of a fearful chasm in the plateau whose opposite shore is 13 miles away." (ENTIRE NOTE)

Page 333 (General Alphabetical Index) correctly spells "Hopi House" in the title, where also is noted the lease price of the film at $19.50. (Film is cited herein as Motion Picture Patents Company, no date. The original source is not indicated.)

Harriman, Gray C.

773 1910 Seeing big things. In: Bolivar, Duke, Boys' Own Circle [SECTION]. The Circle, 7(4) (April): 249.

Notes from a January trip with his parents to Grand Canyon, Petrified Forest, Flagstaff, Montezuma's Castle, and a "soda spring". Regarding Grand Canyon: "The most beautiful place visited upon the trip is the Grand Canyon of Arizona. I stood upon the edge and looked six thousand feet below at the Colorado River, seemingly a ribbon. For eight thousand feet the river has cut through sandstone and solid granite." (ENTIRE NOTE)

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

James, George Wharton

- 774 1910 The Grand Canyon of Arizona : how to see it. Boston: Little, Brown and Co., 265 pp. [1st ed.] [Binding cloth color, red and green variants noted; green cloth is with top edge gilt.]

The acme of James' Grand Canyon life. The entire book should be on any Grand Canyon reading list.

- 775 1910 The Grand Canyon of Arizona : how to see it. Boston: Little, Brown and Co., and Kansas City, Missouri: Fred Harvey, 265 pp.

Text of foreword (pp. v-vi) significantly modified from that of 1st ed., 1910, but this version appears only in this ed.; all subsequent eds. (printings) include the original text of the foreword. Later printings under various imprints.

- 776 1910 With God in his out-of-doors. Life and Health, 25(5) (May): cover, 261-264, 280.

Continued in subsequent numbers with modified titles, each a discrete item.

- 777 1910 How to live out-of-doors. Life and Health, 25(8) (August): 470-477.

- 778 1910 What some people have found with God in his great out-of-doors. Life and Health, 25(12) (December): 750-754.

Kelly, James Louis

- 779 1910 An appreciation of American art. Fine Arts Journal, 22(6) (June): 315-323.

"Thomas Moran has explored that awe-inspiring sight, The Grand Canyon of Arizona, and brought back the greatest conception that has ever been executed, and called to the attention of the American people the world's grandest natural wonder." (ENTIRE NOTE)

Kolb Bros. [Kolb Brothers]

- 780 1910 The Grand Canyon of Arizona. Brooklyn, New York, New York: Albertype Co., 21 hand-colored photos.

Kurtz, Benjamin Putnam

- 781 1910 Studies in the marvellous. University of California, Publications in Modern Philology, 1(2): 69-244.

Expanded from the author's 1905 doctoral dissertation (as noted on p. [ii] of number). Regarding "surprise", see p. 126: ". . . who can look out now from the modern tavern-porch at the Grand Cañon of the Colorado without picturing the thrilling surprise of Cardenas and his Spaniards—when, as they advanced slowly over the mesas, suddenly, without the slightest hint of warning, they stood upon the brink of that endless, castellated chasm, doubly unusual, supremely unique, to the wondering eyes of those old conquistadores who for weeks had seen nothing but endless plain and mesa."

- 782 1910 Studies in the marvellous. London and Leipsic: T. Fisher Unwin; and Berkeley, California: The University Press, 176 [179] pp.

An offprint of the item in the University of California Publications in Modern Philology (see above) but includes a title-page that also replicates that imprint. (In this imprint see p. 58.)

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

Liefmann, Robert

- 783 1910 Aus den Gebirgen der Vereinigten Staaten von Amerika. Deutschen und Österreichischen Alpenvereins, Zeitschrift (München), 41: 59-84. [In German.]
(transl. 'From the mountains of the United States of America')

See section 4, "Der Grand Cañon des Colorado-Flusses" (transl. 'The Grand Canyon of the Colorado River'), pp. 73-74, and photo between pp. 74/75, "Powells Plateau im Colorado-Cañon", by the author. Most of the section is not about Grand Canyon, and that part that is about it is unremarkable, describing amenities and places to see. The only passages that convey any particular personal impressions read: "Ganz unten, wo der Fluß seine gelbbraunen Wasser wälzt, fühlt man sich wirklich in die Unterwelt versetzt. • • • Dem Bergsteiger würde sich in den unzähligen Zacken und Türmen aus verschiedenstem Gestein, die sich aus dem Cañon erheben, ein unerschöpfliches Feld für Kletterübungen ergeben." (transl. 'At the bottom, where the river churns its tawny waters, you really feel like you've been transported to the underworld. • • • The mountaineer would find an inexhaustible field for climbing exercises in the innumerable spires and towers made of different rocks that rise from the canyon.')

Maxwell, Everett Carroll

- 784 1910 Art and artists of the Great Southwest. Chapter IV. Fine Arts Journal, 22(6) (June): 304-314.
With regard to Grand Canyon, includes Thomas Moran and Edward Ertz.

Mitchell, Daniel Holmes

- 785 1910 God's country. Cincinnati, Ohio: The Ebbert and Richardson Co., 233 pp.

A posthumously published work, Mitchell having died, aged 27, on May 9, 1909 (as noted in the preface by "H.A.E."). It is about his travels and experiences in "God's Country", richly illustrated with photographs. ". . . although [God's Country's] boundaries include the whole of New Mexico and Arizona, a bit of Utah, Texas and Colorado, and a tiny nook of Southern California, God's Country is really separate from these. It is in them and yet not of them, as it were . . . ." (p. 11). See the concluding chapter of the book, Chapter XI, "The Grand Cañon" (pp. 216-222). Not quite the usual canyon poetics, the entire chapter is reprinted here, with its abrupt start:

"But it is in the sunset hour that the cañon is supreme. For then the air unravels the skein of its seven mighty cliffs, and spinning the colors with the sky, weaves therefrom a fabric of divine beatitude. Ere doing this, however, it awakes the cañon from its afternoon siesta, withdrawing the amber haze of dreams from its warp of monuments and strings these upon the loom of the gray-green plateau. Next it takes the woof of clouds o'er head and dyes their vapors in the sun until they are a pageant of changeful cloth of gold embroidered with lavender and green directly at the zenith and shading through mauve and saffron into scarlet in the west, where they hang like the smoke of incense low above the blue-black waving shuttle of the trees. Then, when all the threads of earth and sky are blended to its liking, it gathers these together in the basket of the winds and begins this tapestry which shall, when finished, be worthy of God's Country's twilight marriage with the day.

"But now the sun has touched the far horizon and hovers there light-footed for a little space of time, as if unwilling to depart from such a fair demesne. Parting the curtain of the clouds whose crimson folds are fringed with gold, he lingers, looking back ward toward the San Francisco Mountains, and gilds their summits with a kiss whose flaming passion shall o'erlay their snows long after he has gone. As he stands there like a lover the evening winds go by and, gathering in their perfumed fingers the needles of his rays, bear them in sheaves through the cañon to hem its monuments.

"Vishnu is there in violet, Newberry in rose, The Angels' Gateway in orange, the Palisades in blue, together with all the others we have long since found and known—Sheba and Solomon, the Viking Ships, Ayer's Peak and Zoroaster, each one appareled in a different hue—but with these such a host of undiscovered monuments that one can scarce distinguish their familiar silhouettes. Indeed, there is no rock in the cañon, no single spear of stone, but what has lifted up its crest for this vesper symphony and rises now from its purple shadow in unsubmissive splendor crowned by an aureole of air. As the moments pass new forms are found on which to drape the silken raiment of the sky, until finally the gray-green meadows are militant with towers and the cañon seems a city whose dwellings have been fashioned from infinite precious stones. The lost isle of Atlantis held not a town so fair, the empires of the world contain not one to match with it. Above, the sky itself is apple-green and flushes thence through silver into primrose in the west, where it is hidden in a band of crimson cloud. From out this pageant as it moves in unpremeditated beauty, will come to you eventually a sense of voices speaking to your soul, of soft, mellifluous voices whispering the meaning of God's Country in your ear. You can not well have come thus far upon your pilgrimage without it being spoken many times—indeed, it was carolled in the first bird's song, the mocking bird we met on Raton Mountain, it has greeted you out of the deserts, it has called from the mountain tops, you heard it at the Enchanted Mesa, and have repeated it in the Hopi prayer. These were, however, but echoes of God's Country's mighty voice, which no man may begin to comprehend until he has been baptized in the cañon's magic hues and received the benediction of its lasting majesty. For in this rockbound temple dwells the spirit of the land, the spirit whose essence is over hill and dale, on desert, mesa, mountain and in cañon, wood and field. With infinite tenderness it breathes its message, bidding all remember from what divine degree they are descended and to what heritage they have fallen heir. 'From me you came,' it says, 'to me you go, and while your term of service lasts, from out of me must come your inspiration. You are one with the sun and the moon and the stars, with the grass and the wind and the rain, and only so far as you labor with these can you win to my great ideal, or be made free of the paradise I spend my strength creating. Feel your sisterhood with the flowers, learn the language of the trees, drink deep of the inspiration which flows from a forest spring, let the desert kiss you with its heat and the cañons cool your body with their breeze, so and so only shall you prove yourself, so and so only will I give to you the ever lasting comfort of my peace.'"

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

Then follow this with "Scattered Thoughts of the Writer for Chapters IV, V, VI and XI" (pp. 223-233), specifically the finale, pp. 232-233: "But it is in the sunset hour that the cañon is supreme. For then the air collects its hues and spins them with the sky, to weave for it a fabric of divine beatitude, and then the cañon wakes its cliffs from their afternoon siesta and bids them don this bridal veil of marriage with the day. One after one these rocks come forth from their amber haze of dreams to walk the gray-green valleys in the splendor of their height, until at last their company bewilders mind and eye, and one forbears to number their unending multitude. Vishnu is there, and Newberry, and the others we have known The Angels' Gateway, Zoroaster, Sheba and Solomon, Ayer's Peak, the Viking Ships, the Palisades—but with these such a mighty host of undiscovered forms that one can scarce distinguish their outlines from the rest. Nay, even these appear more perfect than ever heretofore, for at this vesper service each monument and stone within the chasm lifts its head, however small it be, so that the slopes are militant with pinnacles and spires. So soon as each of these arise in unsubmissive grandeur they join their shadows with the rest and send these in a wild array toward the dizzy rim, as if they would hew the forest down with these slender, purple spears, and win to freedom the land which radiates beyond. Yet never do they reach it, for the moment each appears, the air flings a lariat of light around the angry crest and drawing taut the noose, compels the monument to wear the motley badge of service of the sky."

Moe, H. H.

- 786 1910 Bee-keepers as I have known them. In: Wisconsin Convention Report [as part of the "Convention Proceedings" section]. American Bee Journal, 50(3) (March): 92.

One paragraph recounts a visit to Grand Canyon with other convention attendees:

"As for our memorable visit to the Grand Canyon of the Colorado, that would be deserving alone of a longer paper than I intend to weary you with here. How our midnight sleep was disturbed by the yip, yip! and bow, wow! of the coyotes. Mr. Hutchinson and Mr. France are big bee-men, but a trip down into the Canyon scared them out. They remained on top and described us as little ants crawling along the mountain side. Wonderful scenery, indeed! The interesting gospel service Sunday morning, by the bee-keepers, in the hotel—a place unused to such services—will no doubt long be remembered. And were they not appropriate? The beautiful song, 'Not Ashamed of Jesus,' by Mr. and Mrs. York, (the latter now deceased), will not be forgotten. Dr. C. C. Miller's

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

resonant tenor voice in 'The Rock That is Higher Than I,' sounded especially inspiring in that region. A I. Root, one of the best known bee-keepers in all the world, spoke on the text 'In all thy ways acknowledge Him,' and his address also seemed very appropriate.

"But I set out to write a brief paper, and not one to put you to sleep. • • • "

Orr, H. Nelson

- 787 1910 A hike through the Grand Canyon of Arizona. The Bur (Chicago College of Dental Surgery, Alumni Association), 15(1) (January): 2-8, (2) (March): 39-46, (3) (May): 63-68, (4) (July): 95-107. [Seen also as a separately paginated offprint, 32 pp.]

Recounting a cross-canyon trip in 1909 on the Bass trails by a party of three, followed by a tour of the Arizona Strip and the vicinity of Kanab, Utah, before returning to the South Rim. James Ferriss and L. E. Daniels, despite being called "bug hunters" by Orr, were naturalists whose real focus was in malacology (the study of mollusks). Ferris, in fact, had been in the canyon before, in 1906, with Philadelphia malacologist Henry Pilsbry, when the two men spent time with Bass and crossed the canyon to Shinumo Creek. Regretfully, neither Pilsbry nor Ferriss wrote of their 1906 experiences; only producing scientific publications from their collections. (However, Pilsbry's telegraphic field notes, essentially all technical, were transcribed as Appendix 1 (pp. 65-68) in Earle E. Spamer and Arthur E. Bogan, "Mollusca of the Grand Canyon and Vicinity, Arizona: New and Revised Data on Diversity and Distributions, with Notes on Pleistocene-Holocene Mollusks of the Grand Canyon", Proceedings of the Academy of Natural Sciences of Philadelphia, 144 (1993): 21-69.) Orr, on the other hand, a dentist and Ferriss's cousin, was just "along for the ride" as it were, and he wrote this very engaging story of the 1909 trip. Their experiences at the canyon are extracted here, omitting that part of their travels across the Arizona Strip and Kaibab Plateau, and he includes a number of photographs from the expedition. The series may be unique for its rich record of an early trip on the Bass trails across the canyon, thus much of it is reproduced here (also considering the relative scarcity of the serial in which it appears). After some preliminaries between Chicago and Arizona, we pick up the story there.

"The trip was uneventful until the Little Colorado was reached; there we struck three wash-outs, one of them had taken over a quarter of a mile of track arid we had to wait for the Mexicans to lay track around it so that we could go on. Arrived at Williams Wednesday, 18th, quite late but found the Canyon train waiting for us. This train runs from Williams to Grand Canyon over a branch of the Santa Fe, sixty-five miles.

"Before starting, my cousin had made arrangements with W. W. Bass, who owns a trail, pack and saddle animals, gold, copper and asbestos mines and other things in the Canyon and whose house is on the railroad about four miles from Bright Angel Trail where the train was stopped and our baggage thrown down an embankment of about 20 feet, and we were kindly allowed to drop down on top of it. You see Bass was one of the first settlers on the Canyon rim and when he came there 25 years ago there was no railroad, no El Tovar Hotel or Harvey System, and people were brought over from Flagg Staff by stage; but it was too good a thing to leave to one or two individuals, so the Santa Fe and the Harvey System stepped in and ran a branch up from Williams, 65 miles, to the head of Bright Angel Trail, built the El Tovar Hotel having accommodations for three hundred guests, and costing over a quarter of a million dollars. All the trail owners except Bass have been driven out, and the week before we arrived they discharged a conductor because he would not put Bass off the train in the middle of the desert for talking to Canyon visitors, and the next day a construction crew pulled up the platform at Bass Station so that we were forced to make a high dive in order to land at all. When we left Chicago we expected to leave all discord, grind and strife behind; but even here in this country of pure air and magnificent beauty extends one of the smaller tentacles of a large corporation; and as we fill our lungs and breathe deeply we detect an odor which seems strangely familiar to our Chicago nostrils, that of Graft; but I think from careful observation that they might as well try to crowd the canyon off the map as to move Bass, for he is part of the canyon. • • •

"Our baggage is rescued from the bottom of the embankment and taken to the house only a short distance away, and we are taken in to meet the family and have a good meal; after which we talk over our plans and pack our outfits for the drive of 20 miles in the morning. We retire and are lulled to sleep by the gentle sighing of the wind through the great pines which tower over one hundred feet beside our windows. Early in the morning

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

we are awakened by a coyote chorus which seems very near; I grab my gun and rush to the window but it is too dark to see, so I return to bed and take another nap till we are called to breakfast just as the sun is rising. After breakfast our outfit is loaded on the four horse stage, Bass cracks his whip, and we are off for the Camp on the rim 20 miles through a country of sage and buck brush, cedars and pinion pine. The road is broken by ravines and washes; some are filled with water from the recent rain. We are going up hill all the way to the canyon rim, which fact is one of the strange things about the canyon, all the water that falls on the rim running away from the canyon instead of into it, as the rims are hundreds of feet higher than the surrounding country. We drive on five miles and suddenly without warning we emerge from the cedars and pinions on the rim, within 20 feet of the edge which drops sheer 2500 feet to the plateau below.

"The first sight of this stupendous [sic] panorama is overwhelming; we feel as if we were standing on some high mountain gazing on an enchanted world. A thousand square miles of huge architectural forms of all imaginable design lay before us. All colors known to art are here laid on in harmony by some master hand. There are great castles whose battlements rise upwards of a thousand feet and whose moats reach to the granite gorge 3000 feet below; temples and mosques with slender minarets and spires surmount a hundred mountains. We stand with bated breath in the overwhelming silence allowing our imagination full play, and it seems that all that is needed is the Genie of Aladdin's Lamp to break the spell and bring the whole Enchanted Land to life. Here on the rim at an elevation of about 6500 feet above the sea, we have our lunch and then drive on, occasionally catching glimpses of the canyon and the other rim 13 miles away, until we arrive at Bass Camp, which is made up of a one story house and three large well furnished tents right on the rim of the canyon overlooking the Mystic Spring Trail. Here we met Mr. George Wharton James, author, of Los Angeles, California, who has been a prospector and exploring companion of Bass' for the last 20 years and to whom I am indebted for a great deal of information on the canyon and the Indians of the region, and for the pleasure of his company down the trail to the river; and the memory of the swim we had together in the roaring Colorado. James has written many good books on the canyon and Indians of the country, his book on Indian Basketry is a text-book on the subject and his 'In and Around [sic] the Grand Canyon' is an authority and considered one of the best. He is under contract with a Boston firm for all that he writes.

"After supper, (yes we call it supper out here in Arizona as we are beginning to shed some of the polite usages of the higher civilization along with our 'b[o]iled' shirts, high collars and other impedimenta,) we again go over our outfit and cut it down, taking only the things that are necessary. We are assigned to our respective tents and sleep until morning when we are called early for breakfast and to get our outfits ready to pack on the burrows [sic]. Here we meet the burrows, four pack and three saddle animals with a colt thrown in for good measure and to devil Harry and keep him from getting homesick. Harry Jennings, the guide, was a tenderfoot from 'Over on the Jersey Side,' but two years of piloting tourists into the Canyon in the summer and packing ore out in the winter have made him over so that now he doesn't care whether he changes his socks or not, and his feet have taken on that dark brownish gray horn like appearance which is an indication analogous to the Chinaman who cuts off his cue,—he intends to remain in the country of his adoption.

"Old Jim, the horse that Harry rode, was a character. John, one of Bass' men, traded a gun to an Indian: for him. He had one good eye and a hole where the other ought to be; one good hip and a dimple where the other had been. He was as wise as a burro and had many of the traits and characteristics of the Indian and some of his own, one especially of being able to vanish at will almost any time or place he wanted to,—just hobble him and turn him loose with a bell on his neck and when you wanted him you might pass him in the brush ten feet away and he would not move or ring that bell until you were too far away to hear it. Sometimes we would find him on the mountain side leaning up against a boulder and you might pass on the other side of it and never see him. He was a good old horse for our trip as he could get along without water like a camel, and would rather browse on dead leaves and brush than have the best grass in the country. 'Peanuts,' my cousin's saddle animal and the only lady in the party, apparently timid and shy,—yes, she shied at every stick, stone and shadow in the trail for 300 miles,—was misnamed. If I had had the naming of her I would have called her Hellen Damnation. Every morning when we were ready to start, my cousin would mount to lead the procession as she was bell burro, and she would roll her eyes so that the whites would show all around and then 'Waltz him around again Willy, around, around, around' to the accompaniment of 'Line up there, you blank, blank, blank,' 'Get in the trail there or I'll break every bone in your blankety blank hide[']; and then with a delicate side step or two she would

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

glide into the Hooche Kooche or the Hula dance and then do the Salome Wriggle with variations. She would keep her eyes peeled and her ears pointed straight forward all day long looking for something to happen, and at night when we would unpack she would be the freshest one in the party. Then there was 'Joe' a veteran of the trail, of fine physique and comely too, a suitor of the aforesaid 'Peanuts'; but he couldn't suit her and wouldn't let the others try; 'Murphy,' a good packer and willing to follow the bell to the end of the trail; 'Jock,' inclined to object to being packed in the morning, but honest and temperate in his habits; 'Davy,' the chronic grouch, never smiled the whole trip, as he goes along his head hangs low, his ears lay back along his neck, care seems to sit heavy upon his shoulders, I guess that's why his other end's so light. Beware Davy's 'other end.' 'Casey,' the granddad of the bunch, his coat of faded gray is frazzled by the wind and weather, but his eyes burned with the fire of a soul unconquered, he was before the white man or the Indian. He saw the canyon formed and as the years roll on he seems content to carry tourists down the trail who little dream that he was the famous ass of Bible times. 'Jack,' my saddle animal, one of the original 'Seven Sleepers,' would go to sleep between strokes of the quirt and jabs of the spur and even snore contentedly as he walked along. No tsetse fly in his most virulent form could produce slumber so profound as this; consequently, I walked most of the 300 miles of our journey rather than disturb this original rest cure advocate. Last, but not least, the colt, (I will call him 'Trouble,' for he was tht and nothing more,) [sic] We were afraid to leave him behind for fear his mother, 'Peanuts' would not go, afraid to kill him after we started for fear she would return to the body; we couldn't tie him up at night because the others wouldn't leave him to feed, and when we let him go he would keep at them and drive them back on the trail four miles so that it would take half a day to find them. As we were packing and I was being initiated into the mysteries of the Diamond Hitch, Squaw Hitch and Swing Rope, I made some slighting remark about the burro we were packing and Bass gently drew me one side and whispered in my ear, 'Now Doc, don't say anything like that before the burros.' I learned later that the advice was good for as sure as we would discuss our plans in their hearing and they didn't agree with them, or remark that we would break camp for a hike in the morning, when morning came the burros would be far far away, and if they happened to hear that we would all be out of camp at the same time they would make a general raid on it, eat everything that wasn't canned, lick out all the pots and frying pans and have a good time generally.

"At last we are all packed. James is going to cross the river with us and is mounted on a horse, Harry is mounted on old Jim the horse, and Jim Daniels and yours truly on our respective burros—Jim ahead as his burro has the bell—and the rest of us bring up the rear. As we go over the edge of the rim we look down upon Le Conte Plateau 2500 feet below, which appears to be quite smooth and dotted with a growth of what seems to be sage or small brush. On the way down we pass two natural tanks, which catch the water when it rains. When the tanks were found by Bass they were full of debris which he cleaned out and cemented the tanks and covered them and they hold several hundred barrels of water which is used in dry weather. There are some Cliff Dwellings across the ravine from the tanks which are built into the wall and were undoubtedly used by the same people as storage places for grain. As we go down on to the plateau the surface presents an entirely different appearance, it is rough and broken, great boulders lying here and there, and the vegetation that looked like brush from the top is a forest of trees 20 to 30 feet in height.

"As we leave the zigzag trail and pass out upon the level plateau we have descended about 2,500 feet in a mile and a half. The plateau at this point is about a mile wide and was undoubtedly the grazing ground and garden spot of the people who built the storehouses and cisterns in the cliffs; here and there are mesal pits and other evidences of habitation. Here the trail widens and the pack animals take advantage of this and scatter and for a few minutes all hands are busy getting them in line. We mount our burros and as we ride along my burro shies, which is unusual for him, as he is generally asleep, and I look down and see our first rattler. He is coiled and ready to strike and his tail is a-quiver, emitting that peculiar sound that once heard is never forgotten. I am taken by surprise and neglect to get a picture of him, which is an opportunity that I do not have again on the whole trip. Harry kills him with a blow of his quirt and I hang him on my saddle to skin later. He is about four feet and a half long and has nine rattles, and is the color of the earth of the plateau, which is a dark red. We are told that snakes are rare in the canyon, consequently we feel quite swelled up over our find. The trail keeps to the plateau for about a mile and then turns sharply to the edge of the precipice, and we start the descent into Trail Canyon. As we go over the edge it seems impossible that any man or animal could find foothold enough to descend to the river, but we go on and look back to see how the pack animals are making it. Here and there the trail is cut from the solid rock; at other places there are natural steps three or four feet high; and some places where there are very steep inclines of loose rock the burros seem to sit down and coast, and as I look back and see them sliding down towards me enveloped in a cloud of dust, I am reminded of the old story of the 'hobo who had been kicked off the train for the twenty-third time and the conductor asked him where he was going. He said he expected to get to Frisco if his pants held out.' Bass told me that he had to put copper bottoms on some of the younger burros, but after they got older they didn't need them.

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

"The trail curves around under Le Conte Plateau and we go down and enter the marble. The canyon here is narrow, having two perpendicular walls, and as we descend and look up the distance is so great that the sky is a mere ribbon above us. As we continue to descend we wonder if it will ever end. Our knees are shaky from constantly holding back and muscles are aching that we never knew we had before.

"I have chased the festive Gu Gu through the mountains of Cebu, Negros, Panay and Bohol over country and through jungles without a trail, in the Philippines, and had reason to believe that I was 'some hiker,' but I will take off my hat to the Grand Canyon of the Colorado.

"Down we go deeper and deeper, and here the canyon begins to open out and grow wider and there is more vegetation,—yucca, amole, cactus of different varieties, beargrass and mescal.

"We are now in the dry bed of a stream which has worn into the solid rock, and as we go on we come to a great fold on our right which runs parallel to the canyon and looks as if it has been bent down while red hot to let the steam through. It is called Wheeler Fold, and the other end is visible on the left as a jagged outcropping caused by a fault or uplift of the other side. A little further on the trail doubles and turns and runs into a shut-in gorge. The upper end has been a great waterfall, and under this overhanging shelf, which is fifteen or twenty feet high, is a snug camp and Bass keeps supplies, mining machinery and trail-making tools here, and just upon the brink of the dry waterfall is a small spring in a hollow of the rock.

"From this camp we continue on over a mile and a half of black granite. We round a turn and look down upon the roaring Colorado for the first time. The river at this point is in sight for a short distance only, but there are two dangerous rapids visible from where we stand. The Grand River [sic] has 520 rapids, falls and cataracts in less than 500 miles, making a total fall of 4,500 feet. Just at this point where Bass has strung his cables the river is about 400 feet wide, 90 feet deep, and as we look down from the cage we are about 75 or 100 feet above the river, which is 30 feet higher at this time than it is when we cross two months later on our way home. Marks and driftwood lodged on the side of the wall, which is perpendicular granite at this point, show that it has been at times 60 feet higher. One of the most dangerous peculiarities of the river is the boiling up of great columns of water like that produced by the explosions of a submarine mine, never twice in the same place, so that they are unavoidable in a boat. Once, before the cables were up, two of Bass' men were crossing, and as they neared the opposite shore where a shelving bar made it possible to land, one of these upheavals of water occurred between them and the shore, throwing the boat nearly to the center of the river. Luckily they landed right side up, but had to work for their lives to get back as they were just above a dangerous rapid and the current running 20 miles an hour. Again, as they neared the shore, the water boiled up and this time on the outside, throwing them against the wall with such force that it was all they could do to keep the boat from being smashed. The cause of these submarine fountains is that some great rock that is being carried by the current is momentarily lodged on a sandbar or caught in a crevice in the bottom of the river and the current on striking this is forced upward through the surface with a rush and roar that can be heard for a mile.

"The river has been navigated in small boats by Powell, Stanton and others, but they all have lost men, with the exception of Powell; and he lost some of his boats.

"Here before us lies a monster which, if enchained and harnessed, would furnish unlimited power. In places the perpendicular walls rise upwards a mile in height. Just imagine if you can the buildings on State Street built up on either side one mile in height and this monster rushing at the rate of 20 miles an hour along the street, and you will get some idea of the most unconquerable, tempestuous river of the world.

"We are now at the river—that is, we are on a trail 150 feet above the water—and here we go abruptly over the edge of the granite and down a trail cut in the face of the wall. The burros seem standing on end and when we get to the bottom, about 50 feet, we are in a little cove about 50 feet in diameter, and the car is on our side, ready to be loaded, so we begin to unpack and load. The car is made of wood hung on four pulleys, which run

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

on two cables passing around a windlass in the center of the car overhead. This windlass has four handles on each end, and two of us go with each load to pull the car in on the other side. As we are loaded and pushed off we run down the sag of the cable like a shot out of a gun and have to crouch low to avoid the flying handles, but as we get to the center and start up the other side, the speed slacks and we begin to turn our windlass, and here is where we begin to realize that we have dropped down nearly 6,000 feet and are in the tropics; temperature 135 degrees, with a sun beating down on our heads which are bare, to avoid losing our hats in the river. We puff and blow and the perspiration runs down into our eyes, but we must hang on as there is no brake and to let go would run us back to the center of the river. Finally, as we think our arms are about to be pulled out, John, who is waiting on the other side, throws a rope which we make fast and with his help pull her up the last few feet. From my short experience I am led to believe that old Charon would jump his job if he had to run Bass' ferry. James crosses with us and we build a fire, which isn't at all necessary, as you could boil a pot of coffee or fry bacon on any of the rocks. We merely build the fire to make it more cheerful and have our lunch in the sun, as the only shade is under a small piece of canvas that we have rigged over an angle in the rock to get Daniels out of the sun, which has been too much for him.

"After lunch James and I leave the rest to pack and we find a place where we can get down the wall into a little cove, where we take off our clothes and jump into the crimson flood. The only good thing about this water is that it is cool and we have a good swim and feel much refreshed; but when we come out we are the color of the river, which is like brick-red paint and just about the consistency. James' beard, which nearly reaches to his waist, is matted with mud and my hair is being baked into a brick helmet as I dress; but for all that we feel much better for our swim. We climb back to camp, James bids us good-bye and Harry takes him across in the car, leaving it on the other side for Bass, and returns on one pulley, sitting in a loop of the rope; then we start for the Shinurno, two miles away, a mile and a half up and one-half mile down."

The poem that follows, appearing at the close of the second installment of the article, probably should have been printed in third installment, where Orr refers to "the song of the Shinumo".

THE SONG OF THE SHINUMO

As I climb the hot trail slowly
And reach the top at last,
I hear a distinct murmur
And seem to feel a gentle blast.

A cooling zephyr greets me
From the canyon depths below,
Where the Shinumo is calling
And the shadows come and go.

I see the green shoots budding,
Hear the song of welcome swell—
Come you back again to Shinumo,
Come you back again and dwell.

Get the odor of the campfire
And hear the tinkle of the bell,
As the burros round the boulder
On the trail I know so well.

Come you back again to Shinumo,
And the ferns and rocks and dells;
Come you back again to Shinumo,
Says the tinkle of the bell.

I see the shadows lengthen
As the sun sinks to his rest.
A silvery crescent now appears
Just o'er the canyon's crest.

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

The reflection on the water
Of the rosy afterglow,
And the opalescent ripples
On the streamlet as it flows,
Make a picture all enchanting,
And it calls and calls to me,—
Come and rest by shady waters
Laughing onward to the sea.
As the evening shadows deepen
Heaven's canopy is star-filled;
The song of the stream is soft and low,
The wind is hushed and stilled.
And I lie here by the campfire,
With the embers burning low,
Called to the realms of dreamland
By the song of the Shinumo.

Once across the Colorado River, to reach Shinumo Creek requires first a climb upward, then a descent into its canyon.

"As we reach the point in the trail where it begins to descend into the Shinumo Canyon, we get a view of a veritable paradise,—a crystal stream with willow-fringed banks, the water flowing over many colored stones and singing a soft low song of welcome. We are all feeling the effect of the hot sun and the climb over the rugged trail and the sight of this oasis is enough to make us wish that we might stay there forever.

"As we pass up the stream to Bass' camp, which is situated under the overhanging cliff where no rain can damage the provisions which are kept here, we are met by Tom the cat and Jim the rooster with his three wives. You see we are nearing the Utah border and Jim is the first Mormon we meet. John lives here in the summer and runs the garden and camp, and the cat and cock and three hens are his sole companions for most of the time, and they have learned to talk and make their wants known and will follow him around keeping close to his heels as he works in the garden or about the camp."

When Ferriss had been at Shinumo Camp with Henry Pilsbry in 1906, they referred to it as the "Thousand Mouse Camp" (mentioned in correspondence to Pilsbry following the 1909 trip, which was published in 1910 as "A collecting excursion north of the Grand Canyon of the Colorado", The Nautilus (Philadelphia), 23(9): 109-112). Tom the cat seems to have been a solution to the problem.

"The garden on the Shinumo is an example of what the desert land will do with enough water on it. The watermelons, cantaloupe, beans, potatoes, cucumbers, tomatoes, sweet corn and squashes were the best I ever ate, especially the melons which were very thin skinned and were exceptionally juicy and sweet. This is an ideal spot. It never snows and in the hottest days the walls are so high that there is always shade on one side, and there seems to be a cool current of air circulation up and down the canyon. The stream is clear as crystal and rapid. Rising 18 miles away in the Kibab [sic] Plateau, it drops down about 2,000 feet to the Colorado which it joins just below Bass' crossing.

"We meet Richard Kruger, a young artist from Los Angeles, who is staying some weeks on the Shinumo sketching. Mr. Kruger was an instructor for three years at East Aurora with Fra Elbertus Hubbard. When he came west he walked and sketched the whole distance.

"While Harry is unpacking, John is getting supper and I help Daniels catch a couple of lizards, which are the largest and most beautiful we have yet seen, black with orange rings and green and yellow under the throat. When supper is ready we sit down around a table which will be our last table for some time. This camp is well furnished with a large tent, table and cook stove, which had to come down on the back of a burro, and it is a four hole range at that. The stove and table are under a shelf of rock and the stovepipe runs up a crack in the wall. Shelves are built in the sides of the rock and all is as snug as a real kitchen. We are all pretty tired from our first day's journey, and so we pick out our spot on the ground and spread our blankets. It is warm enough so that we need nothing over us until along towards morning, when it gets quite cool. We have quite a time

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

getting to sleep this first night, although tired out with our trip. A few minutes after I lie down my legs begin to cramp and I have to get up and walk and rub and massage and walk and pound them to keep them from drawing up in hard knots. I am not the only one as I can hear groans and some cuss words issuing from the other blankets, after which all is still and we are lulled to sleep by the song of the Shinumo." [See the poem, above.]

"Next morning we are up early and decide to stay over a day and rest up and explore the canyon of the Shinumo. The bug hunters are off early up the canyon for shells and I go up the creek to explore the prehistoric irrigating ditches and cliff dwellings, and dig in the old habitation under the cliffs and caves. Bass has utilized the old ditches and his garden is one used no one knows how long ago by the ancient inhabitants. Mescal pits are found here and there and numerous small receptacles built in the sides of the cliff, some easy of access and others entirely out of reach. In these places I found broken pottery of different shapes and some of it beautifully marked in colors, corn cobs and stone implements. We all get back to the camp that night, having spent a profitable day. In the evening I catch some minnows in a net for Tom the cat, who is quite an accomplished fisherman, dipping them out of a bucket with his paws.

"The next morning we arc off for the Buckskin Mountains or the camp in the saddle between the Kibab and Powell's plateaus, eight miles from the camp on the Shinumo, but the trail is so rough and the sun is so hot that we only make four miles and camp in Muav Canyon on a shelf in the wall above the creek. I have named this Camp Scorpion, as every stone and stick we turned over in clearing a place to sleep had from one to three scorpions under it, so I made my bed on a large boulder on the bank of the creek. Next morning we start for the saddle, making one of the hardest climbs of the trip, going up over 2,000 feet in four miles under a very hot sun. Jim leaves us to hunt shells and loses the trail and comes in some time after we do. He is about all in from the climb and the heat. We make our camp in the saddle. Bench marks here show elevation 6,717. We can't find level ground enough to pitch tent so level off the slope and swing the tent up to a tree, make a leanto of the wagon sheet and establish a camp for ten days, while Harry goes back for more grub.

"The days are warm and the nights are cold enough for all our blankets and our heavy leather coats are none too warm after the sun goes down.

"The bug hunters are in a paradise for their business, and I busy myself by exploring the surrounding country, cleaning out springs near camp, washing my clothes and making numerous trips to Powell's Plateau, which is about a thousand foot climb from our camp and a four mile walk to the end, which is Dutton's Point, where one of the most stupendous views of the canyon and river is to be had. The top of the plateau is covered with a growth of monster yellow pine and the ground is free from brush, which makes it a beautiful park where herds of deer and numbers of blue grouse and the Kibab squirrel abound. Near Dutton's Point there is a water hole which was full when we were there. When it is dry the game and wild horses have to go to a spring which was about a mile below our camp in the saddle and there was a regular trail made by them to it. This was one of the first springs we found on our trip. The water was so cool that it was almost impossible to stand in it. I cleaned it out and built a dam with a can for a spout so that we could fill our canteens from it and made a bath room below in the stream where we could take a bath or wash our clothes. Later on when we were lost on the desert for five days and did not wash our faces for a week I remembered this place with a great deal of longing.

"On the 7th of September, two weeks had passed and no sign of Harry. The coffee has run out and we are using a small can of cocoa which will last only a short time. Potatoes are used up and we are eating bread which we make fresh every meal in a dutch oven and our bacon still holds out. This is a game preserve and we cannot shoot although we have a license to hunt. One day I went up on Powell's Plateau and ran on to four bucks and two doe and succeeded in getting within 90 yards of them, only to stand and let my mouth water and wonder how long before Harry would arrive with our provisions. But I wiped my mouth, pulled up my belt another hole and walked along. If he doesn't come pretty soon, it will be necessary, in order to save human life, to borrow some venison out of season of Uncle Sam.

"While waiting for Harry to return with supplies, I am forced to join the 'Stone Rollers' Union' in order to occupy my mind and keep from dwelling on the fact that we are slowly starving to death. The S. R. U. is composed of two men that work so hard during about ten months of the year that they call it a rest to start out in the morning on a 'hike' covering about eighteen miles up and down the sides of the mountain and roll eight or ten tons of rock, getting back to camp about dark with a handful of snails. They do this for two months and call it

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

rest. Jim will come in at night and say 'I feel as fresh as a daisy' and expects us to believe it. Daniels, who is truthful, admits that he is tired and hungry. • • •

"We are piecing out our scanty provisions with mushrooms, yucca and a kind of sweet acorn which is pretty good for lunch when you are on a hike. We are getting three kinds of mushrooms. The yucca is a cactus-like plant and tastes like a potato when it is green and roasted in the coals; when it is ripe it is quite sweet.

"The days here at this camp in the saddle are very pleasant and warm but the nights are very cold. We have had several cold rains and have built a lean-to with a wagon sheet and brush for the sides. We build a big log fire at night and it keeps us warm until along towards morning.

"September 7th Harry returns with supplies and we put in the day cooking and making plans for the trip to Mount Trumbull. • • •

After their eventful tour to Mount Trumbull, getting lost, and venturing to Kanab, they begin their journey back to Shinumo Creek, getting lost (again) and, eventually, to the South Rim. Orr finishes:

"Another day and we expect to be at our old camp in the saddle, but we take the lower trail through Quaking Asp[en] Canyon and find it grown up to scrub oak so tough and strong that it cuts the canvas from our pack and tears our clothing to tatters. A whole day spent in trying to find the trail out of this canyon finally landing at our old camp in the saddle. One day more to the Shinimo, where we get our mail, the first in two months. After a rest, we cross the river and I leave the rest of the outfit to rustle burros while I go on, arriving at Bass Camp about seven o'clock in the evening, it taking me four hours of climbing to get to camp where I find John who doesn't know me as I walk into the room ragged and with ten weeks' growth of beard on my face. The next few days are spent at El Tovar where I weigh and find I have gained fifteen pounds after a three hundred mile hike; It takes some time to get used to a bed and living in the house, but I am looking forward to the next trip to the canyon and its never ending wonders and beauty."

Osborne, William Frederick

788 1910 The faith of a layman : studies in the recoil from a professionalized religion. London, New York, Toronto and Melbourne: Cassell and Co., Ltd., 238 pp.

See pp. 63-64, pertaining to wealthy Americans "who seem not to know what to do with themselves in the quest of pleasure." As an example (p. 64), "You are staying at an hotel in the neighborhood of the Grand Cañon in Colorado [sic]. A wealthy family arrives from Chicago or New York. They announce their intention of staying three weeks. In three days they are gone."

Parsons, Charles L.

789 1910 San Francisco meeting of the American Chemical Society. Science, New Series, 32 (September 2): 318-320.

"Friday, July 8, was passed at the Grand Canyon, without question the greatest of all nature's marvels. Rides were enjoyed by many along the rim, while a number went on mule back or on foot to the bottom of the canyon, a mile below." (ENTIRE NOTE)

Pattison, James William

790 1910 Some artists represent, some interpret nature. Fine Arts Journal, 23(6) (December): 351-366.

See p. 366, remarks on Grand Canyon as portrayed by Elliott Daingerfield, De Witt Parshall, F. Ballard Williams, Edward Potthast, and Thomas Moran. No illustrations of Grand Canyon work.

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

Pease, H. Per Lee

- 791 1910 Winter wanderings : being an account of travels in Abyssinia, Samoa, Java, Japan, The Philippines, Australia, South America and other interesting countries. New York: Cochrane Publishing Co., 387 pp.

See "Back To America", pp. 192-199. Transcribed here in whole, due to its remarkable lack of effusive remarks and its informative telegraphic style—Pease in fact just jumps right in—an interestingly refreshing diversion from the usual retellings of the experience.

"HOTEL EL TOVAR [capitalizations thus], GRAND CANYON, ARIZONA, December, 1906.—He who journeys here from the East by the California limited cannot well avoid having a luxurious time. The branch of the Santa Fe leading here is given off at Williams, but at some distance east of it, at Winslow, a sleeper is attached to the rear of the train, the accommodating porter with the expectant palm transfers your baggage, you find your berth yearning to receive you, and are soon in the land of dreams. I have had such an active and strenuous time since early Monday morning that it has produced upon my mind the impression of having been here many days instead of only three. Upon reaching this hotel breakfast was ready, and a few minutes later I formed one of a party of six and was on the way over the rim and into the depths with a suddenness which was almost bewildering. In beginning the descent it did not add to our feeling of security to find that the beginning of the Bright Angel trail was much more abundantly supplied with snow and ice than there seemed to be any real need for, and we, of course, did not know but it was going to be the same all the way down. The introduction to the trail is at one of the few places where there is a perpendicular wall down to a distance not to be inspected with any degree of composure; almost at the start the zigzag gradients began, varying in length from half a furlong to 50 or 60 feet. It would be accurate perhaps to say that the average width of the trail is about four feet, and a few of the steepest grades about 45 degrees from a perpendicular.

"We had traveled about an hour when my horse suddenly stopped and held up its left front foot, refusing to go any farther. The guide came back at once and found the animal had stepped on the shoe with a hind foot, partially tearing it off and injuring the foot so that it bled freely at the side of the frog. The shoe was removed, and the poor beast limped very badly, moving with reluctance and pain. It was necessary to dismount, and, just as luck would have it, it was at a peculiarly inconvenient place, the down hill side being to the left, with a very narrow margin to go on. If I had been about to alight upon a stratum of eggs at fifty cents a dozen, or upon thin ice, this feat could not have been performed in a more cautious or gingery manner by any human being on the globe. After leading the animal a mile or so he seemed to improve to such a degree that I mounted again and stayed in the saddle except at such places and times as all were required to walk.

"One of these places is called Jacob's ladder, which includes about three zigzags and is one-fourth of the way down. Here beasts and human kind take a slide over a crooked, rocky surface, which ought to be trimmed down and straightened. A little beyond that we were overtaken by a party of four individuals including the guide; a lady from Pasadena, a young lady, and a physician, habitat unknown.

"Soon after the new regime was instituted we came to a place [Indian Garden] where two men were putting up a small dwelling, and being in colloquial and social mood I observed to one of them that he seemed to be preparing with great zeal for a life of loneliness and chronic silence. The reply was without hesitation and to the effect that he had already been down there three years and had not been lonesome yet, after which I subsided, and said no more. About half way down is a cluster of small structures with muslin sides, near them a vegetable garden in surprisingly good condition, but with no human being in sight—red, white, or black.

"We came to a rise soon after, and here the young lady who had joined us discovered she wanted a picture of the group, which she proceeded to take after much preparation and delay, the guide muttering something about wasting sunlight (burning it to quote his own language) in a most profligate manner. We approached the Granite Gorge and, looking down at one spot, saw our trail below with a sort of regular tortuosity, which had given it the name of 'The Corkscrew.' Here we dismounted and passed down that portion of the trail on foot, leading our animals, which did not seem to object to the change, then remounted, went parallel with a mountain stream for some distance, saw an opening of a mine in the solid rock to the left, and soon after noticed our guide

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

dismounting and, following suit, went on foot around a curve and saw beneath and before us the famous Colorado River, which enjoys the distinction of having done more rock dissolving than most any other stream on earth.

"The Colorado River at our stopping place is just 200 feet wide, has a gait which would put to the blush the oft-mentioned mill race, and is turbid with infinitesimal particles which it had detached from its rocky bed, for the erosion which produced this great wonder of the world is going on still, cutting the channel deeper. In contemplating it one is much more impressed with the bravery of Major Powell, who descended it in 1860 [sic] with a small party, than when he read of it in the books.

"Returning to the Granite Gorge, the guide halted at a convenient spot and rounded us up to tell about some cave dwellings to which he pointed opposite us across a part of the gorge. One was built in a fissure of the rock, which he said was four feet high, and the inhabitants must have moved about on their hands and knees after attaining adult stature. Some of the masonry still remained, held together by the wonderful mortar which primitive man of that epoch knew how to make. Near by to the left was a cave of good size and height, but the masonry which partially closed it once upon a time had been removed piecemeal by relic hunters. We dismounted a second time at the Indian garden, and when we left there sunshine had disappeared from the lower part of the canyon. In fact, we were in the sunshine only about three times in the course of the day, for the canyon is full of colossal areas of stone which had not dissolved nor disintegrated in the countless cycles of time when water occupied the entire channel, and they remain to cast huge shadows about them. The men were still working at the little shack, and I called to them with an amiable long-range smile to my cheerful friend to ask about his progress, and was assured it left nothing to be desired.

"The last quarter of the journey back was the heavy and tedious one for man and beast. The animals had not been fed at the river and had since only a drink of water for refreshment. The altitude affected them, and during the last hour of the ascent they stopped every few rods to recover their breath; I could feel the heart thumping through the sides of my horse. We were all benumbed with cold at this stage of the journey. The young physician and young lady, to whom he did not seem altogether indifferent, brought up the rear on foot, arm in arm, and whispering sweet nothings in each other's ears, consequently they reached the rim some time after dark, but we were credibly informed later that it didn't seem to worry them in the least. I assisted one of the young English ladies in getting her sister into the hotel, and we were all glad enough to gather about a big fireplace and thaw out our extremities.

"The personnel of our original party was composed of the Misses Jackson, of Derbyshire; the Misses Seltzer, of Philadelphia; the guide; and yours truly." [A photo of the mounted party is shown between pp. 196/197, "Coming down the Bright Angel Trail"; the photo is taken at trail level.] "We were treated to something out of common by the guide and his mule, which latter always objected to being remounted, would spin around in a circle, and when the man succeeded in mounting his quarterdeck, would kick and buck energetically in efforts to dismount him. We always watched these performances with great interest, by reason of the fact that our commissary department was being spun around and bucked at the same time. A guide is frequently obliged to dismount to come back and tighten a saddle girth, and many of these vaudeville performances consequently took place in inopportune and inconvenient if not dangerous places on the trail. The safety of one of the English ladies, who rode next behind the guide, was jeopardized several times in this way.

"A few rods away from this hotel and belonging to it is the Hopi House, occupied by Indians of that name, said to be the same as the Mokis, who there ply their crafts. A young squaw is weaving blankets there constantly, and the process, while crude, is very interesting to observe. Her little daughter, just beginning to walk, led me around the room a few times as if bent upon doing the honors for the tribe. At 8:30 every evening the men perform the buffalo and rain dances in this building, the lookers-on expressing their appreciation by tossing coins upon the floor to be gathered in a hat. The dances are entertaining, and more remarkable for rhythm and prolonged muscular exertion than for grace. The oldest man beats on a drum and wails aloud in the Indian way of singing. These are the Indians who can go on foot 70 miles a day, on a run most of the time. They are copper-colored, have inky black hair of very coarse texture, short of stature, rather spare, but with fine muscular development. Their features are large and coarse, but the expression of the face is not unpleasing. A young girl of about 18 who had been to school at King's Canyon [sic, Keams Canyon] could speak English quite well, could read and write it, and wanted to return to school.

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

"The ride to Grandview, which is 14 miles from the El Tovar Hotel, is through a pine forest over a moderately rough road, the journey being made in a four-in-hand vehicle with remarkably stiff springs. We were first taken to an hotel near by, warmed ourselves before a huge fireplace, and later were served with a most substantial lunch. Before doing this agreeable duty for ourselves, the boniface conducted us a few rods below the hotel and showed us a view of great scope and grandeur, the canyon being at that point 22 miles across. Beyond was the opposite rim; past that the Painted Desert, the country of 17,000 Navajos. On the horizon line was Navajo Mountain, 120 miles away, but showing up with clear definition through the pure atmosphere.

"One useful purpose served by travel beside that of being a supplementary education and manner of entertainment is that of correcting preconceived erroneous impressions, for I had assumed that from here could be seen the Colorado River ad libitum. Error; nor could it be seen at any point in the immediate neighborhood. [Ad libitum: Latin, "optional".]

"After lunch we rode to Grandview, walked down an incline of a few rods, and had one of the most extensive and comprehensive views of the canyon. While at the hotel we saw a man with his mule laden with asbestos from the mines not far away; also a string of mules tied head to tail, with bags of supplies for the copper mine down the Grandview trail, to return next day with heavy loads of copper ore.

"It is said there are timber wolves there, and we saw a coyote, going and returning. This journey occupies most of a day and should be taken by all means. O'Neill's Point is about three miles from here, and from thence we saw two small triangles of the river, not very far apart. At Grand Point [Grandeur Point], a mile or more away, we saw the people who started down this morning, looking like flies, and watched them traversing several zigzags. When we came away they were, as nearly as I could conjecture, about the place where my horse (and consequently myself) got into trouble Monday morning.

"After lunch on the third day we rode to Sentinel Point in the same four-in-hand, from whence we had a satisfactory view of the river at four different points, looking like a small creek rather than a roaring torrent. On the way back we stopped at Crow's Point [Rowe's Point], and had another superb view while standing on clay rock with protruding petrified marine shells of massive size, which one of the men of the party tried to break off for souvenirs, but unsuccessfully.

"The world has become smaller than ever since the last drive of to-day, in the course of which I sat next to an old gentleman whose face seemed familiar, and there was good reason for it, as we took the famous Celtic Mediterranean cruise together in 1902; and not only that, but he is going to New Zealand and Australia on the same steamer with my nomadic friends, who are awaiting me at Pasadena, and myself. He is from the noble Keystone State [Pennsylvania], and his name is Hartley.

"When I stood upon the so-called 'roof of the world' on Tiger Hill in the Himalayas it was the impression that I was gazing upon the greatest sight on earth, but this life is only a school, and we keep learning as we go. Tiger Hill within the past few days has been moved down just one peg in my scale of sights, and the Grand Canyon of the Colorado has supplanted its place there to remain until supplanted by honest conviction.

"Many times in other lands have I felt almost humiliated when foreigners have asked me about this canyon, the Yosemite Valley and the Yellowstone Park, when obliged to admit reluctantly and regretfully that they were unknown to me except by hearsay and the books. It should be a source of honest pride to every American to know he can truth fully say that the very greatest sight on earth, as admitted by all who have seen it, is in his own beloved land.

"This hotel is a wonder for picturesqueness and comfort, and if it were not for a steamer date looming up in the near future it might shelter and provide for me a while longer. It is built of matched logs with no interior finish. The office [lobby] is an enormous room having a large stone fireplace, with an arch to gladden the heart of any ghost of an ancient Roman which might stray this way. About the walls are hung the mounted heads of all the great American fauna (some of which are most unfortunately vanishing), the buffalo, elk, moose, caribou, black-tail deer, antelope, mountain sheep and others too numerous to mention.

"Who can describe the Grand Canyon? Many noble attempts have been made, but by reason of the very limited area I have seen, to say nothing of a paucity of adjectives in the superlative degree, I will refer Dispatch readers to the standard books on this subject. What most people want to know is what it is like to descend and

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

return. Many visitors come here and content themselves with seeing what they can from the rim, and some think it the best way. When it is realized that that canyon is approximately as long as from Pittsburgh to Harrisburgh [sic], as wide as from Union Station to Hawkins Station, and as deep as from the court house on Grant Hill to the Carnegie Library in Allegheny, one should know how hopeless a task would be an attempt at anything like an accurate description.

"And it is all the product of erosion, caused by the solvent properties of water aided by the mechanical effect of the current, silent as the desert night, ceaseless as the advance of time, resistless as the approach of the winds, and the rushing river of to-day is the lineal and atrophied descendant of the mighty stream which has wrought this crowning of the earth."

Potts, James Henry

792 1910 My gift to thee : present time verses. Cincinnati: Jennings and Graham, and New York: Eaton and Mains, 235 pp.

See "The Grand Canyon", pp. 47-48:

Arizona! Arid zone!
Nature's niche with grandeur sown!
Evolution's wildest freak!
Earthly wonder most unique!

See that yawning Canyon Grand!
See its sunken mountains stand!
See its mighty river roll!
Feel its depth within your soul!

O'er the gulf your vision cast;
Gauge the distance, blue and vast;
Search the depths, so calm and clear;
Quell your doubtings, curb your fear.

Note the towering pictured walls,
On which dazzling sunlight falls;
Red and purple, azure gray;
Tinted rock and painted clay.

Study those fantastic forms
Chiseled out by Titan storms;
Ancient capitols and domes,
Phantom ships, and mystic homes.

Stand in awe at chasm brink!
Wierd-like [sic] inspiration drink!
Think of God and boundless space!
Bow the knee and veil the face!

"Here's the end!" my spirit cries;
Other scenes may greet my eyes;
But till heaven its sights unfold,
Canyon Grand first place shall hold.

Rust, David D.

793 1910 From Salt Lake to the Grand Canyon. Improvement Era, 13(5) (March): 408-412.

A charmingly brief telling, by a Mormon entrepreneur, of an uncommon trip to the North Rim, in the shadow of greatly increasing visits (bolstered by the Santa Fe Railway) to the South Rim. Recounted here in its entirety, the article includes several large photos by Rust, which double the number of printed pages.

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

"Fredonia, the nearest settlement to the north rim of the Grand Canyon, exhibited about as much commotion last June upon hearing the exhaust of an automobile as did the early inhabitants of the Hudson at the chug, chug of Fulton's Folly. And a month before there was about as much faith in the promise of such an opportunity as Bridger had in the production of corn in the Salt Lake valley. But such are the surprises wrought by the miracles of mechanical improvement and industrial advancement.

"Since his visit to the Kaibab country with Senator Smoot and others, in the autumn of 1902, Mr. Gordon Woolley continued to express and cherish a desire again to look into the marvelous Titan of chasms. To satisfy this longing, two motor cars were steered down through the counties, rougher and wilder as you go, towards the Buckskin Mountains, that might as well be a thousand miles away.

"It is not expected, nor wished, that the Grand Canyon will ever become as familiar to people of Salt Lake City as is Garfield Beach or Lagoon. The God of the wilderness will see to that. But space will shorten. The actual distance between the two places is four hundred and twenty-five miles. Ox teams went in twenty days; horses in two weeks; a combination of railroad, stage and pack outfit, six days; automobiles did it in four days, and may do it in two; Pullman cars may run it from sun to sun;—and the end is not yet.

"There has been a call to the city. There is now a call to the wilderness. The temples, spires, turrets, monuments, domes,— all the forms of architecture of the mountains—are more inspiring than the works of man. Solitude is as necessary as society. The awful depths, the pinnacles of glory, and the gloomy shadows of the canyon, give the keenest impressions, and would be fitting for a sacred excursion.

"With Mr. Woolley were his wife and four children. Mr. David Affleck, Mrs. Woolley's sister, and 'Sandy,' the 'chauf'—all of Salt Lake City. They were joined at Kanab by E. D. Woolley and others.

"The roads were discouraging enough. The people were worse than the roads. All along they were met with that old 'You'll never get there,' both from those who knew and those who didn't know the requirements of automobiles. There were rocks and stumps and washouts; there were creeks to ford, and deserts of deep sand; there were narrow, crooked dugways that would puzzle Ben Hur. Yet they went and returned with slight need for repairs.

"The cars deserve special mention. One was a big 'Thomas,' 60-horse, a type of the famous car that went around the world. The other was a pattern of the Vanderbilt cup-winner. They were pioneers—and they looked the part.

"The racer took the lead through the forest, with Gordon Woolley at the wheel. 'Uncle Dee' was by his side with his ax and pick, living up to his promise and prophesying to the people as he passed that this was forerunner to a railroad. But they kept on doubting.

"The way they chased along through woods, across ravines, down the slopes to the very drop of the canyon wall,—it would have seemed a proper sequence if they had kept right on, amid air, till, like a bird, they withered from view, or landed safely on the opposite brink.

"And this will be done. The most distinguished tour of the next decade will be across the canyon in an airship, a mile above the Colorado. Yet all around are men who squint their eyes and say, 'You'll never do it.'

"Who can judge the significance of the automobile trip of a little more than eight hundred miles? These two cars left their tracks in a strip of country that has been 'a hiss and a byword.' They cannot be erased. They may serve as a stamp of growth. It is as impossible to forecast what may follow, as it is to tell the course of the roots of that quaint pine on a rocky peak. Pioneers have always builded better than they knew."

The Grand Canyon!

II. To, Into, and Expressing the Canyon

Skarstedt, Ernst

- 794 1910 Intryck och minnen från en sommarresa till östern. Prärieblomman Kalender för 1911 (Rock Island, Illinois), 11: 51-77. [In Swedish.]
(transl. 'Impressions and memories from a summer trip to the east' in 'The Prairie Flower Calendar for 1911')

An account of a Californian's trip to the East, in 1910. Grand Canyon, see pp. 72-75. The entire recounting, which is stuffed inside an even longer paragraph no less, is as follows (with translation afterward). He is not an easy one to win over.

